59 In Barrett v. Denver Tramway Corp. I specifically sought instructions from the Circuit Court whether the district judge in passing on the question of fairness of a reclassification or recapitalization plan was bound under Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 58 S.Ct. 817, 82 L.Ed. 1188, 114 A.L.R. 1487, to apply state law or whether the lower federal court might apply its own independent test as to "fairness". On the date of the opinion in the case at bar, the Circuit Court has not as yet filed its decision in the Barrett case. I am, therefore, following the same course I took in MacCrone v. American Capital Corp., i. e., applying first the litmus of the Delaware decisions, followed by an independent "federal" examination of the plan to test the question of fairness.

Another test shows the Class A stockholders were fairly treated from the standpoint of their interest in defendant's assets. The defendant's assets may properly be measured by capitalizing earnings. There was offered in evidence a calculation of the probable post-war income of the defendant. The average annual income for the years 1939–1941, for example, after providing for preferred stock dividends and all other prior charges, was $1,137,532. Class A stockholders receiving 78.7% of the new Common stock would, therefore, be entitled after the amendment to 78.7% of these earnings, or $895,237. Capitalizing this sum at 6% will yield a value of $14,920,628, which, compared with $13,881,429, discloses more than $100 per share and more than the aggregate par value of all the Class A shares, assuming that they had an actual par value of $100 per share. Thus, on the basis of prospective earnings, it is apparent that plaintiffs were fully compensated for their former interest in defendant's assets. This is one of the methods applied in this circuit in Hottenstein et al. v. York Ice Machinery Corp., D.C.Del., 45 F.Supp. 436, affirmed, 3 Cir., 136 F.2d 944. That case involved the fairness of the treatment of a class of 7% Cumulative Preferred stock in a merger. On the basis of the Ice Company's balance sheet, the common stock was under water. The district court, nevertheless, found that the merger which gave something to the common was fair to the preferred stockholders. At page 438 of 45 F.Supp., Judge Watson said:

"The question of fairness here involved relates only to the distribution of the stock of the resulting corporation as between the preferred and common stockholders of the defendant. The value of the preferred stock, if the common stock has any value, is approximately $10,000,000 including accumulated dividends. Therefore, if the value of the interest which the preferred stockholders receive under the plan of merger is as much or more than $10,000,000, it certainly is not so grossly unfair as to shock the conscience of the court. And, insofar as the interest given to the preferred stockholders has less than that value, the plan approaches the point at which it must be deemed so unfair that the merger should be enjoined.

"* * * Neither side offered testimony as to the probable future earnings of the company. The evidence received dealt only with the past earnings of the company up to September 30, 1941. While the past earnings of a corporation are ordinarily of considerable value in estimating probable future earnings, in the present case they are insufficient to form the basis of anything but the wildest guess as to the probable future earnings. The amount of income available for stock dividends has varied as much as a million dollars in the ten years prior to September 30, 1940, and over that period the corporation suffered an operating loss of approximately $150,000. On the other hand, the evidence also reveals that the defendant had an income subject to sinking fund arrearages, available for dividends in the year 1941 of between $800,000 and $1,200,000. Under the plan of merger, the preferred stockholders receive eighty-three and two-tenths per cent. (83.2%) of the stock of the resulting corporation. Therefore, if the lesser figure for 1941 were considered as an approximation of the probable future earnings of the company, there would be available for dividends on eighty-three and two-tenths per cent. (83.2%) of the stock the sum of $665,600, or six per cent. on approximately $11,000,000.00. Thus, again, the evidence received fails to establish that the plan of merger is unfair."

It is clear, then, on asset basis the amendment will meet any reasonable test of fairness.

(b) The market values of the shares of the two classes sustain the percentages upon which the amendment was based. During practically the entire period from June, 1932, when the Class A stock and the old Common stock were originally issued, down to the date of the amendment, the market value of the shares of these two classes on the New York Curb Exchange stood in the ratio of one or more for the old Common to eight for the Class A. Since these shares were traded upon the free exchange their price is a good indication of what investors thought was the relative value of the two classes of stock.[60] This is especially significant since the stated ratio existed long before there was any thought of the present amendment.

(c) The amendment treated the Class A stockholders fairly from the standpoint of defendant's earnings. I think that in appraising the relative values of two classes of stock in a going concern, earnings are a matter of much importance. Cf. In re United Light & Power Co. D. C.Del., 51 F.Supp. 217, affirmed In re Securities and Exchange Commission, 3 Cir., 142 F.2d 411. The recent earnings of defendant would divide between Class A and Common stock on a per share basis after giving the Class A their full $7 per annum when earned, the ratio of approximately eight to one. Plaintiffs contend, however, that the recent earnings were unusually good and that the recent years are the only years in which the ratio did hold good. True, the ratio did hold good only in recent years, but it must be remembered that the company in 1936 commenced a major expansion program which cost approximately $10,000,000 and, consequently, the earnings of recent years are the only ones which reflect this expansion program. In view of this fact and the anticipated post-war expansion, it is reasonable to take only the recent years in considering the earnings of the company. Upon the basis of recent earnings and reasonable prospective earnings the amendment is fair to the Class A stockholders.

There was much evidence offered relative to the future of the rayon industry in the United States. There is some agreement and I think the testimony supports the conclusion that the rayon industry is a growing industry in the sense that production and consumption will continue to increase in the post-war period. Plaintiffs, however, offered much testimony to indicate that productive capacity would be so great that there would probably be a recurrence of the price war which existed in 1938 and that while production and consumption might expand, profits would tend to decline. This may prove to be the case, but I do not think that plaintiffs have met the burden of proof (which is on them) that such will be the fact. How far plaintiffs' proof falls short of sustaining their burden is made clear by the following illustration: Prior to the war Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, France and Germany in the order named, were the chief rayon exporting countries. It is quite apparent that the enemy countries, where so much fighting is going on, will not be able to immediately regain their prewar competitive position after the termination of hostilities; and it may be that the peace sanctions imposed on certain of those countries will withdraw them as competitors or, at least, greatly weaken their position in world markets.

(d) On the basis of various intangible factors the amendment treated the Class A stockholders fairly. Evidence offered by defendant (which I accept) shows that upon a consideration of certain intangible factors the directors were justified in allocating 21% interest in the new Common to the holders of the old Common stock. The most important intangible factor was the surrender by the old Common stockholders of voting control. Plaintiffs claim that because a certain group owned both Common and Class A stock this was not, in fact, a surrender of voting control. This argument is beside the mark for the particular identity or community of holdings is unimportant. The important thing is that the Common stock, as such, gave up its voting control; that is a thing of value. Cf. Maddock et al. v. Vorclone Corp., 17 Del.Ch. 39, 43, 147 A. 255, 256.

I, conclude, therefore, that the amendment was fair to the Class A stockholders.

2. The members of the board of directors of defendant held or controlled an aggregate of 50,550 shares of old Common stock, or 17% of the class outstanding, and 19,707 shares of Class A stock, or 14% of the class outstanding. After the amendment these directors now own or control 104,103 shares of new Common stock, or 15% of the class outstanding. Plaintiffs argue that these holdings constitute a practical voting control of defendant. Since I am of the opinion that the amendment is fair to the Class A stockholders, the question of "improper control" becomes moot. But, since plaintiffs made so much of this point, I shall pause to consider it. It is true that there was, in fact, an identity of holdings in both Class A and old Common stock among this group of shareholders. Plaintiffs contend, as I understand the argument, that this is a fact to be considered in every case in determining whether a plan or an amendment is fair. I do not understand plaintiffs to contend that this fact per se would make an otherwise fair amendment unfair, but merely that it is a circumstance to be considered in passing on fairness. If directors or stockholders of a corporation, by appropriate action, have the power to effect a particular change, their motive for doing so is not a relevant consideration in determining the question of objective fairness. Cf. Gans v. Delaware Terminal Corp., 23 Del.Ch. 69, 2 A.2d 154, and MacCrone v. American Capital Corp., D.C.Del., 51 F.Supp. 462.

I am accordingly of the opinion that the complaint should be dismissed. Separate findings of fact and conclusions of law have been filed.

BARRETT et al. v. DENVER TRAMWAY CORPORATION.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Third Circuit, 1944. 146 F.2d 701.

Suit by W. Stanley Barrett and others against Denver Tramway Corporation to determine validity of reclassification plan of a solvent Delaware corporation involving alteration of rights of preferred stock. From a decree dismissing the complaint, 53 F.Supp. 198, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

McLAUGHLIN, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This matter arises out of the recapitalization of a Delaware corporation which eliminated accrued dividends on its old preferred shares. Suit was brought by preferred stockholders who attacked the then proposed plan as unfair. Diversity of citizenship is the basis of federal jurisdiction. The District Court dismissed their complaint. * * *

The one point on the merits of this appeal is whether the plan was fair to the preferred stockholders. This is a diversity case with a question of substantive right involved. Under the facts here, Delaware law controls the issue and it is our duty, as it was the duty of the trial court, to ascertain and apply the law of that State. [Citing cases] * * *

The Denver Tramway Corporation, which operates the public transportation system in Denver, Colorado, was incorporated under the Delaware Corporation Act in 1925 following a federal receivership reorganization. Its certificate of incorporation provided, inter alia: "The holders of preferred stock shall be entitled to receive out of the surplus or net profits of the corporation * * * dividends * * *" This limitation in regard to the funds out of which preferred dividends could be paid was in keeping with the law as it then existed in Delaware.[61] In 1927 the statute was changed in such a way as to empower the directors of a corporation to declare and pay dividends on shares of capital stock out of net assets in excess of capital or current net profits, subject to any restrictions in the corporate charter.[62]

[61] Revised Code of Delaware of 1915, Ch. 65, Sec. 34 (§ 1948):

"Dividends; Reserves:—The Directors of every corporation created under this Chapter shall have power, after reserving over and above its capital stock paid in, such sum, if any, as shall have been fixed by the stockholders, to declare a dividend among its stockholders of the whole of its accumulated profits, in excess of the amount so reserved, and pay the same to such stockholders on demand; provided, that the corporation may, in its certificate of incorporation, or in its by-laws, give the Directors power to fix the amount to be reserved."

Revised Code of Delaware of 1915, Ch. 65, Sec. 35 (§ 1949):

"Dividends; How Declared and Paid; Violations of Section; Penalty; Exoneration from Liability:—No corporation created under the provisions of this Chapter, nor the directors thereof, shall make dividends except from the surplus or net profits arising from its business. * * *"

[62] Section 34 (§ 2066) Revised Code now provides:

"Dividends; Reserves:—The directors of every corporation created under this Chapter, subject to any restrictions contained in its Certificate of Incorporation, shall have power to declare and pay dividends upon the shares of its capital stock either (a) out of its net assets in excess of its capital as computed in accordance with the provisions of Sections 14, 26, 27 and 28 of this chapter, or (b) in case there shall be no such excess, out of its net profits for the fiscal year then current

In September, 1943, when the plan under consideration was proposed, defendant corporation had outstanding 104,412 shares of cumulative preferred of a par value of $100 and 61,240 shares of common, without par, representing capital of $10,441,200 and $7,670,576.58 respectively.

Preferred enjoyed the usual privileges over common:

(a) Though both preferred and common had full voting power, this passed exclusively to preferred whenever preferred dividends were in arrears in excess of ¼ of 1% for one year or more.

(b) Preferred was entitled to dividends of 7% per annum on the par value of $100 per share out of the surplus or net profits of the corporation before any dividends could be paid on common, whenever the directors so declared a dividend. The dividends were cumulative as to the first 5% per annum whether earned or not, and cumulative as to the next 2% if earned. Common was not entitled to any dividends until preferred's current and accumulated dividends had been paid.

(c) Preferred, in the event of dissolution, winding up or liquidation was entitled to receive its par value plus an amount equal to all accumulated and unpaid dividends at the rate of 7% per annum to the date of distribution, before any distribution to common, though it was not entitled to share in any assets left after the payment of such amounts.

Common was entitled to receive such dividends as the directors should declare out of the surplus or net profits of the corporation, after all preferred dividend requirements had been met and accumulated dividends paid.

From 1926 to 1931, inclusive, dividends in ever diminishing amounts were paid on preferred; since 1931, no preferred dividend whatever was paid. As a result, accrued and unpaid dividends on preferred up to June 30, 1943, amounted to $69,875 per share, or a total of $7,295,788.50.

Meanwhile, war conditions had caused a sudden and tremendous increase in the earnings of defendant, as shown by the following table:

Year	Profit	Loss
1938	......	$ 7,544.
1939	$ 26,518.	......
1940	......	28,023.
1941	121,356.	......
1943 to June 30	569,555.	......

Between the years 1925 and 1943, the defendant had reduced its bonded indebtedness from $10,969,000 to $2,915,500. A modernization program was started in 1938 and continued until the war forced its suspension. This involved the replacement of much of the com-and/or the preceding fiscal year; provided, however, that if the capital of the corporation computed as aforesaid shall have been diminished by depreciation in the value of its property, or by losses, or otherwise, to an amount less than the aggregate amount of the capital represented by the issued and outstanding stock of all classes having a preference upon the distribution of assets, the directors of such corporation shall not declare and pay out of such net profits any dividends upon any shares of any classes of its capital stock until the deficiency in the amount of capital represented by the issued and outstanding stock of all classes having a preference upon the distribution of assets shall have been repaired."

pany's equipment. The corporation's capital was seriously impaired, and though the balance sheet as of June 30, 1943, showed a surplus of $1,155,151.18, a deficit in fact existed.

For several years there had been agitation by the preferred stockholders, including the plaintiffs, for the payment of dividends currently to preferred stockholders. Various plans to accomplish this end were proposed and studied by the management. The directors were advised by counsel that under the circumstances, with the capital of the company impaired, an amendment to the certificate of incorporation was a prerequisite to the payment of dividends to preferred if the directors were to escape personal liability for such an act.

Finally, on September 1, 1943, the Board of Directors endorsed and proposed to the stockholders a plan which created a new class of noncumulative prior preferred stock. Holders of the new shares were to receive a dividend of $2.50 per share in 1943. Each year thereafter they were to receive $3.50 per share prior to the payment of any dividend on old preferred. Up to 50% of the net earnings of the corporation were to be applied to the payment of dividends on new preferred to the extent of $2.50 per share. Dividends on old preferred became noncumulative after January 1, 1943. All classes of stock were given one vote for each share at all meetings of stockholders. Holders of old preferred had the choice of retaining the old preferred or exchanging one share of old preferred for two of the new with the proviso that if the latter were accepted, then all claims for unpaid accumulated dividends to December 31, 1943 were to be waived. Before any dividends were payable on common, the new preferred was to receive $3.50 a share, and current dividends of $7 a year with all unpaid accrued dividends through December 31, 1943, were to be paid on the old preferred stock. On liquidation or redemption, old preferred became entitled to its par value of $100 a share plus all unpaid accumulated dividends. In such event two shares of new preferred would be the equivalent of one of the old.

The plaintiffs own 3200 shares of preferred stock, all of which were voted against the proposed plan. At a stockholders' meeting held on October 11, 1943, the plan was overwhelmingly approved as shown by the following table of votes cast:

For the resolution:
Preferred Stock	67,110 shares
Common Stock	45,132 shares
Total	112,242 shares
Against the resolution:
Preferred Stock	3,710 shares
Common Stock	2,000 shares
Total	5,710 shares

Before the adoption of the plan plaintiffs notified defendant of their opposition, and on October 8, 1943, three days prior to the aforementioned meeting, they filed a bill of complaint in the District Court seeking to enjoin its consummation. The plan entailed amending the certificate of incorporation of the defendant, and defendant agreed orally to withhold action on such amendment until the decision of the District Court. On January 7, 1944, that court entered a final decree dismissing the bill of complaint. Defendants filed a notice of appeal on January 11, 1944, and on January 27 of the same year asked for an injunction pending appeal. As stated, the application for an injunction was granted by this court conditioned upon the filing of a bond in the sum of $20,000 by the plaintiffs for any damages and costs which might result to defendant if plaintiffs did not prosecute their appeal to effect. The plaintiffs did not post such bond, and on February 24, 1944, the corporation filed the certificate of amendments according to the laws of Delaware. A subsequent meeting of stockholders on March 21, 1944, approved the amendments and requested that dividends be paid as provided. Certain dividends have already been paid and others will be as they fall due.

The method of presenting the plan to the stockholders is assailed by the plaintiffs in connection with their contention of unfairness. As a result of counsel for the company advising the directors that the certificate of incorporation had to be amended in order to pay dividends currently on the preferred stock, the plan was formulated and sent out to the stockholders together with a letter from the president which read in part as follows:

"Broadly speaking, the meeting is to be held in order to give the stockholders of the corporation an opportunity to consider and vote upon amendments to Article Fourth and Article Ninth of the Certificate of Incorporation of The Denver Tramway Corporation in order to effectuate the Plan of Recapitalization unanimously adopted by the Board of Directors at the meeting held on the tenth day of August, 1943.

"The Board of Directors for many months has given very careful consideration to the problem of dealing with dividend accumulations on the Preferred Stock of your Corporation and to methods of enabling the Corporation to declare and pay dividends to the present holders of Preferred Stock from annual net profits. The solution of these problems has required the consideration of many other important related questions, such as taxes, accrued depreciation, and the modernization of the properties of the Corporation, which has been delayed by war conditions. The proposal fully set forth in the Plan of Recapitalization (Exhibit A) and accompanying amendments has the complete approval of the Board of Directors, has been devised after careful study, and is unanimously recommended to the stockholders for adoption as equitable and advisable and in the best interests of the Corporation and its stockholders." * * *

In the forty-eighth, forty-ninth and fifty-first findings of fact, the court also found: that the officers and directors of the defendant fully and fairly presented to the stockholders the legal and practical effect and purposes of the said plan and amendments; that they, and the majority stockholders, acted as the result of good faith with regard to the rights of others in the preparation, submission and adoption of the plan and amendments; and that the amendments were proposed in good faith without misrepresentation or fraud, either actual or constructive, and more freely adopted after full disclosure. A careful examination of the record shows that these findings are borne out by substantial evidence. Certainly we cannot hold that these findings are clearly erroneous. Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 52(a).

Under the Delaware law in order for the plan involved here to be held unfair it must amount to at least constructive fraud. It can be safely stated that all of the Delaware cases, even remotely touching the present question, have been ably discussed at length by counsel on both sides in the unusual number of briefs which have been filed. While there are no Delaware decisions dealing with the exact problem, this question of fairness has arisen in various merger cases under the Delaware Corporation Act. The latest opinion on the subject is Porges v. Vadsco Sales Corporation, Del.Ch.1943, 32 A.2d 148, at page 151, where Vice Chancellor Pearson said: "Complainant's case is simply that the allocation between the old preferred and common stockholders is so unfair that it amounts to fraud. When fraud of this nature is charged, the unfairness must be of such character and must be so clearly demonstrated as to impel the conclusion that it emanates from acts of bad faith, or a reckless indifference to the rights of others interested, rather than from an honest error of judgment." * * *

In addition to the lower court's findings of fact above detailed which directly relate to the fairness of the plan, the trial judge applying the test of Delaware decisional law to the issue here said in his opinion: "But my views are ineffectual in the light of my conclusion that the Delaware law controls. As there can be no possible finding of fact from the evidence adduced here to which the Delaware symbols of 'constructive fraud' or 'bad faith' or 'gross unfairness' may attach, the legal formula established by Delaware compels the result that plaintiffs' charge of unfairness can not be sustained."

Scrutiny of the testimony and exhibits reveals that the facts justify the findings of the trial court in this respect. In line with the thought expressed by Judge Leahy in his opinion below, it may well be that the vexing problem of the elimination of accrued dividends on preferred shares in such a situation as this litigation presents is a matter for Delaware legislative action, but as the corporation law of that state, both statutory and decisional, now stands, it calls for affirmance of the judgment of the District Court.

NOTE

Corporate Cancellation of Accrued Preferred Dividends

The desire to eliminate accrued preferred dividends arises commonly when a period of business prosperity follows one of low earnings. As the corporate income and profits increase, holders of common stock find that the necessity of paying off the accruals built up for the preferred holders during the lean years prevents any immediate dividends on the common stock. This may discourage the common stockholders, or perhaps discourage new common investment, prevent necessary refinancing and interfere with profitable operation of a corporation financially stable but unable to progress due to its commitments to its holders of cumulative preferred stock. (55 Harv.L.Rev. 780, 783; 29 Va.L.R. 1, 12 et seq.) As a result, and with a plea of corporate necessity, modern corporations have contrived means for cancelling such accruals, thus undoubtedly benefiting the common holders, often bettering the corporation, but all at the expense of the preferred holder, who loses his arrearages in exchange for what are often dubious advantages in the reorganized corporation. It is apparent that in each case there should be a balance reached between corporate necessity and the rights of the individual dissenting preferred holders, in order that the corporation be allowed sufficient flexibility yet the stockholder be not deprived of his just and equitable earnings.

Traditionally the stockholders' argument has been that any reduction or denial of preferred arrearages is invalid under the Federal (and usually State) Constitution. Accruals have been held vested interests (Yoakam v. Providence Biltmore Hotel Co., 34 F.2d 533, D.C.R.I. 1929: optional amendment plan), and preferred rights held inviolable under the due process and contract clauses (Roberts v. Roberts-Wicks Co., 184 N.Y. 257, 77 N.E. 13, 1906: capital reduction). Although there were some early cases in which the rights of preferred holders were allowed to be altered on the basis of statutory permission (Hinckley v. Schwarzchild, 107 App. Div. 470, 95 N.Y.S. 357, 1905: capital increase) or corporate necessity in the judgment of the directors (Windhurst v. Central Leather Co., 101 N.J.Eq. 543, 138 A. 772, 1927; Windhurst v. Central Leather Co., 105 N.J.Eq. 621, 149 A. 36, 1930; affirmed 107 N.J.Eq. 528, 153 A. 402, 1931: merger), the general rule of inviolability of preferred accrued dividends was firmly enough established that the decisions in the Keller (Keller v. Wilson, 190 A. 115, Del.1936) and Johnson (Consolidated Film Industries v. Johnson, 22 Del.Ch. 407, 197 A. 489, Del.1937) cases, holding that amendment of corporate charters pursuant to statute could not be interpreted as destroying dividends accrued prior to such amendment, were clearly anticipated.

At least three methods have been used in the attempt to eliminate preferred accruals (89 U. of Pa. L.R. 789, 794, 800, 803). A charter amendment attempts to create new classes of stock exchangeable for outstanding shares, usually in such manner that the preferred holder receives more new shares, or proportionately greater voting control than before; in exchange he gives up his old stock and arrearages. Charter amendment usually requires the vote of two thirds or more of all classes of stock; such concessions as are made to the preferred holders will usually elicit sufficient support to carry the proposal, thereupon providing the corporation with the argument of majority consent as against the dissenters' claims of unjust or inequitable treatment.

A second common method of recapitalization is by "merger" with another corporation, with a resulting exchange of shares of the two former corporations for stock in the new body, in the course of which arrearages are eliminated. Merger is not dissolution of either corporation, and special preferred rights on dissolution do not arise therefrom (Adams v. U. S. Distributing Corp., 184 Va. 134, 34 S.E.2d 244, 1945); nor does the fact that the merger is with a wholly owned subsidiary, or even with one created solely for the purpose of the merger, affect the plan adversely (Hottenstein v. York Ice Machinery Corp., 136 F.2d 944, 953, C.C.A. Del.1943). When the merger technique is employed, dissenters are allowed the statutory right of appraisal as an alternative (or in most cases, as the sole alternative.) (Adams v. U. S. Distributing Corp. 184 Va. 134, 34 S.E.2d 244, 1945; Hubbard v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 42 F.Supp. 432, D.C.Pa.1941; 87 A.L.R. 603, 162 A.L.R. 1250.)

Creation of prior preference stock by charter amendment is a means of "optional" recapitalization, whereby the preferred holder need not exchange his present stock and accruals for the new issues, but the old stock will be subjected to a prior preference and consequent loss of its first call on corporate profits. Here the alternative of appraisal may be allowed, or the option may be considered sufficient alternative in itself to secure the shareholder. (Johnson v. Lamprecht, 133 Ohio St. 567, 15 N.E.2d 127, 1938; cf. Patterson v. Durham, 214 N.C. 806, 200 S.E. 906, 1939.)

In the Keller and Johnson cases, the charter amendment method of eliminating accruals was prevented, both due to failure of the statute specifically to provide for destruction of rights "in the nature of a debt" and, as a necessary corrollary, on the basis of the vestedness of the arrearages. (Wheatley v. Root, 147 Ohio St. 127, 69 N.E.2d 187, Ohio 1946; cf. 55 H.L.R. 71, 88). The Havender case (Havender v. Federal United Corp., 24 Del.Ch. 318, 11 A.2d 331, 1940) came as a surprise; there the plan was merger with a wholly owned subsidiary, and the court upheld the merger with its resulting cancellation of accruals, distinguishing the Keller and Johnson cases on the facts and basic statutes. The holding, while asserting the defeasibility of accrued dividends, did not claim to overrule the principle of vestedness asserted in those cases; citation of the alternative of appraisal as preventing deprivation of property without due process of law indicated that the court had not yet reached the point of denying the preferred holders' property right in so many words. Recognition of the fact that the vestedness theory was abandoned and that the Havender case repudiated the doctrine, (although not the result, since different statutes were involved) was given in another merger case (Hottenstein v. York Ice Machinery Corp., 136 F.2d 944, C.C.A.Del.1943). And in the Shanik and Barrett cases, the charter amendment providing optional exchange for prior preference stock was also allowed in Delaware (Shanik v. White Sewing Machine Corp., 19 A.2d 831, Del.1941; Barrett v. Denver Tramway Corp., 146 F.2d 701, C.C.A.Del.1944).

In New York, Davison v. Parke Austin and Lipscome Inc. (285 N.Y. 500, 35 N.E.2d 618, 1941) followed the Keller result in denying the corporation's right to eliminate accrued dividends by charter amendment, but the basis of the holding was not the indefeasible vestedness of the arrearages but solely the absence of explicit statutory permission for a corporation to alter preferred rights. 1943 amendments to section 36 of the Stock Corporation Law added these powers, and the McNulty case (McNulty v. Sloan, 184 Misc. 835, 54 N.Y.S.2d 253, 1945) held the statute constitutional where used to destroy accruals by charter amendment. Since Zobel v. American Locomotive Co. (182 Misc. 323, 44 N.Y.S.2d 33, 1943) had allowed the elimination of arrearages by consolidation and merger with a wholly owned subsidiary, a variety of methods are open in New York.

With increasing acceptance of the power of the corporation to cancel arrearages, there has appeared no correlative development of judicial techniques for assuring dissenting shareholders of equitable treatment either in the recapitalization plan or in alternatives to it. Appraisal is often the sole statutory alternative, in the absence of fraud or illegality (Barnett v. Philadelphia Meat Market Co., 218 Pa. 649, 67 A. 912, 1907), although the inadequacy of that method to compensate for stock and arrearages will probably result in loss to the stockholder (Langfelder v. Universal Laboratories Inc., 68 F.Supp. 209, D.C.Del.1946; 45 H.L.R. 233; 57 H.L.R. 895). Where the plan is optional, the fact that any exchange is "voluntary" leads the court to consider it equitable (Shanik case, supra; cf. Patterson v. Durham, supra). But far more important for the protection of preferred holders than adequate alternatives is an equitable review of the plan itself to assure that it will work no injustice on dissenters. This the courts have attempted by the requirement that a recapitalization be "fair and equitable". In the handling of similar problems by the SEC, wherein necessity of reorganization and fairness to all classes is considered (Federal Water Service Corp., 8 SEC 893; Public Utilities Holding Co. Act, sec. 7(e), 11(e); Bankruptcy Act ch. X), "fair and equitable" have come to mean an absence of actual or constructive fraud on the part of the proponents of the plan. But, under Delaware decisions (Porges v. Vadsco Sales Corp., 32 A.2d 148, Del.1943), "unfairness" must amount for bad faith and reckless indifference to the rights of the preferred holders before the courts will interfere with the plan. And since the courts hold that the reasons for or business necessity behind the recapitalization are not matters for judicial determination (MacCrone v. American Capital Corp., 51 F.Supp. 462, D.C.Del.1943), and that the judgment of the directors as to the plan must be presumed to be in good faith and to the best interests of the corporation (Barrett v. Denver Tramway Corp., supra), it will be a rare and blatantly fraudulent case in which the court will interfere.

The ease with which corporations today can eliminate accruals without strict regard for the value given to the preferred owner has been criticized, not so much for the great increase in power thereby afforded the corporation as for failure of the courts to establish equitable standards for the protection of the holders of stock with arrearages (29 Va.L.R. 1, 2, 24). The two principal suggestions for court review of capitalization plans for fairness to dissenters are: first, that the corporation be required to show actual and present necessity for reorganization eliminating accruals, (such necessity to be demonstrated by an actual attempt to refinance and impossibility due to arrearages, rather than merely by assertion that refinancing is difficult when there are arrearages); second, by the requirement that the plan provide a substantial equivalent for the accrual which it sacrifices, (substantiality to be determined in terms of the value of stock, priorities, preferences and control given in exchange for the old preferred, 29 Va.L.R. 1; 55 H.L.R. 780). For, unless the quid pro quo provides the preferred holder with a greater money value of stock than before, or greater dividend rate, or substantially greater privilege in the corporation, he has received nothing for the elimination of his accrued dividends and the corporation has achieved its flexibility in refinancing at his expense. (57 H.L.R. 894, 899.)

(b) "Blank Stock"

AUTHORIZATION OF "BLANK" PREFERRED STOCK

It has been noted that under § 5, par. 4 of the Delaware (and under § 11 of the New York) corporation act, certificates of incorporation may authorize the issue of a stated number of shares of preferred stock, which may be divided into series (that is, an issue of preferred stock, Series A; later, another issue of such stock, Series B, and so forth); and granting to the Board of Directors the right by resolution at time of issue, to determine the dividend rate, preferences and privileges of each such series. A charter may, but need not, limit the power of directors in fixing such preferences.

This is perhaps, high-water mark in giving to managements unrestricted power over the position of stockholders. For instance, a corporation may be empowered in its charter to issue preferred stock, under the "blank stock" provision. It may then issue a respectable Series A preferred stock, carrying a cumulative dividend of $5.00 per year, entitled to receive in preference to the common stock $100 and no more in case of liquidation or dissolution; and so forth. This may be sold as an investment issue. Later, the directors may issue a Series B preferred stock carrying a cumulative dividend of, say, $50 per share annually, a preference on liquidation of, say, $1000, and so forth. Particularly if the charter likewise includes a waiver of pre-emptive rights such a series could be framed to absorb practically all of the future earnings and possibilities of the corporation, and it could be issued in such fashion that the existing stockholders would have no chance to vote upon the proposal, or to subscribe to the new stock or otherwise to protect themselves; in a word, would have no intra-corporate remedy.

Were the issue of such a series attacked in the courts, the attorneys for the corporation undoubtedly would insist that there was a presumption (though rebuttable) that the directors had acted in the business interest of the corporation, and that courts should not interfere with the ideas of the directors as to the development and financing of the business. In Delaware, at least, this presumption apparently would have some force, despite the fact that the presumption originally arose from the fact that directors, elected by stockholders all of whom were interested in the corporation, might be assumed to act in the interest of their stockholders. Economically, of course, this is no longer the case. Students may wish to consider the probabilities of future legal development in connection with this and similar grants of virtually absolute power to directors. Such powers can, of course, be used legitimately. In theory, the "blank stock" provision was designed to permit directors to issue preferred stock at varying rates of dividend, depending on the current rates for money. Thus, when preferred stock normally commands a dividend rate of 6%, a preferred share designed to sell at $100 would have to have a cumulative dividend of $6.00 per year to be saleable in the investment market. Later, when dividend rates decline, another issue might be floated at a 4% rate. The legitimate use of the "blank stock" provision would be adapting preferred stock issues to the money market, so that advantage could be taken of favorable rates without completely revamping the charter each time. But the freedom thus given offers likewise wide possibility for illegitimate use.

If, as the United States Supreme Court observed in Pepper v. Litton (308 U.S. 295, 60 S.Ct. 238), corporate powers are "powers in trust", there is plain equitable control which a shareholder might invoke against abuse of this singularly wide power. But if the rather slashing observations of Mr. Justice Holmes in Barclay v. Wabash Railway Co. (280 U.S. 197, 50 S.Ct. 106) are accepted, the investor who buys into this sort of corporation is merely an imprudent fool who gets what he deserves.

The "blank stock" clauses in New York and Delaware are, at the moment (1948), frontier posts in the long struggle between managements to secure unquestioned power, and prohibitions to subject that power to equitable control where it is unfairly used. There being no decided cases, the issue is still in doubt in this area.

(c) By Merger

FEDERAL UNITED CORPORATION v. HAVENDER.

HAVENDER et al. v. FEDERAL UNITED CORPORATION.

Supreme Court of Delaware, 1940. 24 Del.Ch. 318, 11 A.2d 331.

Bill in equity by Joseph Havender, Sr., and another against Federal United Corporation to declare void the merger of the defendant with its wholly-owned subsidiary, Corporation Bond & Share Company, in so far as the merger and recapitalizing the defendant corporation undertook to convert complainant's preferred shares into other securities without paying in money dividends accrued thereon. From a decree for the complainants, 6 A.2d 618, both parties appeal.

Reversed, with directions. * * *

LAYTON, CHIEF JUSTICE. The first question to be decided is whether a merger of a parent corporation with a corporation wholly owned by it is within the purview of Section 59 of the General Corporation Law. The late Chancellor, indirectly, gave a negative answer. He made no reference to the amendment of April 13, 1937, designated as Section 59A; and we prefer to think that the amendment was not called to his attention, for in such case, no doubt, there would have been some modification of expression. The present Chancellor was specific. In his opinion a merger of a parent corporation with its wholly-owned subsidiary was not within the contemplation of Section 59. This was apparent, as he said, from the provision that the merger agreement shall state the "manner of converting the shares of each of the constituent corporations into shares of the consolidated corporation"; and he referred to the amendment, designated as Section 59A, as indicating that the Legislature had found it necessary to amend the General Law by expressly authorizing mergers between parent companies and their wholly-owned subsidiaries.

We find ourselves unable to agree with this view. By Section 59, any two or more corporations organized under the General Corporation Law, or existing under the laws of this state, for the purpose of carrying on any business, may merge. The language of the authority is plain, understandable and general. The power is not qualified or restricted by limitation or exception. Limitations on power are usually to be found in the language of the grant, or in a reservation or exception attached to the grant. The language singled out by the learned Chancellor as indicating a limitation on the general authority conferred is not concerned with extent of the power granted. It relates to the details of merger agreements; and is general directory language applicable, mutatis mutandis, to all circumstances of mergers and consolidations. An exception to the all-embracing authority conferred by the section is not, we think, to be found in the language seized upon. The general rule of statutory construction repeatedly affirmed by the courts of this state generally, and, in particular, by this court, is that where the language of a statute is plain and conveys a clear and definite meaning, the courts will give to the statute the exact meaning conveyed by the language, adding nothing thereto, and taking nothing therefrom. Van Winkle v. State, 4 Boyce 578, 27 Del. 578, 91 A. 385, Ann.Cas.1916D, 104. And, specifically, where the Legislature had made no exception to the positive terms of a statute, the presumption is that it intended to make none, and it is not the province of the court to do so. Lewis v. Pawnee Bill's Wild West Co., 6 Pennewill 316, 66 A. 471, 16 Ann.Cas. 903.

It is for the Legislature not for the court, to declare the public policy of the state; and it is not, therefore, the function of the court to graft an exception on the plain and positive terms of the statute. * * *

We are of opinion, therefore, that a merger of a parent corporation with a subsidiary wholly owned by it is within the purview of Section 59 of the Corporation Law.

Next to be considered is whether, under the merger and consolidation provisions of the General Corporation Law, and apart from those provisions with respect to a valuation of stock either by agreement or by appraisal, dividends accumulated on the cumulative preference stock of one or more of the constituent companies may be disposed of other than by paying to the dissatisfied shareholder the amount of them in money.

Neither of the learned Chancellors below thought it necessary to consider the question. In their view, the corporate proceeding complained of, while styled a merger, was no more than an unauthorized attempt at a recapitalization of the defendant corporation, ineffective, as against objection, to extinguish accumulated dividends on preference stock within the rule announced by this court in Keller v. Wilson & Co., Inc., Del.Sup., 190 A. 115.

The complainants, founding their position on the Keller case, insist that the merger sections of the Corporation Law not only do not authorize, and could not validly authorize, the abrogation of dividends accumulated on preference stock, but, on the contrary, expressly preserve the right to such dividends. The contention is that in the Keller case this court held that the right of a holder of cumulative preferred stock to eventual payment of dividends in arrear on his stock was a fixed contractual right, a right in the nature of a debt, in that sense vested, and not to be taken away by a voluntary recapitalization without the consent of the holder of the stock. In the cited case, a recapitalization of a corporation under Section 26 of the General Corporation Law, Code 1935, § 2058, was involved. At the time of the formation of the corporation and the issuance of the stock, the right of the holder of cumulative preferred stock to dividends accrued thereon through time was protected against destruction by charter amendment under Section 26. Relying on an amendment to the section subsequently enacted, the corporation attempted to cancel the dividends accrued on its preference stock. It was held that there were limitations on the general reserve power of the state. The rationale of the decision, stated and reiterated, was that when the nature of the right of the holder of cumulative preferred stock to unpaid dividends accrued thereon through time was examined in a case where the right was accorded protection when the corporation was formed and the stock was issued, it was such a right that could not be destroyed by corporate action taken under an authority subsequently conferred. In such circumstances, the right was considered to be of the dignity of a fixed contractual right in the nature of a debt. The decision has no application beyond its philosophy. It has no bearing on the question in dispute. The substantial elements of the merger and consolidation provisions of the General Corporation Law as they now appear have existed from the time of the inception of the law. It is elementary that these provisions are written into every corporate charter. The shareholder has notice that the corporation whose shares he has acquired may be merged with another corporation if the required majority of the shareholders agree. He is informed that the merger agreement may prescribe the terms and conditions of the merger, the mode of carrying it into effect, and the manner of converting the shares of the constituent corporations into the shares of the resulting corporation. A well understood meaning of the word "convert", is to alter in form, substance or quality. Substantial rights of shareholders, as is well known, may include rights in respect of voting, options, preferences and dividends. The average intelligent mind must be held to know that dividends may accumulate on preferred stock, and that in the event of a merger of the corporation issuing the stock with another corporation, the various rights of shareholders, including the right to dividends on preference stock accrued but unpaid, may, and perhaps must, be the subject of reconcilement and adjustment; for, in many cases, it would be impracticable to effect a merger if the rights attached to the shares could not be dealt with. The state has an interest in the corporate structures erected under its authority. Having provided for the merger of corporations, they are not regarded with disfavor. On the contrary, mergers are encouraged to the extent that they tend to conserve and promote corporate interests. The catholic quality of the language of the merger provisions of the law negatives a narrow or technical construction if the purpose for which they were enacted is to be accomplished. MacFarlane et al. v. North American Cement Corporation, 16 Del.Ch. 172, 157 A. 396. Moreover, it is recognized that there may be shareholders who will be dissatisfied with the effect of the terms of the merger proposal upon the rights attached to their shares. While their right to dissent is admitted, the public policy of the state declared by the statute, somewhat analogous to the right of eminent domain, does not permit a dissenting shareholder, as against an affirmative vote of two thirds, to veto a merger agreement if its terms are fair and equitable in the circumstances of the case. Within the time and in the manner provided by the statute, the dissatisfied stockholder, if he so desires, may demand and receive the money value of his shares as that value has been agreed upon or has been determined by an impartial appraisement. Consequently, in a case where a merger of corporations is permitted by the law and is accomplished in accordance with the law, the holder of cumulative preference stock as to which dividends have accumulated may not insist that his right to the dividends is a fixed contractual right in the nature of a debt, in that sense vested and, therefore, secure against attack. Looking to the law which is a part of the corporate charter, and, therefore, a part of the shareholder's contract, he has not been deceived nor lulled into the belief that the right to such dividends is firm and stable. On the contrary, his contract has informed him that the right is defeasible; and with that knowledge the stock was acquired. In such situation the shareholder is not confronted, as was the complainant in the Keller case, with a proposed alteration of rights attached to preference stock not within the contemplation of the law as it stood when the corporation was formed and the stock issued (except as an alteration of rights may be said to be imagined under the general reserve power of the state) and with no alternative right to demand and receive the value of his stock in money.

The broad contention advanced by the appellees, that the merger provisions of the General Corporation Law do not authorize the extinguishment of dividends accumulated on preference stock, even if the terms of the merger proposal are fair and equitable, must be denied, unless the effect of the qualifying clause at the end of Section 60 is such as to compel the recognition of such unpaid dividends as a debt or liability of the corporation enforceable against the resulting corporation.

It is to be supposed that the Legislature intended to give to the words and terms employed by it their usual and ordinary meaning and significance. A holder of preference shares as to which dividends have accumulated through time is not a creditor of the corporation in the ordinary and usual meaning of the word; nor is he the holder of a lien as that word is usually understood. In proximate contextual relation to the words, "creditors" and "liens", are the words, "debts", "liabilities" and "duties". The connotation of these words, having in mind the significant fact that there is nothing in the section that purports to deal with the rights of shareholders, leads to the conclusion that the words and terms were not intended to refer or to be applicable to the results of the contractual relation arising out of stock ownership either as between the shareholders inter sese, or as between the shareholder and the corporation. The words and terms are readily to be understood as referable to persons external to the corporation, and to debts, liabilities and duties due from the corporation to them, and not to those internal liabilities and duties of the corporation to the shareholder which spring from that relationship. If the legislative intendment had been otherwise, the necessity for positive and unequivocal language is plainly indicated; and it would not have been difficult to make clear the meaning and purpose of the qualifying clause. Considering as a whole the merger and consolidation sections of the General Law, we are not willing to ascribe to the words and terms of the qualifying clause of the section a significance that would make them comprehensive of such internal liabilities of the corporation as may be supposed to proceed from the recognition of unpaid dividends accumulated on preferred stock as in the nature of a debt due from the corporation to the shareholder. See 1 Machen, Corporations, § 538. * * *

It will be noticed, of course, that the merger plan, in no sense, provided for the "literal enforcement" of the rights of the preferred shareholders, for they were to receive only $5 in money as against $43 accrued on the preferred stock, and the total of the values to be received by them was only $78 as against a face value of $143. Notwithstanding, the plan of conversion was held to be fair and equitable. The observations of the Vice-Chancellor are utterly irreconcilable with the theory that, in no case, can dividends accumulated on preferred stock be extinguished except by their payment in money against the objection of a dissenting shareholder; and, as his conclusions were approved by the Appellate Court, we are unable to view the Windhurst case in any light other than as permitting, in the case of merger of corporations, dividends accrued on preference stock to be disposed of other than by money payment, if the plan of merger is fair and equitable in the circumstances of the case, not operating to enrich one class of shareholders at the expense of holders of preferred stock.

There is no invasion of legal or equitable right, nor is there moral wrong, in disposing of dividends on preference stock accumulated through time other than by their payment in money, if the right to such dividends has not the status of a fixed contractual right under the law as it stood when the corporation was formed and the stock was issued, and if the terms of disposal are fair and equitable in the circumstances of the case; and especially is this true where provision is made for payment of the value of the shares to the dissatisfied shareholder. To say that the right to such dividends may not be destroyed by charter amendment under Section 26 of the General Law which, when the corporation was formed and the stock issued, did not authorize the destruction of the right, and with no alternative right in the shareholder to demand payment in money of the value of his stock, is not to say that the right may not be compounded under the merger provisions of the law which warn the shareholder that his right is defeasible, and which, if he is dissatisfied, entitle him to demand and receive the money value of his shares. There is a clear distinction between the situations recognized by the General Law and the modes of procedure applicable to each of them; and we think that the strictness of view of the merger provisions of the law entertained by the learned Chancellors below was, perhaps, induced by overlooking the distinction, so that it was assumed that to attempt to accomplish by merger that which could not be done by mere charter amendment, was a perversion of the statute in an effort to escape the reach of the decision in the Keller case.

It is not suggested that the terms of the plan of merger were unfair or inequitable. We conclude, therefore, that the accumulations of dividends on the preference stock of the defendant corporation were lawfully compounded. The complainants were put to their election, either to demand payment in money of the value of their preferred shares as agreed upon, or as ascertained by an appraisement, or to accept the exchange of securities offered by the merger plan. No effort was made to agree upon a valuation of the shares, and no appraisement was sought. Manifestly, under the provisions of the statute, a valuation cannot be demanded now. The complainants must accept the terms of the merger agreement. * * *

The decree of the court below is reversed, with the direction to enter a decree dismissing the bill of complaint, with costs on the complainants.

HOTTENSTEIN et al. (Moore, Intervenor) v. YORK ICE MACHINERY CORPORATION.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Third Circuit, 1943. 136 F.2d 944.

Action by Charles A. Hottenstein and another against York Ice Machinery Corporation to prevent the merger of the defendant with the York Corporation, wherein R. Thomas Moore intervened. From a judgment, 45 F.Supp. 436, dismissing the case on the merits, the intervenor appeals.

Affirmed.

BIGGS, CIRCUIT JUDGE. The intervening plaintiff, the appellant in the case at bar, is the owner of 50 shares of 7% cumulative preferred stock issued by the defendant York Ice Machinery Corporation, a Delaware corporation. The defendant was incorporated on March 22, 1927. On January 25, 1941 the outstanding capital stock of the defendant consisted of 56,371 shares of cumulative preferred stock [63] and 161,481 shares of common stock. On that date the unpaid accumulated dividends on each share of the preferred stock amounted to $88.25. The defendant also had bonds due October 1, 1947, in the principal amount of $5,808,500 and 10 year 6% sinking fund gold debentures in the principal amount of $612,000 which previously had borne a due date of December 1, 1937, but which had been extended to December 1, 1943. The defendant also owed certain unsecured 3% notes to the amount of $118,500 due December 1, 1944. Its current liabilities, on the date specified, including sums due to trade creditors and taxes, payrolls, and interest on long term indebtedness calculated on an accrual basis, amounted to approximately $1,150,000.

Its assets as of September 30, 1940, were cash in excess of $1,000,000, notes and accounts receivable of more than $3,500,000 and inventories worth $3,800,000. It possessed miscellaneous assets including customers' notes, accounts receivable, stocks, bonds, mortgages and the capital stocks of affiliated companies worth more than $900,000. The defendant also owned a plant carried on its books at a value in excess of $7,000,000.

On January 25, 1941, the asset position of the defendant was good. It was solvent and its current assets greatly exceeded its current obligations, though refinancing of its funded debt obviously was required.

[63] Each share preferred stock is entitled to $100 and all unpaid accumulated dividends on the liquidation or dissolution of the defendant. Each share of preferred stock may be redeemed by the defendant at the rate of $107.50 plus unpaid accumulated dividends.

Specifically it appears from a balance sheet of the defendant as of September 30, 1940, that an equity of about $4,300,000 was available for the preferred stock. The unpaid accumulated dividends on the preferred stock then amounted to approximately $4,600,000.[64] An examination of the income account of the defendant year by year for the five years ending September 30, 1940, shows its operations resulted in net income in 1940 of $483,121, in a loss in 1939 of $185,076, in a loss in 1938 of $118,753, in net income in 1937 of $957,649 and in net income in 1936 of $165,586. The financial statement of the defendant also shows a net income of $1,202,000, for 1941. The earned surplus for this year was in excess of $800,000 contrasting with an earned surplus of $403,000 for the year 1940.

On January 25, 1941 the board of directors of the defendant sent a letter to each of its stockholders and presented for their consideration "a Plan for the Recapitalization of the Company". * * *

The plan of recapitalization proposed by way of merger was that each share of the preferred stock of the defendant with accumulated dividends should be converted into fifteen shares of common stock of York Corporation as the "surviving" corporation, and that each share of the common stock of the defendant should be converted into one share of common stock of York Corporation. Upon consummation of the merger and the issuance of the new stock the holders of the preferred stock of the defendant will own 83.2% of all of the stock of York Corporation. The voting power of the present holders of the preferred stock of the defendant will be increased from 24.8% to 83.2%. It should be noted that the plan of recapitalization does not purport to deal with the funded indebtedness of the defendant in any way. The directors' letter to the stockholders of the defendant also states that the common stockholders will benefit by the elimination of the prior claims of $10,047,090, representing the par value of the preferred stock plus the cumulative dividends accrued thereon as of January 25, 1941, and the preferred stockholders of the defendant will be benefited by their equity in the future earnings of York Corporation. The letter then states that it should be observed that the company's sales for the three months ending December 31, 1940, were $5,107,373, as compared to $3,588,630 in the same period of 1939; that the existing debt structure of the defendant with the sinking fund requirements and restrictions of the payment of dividends is a severe burden on the defendant and its stockholders; that refinancing of the funded debt is impeded by the arrearage of dividends on the preferred stock, and, if the plan of recapitalization is adopted, that "* * * it will be possible to consider re-financing more advantageously and it may then be to the advantage of the Company to provide a part of the monies necessary, by the issuance of convertible bonds * * * [a result] * * * obviously impossible while the Preferred Stock is outstanding." * * * it was the intention of the defendant to reclassify its stock by way of merger with its wholly owned subsidiary, York Corporation.

York Corporation is also a Delaware corporation. It was incorporated at the direction of the defendant on or about January 5, 1939. Its charter provides that its capital stock shall consist of 250 shares of stock without par value. The defendant purchased twenty shares of the stock of York Corporation for $1,000, the stock, having a stated value of $50 a share. On October 11, 1940, the president and secretary of York Corporation issued to the defendant a certificate for 20 shares of stock. No other certificate has been issued. York Corporation has never carried on business. So far as appears from the record, it stood awaiting merger with the defendant. * * *

On the day of the adjourned meeting the merger was consummated, 40,527 shares of preferred and 121,326 shares of common stock being voted in favor of the resolution and merger, 1,499 shares of preferred stock and 240 shares of common stock being voted against the resolution and merger out of the total of 56,571 shares of preferred stock and 161,481 shares of common stock issued and outstanding.

Additional facts must be stated. Over 50% of the common stock of the defendant was owned by two directors and members of their family groups. The directors and their groups owned less than 25% of the preferred stock. The original complaint was filed in the court below on March 12, 1941. The appellant filed his intervening complaint on May 27, 1941. The latter complaint alleges that the appellant has brought his suit not only on his own behalf but also on behalf of all persons situated like unto himself. He prayed for a preliminary injunction to restrain the defendant from holding the adjourned stockholders meeting to vote upon the proposed merger, and, in the event the court declared that the accrued accumulated dividends on the preferred stock could not be affected by the merger, that the defendant be enjoined "* * * from paying dividends upon any of the capital stock without first providing for and liquidating the arrears of dividends which up to January 25, 1941, [had] accrued on the preferred stock of the intervening plaintiff * * *". An answer was filed and hearings were held.

No preliminary injunction was granted. The learned District Judge dismissed the cause upon the merits. See, D.C., 45 F.Supp. 436. The appeal at bar followed.

We think it clear from the facts of the case at bar that the defendant has evoked the provisions of Section 59 of the General Corporation Law of Delaware, Section 2091, Revised Code 1935, in order to avoid the effect of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Delaware in Keller v. Wilson & Co., Inc., 21 Del.Ch. 391, 190 A. 115, which reversed the decision of Chancellor Wolcott, 21 Del.Ch. 13, 180 A. 584, and in Consolidated Film Industries v. Johnson, 22 Del.Ch. 407, 197 A. 489, which affirmed the decision of that Chancellor, 22 Del.Ch. 262, 194 A. 844. The cases cited arose under Section 26 of the General Corporation Law of Delaware, Section 2058, Revised Code 1935. The decisions of the Supreme Court of Delaware in the Keller and Consolidated Film Industries cases are so well known to the bench and bar of this circuit that there is no need to dwell on them at great length in this opinion. It is enough to say that following the decision of the Supreme Court in the cited cases the directors of a Delaware corporation and its stockholders knew that whether a class of cumulative preferred stock was created before or after the 1927 amendments to Section 26 of the General Corporation Law (35 Del.Laws, c. 85, Sec. 10), accrued accumulated dividends could not be adjusted by the provisions of Section 26. In short, it was clear that a preferred stockholder's right to accumulated unpaid dividends could not be divested by a reclassification under Section 26 of the General Corporation Law even when a majority of the stockholders of the class consented thereto over the objection of dissident stockholders. * * *

It follows, as Chancellor Wolcott pointed out, in his opinion in Johnson v. Consolidated Film Industries, supra, that it would make no difference if the corporation, whose preferred stock was to be divested of unpaid accumulated dividends, was incorporated before or after the 1927 amendment to Section 26 or if the issuance of the preferred stock was authorized before or after that amendment. The cancellation of accumulated dividends, accrued through the passage of time, had been held by the Supreme Court in the Keller case not to be an amendment to a Delaware charter. We think it is fair to state that the bar generally concluded that the right of a preferred stockholder to unpaid accumulated dividends could not be affected or adjusted without his consent. This conclusion was short-lived. * * * If it is fair to say that the decision of the Supreme Court of Delaware in the Keller case astonished the corporate world it is just to state that the decision of the Supreme Court in Havender astounded it, for shorn of rationalization the decision constitutes a repudiation of principles enunciated in the Keller case and in Consolidated Film Industries v. Johnson, supra. * * * The right of the preferred stockholder in the instant case is to receive payment of his unpaid dividends in preference and priority to the payment of any dividend on the common stock. Such a right should not be given the status of a vested property right in view of the power of self-amendment conferred on the defendant by the 1927 amendment to Section 26 which was in force when the defendant in the case at bar was incorporated and when the charter amendment authorizing the issue of preferred stock was lodged with the Secretary of State of Delaware. In view of the power of self-amendment conferred upon the defendant we think it is clear that the intervening complainant may not claim the protection of the Contract Clause. We think for the reasons stated hereinafter that he is not entitled to make the claim that he is being deprived of his right without due process of law within the purview of the Fourteenth Amendment. We are called upon simply to interpret the law of Delaware. Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 58 S.Ct. 817, 82 L.Ed. 1188, 114 A.L.R. 1487.

After reflection we find ourselves unable to reconcile the decision of the Supreme Court of Delaware in the Havender case with its pronouncements in the Keller case that cancellation of cumulative dividends accrued through the passage of time is not an amendment of a charter and that the right of a holder of cumulative preferred stock to unpaid dividends is a vested right of property secured against destruction by the Federal and State Constitutions. While the approach of the Supreme Court in the Havender case was through Section 59, which, as was stated, had remained substantially unchanged in form since the adoption of the General Corporation Law in 1899, 21 Del.Laws c. 273, and the approach in the Keller case was through Section 26, we must conclude that Havender broke Keller's back. * * *

It follows, therefore, that it is the law of Delaware that a parent corporation may merge with a wholly owned inactive subsidiary, cancelling old preferred stock and the rights of the holders thereof to unpaid accumulated dividends, substituting in lieu thereof stocks of the surviving corporation.[65]

It should be noted that the question of fairness of the reclassification was not considered by the Supreme Court in the Havender case and the case was disposed of (the holding as to laches aside) on the ground of corporate power. It should be observed also that Chancellor Wolcott upheld Wilson & Company's proposed reclassification in the Keller case without considering the fairness of the plan and that the Supreme Court held the reorganization invalid on a ground which rendered fairness irrelevant. In the recent case of Porges v. Vadsco Sales Corporation, Del.Ch.1943, 32 A.2d 148, 150, the Vice-Chancellor of Delaware devotes a substantial portion of his opinion to a discussion of the question of fairness. In the Porges case a merger was proposed pursuant to the provisions of Sections 59 and 59A of the General Corporation Law between a parent and its wholly owned subsidiary. The Vice-Chancellor lays emphasis upon the provisions of Section 61 of the General Corporation Law, Section 2093, Revised Code, 1935, as amended, which provides that a stockholder objecting to a merger or consolidation may withdraw from the enterprise and obtain payment in money for the value of his stock. He quotes from the decision of Chancellor Wolcott in Cole v. National Cash Credit Association, 18 Del.Ch. 47, 56, 156 A. 183, 187, as follows: " 'As a general proposition dissenting stockholders are thus put to an election by the statute.' " In respect to the issue of fairness the Vice-Chancellor states, "However, there are exceptional circumstances under which a stockholder is not obliged to make an election to accept the merger or to demand the value of his stock in money, but may enlist the aid of a court of equity to restrain the consummation of the merger. In the Cole case, the Chancellor gave examples of such circumstances, and said, 'The exercise of the statutory right of merger is always subject to nullification for fraud.' "

An examination of the examples cited in the Cole case leads us to the conclusion that actual fraud will cause the Delaware courts to restrain a merger. Actual fraud amounts to misrepresentation, concealment or deception. The allocation of equities in the surviving corporation

65 It should be noted that in the Havender case as in the case at bar a surplus was available for the payment of dividends on the preferred stock. In the Havender case there was no earned surplus as there is in the case at bar. An earned surplus is not necessary in order to pay dividends under the law of Delaware.

between the old preferred and common stockholders may be so unfair as to amount to constructive fraud in the eyes of the Delaware Courts. Vice-Chancellor Pearson states, "When fraud of this nature is charged, the unfairness must be of such character and must be so clearly demonstrated as to impel the conclusion that it emanates from acts of bad faith, or a reckless indifference to the rights of others interested, rather than from an honest error of judgment", citing the Cole case and MacFarlane v. N. A. Cement Corporation, 16 Del.Ch. 172, 157 A. 396.

In the case at bar can it be asserted justly that the reclassification which is actually worked by the merger is so unfair to the intervening complainant and those like situated that it amounts to constructive fraud? The balance sheet of the defendant corporation shows that as of September 30, 1940, the equity above the par value of the cumulative preferred stock amounted to $4,384,000, whereas as of that day the arrearage of dividends on the preferred stock amounted to $4,616,-000. This arrearage was accumulating at the rate of 7% per annum. Upon the other hand, the earnings of the defendant have increased substantially and by the merger the preferred stockholders gain control of the company. It should be noted also that when the plan of reclassification by merger became public the preferred stock nearly doubled in price on the market. The increased earnings should create an equity for the common stockholders of the defendant. Substantial funded indebtedness must be refinanced in the not distant future. As a practical matter we know that it is difficult to refinance corporate indebtedness when there are heavy arrearages of accumulated dividends outstanding. A corporation so situated reasonably may expect litigation and its concomitant miseries. Bankers are loath to float security issues under such circumstances. We are of the opinion that it is not unjust under all the circumstances of the case at bar to treat the equity of the common stockholders as being worth approximately 17% of the stock of the surviving corporation. It follows that the reclassification is fair.

We come, therefore, to the final question in the case at bar, which, however inconsistently we must treat as one of corporate power. Though there is substantial evidence that the defendant corporation did desire to change its cumbersome title to a new and more realistic name, the evidence is overwhelming that York Corporation was created by the defendant for the primary and principal purpose of effecting a reclassification, cancelling the accumulated preferred dividends on the preferred stock, by merger with it. York Corporation was brought into being by the defendant with the purpose, intention and design of effecting that which a director of the defendant and the chairman of its committee on refinancing characterized as a " 'paper' merger". As we have said, this is the point of difference between the facts of the instant case and those in Havender. Corporation Bond & Share Company, though it was a totally owned and inactive subsidiary of Federal United Corporation, was not brought into existence by Federal United for the purpose of a merger. No case has been before the courts of Delaware which involved this precise question. In the Havender case, however, Chancellor Wolcott delivered a dictum which is most pertinent.

Chancellor Wolcott said, 2 A.2d 147, "I am of the opinion that the merger was not conceived in any genuine purpose which mergers are designed to serve. Its object and aim was to reclassify the defendant's shares in a manner which the Supreme Court of this State has declared to be not permissible. If what the defendant did will stand the test of legal legitimacy, I can see no escape from the proposition that all a corporation needs to do to escape the results of the law as laid down by our Supreme Court, is to create a subsidiary for itself and then proceed to absorb it by merger. If it be said that deliberation to evade would be too conspicuous in that case to warrant overlooking it, the answer is that evasion cannot be any the more objectionable simply because it might be a little more conspicuous. The difference between using a wholly owned subsidiary already existing and using one specially created for the purpose to accomplish by a merger an end which bears no perceptible relation to the problem involved in and incidental to the merging operation, is a difference which rests on no basis of substance."

The late great Chancellor wrote with prescience. What he said stands as the only direct evidence as to the law of Delaware today upon the question before us. The conclusion is inescapable that he was correct in his statement. Further evidence as to the law of Delaware, though it is of an indirect nature is supplied by the opinion of the Supreme Court in the appeal in the Havender case. The literal application of the phrases of Section 59 of the General Corporation Law by the Supreme Court will permit and enable a Delaware corporation to effect a reclassification which will cancel the accumulated dividends on preferred stock by merger with an inactive wholly owned subsidiary specially created for that purpose. Between inactive Corporation Bond & Share Company, not created for the purpose of merger, and inactive York Corporation, created for the purpose of merger, there is little to choose. The Keller case remains a landmark in the law of Delaware only to signify that what cannot be done directly under Section 26 of the General Corporation Law may be done by subterfuge under Section 59. A court of the United States bound by the rule of Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins is powerless to afford aid to the stockholder until reclassification reaches that degree of unfairness where it amounts to a cancellation of the preferred stockholders' accumulated unpaid dividends without adequate compensation therefor under the law, either by way of a share in the equity of the surviving corporation or by the payment of money under Section 61 of the General Corporation Law. At such a point a court of the United States might grant injunctive relief under the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. Such is not the situation in the case at bar, for as we have stated the plan is fair.

Accordingly the judgment of the court below is affirmed.[66]

6. RIGHT OF APPRAISAL OF NON-ASSENTING STOCKHOLDER

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 21. Determination of value of stock of objecting stockholder. In the event that the stockholders of a corporation have taken action pursuant to sections fourteen, twenty, thirty-six, eighty-five, eighty-six or ninety-one and if any stockholder has objected to such action and demanded payment for his stock as provided in section fourteen, section twenty, subdivision nine of section thirty-eight, subdivision seven of section eighty-five, section eighty-seven or section ninety-one, either such stockholder or the corporation may apply upon eight days' notice to the other, within sixty days after such demand, to the supreme court at any special term thereof held in the judicial district in which the office of such corporation is situated, for the appointment of three persons to appraise the value of such stock, and the court shall appoint three such appraisers and designate the time and place of their first meeting, with such directions in regard to their proceedings as shall be deemed proper. The court may at the time of appointing the appraisers or at any subsequent time direct such stockholder to submit his stock certificate to the clerk of the court for notation thereon of the pendency of the appraisal proceedings, and if such stockholder fails to comply with such direction the court may on motion of the corporation dismiss the proceeding. The court may fill any vacancy in the board of appraisers occurring by refusal or neglect to serve or otherwise. The appraisers shall meet at the time and place designated, and after being duly sworn honestly and faithfully to discharge their duties, they or any two of them shall estimate and certify the value of such stock just prior to the taking of the action to which the objection is made and deliver one copy of their appraisal to such corporation, and another to such stockholder if demanded by him. Either the stockholder or the corporation may apply to the supreme court upon five days' notice for an order confirming or modifying or rejecting the appraisal. If the court confirms or modifies such appraisal it shall award interest on the value of such stock, as determined by such appraisal and as confirmed or modified by the court, from the date of taking the action to which the objection was made, and shall direct the manner in which payment shall be made to such stockholder. Before receiving payment such stockholder shall surrender to the corporation his certificate of stock. When the corporation shall have paid the amount of such appraisal, as directed by the court, such stockholder shall cease to have any interest in such stock and in the corporate property of such corporation and such stock may be held or disposed of by such corporation. The fees and expenses of the appraisers shall be fixed by the court and paid by the corporation.

§ 87. Rights of dissenting stockholders. Any stockholder not voting in favor of such consolidation may at any time prior to the vote on such consolidation—or if notice of the meeting to vote on such consolidation was not mailed to him at least twenty days prior to the taking of such vote, then within twenty days after the mailing of such notice—object to such consolidation and demand payment for his stock. Such stockholder or such consolidated corporation shall have the right, subject to the conditions and provisions of section twenty-one to have such stock appraised and paid for as provided in said section. Such objection and demand must be in writing and filed with the constituent corporation of which he is a stockholder or with the consolidated corporation. If the consent to such consolidation is given in writing without a meeting by the stockholders of any constituent corporation the time of a stockholder of such constituent corporation to file his objection and demand shall expire on the twentieth day after the mailing to such stockholder of a notice setting forth the plan of consolidation and stating that the consent in writing of the stockholders entitled to vote thereon of such constituent corporation has been given to such consolidation pursuant to section eighty-six.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 61. Consolidation or Merger; Payment for Stock of Dissatisfied Stockholder:—If any stockholder in any corporation of this State consolidating or merging as aforesaid, who objected thereto in writing and whose shares were not voted in favor of such consolidation or merger, and who filed such written objection with the corporation before the taking of the vote on such consolidation or merger, shall within twenty days after the date on which the agreement of consolidation or merger has been filed and recorded, as aforesaid, demand in writing, from the corporation resulting from or surviving such consolidation or merger, payment for his stock, such resulting or surviving corporation shall, within thirty days after the expiration of said period of twenty days, pay to him the value of his stock on the date of the recording of said agreement of consolidation or merger, exclusive of any element of value arising from the expectation or accomplishment of such consolidation or merger. If during said period of thirty days the corporation and any such stockholder fail to agree as to the value of such stock, any such stockholder, or the corporation resulting from or surviving such consolidation or merger, may by petition filed in the Court of Chancery within four months after the expiration of said period of thirty days demand a determination of the value of the stock of all such stockholders by an appraiser to be appointed by the Chancellor.

Upon the filing of any such petition by a stockholder, service of a copy thereof shall be made upon the corporation, which shall within ten days after such service file in the office of the Register in Chancery in which said petition was filed a duly verified list containing the names and addresses of all stockholders who have demanded payment of their shares and with whom agreements as to the value of their shares have not been reached by the corporation. If the petition shall be filed by the corporation, the petition shall be accompanied by such a duly verified list. The Register in Chancery shall give notice of the time and place fixed for the hearing of such petition by registered mail to the corporation and the stockholders shown upon said list at the addresses therein stated, and notice shall also be given by publishing a notice at least once a week for two successive weeks, the second publication to appear at least one week before the day of the hearing, in a newspaper of general circulation published in the City of Wilmington, Delaware. The Court shall have power to direct such additional publications of notice as it may deem advisable. The forms of the notices by mail and by publication shall be approved by the Court.

After the hearing of such petition the Court shall determine the shareholders who have complied with the provisions of this section and become entitled to the valuation of and payment for their shares, and shall appoint an appraiser to determine such value. Such appraiser shall have power to examine any of the books and records of the corporation the stock of which he is charged with the duty of valuing, and he shall make a determination of the value of the shares upon such investigation as to him may seem proper. The appraiser shall also afford a reasonable opportunity to the parties interested to submit to him pertinent evidence on the value of the shares. The appraiser, also, shall have such powers and authority as may be conferred upon Masters by the Rules of the Court of Chancery or by the order of his appointment.

The appraiser shall determine the value of the stock of the stockholders adjudged by the Chancellor to be entitled to payment therefor and shall file his report respecting such value in the office of the Register in Chancery and notice of the filing of such report shall be given by the Register in Chancery to the parties in interest. Such report shall be subject to exceptions to be heard before the Court both upon the law and facts. After hearing exceptions to the said report the Court shall by its decree determine the value of the stock of the stockholders entitled to payment therefor and shall direct the payment of such value to the stockholders entitled thereto by the resulting or surviving corporation upon the transfer to it of the certificates representing such stock, which decree may be enforced as other decrees in the Court of Chancery may be enforced, whether such resulting or surviving corporation be a corporation of this State or of any other State of the United States of America. The shares of the surviving or resulting corporation into which the shares of such dissenting stockholders would have been converted had they assented to the consideration or merger shall have the status of authorized and unissued shares of the surviving or resulting corporation, as the case may be.

The cost of any such appraisal, including a reasonable fee to and the reasonable expenses of the appraiser, but exclusive of fees of counsel or of experts retained by any party, may on application of any party in interest be determined by the Chancellor and taxed upon the parties to such appraisal or any of them as may appear to be equitable, except that the cost of giving the notice by publication and by registered mail hereinabove provided for shall be paid by the corporation.

Any stockholder who shall have demanded payment of his stock as herein provided shall not thereafter be entitled to vote such stock for any purpose or be entitled to the payment of dividends or other distribution on said stock (except dividends payable to stockholders of record at a date which is prior to the date of the recording of said agreement) unless the appointment of an appraiser shall not be applied for within the time herein provided, or the proceeding be dismissed as to such stockholder, or unless such stockholder shall with the written approval of the corporation deliver to the corporation a written withdrawal of his objections to and an acceptance of such consolidation or merger, in any of which cases the right of such stockholder to payment of his stock shall cease.

At the time of appointing the appraiser or at any time thereafter the Court may require the dissenting stockholders to submit their certificates of stock to the Register in Chancery for notation thereon of the pendency of the appraisal proceedings, and if any stockholder fails to comply with such direction the Court may dismiss the proceedings as to such stockholder.

This section shall apply only to cases of agreements of consolidation or merger filed after the date of the approval of this Act.* All prior cases shall be governed by the law in force immediately prior to the approval of this Act, which as to such cases, and only such cases, is continued in force and effect.

COLE v. WELLS et al.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1916. 224 Mass. 504, 113 N.E. 189.

Suit by Alfred E. Cole, administrator, against Channing M. Wells and others. From interlocutory decrees overruling defendant's demurrer to the original bill on all grounds except that of multifariousness, plaintiff appealed, but subsequently amended, to which defendants filed a demurrer and plea. On report from the superior court Order on demurrer to bill and amended bill affirmed, and plea adjudged insufficient.

Bill in equity by a stockholder in the American Optical Company to set aside certain transactions of defendants, a majority of the officers and shareholders of the corporation, and for an accounting

* April 15, 1943.

In the superior court, the case was reported to the Supreme Judicial Court.

BRALEY, J. The bill, as originally framed, charged the defendants as directors with having wrongfully appropriated funds of the corporation to a large amount for their own personal benefit, and also that at a meeting of the stockholders duly called to take action on a plan proposed by the directors to transfer all the assets of the corporation to themselves as trustees to hold under the declaration of trust, a copy of which is annexed to the bill, the plaintiff representing a minority of the capital stock having voted against the transfer thereafter made a demand in writing upon the corporation in accordance with the provisions of St.1903, c. 437, § 44, which read as follows:

"A stockholder in any corporation which shall have duly voted to sell, lease or exchange all its property and assets or to change the nature of its business in accordance with the provisions of section 40, who, at the meeting of stockholders, has voted against such action may, within thirty days after the date of said meeting, make a demand in writing upon the corporation for payment for his stock. If the corporation and the stockholder cannot agree upon the value of the stock at the date of such sale, lease, exchange or change, such value shall be ascertained by three disinterested persons, one of whom shall be named by the stockholder, another by the corporation and the third by the two thus chosen. The finding of the appraisers shall be final, and if their award is not paid by the corporation within thirty days after it is made, it may be recovered by the stockholder from the corporation in an action of contract. Upon payment by the corporation to the stockholder of the agreed or awarded price of his stock, the stockholder shall forthwith transfer and assign the stock certificates held by him at, and in accordance with, the request of the corporation."

But having as he further alleges made the demand before he had any knowledge of the misappropriation by and fraudulent management of the directors, he also sought to maintain the suit as a minority stockholder. * * *

A minority stockholder if he votes against the action taken by the corporation is entitled under the statute "to payment for his stock." If the corporation and the stockholder cannot agree, the value is to be ascertained by disinterested arbitrators. It is obvious that "the value of the stock" means not merely the market price if the stock is traded in by the public, but the intrinsic value, to determine which all the assets and liabilities must be ascertained. The stockholder as well as the arbitrators, if arbitrators are appointed, ordinarily must resort to the books of the corporation for information, although a condition of affairs may exist where the books of themselves would fail to exhibit the true financial condition of corporate affairs. It is specifically alleged that the directors holding nearly four-fifths of the capital stock, while the plaintiff held the remaining shares, in violation of the by-laws voted themselves salaries "grossly exorbitant and greatly in excess of the fair value of the services rendered," and that not only were such misappropriations concealed from the stockholders including the plaintiff, but being in complete control of the corporation, they managed its affairs for their own personal profit, and the books of the company were so manipulated and falsified, that it was "difficult, if not impossible, to determine from the accounts of the concern the amounts so overdrawn" or appropriated.

A further and important allegation appears, that "because of such acts your complainant did not know what the profits of the company were and was totally ignorant of the fact that these enormous salaries had been taken from the profits of the concern and remained in ignorance thereof until some time after the attempted sale," meaning the transfer under the declaration of trust. And these allegations not being contradicted by the plea are admitted to be true. French v. Shotwell, 5 Johns.Ch. (N.Y.) 555; 10 R.C.L.Equity, § 223.

The statutory option given to a dissatisfied stockholder is either to acquiesce or accept the fair value of his stock and retire from the corporation. If he retires the valuation on which payment is to be made is not what the majority stockholders may be willing the corporation should pay, but is to be ascertained as if liquidation had been voted and all the corporate property after the payment of debts had been marshaled for the benefit of all the stockholders. It is plain that the defendants through their control of the corporation cannot compel the plaintiff who was ignorant of their misdoings, to accept payment for his stock upon a valuation of the assets which excludes the amounts misappropriated. A demand under such circumstances cannot be held to have the force and effect of the demand contemplated by the statute, and there was no irrevocable election as the defendants contend to receive payment upon a valuation to be fixed by agreement of parties, or by arbitration, whereby all demands for an accounting or proceedings to set aside the transfer as violative of his just rights as a dissenting or minority stockholder were waived. The right moreover to demand payment and the right to seek relief in equity in aid of the demand, are not inconsistent but concurrent, and under such circumstances there is no necessity for an election. Mason v. Mason, 4 Sandf.Ch. (N.Y.) 623, 632; Barnett v. Philadelphia Market Co., 218 Pa. 649, 67 Atl. 912; Winfree v. Riverside Cotton Mills, 113 Va. 717, 724, 75 S.E. 309.

But even if the plaintiff could be deemed to have elected, he remained a stockholder until payment by the corporation for his stock at the agreed or awarded price, with the right if necessary to maintain a minority stockholder's bill for an accounting and the restoration to the corporation of the unlawful gains and profits obtained by the defendants while acting in a fiduciary capacity. The enhancement of assets from this source manifestly would result in the enhancement of the price or value of his stock.

The bill alleges that, the defendants having acquired virtual ownership and control of all the stock of the corporation excepting the small percentage owned by the plaintiff, they caused a meeting of the stockholders to be called to take action with reference to selling or disposing of all the assets and business of the company, and the vote thereupon passed that the company sell all its property and assets including its good will to the defendants to hold and manage under the declaration of trust was not intended to be a transaction in the interests of the corporation and the stockholders, but was deliberately planned and accomplished for the sole purpose of enabling the defendants to acquire for their own benefit the property of the corporation, and to protect and secure themselves against any attempt on the part of the corporation, or of the plaintiff to seek and compel an accounting of the moneys theretofore wrongfully appropriated, and to enable them to enlarge and carry on the business beyond the chartered powers of the company solely for their own personal advantage, as well as to retain under the guise of a trust with certificates of preferred and common stock a greater share of the profits than they would have obtained if the transfer had not been made. A transaction of this character promoted and consummated by the directors who were also the majority stockholders was a deliberate fraud upon the corporation, and the plaintiff. The vote and transfer cannot bar the right of a dissentient stockholder who has no remedy within the corporation because the wrongdoers are in full control, from maintaining a bill in equity in its behalf to have the transfer set aside and for an accounting. The property and profits when recovered constitute assets of the corporation. Brewer v. Boston Theatre, 104 Mass. 378; Greenfield Savings Bank v. Simons, 133 Mass. 415; Warren v. Para Rubber Shoe Co., 166 Mass. 97, 44 N.E. 112; Von Arnim v. American Tube Co., 188 Mass. 515, 74 N.E. 680; United Zinc Cos. v. Harwood, 216 Mass. 474, 476, 103 N.E. 1037, Ann.Cas.1915B, 948; Smith v. Bank of Victoria, 41 L.J. (P.C.) 34; 7 R.C.L. Corporations, §§ 287, 609.

The result is that the interlocutory decrees overruling the demurrer to the original bill on all grounds except for multifariousness, and the demurrer to the amended bill, and adjudging the plea to be insufficient in law from which the defendants appealed, are affirmed.

Ordered accordingly.

ADAMS et al. v. UNITED STATES DISTRIBUTING CORPORATION et al.

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, 1945. 184 Va. 134, 34 S.E.2d 244.

Appeals from Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond; Willis D. Miller, Judge.

Suit in equity by Maurice D. Adams and others against United States Distributing Corporation, the Pittston Company, and others for determination of rights of plaintiffs as dissenting holders of preferred stock of first-named defendant and that plaintiffs should be paid amounts alleged to be due them, wherein the last-named defendant filed a demurrer, and after the demurrer was overruled the last-named defendant filed a cross-appeal. From a decree plaintiffs appeal and last-named defendant cross-appeals.

Reversed and dismissed.

EGGLESTON, JUSTICE. This appeal involves the rights of certain holders of preferred stock in United States Distributing Corporation, a Virginia corporation, with its principal office in the city of Richmond, who dissented from the merger of that corporation with The Pittston Company, a Delaware corporation, under the name of the latter. The merger was approved by the respective agencies of the two States on December 31, 1942, with the result that the merged corporation is now duly incorporated in both States. * * *

Briefly stated, the appellants' position is, that the merger of United States Distributing Corporation into The Pittston Company resulted in the dissolution of the former corporation, which gave to the dissenting stockholders their choice of three courses of action:

(1) They could join in the merger by exchanging their stock for shares in the continuing corporation.

(2) They could proceed under Code, § 3822, to recover the "fair cash value" of their stock.

(3) They could insist that the continuing corporation, The Pittston Company, pay to them out of the assets it received from the United States Distributing Corporation the par value of their stock, plus accrued dividends thereon, provided The Pittston Company received from the United States Distributing Corporation sufficient assets for such purpose.

It is the position of The Pittston Company that Code, § 3822, as it stood at the time of the merger, gave the appellants the choice of only the first two alternatives, contended for by them, but that it left to them no right to the third course which they are attempting to assert in the present proceeding. * * *

We are of opinion that these provisions evidence a clear legislative intent, not present in the 1903 statute, to give every stockholder of a merging corporation an election either to dissent and secure in the prescribed manner the fair cash value of his stock, or, if he fails to dissent, to be bound by the terms of the merger.

There is no language, either express or implied, on which there may be based the third alternative remedy which the appellants have sought to invoke in this proceeding.

Nor can the right to such remedy be based on anything which was said in Winfree v. Riverside Cotton Mills, supra. While the opinion states that the dissenting stockholder, in an independent suit in equity, is entitled to receive not less than the "actual value" of his shares, that term is practically synonymous with "fair cash value." Certainly, there is no suggestion that the dissenter may recover what the appellants here call the 'contractual value" of their shares as distinguished from the "fair cash value" or the "actual value." See, Weiss v. Routh, post.

To adopt the contention of the appellants and hold that the remedy afforded by the statute is merely cumulative and not exclusive would lead to confusion and to inequitable results among various dissenting stockholders, even where the identical corporation is involved and the sole question is that of the value of the dissenters' shares. For example, in the case at bar, those preferred stockholders, other than the appellants, who dissented from the merger and pursued the statutory remedy for the appraisal of the "fair cash value" of their stock, in the Chancery Court of the city of Richmond, would have such value determined by the appraisers appointed by that court and subject to its approval, while the appellants in the present proceeding would have the value of their stock determined by a commissioner in chancery, subject to the approval of the Law and Equity Court of the city of Richmond. Unless the two tribunals worked in close harmony they might arrive at entirely different results, although the ultimate purpose is precisely the same.

But that is not all. If the appellants are sound in their view, then they would be free to pursue their equitable remedy in any court, State or Federal, in which they might acquire jurisdiction of the parties. Under this theory the dissenting stockholders could institute actions for the value of their shares in State and Federal courts throughout the country, provided, only, that proper service of process could be effected.

If such a multiplicity of suits could be instituted, and if all such courts had equal and concurrent jurisdiction, the inescapable result would be that instead of all dissenters from a particular merger receiving equal treatment, those who elected to pursue different remedies or like remedies in different courts, would inevitably find themselves with widely varying judgments in their favor. See, Weiss v. Routh, post.

It is inconceivable, we think, that the legislature ever intended that dissenting stockholders of the same corporation and of the same class should receive different values for their shares. On the contrary, we think the design of the Virginia statute is to assure to the dissenting stockholder that he will be fully compensated for the value of that of which he has been deprived by the merger, and no more. * * *

The appellants argue that the effect of the merger and the application of the terms of the appraisal statute is to violate the contract which they had with the corporation, as embodied in its charter and in the provisions of the certificates of stock held by them. There are two answers to this contention.

In the first place, it is elementary that the general corporation law of the State, in force at the time of the incorporation, is just as much a part of the contract between the corporation and its stockholders as are the documents upon which the appellants rely. [Citing Cases.] * * *

Indeed, Code, § 3841, provides: "The general statutes of this State applicable to corporations shall be a part of the charter of every corporation formed under the laws of this State, except so far as the same are inapplicable or inappropriate to the objects of such corporation."

Therefore, when the appellants invested in the shares of the United States Distributing Corporation, they did so with the full knowledge of the fact that the corporation, chartered under the General Corporation Law of Virginia, in 1919, might, under the laws of this State, merge with another corporation, in the manner and with the effect upon their investment specified in the statute.

In the next place, the appellants' claim is predicated upon the theory that the merger of United States Distributing Corporation into The Pittston Company effected a dissolution of the former corporation and thus made operative the charter provision that, "in case of the liquidation or dissolution of this corporation, or a distribution of its assets," the preferred stockholders were to be paid the par value of their stock, plus accrued dividends.

Whether a merger results in the dissolution of the constitutent corporations depends upon the terms and intent of the statute involved. 13 Am.Jur., Corporations, § 1195, pp. 1097, 1098; Fletcher Cyclopedia Corporations, Perm.Ed., Vol. 15, § 7076, pp. 74, 75.

It is well settled in this State that the merger of two corporations does not end the existence of either, but continues the existence of both in the merged corporation. * * *

In re FULTON.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1931. 257 N.Y. 487, 178 N.E. 766.

Proceeding by Kerwin H. Fulton, as substituted trustee under the last will and testament of Alexander Clark, deceased, for the appointment of persons to appraise the value of the shares of stock held by petitioner in the Van Beuren & New York Billposting Company. From an order, 237 N.Y.S. 745, which affirmed an order of the Special Term, 131 Misc. 151, 226 N.Y.S. 141, confirming the report of appraisers the Van Beuren & New York Billposting Company appeals.

Modified and affirmed.

HUBBS, J. This is a proceeding to appraise the value of 481 shares of the preferred stock of Van Beuren & New York Billposting Company, under section 21 of the Stock Corporation Law (Consol. Laws, c. 59).

All of the stockholders of the appellant corporation, except respondent, voted to sell and transfer all of its assets, including its good will, to another corporation. The respondent, who owned 481 shares of preferred stock, did not vote in favor of such sale. He commenced this proceeding under section 21 of the Stock Corporation Law to have the value of his stock appraised. The par value of his stock was $100 per share, and it had never sold above par.

At the date of the respondent's dissent, there were outstanding 2,471 shares of 6 per cent. preferred and 2,471 shares of common stock, all of the par value of $100 per share. The corporation had therefore capital stock outstanding totalling $494,200, all of which had been issued at par. It also had an accumulated surplus arising from undivided profits totaling $682,757.95. The appraisers fixed the value of the preferred stock at $238.15 per share. That figure was arrived at by dividing the sum of the surplus and capital stock issued, $1,176,-957.95, by 4,942, the total number of shares issued, common and preferred. Thus one-half of the surplus was allotted to the preferred stock.

If the method adopted by the appraisers was correct, it is quite apparent that the respondent, by dissenting and requiring an appraisal of his stock, thereby more than doubled the value of his stock which had never sold for more than par.

The method adopted by the appraisers was the method approved for the appraisal of preferred stock after a dissolution of a corporation in the case of Continental Insurance Co. v. United States, 259 U.S. 156, 42 S.Ct. 540, 66 L.Ed. 871. We do not pass upon the question of the proper rule to be applied upon the distribution of surplus between common and preferred stock upon the dissolution of a corporation. The determination of that question is not involved in this case.

Under section 21 of the Stock Corporation Law, the duty of the appraisers is to "estimate and certify the value of such stock at the time of such dissent." We are required to determine the proper method of computing the "value" of each share of preferred stock on April 13, 1926, "the time of such dissent."

Proceedings to dissolve a stock corporation in this state are carefully regulated by statute, which prescribes in great detail all of the various steps in such proceeding. Article 7 of chapter 28, Laws of 1909, the General Corporation Law (Consol. Laws, c. 23), regulates the proceedings for an involuntary dissolution, and article 9 thereof applies to a voluntary dissolution. Section 185 of the statute as amended (Laws 1929, c. 650) provides for the division of the surplus among the stockholders, after the payment of claims, "in accordance with their respective interests." Manifestly, their "respective interests" will depend upon the provisions of the certificate of incorporation and the wording of the stock certificates. In the absence of any provision giving a preference in the surplus to a particular class of stock, it has been decided that such surplus shall be distributed "upon principles of equal justice and equity among all the stockholders." James v. Woodruff, 10 Paige, 541, 546, affirmed 2 Denio, 574.

At the time of the distribution of a surplus upon dissolution, the directors of a corporation have ceased to function. The title to the surplus has vested in a receiver. The statute requires him to distribute it to the stockholders "in accordance with their respective interests."

This proceeding has no resemblance to an action or proceeding to dissolve a corporation. It is a purely statutory proceeding. The statute expressly provides for the fixing of the value of the stock of a going concern, as of the time of the dissent.

It has been said that a sale, not in the ordinary course of business, by a corporation of a substantial part of its business, "so integral as to be essential for the transaction of its ordinary business" (Matter of Timmis, 200 N.Y. 177, 181, 93 N.E. 522, 523), entitles dissenting stockholders to have their stock appraised and paid for by the corporation. The statement that such a sale constitutes a "practical dissolution" of a corporation has been used, not to indicate that the corporation as such had ceased to exist, but as a justification for holding that such a sale could not be made over the protest of dissenting stockholders without giving them the right to have their stock appraised.

While the sale of the assets of a corporation changes the character of the business of the vendor corporation, and establishes the right of a dissenting stockholder to have his stock appraised, it does not amount to an actual dissolution.

Matter of Timmis, 200 N.Y. 177, 93 N.E. 522, is a typical case. In that case a substantial branch of the corporation's business was sold, not in the ordinary course of business, and this court decided that the dissenting stockholder was entitled to have his stock appraised, not because the corporation was dissolved, but because the stockholder could not be compelled to continue as a stockholder in a substantially different business. A reading of the opinion in that case discloses that the corporation was not in fact dissolved or its business discontinued. It only discontinued one branch of its business and continued to carry on its other branches.

At common law, the assets of a corporation could not be sold without the consent of all stockholders. The right of two-thirds of the stockholders to require a sale is a privilege conferred by the Legislature. That privilege cannot be exercised to the detriment of the dissenting stockholders. To require them to accept less than a fair market price for their stock would be a distinct injury. It is true that there may be cases where the stock has a fictitious market price. To require the corporation in such cases to pay the market price of the stock owned by dissenting stockholders would work a hardship on the corporation and its remaining stockholders.

Under such circumstances the market quotations should be considered, but not accepted as decisive of a fair market price. The market quotations at the time of the dissent may, in certain instances, reflect an expectation of increased value as a result of the proposed sale. A dissenting stockholder is not entitled to share in an enhanced value of stock due to the sale which he has opposed and from which he dissents. Market quotations are therefore to be considered only in so far as they reflect a reasonable basis for estimating market quotations which would probably have continued if a sale had not been made. The appraisers should consider the elements that tend to affect market quotations: The rate of dividends; the regularity with which they have been paid; the management and reputation of the company; its prospects for the future; and all other circumstances which will aid them in estimating the future course of the stock in the market. After such consideration, it may be reasonable to decide that the true market price of the stock, i. e., the quotations that would probably prevail in the future, is not less than the quotations at the time of the dissent, and an award may be made based on such market quotations even though it would be greater than the book value or the value as estimated by experts.

The consideration of market quotations when they have been artificially enhanced will seldom be required upon an appraisal, for, if there is an open unrestricted market in which dissenting stockholders can sell their stock at more than its actual value, they will, no doubt, do so. If, however, the directors of the corporation have so managed it as to depress the price of the stock in the open market, dissenting stockholders will naturally desire to secure for their stock its actual value by requiring an appraisal. Petry v. Harwood Electric Co., 280 Pa. 158, 124 A. 307.

The payment of such actual value, even if more than the market quotation, is the price that must be paid by the corporation for the privilege of requiring a sale over the protest of the dissenting stockholders who in effect are being ousted from the corporation.

The purpose of the statute being to save the dissenting stockholder from loss by reason of the change in the nature of the business, he is entitled to receive the value of his stock for sale or its value for investment.

No rule can be laid down for determining the actual or true value of stock of a given class except one of a very general nature, and which may, in a particular case, be inapplicable because of varying provisions contained in the charter or by-laws of the corporation or because of the existence of a state of facts peculiar to the situation involved in the particular case.

In addition to the aliquot value of the share of the applicable assets, which is the only factor to consider under the facts in this case, and market quotations, other elements should be considered by the appraisers. Those elements will necessarily vary in different cases, and it is not practical to attempt to state every circumstance which may properly influence appraisers in fixing the value of such stock.

It will be readily appreciated that the appraisers should have considered the investment value of the stock which is largely determined by the rate of return, the security afforded that the dividends will be regularly paid, the possibility that dividends will be increased or diminished, the selling price of stocks of like character, the amount of preferred stock in comparison with the common stock, the size of the accumulated surplus applicable to the payment of dividends, the record of the corporation, and its prospects for the future.

The appraisers in estimating the fair value of the stock being appraised should give such consideration as to them seems proper to each factor which might enter into such value, and their report as to value should be reasonable and in accordance with the facts proven.

In the case at bar the directors had not ceased to function. The corporation was a going concern. The surplus, consisting of accumulated profits, was still subject to distribution among the common stockholders. True, the corporation had voted to go out of the active business in which it had been engaged and to turn over its assets to another corporation, and to receive therefor stock in the purchasing company, but the relation of the nondissenting stockholders to the vendor corporation remained unchanged. Under the proposed transfer, the stock of the purchasing company received in exchange was to become assets of the selling company and held by its directors in place of the assets which had been transferred. There is no apparent reason why the directors could not vote that part of the stock acquired in exchange for the surplus profits of the corporation as a stock dividend to the holders of the common stock, or sell such stock and distribute the proceeds as a cash dividend to the common stockholders. The holders of the preferred stock had no interest in such surplus except the preference given by the terms of the certificate of incorporation, which gives a preference as to dividends only.

The appraisers were mistaken in assuming that the dissenting stockholder was entitled to an aliquot part of the surplus earnings of the company and in apportioning the same to his preferred stock. The result was to give an unreal and fanciful value to his preferred stock, and to work an injustice to the common stockholders and to the holders of the remaining preferred stock. As there was no established market for the preferred stock, the respondent was entitled to receive the actual value of his stock. The figures used by the appellant showing the condition of the corporation were all taken from its last balance sheet and are conceded to be correct. The correct method of computing the value of the preferred stock under the conceded facts is comparatively simple. The capital stock account was made up of the amount paid for the stock when issued at par; i. e., $494,200. That amount divided by the number of shares issued equals the value of each share of preferred stock, the value at which it should have been appraised under the facts in this case. It happens to be the exact amount paid for the stock when issued.

The result that the dissenting preferred stockholder is entitled to receive for his preferred stock the exact amount paid occurs because the corporation commenced business without any surplus and each stockholder paid par for his stock when issued.

The cases relied upon by the respondent do not hold anything contra to the conclusion which we have reached. Continental Insurance Co. v. United States, supra, involved the construction of a certificate of incorporation which by its terms defined the rights of holders of preferred stock. The court decided that the holders of such stock were entitled to share in the surplus at the conclusion of an action to dissolve the corporation. The dicta contained in the case of Cole v. Wells, 224 Mass. 504, 113 N.E. 189, states the rule applicable upon the distribution of a surplus among owners of common stock, and has no application to a case where a surplus is to be distributed in a statutory proceeding where there is outstanding stock, both common and preferred.

It will be unnecessary to remit the proceeding for a reappraisal, as the parties are in substantial agreement that the value of the preferred stock is its par value of $100 per share provided the dissenting holder of preferred stock is not entitled to share in the surplus.

The order should be modified by reducing the amount to be paid by the appellant for the 481 shares of preferred stock owned by the respondent from the sum of $114,515.50 to $48,100, and, as modified, affirmed, without costs.

ANDERSON v. INTERNATIONAL MINERALS & CHEMICAL CORPORATION.

[For statement of facts, see supra p. 613.]

* * * In this case we are dealing with the provisions of the New York Stock Corporation Law having to do with merger and consolidation (art. 8). These provisions differ in language, purpose and subject matter from article 4 relating to the reclassification of shares under which the cases arose upon which plaintiff relies. The whole process of merger and consolidation rests upon the principle of permitting consolidations approved by two thirds of the shareholders which in the absence of Statute would require the consent of all and permitting dissenters, not wishing to go along, to retire from the enterprise upon payment to them of the appraised value of their shares. It is important to note that the provisions of subdivision 7 of section 91 of article 8 give to every dissenting stockholder included in the consolidation the right to object and demand payment for his stock and to have the same appraised and paid for in the manner provided and subject to the conditions imposed by section 21. Section 21 expressly provides: "Before receiving payment such stockholder shall surrender to the corporation his certificate of stock. When the corporation shall have paid the amount of such appraisal, as directed by the court, such stockholder shall cease to have any interest in such stock and in the corporate property of such corporation and such stock may be held or disposed of by such corporation."

The purpose of section 21 of the Stock Corporation Law was to protect dissenting shareholders, and the process of appraisal was designed to meet two evils which arose because of limitations upon the powers of majority shareholders to bind the minority to a course of action beyond the powers of the majority, which might well be greatly to the advantage of those engaged in a corporate enterprise. These two evils are well stated in Matter of Timmis, 200 N.Y. 177, at page 181, 93 N.E. 522 at page 523 dealing with analogous Statute.

"(1) The injustice to the bulk of the stockholders from want of power in a corporation to sell its business or an essential part thereof to another corporation organized for the purpose, frequently from its own membership, on terms deemed advantageous by the holders of a large majority of the stock. (2) The injustice to minority stockholders of requiring them to abandon, change, or limit their business if the majority should have the power to direct such a sale. An incidental evil was the power of a dissenting stockholder to compel the majority to buy him out on his own terms in order to secure unanimous consent with no one left to question the transaction.

"These evils could be remedied only by legislation, for the courts cannot provide against inherent defects in the creation of corporations. * * * This legislation was designed to meet the evils pointed out by the courts by enabling a majority of two-thirds to sell if they deemed it was the best policy, and at the same time to protect the minority, if they regarded the sale as opposed to their interests."

The remedy of appraisal and payment was intended to afford fair and just compensation to the dissenters and at the same time provide the method by which their objections could be fairly composed so as to enable the consolidation to proceed. This is plainly one of the cases in which it was intended that the rights of the dissenting minority should be surrendered, subject only to their right, secured by the statute, to fair and just compensation. No other construction of the statute is compatible with the accomplishment of its purpose. The care with which the Legislature provided in such cases that any stockholder included in the consolidation can have such compensation indicates quite clearly that every right of a dissenting shareholder is to be appraised and paid for. Since consolidation necessarily imports the retirement of the stock of the constituent companies and the issuance of new shares representing the capital of the consolidated company, the old stock with all its rights and privileges is necessarily retired and the shareholders participating in the consolidation become entitled to the shares of the new corporation under the terms and conditions of the certificate of consolidation. If, proceeding in accordance with the statute, the consolidation is duly consummated, there are but two alternative rights which survive to the holders of the old shares: To take the new shares upon the terms and conditions of consolidation or to take the value of the old shares determined in accordance with section 21. The plaintiff here insists that he may demand the dividends accumulated upon his stock and at the same time take the new shares of the consolidated company. This of course is quite contrary to the provisions of the certificate of consolidation which provides for the issuance of one share of new 4% cumulative preferred stock and three and one-half shares of new common stock of the consolidated corporation in exchange for each share of the 7% prior preference cumulative stock of the constituent New York corporation, International Agricultural Corporation. Of course none of the other shareholders has agreed to any such basis of consolidation as the plaintiff demands and his demand is destructive of the whole statutory process.

The plaintiff attempts to support his position by reference to section 90 of the Stock Corporation Law which deals with rights of creditors of consolidated corporations. Quite obviously there is no merit in this contention, for the right to accrued dividends, accrued merely by the lapse of time and not yet declared, is not a debt or a claim enforcible against the corporation, Godley v. Crandall & Godley Co., 212 N.Y. 121, 128, 105 N.E. 818, 820, L.R.A.1915D, 632; McNulty v. W. & J. Sloane, 184 Misc. 835, 842, 54 N.Y.S.2d 253, 260.

The interpretation of the statute being clear, no question arises as to its constitutional validity since the plaintiff acquired his stock in International Agricultural Corporation, a New York corporation, during the years 1931 and 1932. It is true that section 91 authorizing the consolidation of domestic with foreign stock corporations was added by Laws of 1934, chapter 611, section 1, effective May 14, 1934, but similar provisions for merger and consolidation of two or more domestic business corporations had been on the statute books since the enactment of section 8 of the Business Corporations Laws of 1909 Consol.Laws, c. 4, and these provisions had been derived from section 14 of the Business Corporations Law of 1890. Thus whatever rights the plaintiff acquired as a stockholder in 1931 and 1932 were subject to the provisions for appraisal similar to those which he now attacks as invalid. Indeed, the constitutionality of such provisions had been considered and determined by this court as early as 1918 (Logan v. New Amsterdam Gas Co., 224 N.Y. 664, 121 N.E. 876) and similar questions arising under the Banking Law, Consol.Laws, c. 2, were decided in April, 1908. Colby v. Equitable Trust Co. of New York, 192 N.Y. 535, 84 N.E. 1111. For a precisely analogous case see In re Interborough Consolidated Corporation, D.C., 277 F. 455.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

E. CORPORATE REACQUISITION OF OWN STOCK; REDEMPTION AND RETIREMENT.

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW.

§ 28. Redemption, purchase or retirement of preferred stock out of capital. 1. Whenever any stock corporation has issued shares of any class of preferred stock which by their terms are redeemable at the option of the corporation, and such corporation shall desire to redeem or purchase any of such shares, it may, unless otherwise provided in its certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law, by resolution of its board of directors, apply to the redemption or purchase thereof an amount out of its capital which shall not be greater than the capital represented by the shares so redeemed or purchased, provided that the effect of any such redemption or purchase and application of capital thereto shall not be to reduce the actual value of its assets to an amount less than the total amount of its debts and liabilities, plus the amount of its capital reduced by the amount of capital so applied. Any such redemption or purchase and application of capital thereto shall not be deemed to be the declaration or payment of a dividend or a distribution of assets within the meaning of section fifty-eight. Whenever any such stock corporation shall have in its treasury shares of any class of such preferred stock so redeemed or purchased out of capital, or redeemed or purchased out of surplus, it may, unless otherwise provided in its certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law, by resolution of its board of directors, retire such preferred stock. Upon the filing of a certificate as provided in paragraph three of this section, all shares so redeemed, purchased or retired shall be eliminated from the authorized capital stock or number of shares of the corporation, and the capital of the corporation shall be reduced by an amount equal to the amount so applied to the redemption or purchase of such shares or, in the case of such retirement by an amount equal to the amount of capital represented by the shares so retired.

2. For the purposes of this section:

a. When the shares so redeemed, purchased or retired have a par value, the capital represented thereby shall be deemed to be the par value thereof;

b. When such shares are without par value, the capital represented thereby shall be determined as follows:

Where any part of the capital of the corporation has not been allocated to any class of shares or consists of amounts transferred to capital by resolution of the board of directors, in determining for the purposes of this section the capital represented by such shares without par value so redeemed, purchased or retired, the board of directors may allocate to the capital represented by the class of which such shares are a part all or any part of such allocated or transferred capital. If the statement respecting capital is that prescribed by paragraph A of subdivision four of section twelve, the capital represented by the class of stock of which the shares so redeemed, purchased or retired, are part shall be the dollar amount per share specified in such statement multiplied by the total number of issued shares of such class, plus any other amount transferred or allocated to such class by the board of directors; or if the statement respecting capital is that prescribed in paragraph B of subdivision four of section twelve, the capital represented by such class shall be the aggregate amount of consideration received by the corporation for the issuance of the total number of issued shares of such class, together with any other amount transferred or allocated to such class by the board of directors; provided, that the capital represented by any class of such preferred stock shall not be greater than the maximum amount which by the terms of such stock would be distributable to all the issued shares thereof upon the involuntary liquidation of the corporation. The capital represented by each issued share of any class of such preferred stocks shall be the quotient obtained by dividing the total capital represented by such class by the total number of issued shares of such class.

3. Whenever any capital of the corporation is applied to the redemption or purchase of shares of such preferred stock or any shares of such preferred stock which have been purchased out of surplus are retired, pursuant to this section, there shall be filed a certificate which shall be entitled "Certificate of reduction of capital of (name of corporation) pursuant to section twenty-eight of the stock corporation law." Such certificate shall contain the statements prescribed in section thirty-six for like certificates under subdivision (G) to effect the reduction of capital, and the statements prescribed by such section thirty-six of like certificates under subdivision (A) or (C), as the case may be, to effect the reduction of capital stock or the elimination of previously authorized shares, except that such certificate need not state the preferences, privileges and voting powers, or restrictions or qualifications thereof, of previously authorized shares. Such certificate shall be subscribed and acknowledged by the president or a vice-president and the secretary or an assistant secretary who shall make and annex an affidavit that they have beeen authorized to execute and file such certificate by resolution of the board of directors, adopted at a directors' meeting duly called and held on a date specified in such affidavit. There shall be annexed to such certificate an affidavit of the president or a vice-president and also an affidavit of the treasurer or a majority of the directors stating that the actual value of the assets of the corporation is not less than the total amount of the debts and liabilities of the corporation plus the reduced amount of its capital. Such certificate shall be filed as provided in section thirty-eight in respect of certificates under section thirty-six.

9. If the certificate

(a) alters or abolishes any preferential right of any outstanding shares having preferences, affecting the holders of such shares adversely; or

(b) creates, alters or abolishes any provision or right in respect of the redemption of any outstanding shares or of any sinking fund for the redemption or purchase of any such shares, affecting the holders of such shares adversely; or

(c) limits or denies any pre-emptive right of the holders of any outstanding shares to subscribe for shares or other securities of the corporation, or alters or abolishes any provision affecting any such right contained in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law, so as to affect adversely the pre-emptive right of such holders; or any holder of any such shares not in favor of such action may at any time prior to the vote authorizing such action—or if notice of the meeting to vote upon such action was not mailed to stockholders entitled to receive such notice at least twenty days prior to the taking of such vote, then within twenty days after the mailing of such notice—object to such action and demand payment for his stock, and thereupon such stockholder or the corporation shall have the right, subject to the conditions and provisions of section twenty-one, to have such stock appraised and paid for as provided in said section. Such objection and demand must be in writing and filed with the corporation. If the action is effected without a meeting, the time of such stockholder to file his objection and demand shall expire on the twentieth day after the mailing to such stockholder of a notice stating the nature of such action and the date on which a certificate pursuant to section thirty-six and executed as prescribed by subdivision two of section thirty-seven was filed. * * *

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW.

Sec. 19. Corporation May Purchase, Hold, Sell and Transfer Its Own Stock; Not to be Voted:—Every Corporation organized under this Chapter shall have the power to purchase, hold, sell and transfer shares of its own capital stock; provided that no such corporation shall use its funds or property for the purchase of its own shares of capital stock when such use would cause any impairment of the capital of the corporation; and provided further that shares of its own capital stock belonging to the corporation shall not be voted upon directly or indirectly; and provided, further, that nothing in this Section shall be construed as limiting the exercise of the rights given by Section 27 of this Chapter.

Sec. 27. Retirement of Perferred Stock:—Whenever any corporation organized under this Chapter shall have issued any preferred or special shares it may, subject to the provisions of its Certificate of Incorporation, (1) redeem all or any part of such shares, if subject to redemption, at such time or times, at such price or prices, and otherwise as shall be stated or expressed in the Certificate of Incorporation or (2) at any time or from time to time purchase all or any part of such shares, but in the case of shares subject to redemption, at not exceeding the price or prices at which the same may be redeemed, or (3) at any time or from time to time, by resolution of the board of directors, retire any such shares redeemed or purchased out of surplus. The corporation may apply to such redemption or purchase an amount out of its capital which shall not be greater than the sum of (1) that part of the consideration received for such shares which shall be capital pursuant to the provisions of Section 14 of this Chapter and that part of surplus which shall have been transferred and treated as capital in respect of such shares pursuant to the provisions of said Section and (2) any amounts by which the capital of the corporation shall have been increased by other transfers from surplus in accordance with the provisions of said Section 14, except those transfers, if any, which shall have been made in respect of other preferred or special shares. No such redemption or purchase, however, shall be made out of capital unless the assets of the corporation remaining after such redemption or purchase shall be sufficient to pay any debts of the corporation, the payment of which shall not have been otherwise provided for.

Any such shares so redeemed or purchased by the application of capital or otherwise retired pursuant to the provisions of this Section, shall, upon the filing and recording of the certificate hereinafter in this Section provided for, and any shares of the corporation surrendered to it on the conversion or exchange thereof into or for other shares of the corporation pursuant to the provisions of the Certificate of Incorporation shall, after such conversion or exchange, have the status of authorized and unissued shares of the class of stock to which such shares belong; provided, however, that if the Certificate of Incorporation prohibits the reissue of such shares, the authorized capital stock of the corporation of the class to which such shares belong shall, upon such redemption, purchase, retirement, conversion or exchange, be deemed to be, and shall, upon the filing and recording of an appropriate certificate, executed as hereinafter provided, be reduced to the extent of the aggregate par value of the shares so redeemed, purchased, retired, converted or exchanged or, if such shares are without par value, to the extent of the total number of such shares.

Whenever any capital of the corporation is applied to the redemption or the purchase of shares or any shares are retired pursuant to the provisions of this Section 27, a certificate shall be made accordingly under the seal of the corporation and the hands of its President or a Vice-President and its Secretary or an Assistant Secretary and the President or such Vice-President shall acknowledge said certificate before an officer authorized by the laws of Delaware to take acknowledgement of deeds; and said certificate, so executed and acknowledged, shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State and a copy thereof, certified by said Secretary of State, shall be recorded in the office of the Recorder of the County in which the original Certificate of Incorporation is recorded; and thereupon the capital of the corporation shall be deemed to be and shall thereby be reduced by the amount thereof so applied to such redemption or purchase or the amount thereof represented by the shares so redeemed or purchased.

"* * * a right to redeem springs from a provision in the articles of association, by-laws or share certificate existing at the time the shares were created and obtaining with respect to all the shares of a given class. A purchase of shares, on the other hand, though it also results in a surrender of shares and a distribution of funds to the holder, is the creature of a specific agreement between the corporation and the individual holder. The obligation of the corporation to purchase does not necessarily arise at the time of issuance. * * * Another process often involving a delivery of shares to the corporation and a distribution of capital to the shareholder is a statutory reduction of capital stock. This method differs, however, from a redemption in at least one respect. It is not provided for in advance by an agreement between the corporation and its members at the time of the issuance of the shares." Note, Redemption of Preferred Shares, 1935, 83 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 888, 889.

A corporation may reacquire its stock, without purchase, in the following ways:

1. by taking back some outstanding stock to compromise a claim against it or a debt owed by a stockholder;
2. by bidding in outstanding shares rather than forfeiting them for non-payment of calls or assessments;
3. by a gift or bequest of shares from a stockholder;
4. by operation of law (i. e., the corporation is sued for conversion; there is a judgment for plaintiff; on payment of the judgment, title to the shares vests in the corporation).

A corporation may wish to purchase its own stock for any one of the following reasons:

1. to effect a compromise of internal dissension; [1]
2. to repurchase from employees stock given them with an option in the company to buy in the shares at the termination of the employment; [2]
3. to permit the company, in floating stock issues, to entice otherwise reluctant buyers by contracts to repurchase from them if they later wish to back out;
4. to obtain stock which can be issued at less than par, (i. e., there is no requirement that treasury stock be issued at par);

6. to prefer favored shareholders, by permitting them to withdraw from the venture either because they have lost confidence in it, or to give them an advantageous price;

7. to avoid the preemptive right of stockholders;[3]

8. to manipulate the stock market, (i. e., by trading in its own securities, an artificial value is set upon the shares);

9. to defeat creditors' priorities to corporate assets in the event of insolvency. See, Levy, Purchase by a Corporation of Its Own Stock, 1930, 15 Minn.L.Rev. 1.

"* * * a purchase (by a corporation of its own shares) would be proper under any of the following circumstances: (1) if the purchase were made from surplus, and the stock carried no liabilities; (2) if the corporation were solvent, and it had statutory permission to reduce its capital stock, and the court, as a condition precedent to enforcing the contract, required the corporation to avail itself of this statutory permission so that the purchase price should be in fact paid out of a surplus which emerges through the reduction of the capital stock; (3) if the corporation were solvent, and were in liquidation so that the possibility of harm to future creditors might safely be dismissed as negligible." RETIREMENT OF REACQUIRED SHARES AS AFFECTING AUTHORIZED CAPITAL[5]

I. Introduction

Modern American corporation law permits a corporation, subject to various safeguards, to purchase its own stock. Such shares are commonly termed treasury shares.[6] They may be paid for either out of surplus, or out of capital.[7] Depending on which account is used, the legal results will vary. Where surplus has been applied, the shares will generally remain in existence; where capital has been resorted to, the transaction will usually involve retirement of the shares. Some jurisdictions, among them New York, require not only a reduction of capital—a money figure corresponding to the balance sheet liability shown for issued shares—but also a simultaneous reduction of the authorized capital stock or number of shares. Other states, e.g., Delaware, treat treasury shares as if they were authorized, but unissued.

II. Acquisition by a Corporation of Its Own Shares

Aside from § 28 of the Stock Corporation Law, entitled "Redemption, purchase or retirement of preferred stock out of capital," the New York statutes grant no specific authority for a corporation's reacquisition of its shares. Such power may, however, be implied from the Penal Law,[8] which forbids directors to apply any portion of the corporation's funds, except surplus, directly or indirectly, to the purchase of shares of its own stock, except as provided or permitted by law. The courts have permitted corporations to purchase their own shares, provided and so long as, surplus was available for that purpose. As early as 1858, the Court of Appeals held that, in the absence of prohibition by statute, a corporation in full operation with a capital equivalent to its authorized capital stock might purchase its own stock, hold it unextinguished, and resell it by action of the board of directors; that such purchase operated to diminish the capital stock only if the corporation so intended, and the resale was not invalid because requirements applicable to an original issue were not observed.[9] In Cross v. Beguelin, [10] a corporation's agreement to purchase its own stock was held to have been valid when made, because a surplus then existed, and unenforceable, as against it, when the surplus had shrunk to a deficit. In Norwalk v. Marcus,[11] which dealt with the "sterner legislative policy" in regard to a bank's agreement to repurchase its stock, the Court said:

This study was made at the direction of the Law Revision Commission by Carlos L. Israels, Esq., of the New York City Bar, Research Consultant, who was assisted by Felix Taubenblatt, Research Assistant.

[6] See California Civil Code (Deering) § 278: "'Treasury shares' means shares issued and thereafter acquired by the corporation, but not retired or restored to the status of unissued shares." There is, however, no agreement on the definition of treasury shares (11 Fletcher, Corporations (Perm. Ed., 1932) § 5088) and it has been pointed out that they may not be accurately described as "unissued shares, issued shares, cancelled shares, outstanding shares, assets, or non-assets" (Note, The Legal Status of Treasury Shares, (1937) 85 Univ. of Penn.L.Rev. 622, 628). In Ballantine and Sterling, California Corporation Laws (1938 ed.) the authors, speaking generally and apparently without limitation to California, define treasury stock as shares which have been issued and thereafter reacquired by the corporation, but not retired.

"In dealing with stock corporations generally, the Legislature has found it necessary, in the interest of the public, to declare invalid agreements by corporations to repurchase shares of their own stock except out of surplus. (Topken, Loring & Schwartz, Inc. v. Schwartz, 249 N.Y. 206; Cross v. Beguelin, 252 id. 262.)"

III. Disposition of Reacquired Shares

Shares reacquired by the corporation from surplus may be resold. Such action is within the discretion of the board of directors[12] and no action by the stockholders is required, unless it is otherwise provided in the certificate of incorporation.[13] Pre-emptive rights do not attach[14] except where there has been a breach of fiduciary duty on the part of the directors in reissuing the shares[15] or where the corporation buys its stock in order to retire it or hold it indefinitely and then proceeds to resell it.[16] Unless the corporation sees fit to "eliminate" the purchased shares,[17] the authorized capital stock will not be reduced. It follows that the resale of these shares involves no increase of authorized shares taxable under the Tax Law.[18]

An entirely different situation prevails in regard to preferred stock redeemable by its terms at the option of the corporation.[19] Under § 28 of the Stock Corporation Law such stock may be either redeemed or purchased out of capital. A resolution of the board of directors is sufficient, unless the stockholders have restricted such authority in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law. However, the invasion of capital is subject to two restrictions.

19 N.Y. Stock Corp. Law, § 28.

First, the amount applied must not exceed the capital represented by the shares redeemed or repurchased. A premium, for instance, is thus excluded and would have to be paid from surplus.

Second, the actual value of the remaining assets must at least equal the total amount of debts and liabilities, plus the amount of capital reduced by the amount of capital applied. If the directors keep within these limits, they are not liable for unlawful dividends or distribution of assets.[20]

May the corporation reissue such stock? Is it treasury stock or must it be retired? The answers to these questions point up the somewhat confusing terminology employed by the statute:

"Whenever any such stock corporation shall have in its treasury shares of any class of such preferred stock so redeemed or purchased out of capital. . . . it may, unless otherwise provided in its certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law, by resolution of the board of directors, retire such preferred stock." [21]

It follows that preferred stock, redeemed out of capital is "treasury" stock. There is a clear implication that under certain circumstances such shares need not be retired. Despite this, the shares must be eliminated from authorized capital stock, for subdivision 3 of § 28 prescribes that where capital has been applied to the redemption or purchase of preferred shares, the corporation shall file a certificate of reduction of capital, which shall contain statements to effect both the reduction (a) of capital and (b) of capital stock or the elimination of previously authorized shares, and that upon the filing all shares so redeemed or purchased shall be eliminated from the authorized capital stock or number of shares of the corporation and the capital of the corporation shall be reduced accordingly.

Since the authorized capital stock is decreased upon the purchase or redemption of preferred shares out of capital, any later reissue of such shares requires new authorization, increasing the number of authorized shares, which in turn requires action by the stockholders.[22] Unless it is otherwise provided in the certificate of incorporation, or other certificate filed pursuant to law, or unless the issue of such shares is for one of the special purposes enumerated in subdivision 4 of section 39 of the Stock Corporation Law, preemptive rights would attach, under section 39, to shares issued pursuant to such an increase of authorized shares.

The increase of authorized capital stock is taxable under § 180 of the Tax Law. It is noteworthy that for almost twenty-seven years § 180 contained the following provision:

"And in case of a decrease of capital stock, upon which the tax required by law has been paid, and a subsequent increase thereof, a tax shall be paid only upon so much of such increase as exceeds the amount of capital stock upon which a tax has been before paid."

[22] A certificate increasing the authorized shares pursuant to Stock Corporation Law, § 36 requires the vote of the holders of a majority of the outstanding shares entitled to vote. Stock Corporation Law, § 37(3) (a).

The clause was inserted in the section in 1906,[23] but was eliminated in 1933.[24] The Attorney General has ruled that this section now imposes a tax on all increases of capital stock and that the tax is payable on an increase in the authorized capital stock even though such increase is in the exact amount of a prior reduction thereof.[25] Taxwise, therefore, the situation shapes up as follows: Shares purchased from surplus, be they redeemable preferred stock or any other kind, are not eliminated from those the corporation is authorized to issue; upon their redisposition no tax under § 180 falls due. But shares purchased from capital (limited by Stock Corporation Law, § 28, to redeemable preferred stock) will be eliminated from those the corporation is authorized to issue; and if they are to be reissued the tax under § 180 of the Tax Law must first be paid.[26]

Since a corporation may enter the market to repurchase its own shares, a pretty question of divided loyalty may be raised.

A corporate management, determining to repurchase some of the corporation's own shares, finds the interests of the corporation in direct conflict with the selling shareholder. The corporate interest is to buy low; the stockholder's interest is to sell high. Where there is a wide public market, and the transaction merely takes place at an appraisal placed on the shares by a great number of outside buyers and sellers, the conflict of interest is minimal: the corporation as buyer, the stockholder as seller, decide to buy and sell at a current market rate.

But where the market is "thin" and the corporation's own operations affected, the temptations may be very great. The sale of a block by the corporation may depress the market; a purchase may raise it. A thoughtful management will wish to consider these factors as well as the mere advantage to the corporation in deciding its course.

25 (1945) Op.Atty.Gen., February 17. The case concerned an insurance company which reduced its authorized capital stock by reducing the par value of each share. No reacquisition of shares was involved. See Appendix.

26 The extent to which the present rule increases the tax burden of corporations refunding their preferred stocks is difficult to prognosticate. Theoretically, it would be possible under a statute like Tax Law, § 180 as it existed prior to 1933, for a corporation to call a preferred issue, reclassify the shares by changing dividend rates, par value etc., under § 36 of the Stock Corporation Law, and then sell the refunding issue without paying a new organization tax, regardless whether the funds for redeeming the shares are charged against capital or surplus. As a practical matter, however, when a corporation must resort to capital in order to redeem its callable preferred stock, it will probably not have the funds necessary to accomplish the redemption except from the proceeds of the new issue, so that for a period of perhaps thirty days both the new and old issues will be outstanding. In such a situation an organization tax sufficient to authorize the new issue would have to be paid, unless the corporation had in its treasury preferred shares previously retired, which could be reclassified and used, or had already obtained authority to issue additional shares.

If there is no recognized market, and the corporation negotiates separately with a shareholder, the problem becomes greater.

It must be remembered that a corporate management within limits can make the corporate picture seem rosy or bleak. By committing its earnings to very heavy maintenance and depreciation charges, it may conceal to some degree its real prosperity. By limiting its maintenance and depreciation work, and ceasing to carry on expansion, it may increase its apparent earnings and offer hope of larger dividends. It may directly affect the market by adopting a generous or niggardly dividend policy. In consequence, it is in a position materially to affect the price at which it can buy or sell.

Particularly where there is concentrated ownership of stock—one or two individuals holding large blocks—their interests may be adverse to the other holders. A stockholder in a 90% income tax bracket, for instance, will normally prefer that dividends shall be kept low, and earnings "plowed in" to the corporate structure, thereby accomplishing a steady swell up in the value of his stock. On sale of the stock he would then pay merely the capital gains tax of 25% if he had held for the requisite length of time. A small stockholder, needing and wanting current dividends, and a high market value in case he were forced to resell, would wish an exactly opposite policy.

All of these circumstances must be remembered in dealing with the bare legal problem of corporate power to reacquire its own stock; and all of these circumstances bear on the problem. Later, in discussing management, some of these problems reappear in connection with rules of law affecting the participation of the management in the market.

(a) When Permissible

TREVOR v. WHITWORTH.

House of Lords, 1887. 12 A.C. 409.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal.

James Schofield & Sons Limited were incorporated in 1865 under the Companies Act 1862 with a capital of £150,000 in 15,000 shares of £10 each. The objects, as stated in the memorandum of association, were to acquire and carry on the business of certain flannel manufacturers, and any other businesses and transactions which the company might consider to be in any way conducive or auxiliary thereto, or proper to be carried on in connection therewith.

The memorandum did not authorize the company to purchase its own shares.

Several of the articles of association dealt with the purchase of shares by the company. In the view which the House took it is necessary to refer only to two.

Article 179. "Any share may be purchased by the company from any person willing to sell it, and at such price, not exceeding the then marketable value thereof, as the board think reasonable."

Article 181. "Shares so purchased may at the discretion of the board be sold or disposed of by them or be absolutely extinguished, as they deem most advantageous for the company."

The company having in 1884 gone into liquidation in the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster, a claim was made against the company by the respondents, as executors of Whitworth a deceased shareholder, for the balance of the price of Whitworth's shares sold by the executors to the company in 1880, and not wholly paid for. The circumstances under which the purchase in question and other purchases by the company of its own shares were effected are stated in the judgments.

A summons having been taken out by the appellants, the official liquidators, to determine whether the claim ought to be allowed, the Vice-Chancellor of the county palatine made an order declaring that, without prejudice to any claim by the claimants against any persons other than the liquidators and the company, the claim against the company ought not to be allowed.

The Court of Appeal (Cotton, Bowen and Fry L.JJ.) reversed this decision and allowed the claim. Against this decision the liquidators now appealed. The only question material to this report being the general question, whether such a company can purchase its own shares, the arguments on the other points are omitted.

LORD HERSCHELL. * * *

I pass now to the main question in this case, which is one of great and general importance, whether the company had power to purchase the shares. The result of the judgment in the Court below is certainly somewhat startling. The creditors of the company which is being wound up, who have a right to look to the paid-up capital as the fund out of which their debts are to be discharged, find coming into competition with them persons who, in respect only of their having been, and having ceased to be, shareholders in the company, claim that the company shall pay to them a part of that capital. The memorandum of association, it is admitted, does not authorize the purchase by the company of its own shares. It states, as the objects for which the company is established, the acquiring certain manufacturing businesses and the undertaking and carrying on the businesses so acquired, and any other business and transaction which the company consider to be in any way auxiliary thereto, or proper to be carried on in connection therewith. * * *

Let me now invite your Lordships' attention to the facts of the present case. The company had purchased, prior to the date of the liquidation, no less than 4142 of its own shares; that is to say, considerably more than a fourth of the paid-up capital of the company had been either paid, or contracted to be paid, to shareholders, in consideration only of their ceasing to be so. I am quite unable to see how this expenditure was incurred in respect of or as incidental to any of the objects specified in the memorandum. * * *

What was the reason which induced the company in the present case to purchase its shares? If it was that they might sell them again, this would be a trafficking in the shares, and clearly unauthorized. If it was to retain them, this would be to my mind an indirect method of reducing the capital of the company. The only suggestion of another motive (and it seems to me to be a suggestion unsupported by proof) is that this was intended to be a family company, and that the directors wanted to keep the shares as much as possible in the hands of those who were partners, or who were interested in the old firm, or of those persons whom the directors thought they would like to be amongst this small number of shareholders. I cannot think that the employment of the company's money in the purchase of shares for any such purpose was legitimate. The business of the company was that of manufacturers of flannel. In what sense was the expenditure of the company's money in this way incidental to the carrying on of such a business, or how could it secure the end of enabling the business to be more profitably or satisfactorily carried on? I can quite understand that the directors of a company may sometimes desire that the shareholders should not be numerous, and that they should be persons likely to leave them with a free hand to carry on their operations. But I think it would be most dangerous to countenance the view that, for reasons such as these, they could legitimately expend the moneys of the company to any extent they please in the purchase of its shares. No doubt if certain shareholders are disposed to hamper the proceedings of the company, and are willing to sell their shares, they may be bought out; but this must be done by persons, existing shareholders or others, who can be induced to purchase the shares, and not out of the funds of the company. * * *

I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor restored, and that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs in the Court of Appeal and in this House, and do repay to the appellants any moneys and costs received from them. * * *

CRANDALL v. LINCOLN.

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1884. 52 Conn. 73, 52 Am.Rep. 560.

Bill in Equity brought by the plaintiffs as receivers of the Willimantic Trust Company, a corporation, against a large number of former stockholders of the company who had sold their shares of stock to the company and been paid for the same from its capital. * * *

CARPENTER, J. The Willimantic Trust Company, a corporation, by special charter, being insolvent, went into the hands of receivers in April, 1878. The assets of the company are not sufficient to pay its liabilities, the deficit being about $35,000. Prior to its failure the affairs of the company were managed by a board of fifteen trustees. The by-laws required the trustees to appoint from their number an executive committee of five. The duties of the executive committee, so far as material, are found in the fifth section of the by-laws, as follows:—"The executive committee shall superintend and direct with reference to all the business transactions of the company, especially as to the investment and disposal of its funds in stocks, bonds, mortgages and other securities, and all guardianships, receiverships and other special trusts, none of which shall in any case be accepted without their approbation, except such as shall be made by an order of a court of competent jurisdiction."

On the first of January, 1875, there was no surplus. On the first day of May following its stock was impaired, its actual value being then about seventy-five per cent. of its par value. The officers and managers of the institution expected to realize enough from its assets to make the stock worth par, and believed that it was worth par. Some little time before the 14th day of June, 1875, as the company had in uninvested cash about $10,000, the scheme of purchasing the shares of the company by the corporation was talked over by the officers of the company. Nothing was determined upon in relation thereto, although the idea was favorably received, until the meeting of the executive committee on the 14th day of June, 1875, at which time the matter was fully talked over by the officers and the whole executive committee, and it was then determined to purchase stock of the corporation, and the president and secretary were instructed to proceed to purchase the same to the amount of $10,000. There was no vote or resolution of the executive committee to that effect, and no record thereof was kept. The purchases of stock made from time to time were reported to the trustees, and to the stockholders at their annual meeting in the spring of each year, and the executive committee and board of trustees were kept advised from time to time as the purchases were made. More than the $10,000 was so spent, and it is found that there was a general understanding existing at all times on the part of the executive committee that such purchases were being made, and the president and secretary always supposed that they had full authority to make such purchases; and when these transactions were reported to the executive committee, the board of trustees, and the stockholders, such action on the part of the president and secretary was approved. In that way three hundred and twenty-six shares of stock of the trust company were sold and transferred to the company, for which was paid out to stockholders more than $30,000 of its funds. To enable the receivers to pay the debts they have brought this suit to recover of these stockholders the amount so received by them.

The first question presented for our consideration is, whether the purchase of stock by the corporation in the manner stated and under the circumstances was legal.

The stock of a corporation is its only basis of credit. Unlike a partnership, its members generally are not individually liable for its debts.[27] The character, reputation and credit of its promoters do not attach to the corporation itself except to a limited extent. Hence it is of vital importance that the law should rigidly guard and protect the capital stock. Otherwise, especially in these days when so large a portion of the business of the country is carried on by corporations, confidence, on which the prosperity of the country largely depends, would be seriously impaired. Hence it is that in equity the capital stock of a corporation is now regarded as a trust fund for the payment of debts.[28] The creditors have a lien upon it, which is prior in point of right to any claim which the stockholders as such can have upon it; and courts will be astute to detect and defeat any scheme or devise which is calculated to withdraw this fund, or in any way to place it beyond the reach of creditors. A leading case on this subject is Wood v. Dummer, Fed.Cas. No. 17,944, 3 Mason, 308. Story, J., says: "It appears to me very clear upon general principles, as well as the legislative intention, that the capital stock of banks is to be deemed a pledge or trust fund for the payment of the debts contracted by the bank. The public, as well as the legislature, have always supposed this to be a fund appropriated to such purpose. The individual stockholders are not liable for the debts of the bank in their private capacities. The charter relieves them from personal responsibility and substitutes the capital stock in its stead. Credit is universally given to this fund by the public, as the only means of payment. During the existence of the corporation it is the sole property of the corporation, and can be applied only according to its charter, that is, as a fund for payment of its debts, upon the security of which it may discount and circulate notes. Why otherwise is any capital stock required by our charters? If the stock may, the next day after it is paid in, be withdrawn by the stockholders without payment of the debts of the corporation, why is its amount so studiously provided for, and its payment by the stockholders so diligently required? To me this point appears so plain upon principles of law, as well as of common sense, that I cannot be brought into any doubt that the charters of our banks make the capital stock a trust fund for the payment of all the debts of the corporation. * * *

These views are abundantly sustained by the authorities from which we have quoted and from many more which might be cited. We do not intend to say that under no circumstances can a corporation legally become the owner of its own stock. Should it loan money to a stockholder and be obliged to take its own stock in payment, that would not be illegal per se. So too it may be allowable for a company to purchase temporarily with its surplus earnings; but stock should not be held indefinitely; it should be disposed of in a reasonable time. If not, and should creditors thereby be prejudiced, perhaps the managers of the company might be liable.

Nor do we intend to say that a direct purchase would be declared illegal at the instance of a party to the transaction. If the stock is reissued and creditors are not prejudiced probably the courts would not interfere. But as a rule to which there are few if any exceptions, when a stockholder conveys his stock to the company and receives in return a portion of the capital, he holds the money so received subject to the superior equities of creditors.[29]

28 See, supra, pp. 270 et seq., on the trust fund theory.

29 Stockholders who knew they were selling to the corporation were held liable. Certain stockholders had sold their shares in good faith to an undisclosed agent of the company. They were held liable on the ground that: "* * * Under no circumstances can a stockholder sell his stock to the company and take therefor his portion of the capital stock to the prejudice of creditors. Judgment for plaintiff.

In re FECHHEIMER FISHEL CO.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1914. 212 F. 357.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

In the matter of Fechheimer Fishel Co., bankrupt. From an order confirming an order of the referee postponing payment of any dividend upon the claim of the estate of Bernard Rothenberg, deceased, until after the claims of general creditors had been paid in full, Albert Dellevie, as sole surviving executor appeals.

The Fechheimer Fishel Company is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York and doing business in the city of New York. Its capital stock was fixed at $550,000, divided into 5,500 shares of the par value of $100 per share, and of this amount all but $20,000 was issued. In addition debenture bonds aggregating $550,000 were authorized, all of which were issued except $20,000 retained in the treasury of the corporation for future use. The bonds and stocks were issued to the organizers of the corporation, each of whom held, dollar for dollar, equal amounts of bonds and of stock.

By agreement, made part of the bonds, it was provided that "bonds" and stock should be inseparable and that on any sale of "bonds" an equal amount of stock should go with them. The right to sell or dispose of the bonds and stock held by any member of the corporation was limited to a sale to the other members in the manner provided by the agreement, and it was required that on the retirement of any member, for any reason, his bonds and stock should be sold to the other members at the book value of the bonds or else that the corporation should be dissolved and liquidated.

On November 1, 1909, Bernard Rothenberg was the holder of a "bond" of the Fechheimer Fishel Company for $50,000 and a like amount of its stock and was also treasurer of the company. On that date he indorsed in blank and delivered to the company the "bond" and the certificate for the stock and received from the company a note for $50,000, dated November 1, 1909, payable two years after date, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually. He also received an agreement by the company to pay him an additional 2 per cent. per annum so as to make the interest on the note equal to the interest on the bond. This agreement was not actually dated or delivered until January, 1910, but was apparently part of the same transaction in which the note was given. This note was entered by seller; if he in fact sells to the company and receives in return a part of the capital, the policy of the law requires him to know it, and conclusively charges him with knowledge. Thus selling, he sells at his peril. In no other way can the rights of creditors be protected." 52 Conn. 73, 104.

Rothenberg himself in the company's bills payable book, but on the last page, and not where such an entry would naturally appear. The bond and stock was put, in an envelope marked with Rothenberg's name, in the company's safe. The bond was never canceled in the manner customary when bonds were surrendered. On August 9, 1911, this note was renewed by a new note for the same amount, payable November 1, 1912, accompanied by a similar agreement for the payment of additional interest. This is the note on which the claim is made. The Fechheimer Fishel Company was adjudicated bankrupt.

It was contended by the trustees in bankruptcy and held by the referee and by the court below:

First, that the so-called "bonds" were in reality merely a form of preferred stock and as such subject to the general rules of law applicable to a corporation's purchase of its own stock.

Second, that the corporation had no right to buy its own stock unless it was possessed of net profits sufficient to pay therefor without diminishing the fund upon which creditors had a right to rely.

Third, that the claimant was bound by the terms of the "bond" or stock and could not receive any payment in advance of general creditors.

ROGERS, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts as above). * * * The bond for $50,000 which Rothenberg surrendered to the company on November 1, 1909, being in effect preferred stock of the company, the transaction was therefore a purchase by the company of its own stock and payment therefor by the issue of its own note, which, after renewal, matured when the company was insolvent. We are thus led to inquire whether the company had the right to purchase the stock and, if so, under what conditions.

The courts are not at all agreed concerning the right of a corporation to purchase its own stock.

The view that a corporation cannot buy its own stock without an express grant is based on the following grounds:

1. That corporations cannot increase or diminish their capital stock without the sanction of the Legislature.

2. That such a transaction is a fraud upon creditors.

3. That it is foreign to the purposes for which the corporation was created.

In England the courts, in a long and unbroken line of decisions, have held that a corporation, unless expressly authorized to do so, cannot purchase its own stock. The leading case in that country upon the subject was decided in the House of Lords in 1887, Trevor v. Whitworth, L.R. 12 App.Cas. 409.

In the United States the courts of some of the states have followed the English rule. But the clear weight of authority upholds the right of a corporation to buy its own stock if the purchase is made in good faith and does not prejudice the rights of creditors. Cook on Corporations, vol. 1, 7th Ed., § 311.

The text-writers have arrayed themselves generally on the side of the English rule. Thompson on Corporations says, in volume 2, § 2054:

"The rule which forbids a corporation thus to employ its funds rises to the grade of a rule of public policy; and is so strong that although power is conferred upon the company to deal in the shares of joint-stock companies generally, this does not authorize it to deal in its own shares."

Machen on Modern Law of Corporations says, in volume 1, § 628:

"In America, many courts uphold the same sound and wholesome doctrine as the English cases. But it must be conceded that a somewhat larger number of the American courts have taken the view that a corporation may without express statutory authority purchase its own shares, provided the purchase is entered into bona fide and does not endanger the claims of creditors. It should be observed that the American cases which agree with the English doctrine are often well considered and fully reasoned, whereas those which uphold the contrary view generally lack any extended examination of the subject."

Mr. Morawetz, in his work, says in volume 1, § 112:

"No verbiage can disguise the fact that a purchase by a corporation of shares in itself really amounts to a reduction of the company's assets, and that the shares purchased do in fact remain extinguished, at least until the reissue has taken place. The fact that such a transaction may not necessarily be injurious to any person is not a sufficient reason for supporting it. It is contrary to the fundamental agreement of the shareholders, and is condemned by the plainest dictates of sound policy. To allow the directors to exercise such a power would be a frightful source of unfairness, mismanagement, and corruption. It is for these reasons that a shareholder cannot be allowed to withdraw from a corporation with his proportionate amount of capital, either by a release and cancellation before the shares have been paid up, or by a purchase of the shares with the company funds."

We have referred to the opinions of these writers because we think that, in recognizing the right of a corporation to buy its own stock, they indicate the necessity of confining the right to purchase within strict limits. Indeed, the dangers incident to the recognition of the right has led the Legislatures in a number of the states to prohibit the right altogether. And Congress in enacting the law relating to national banks has denied to such banks any right to purchase their own stock.

The corporation which purchased its stock in the case at bar was organized under the laws of New York, was engaged in business in New York, and entered into the purchase of the stock in New York. And under the law of New York a corporation has the right to purchase its own stock. City Bank of Columbus v. Bruce, 17 N.Y. 507, 1858; Vail v. Hamilton, 85 N.Y. 453, 457, 1881; Joseph v. Raff, 82 App.Div. 47, 54, 81 N.Y.S. 546, affirmed 176 N.Y. 611, 68 N.E. 1118. But the purchase must be made out of surplus profits and cannot be made from the capital. The Penal Law of the state provides, in section 664, that:

"A director of a stock corporation, who concurs in any vote or act of the directors of such corporation, or any of them, by which it is intended: * * * (5) To apply any portion of the funds of such corporation, except surplus profits, directly or indirectly, to the purchase of shares of its own stock—is guilty of a misdemeanor." * * * [30]

The note for $50,000 due November 1, 1912, which is the basis of the claim involved in this case is a renewal of a note for the same amount given by the bankrupt on November 1, 1909. Whatever infirmity inhered in the original note attached to the renewal note. Hamor v. Taylor-Rice Engineering Co., C.C., 84 F. 392, 398, 1897. As the note was given by the corporation for its own stock, the right to enforce payment out of the assets of the corporation depends upon the existence of surplus profits.

If at the time the stockholder receives payment for his stock the payment prejudices the creditors, payment cannot be enforced. If a stockholder sells his stock to a corporation which issued it, he sells at his peril and assumes the risk of the consummation of the transaction without encroachment upon the funds which belong to the corporation in trust for the payment of its creditors.

The right of the creditors of the corporation cannot be defeated by the fact that at the time the transaction was entered into the seller of the stock and the officers of the company who purchased it were acting in good faith and supposed that the company was solvent. * * *

The stock of a corporation is its only basis of credit, and it is of vital importance that it be rigidly guarded and protected. Courts have conceived it to be their duty to detect and defeat any scheme or device calculated in any way to place this fund beyond the reach of the creditors. Buck, Trustee, v. Ross, 68 Conn. 29, 31, 35 A. 763, 57 Am.St.Rep. 60, 1896. As the illegality of a purchase by a corporation of its stock rests upon the fact that it withdraws assets upon which the creditors have a superior right or lien, it seems to us that even though the company may have been solvent when the contract to purchase was made, if it becomes insolvent later or is made insolvent by the transaction and is in that condition at the time when payment is to be made, the vendor cannot as against creditors be permitted to take the assets for that purpose in a state in which the statutes make it a criminal offense to apply directly or indirectly anything but surplus profits to the purchase by a corporation of its own stock. If the stockholder postpones the time of payment, he runs the risk of the corporation becoming insolvent in the meantime and must be held to a knowledge of the fact that he cannot enforce payment if in doing so he deprives the creditors of assets upon which they have a lien superior to any claim of his. In the case at bar, when the corporation bought the stock and gave its note to Rothenberg, it in effect promised to pay him $50,000 out of surplus profits and if payment could be made without prejudice to creditors. To be sure the note did not so state on its face, but that was a condition which the law attached to it and which was binding on both Rothenberg and the company. The fact that the corporation had a surplus when the note was given is not decisive of the case if it was insolvent when the time for payment arrived. What the rule may be in the absence of such a statutory provision as exists in New York we need not now determine. * * *

The order of the court below is affirmed.[31]

WOLFF v. HEIDRITTER LUMBER COMPANY.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1932. 112 N.J.Eq. 34, 163 A. 140.

Suit by H. Edward Wolff and others against the Heidritter Lumber Company, in which a receiver was appointed for the defendant corporation and Adolph U. Poppenga filed proof of claim as a creditor. From a disallowance of the claim, the claimant appeals.

Appeal sustained, and claim allowed as that of a general creditor.

BUCHANAN, VICE CHANCELLOR. The bill in this case was filed for the appointment of a receiver and the winding up of the defendant corporation, under the statute. * * *

Poppenga's claim is based upon a written agreement, dated July 9, 1924, between himself and the defendant lumber company, whereby he agreed to sell and the lumber company agreed to buy from him 150 shares of the capital stock of the lumber company for $40,000.

The agreement provides that Poppenga "hereby sells" and the lumber company "hereby purchases" the said stock, and that the purchase price is to be paid by the lumber campany in installments of $1,000 each, every three months, commencing October 9, 1924, together with interest on the balance unpaid from time to time; that upon final payment in full Poppenga will transfer the shares to the lumber company; that Poppenga shall have right to repurchase the said shares "at any time during the continuance of this agreement" by repaying to the lumber company the moneys theretofore paid by it.

Prior to the appointment of the receiver in this suit, the lumber company had paid $13,500, with interest, on account of the $40,000 purchase price. Poppenga's claim is for the balance, $26,500, together with interest from January 15, 1931.

The receivers concluded that, by reason of the determination in Hoover Steel Ball Co. v. Schaefer Ball Bearings Co., 90 N.J.Eq. 164, 106 A. 471, and the cases therein cited, the claim must be deemed invalid and unenforceable. The facts in the present case are different in several particulars from those in the Hoover Case, and it is contended by claimant appellant that these differences are of such materiality as to relieve the present claim from the interdiction of that decision. It is concluded that this contention is well founded, that the claim is valid, and the appeal must be sustained. * * *

In the instant case the company admittedly had far more than sufficient assets to pay its creditors in full, and all of the stockholders expressly consented to the purchase. Under such circumstances it may well be doubted that much, if any, consideration need be given toward the determination of what is a "legitimate corporate purpose." Aside from the rights of creditors, which in the instant case were in no wise prejudiced or infringed, and the right of the state that no criminal or fraudulent act be perpetrated, which is in no wise intimated in the present case, it would seem that the stockholders are the only ones interested, and that any purchase might be made to which all stockholders expressly assented. If, however, the "legitimate corporate purpose" be deemed a requisite even under such circumstances, no doubt is entertained as to its existence in the case at the bar.

The corporation was involved in litigation wherein persons having a "life estate" in the "inchoate" dividends of certain shares of stock of the company, held by trustees, in trust to pay the "income" on that stock, during the life of a third party, to the litigating complainants and to transfer the stock at the death of the third party to other beneficiaries of whom Poppenga was one, sought to obtain payment of dividends to themselves out of accumulated profits of the company.

An opinion had been filed in the litigation, foreshadowing the possibility, if not the probability, of a decree that the corporation should pay such dividends out of the accumulated profits. The accumulated profits had been put back into the business, so that it would have been very difficult, if not impossible, for the corporation to have paid such dividends at that time without liquidating its affairs, notwithstanding it was amply solvent, as has been said.

The interest or share in the corporate assets represented by these shares of stock held in trust belonged partly to the "dividend" beneficiaries and partly to Poppenga and the other "stock" beneficiaries. If the corporation paid the dividends to the former, the value of the shares of stock to which Poppenga and his associates were entitled would be pro tanto diminished, whereas if Poppenga and his associates advanced to the corporation the money to pay the dividends, the amount of their individual assets, aside from the stock, would be thereby decreased, but this would be compensated for because the value of the shares of stock would not be diminished; the net result to Poppenga and his associates would be substantially the same under either plan,—except that for the corporation to pay the dividends out of the corporate assets would have entailed such a sacrifice of corporate assets as to result in still geater diminution of the value of the "stockholders" stock, and they all felt it would be much better for themselves and the other stockholders of the company, who also naturally felt the same way about it, if they should advance the dividend money to the company.

Unfortunately Poppenga was unable or unwilling to advance his share out of his other individual assets, and therefore, in order to enable him to get the money to make the necessary advance, this sale of 150 of his shares of stock to the company was agreed on, being at a price higher than he could get elsewhere, yet lower than the book value; and in order to accommodate the company's situation, the payment of the purchase price was made deferred and payable in installments. The immediate cash necessary to make the payment to the "dividend beneficiaries" was obtained from a bank, on Poppenga's note with collateral, including the stock and the company's agreement to pay Poppenga the $40,000.

The purchase by the company was therefore part of an entire transaction intended, and believed to be, and agreed upon by all stockholders as being, and which apparently in fact actually was, for the benefit not only of Poppenga, but also of all the other stockholders of the company. (It does not appear that the present unfortunate financial situation of the company was in any wise attributable to this transaction, or that it could have been forseen at that time.) The corporation is simply the stockholders in corporate form; the interests of the stockholders are the interests of the corporation; the purpose of the corporation is to benefit the interests of the stockholders. The legitimate benefit of the stockholders is therefore a legitimate corporate purpose, especially when all agree.

It is not intended by anything that has been said herein to intimate that a purchase by a corporation of shares of its own stock would be valid if the then present ability of the corporation to pay its creditors in full was in any wise open to doubt, if, for instance, although then honestly believed to be fully solvent, it should later appear doubtful that the company had in fact been then fully solvent. That situation does not exist here, and no opinion is expressed thereon. * * *

The appeal will be sustained, and the claim allowed as that of a general creditor; but, under all the circumstances, costs of the appeal will be awarded against him.

TOPKEN, LORING & SCHWARTZ, Inc., v. SCHWARTZ.

Court of Appeals of New York 1928. 249 N.Y. 206, 163 N.E. 735, 66 A.L.R. 1179.

[Appeal by permission, from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the first judicial department, which reversed a judgment in favor of defendant entered upon an order of Special Term granting a motion for a dismissal of the complaint, and denied the motion.

Plaintiff brought an action on a contract to repurchase its stock. The contract was entered into in 1922 between the Loring Glove Co.,

Inc. (plaintiff) and Julius Schwartz (defendant). Plaintiff agreed to sell 114 shares of its stock to defendant for $11,400, with an option to purchase more under certain conditions. Defendant was employed by plaintiff, and he agreed to resell to the corporation all of its capital stock that he held at the end of his period of employment, at its book value. Defendant's employment terminated June 1, 1927; he refused to resell the 152 shares of stock held by him. Plaintiff seeks a decree ordering that it be declared owner of the stock, and defendant be compelled to transfer the shares. Plaintiff alleged that the stock has neither actual book nor market value, and that it is a closed corporation having only four stockholders. Defendant appeals from a denial of its motion to dismiss the complaint.]

The following questions were certified: "1. Does the complaint herein state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for the relief demanded therein? 2. Has the plaintiff herein an adequate remedy at law?"

CRANE, J. (after stating the above facts). * * * Does this complaint state a good cause of action? Is the agreement alleged matter for specific performance?

Section 664 of the Penal Law (Consol.Laws, c. 40) enacts:

"A director of a stock corporation, who concurs in any vote or act of the directors of such corporation, or any of them, by which it is intended: * * *

"(5) To apply any portion of the funds of such corporation, except surplus profits directly or indirectly, to the purchase of shares of its own stock, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

No corporation, therefore, can buy its own shares of stock out of its capital without making the officers voting such purchase violators of this law.

This provision of the Penal Law of course has application only to the state of New York, but it has generally been held that no corporation can purchase its stock with its capital to the injury of its creditors. The capital of a corporation is held in trust for its creditors, so that any agreement to purchase stock from a stockholder, which may result in the impairment of capital, will not be enforced, or will be considered illegal if the rights of creditors are affected. [Citing cases.] * * *

This contract, therefore, in question, would have been impossible of performance under certain conditions. The defendant Schwartz it is said was bound to sell and convey his stock at book value at the end of his employment. How about the corporation? What were its obligations? If it had no surplus, it could not legally perform the purported contract; it could not make the purchase. Under our statute it would have been illegal; without our statute it would have been unenforceable as against the corporation, if there were creditors and no surplus. Hoover Steel Ball Co. v. Schaefer Ball Bearing Co., supra. Whichever way we look at it, there were certain conditions under which the corporation would be unable to perform its promise to purchase the stock and under which the courts would declare its contract so to do illegal. If, therefore, we consider the contract in question, as we must, one dependent upon mutual promises for the consideration, we have the defendant promising that at a certain time he will sell at a certain price and the plaintiff promising to buy. The promise is binding upon the defendant but may or may not be binding upon the plaintiff. It is as if the plaintiff had a choice to buy or not as it pleased. By "binding," I mean that the corporation could execute the contract by purchasing the stock out of its surplus, but could not, without violating the law, purchase its stock when it had no surplus. Under these circumstances we have a contract not mutually binding, and therefore lacking in consideration. Schlegel Mfg. Co. v. Cooper's Glue Factory, 231 N.Y. 459, 462, 132 N.E. 148, 24 A.L.R. 1348. "The principle is ordinarily stated in the axiom that in a bilateral agreement both promises must be binding or neither is binding." Williston on Contracts, § 103e. Richards v. Ernst Wiener Co., 207 N.Y. 59, 100 N.E. 592, contains some statements in the opinion which would be very apt to lead one to take the other view and to hold that this contract was good unless it appeared that the corporation were insolvent. The statements to this effect in the opinion are not necessary for the decision of the case as the court considered the contract an option to purchase and a contract of employment. See Matter of Tichenor-Grand Co., D.C., 203 F. 720. If in the case before us the defendant had been given employment and the employment had furnished the price or the consideration for his agreement to return the stock at the end of his employment, we would then have a contract resting not on a mutuality of promises, but upon a consideration given and paid in part by the corporation. Hoover Steel Ball Co. v. Schaefer Ball Bearing Co., supra (last paragraph, page 171 of 90 N.J.Eq., 106 A. 474); volume 1, Williston on Contracts, § 13; Strait v. Northwestern Steel & Iron Works, 148 Wis. 254, 134 N.W. 387. The contract then would be good unless it appeared that the stock would be purchased out of capital. This would be a matter of defense. The situation here, however, is as above stated; the contract for its consideration rests upon mutual promises. One of the promises may or may not be good, the same as if a discretion were left to one of the parties to perform or not perform. Under such circumstances there is no consideration, and the contract cannot be enforced. Specific performance under such circumstances will not be decreed.

For these reasons the order of the Appellate Division should be reversed and that of the Special Term affirmed, with costs in this court and in the Appellate Division. The first question certified should be answered "No," the second question certified not answered.

Ordered accordingly.[32]

GREATER NEW YORK CARPET HOUSE, Inc., v. HERSCHMANN.

Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, First Department, 1940.
258 App.Div. 649, 17 N.Y.S.2d 483.

[Appeal by the defendant from an order of the Supreme Court.]

CALLAHAN, JUSTICE. The complaint alleges, in substance, that the plaintiff is a domestic corporation; that defendant is executrix of the estate of Emil M. Herschmann, deceased; that on September 30, 1932, an agreement was made between defendant's testator, one Milton Goldstein and the plaintiff, a copy of which agreement is attached to the complaint. Said agreement provides that on the death of either of said individuals (who were the sole stockholders of the corporation), the corporation would purchase and the stockholder or his personal representatives would sell his respective holdings (250 shares) of the corporate stock for the sum of $25,000.

The complaint further alleges that two policies of life insurance in the sums of $25,000 each had been procured upon the lives of the respective stockholders, payable to the corporation. On the death of either insured, the proceeds of the policy issued on the stockholder's life were to be placed in a special surplus account with which to purchase his stock. Both stockholders agreed that they would not sell their stock to any person until they first offered same to the corporation.

There were additional provisions in the contract whereby the stockholders agreed to make wills directing their executors to sell their stock, and providing that the wives of the stockholders were to bind themselves to convey any interest which they might receive in the stock of their husbands. The agreement, however, was not signed by the wives of the stockholders. The contract bore the seals of the individual signatories.

The complaint alleges the death of Emil Herschmann; that plaintiff had received the $25,000 payable under the policy issued on his life and had placed same in a special surplus account; that defendant has in her possession the stock of her testator; that plaintiff tendered the $25,000 to the defendant and demanded delivery of the stock, but the defendant refused to comply with the terms of the agreement. Plaintiff seeks specific performance of the agreement.

Defendant contends that the complaint is insufficient in that the contract was unenforceable, owing to lack of consideration. Her theory is that the contract is one which might require the plaintiff to purchase its own stock out of capital rather than out of surplus. She contends that the sole consideration for the contract in suit was the mutual promises of the corporation to buy and of defendant's testator to sell the stock involved; that the promise to purchase was not binding upon plaintiff corporation for the reason that it could not legally perform the contract if it had no surplus, and that, therefore, there were no adequate considerations for the agreement.

Plaintiff, on the other hand, contends that there was sufficient legal consideration for the contract, and that the remedy of defendant, if she claims that it would be illegal at present for the corporation to pay for the stock because of lack of surplus, would be to plead such facts as a defense to this action.

We think that there was a sufficient legal consideration to support the contract. The present agreement was much more than a simple contract for the purchase and sale of stock. It was an attempt by two stockholders who owned all the stock of a corporation to arrange a method whereby the surviving stockholder would acquire complete corporate control. The provision that the corporation would purchase the survivor's stock was merely the means to an end. The agreement, in order to create a fund with which to pay for the stock, provided that the company take out life insurance policies on the lives of both stockholders, payable to the corporation; that the proceeds of these policies were to be set apart as a special surplus account to furnish the purchase price of the stock. While not expressly recited in the contract, we think that it is necessarily to be inferred from its terms that the corporation bargained to pay the premuims for the said insurance, and the facts recited in the complaint indicate that the corporation did in fact pay said premiums between the date of the agreement in 1932 and the death of defendant's testator several years thereafter. This constituted a detriment to the corporation.

For the reasons stated, any claim that despite the arrangement whereby a special surplus account was created to pay for the stock, because of the existence of other debts, there was no corporate surplus sufficient to pay the full purchase price of the stock, would, in our opinion, constitute a defense to the present action.

Defendant relies on the decision in Topken, Loring & Schwartz, Inc., v. Schwartz, 249 N.Y. 206, 163 N.E. 735, 66 A.L.R. 1179, to support her claim that the complaint was insufficient because the contract lacked legal consideration.

We find that the contract now before us is distinguishable from that considered in Topken, Loring & Schwartz, Inc., v. Schwartz, supra, for the reason that here, as noted, there was consideration other than the mutual promises to buy and sell the stock. In the Topken case, supra, it was stated, 249 N.Y. at page 211, 163 N.E. at page 736, 66 A.L.R. 1179: "If in the case before us the defendant had been given employment and the employment had furnished the price or the consideration for his agreement to return the stock at the end of his employment, we would then have a contract resting not on a mutuality of promises, but upon a consideration given and paid in part by the corporation. Hoover Steel Ball Co. v. Schaefer Ball Bearing Co., supra (last paragraph, page 171, of 90 N.J.Eq. 164, 106 A. 474); vol. 1, Williston on Contracts, sec. 13; Strait v. Northwestern Steel & Iron Works, 148 Wis. 254, 134 N.W. 387. The contract then would be good unless it appeared that the stock would be purchased out of capital. This would be a matter of defense."

In the present transaction we find a consideration given and paid in part by the corporation, to wit: The maintenance of the insurance policies. In addition, we have the other mutual promises heretofore recited. As these matters express actual consideration, we need not determine whether consideration would be presumed from the fact that the contract bore the seals of the signatories other than the plaintiff.

It has been stated that the principle enunciated in the Topken case, supra, rested on the reasoning that the corporation's promise was illusory because the existence of a surplus was within the corporation's control. See 1 Williston on Contracts, Rev.Ed., § 133. No such control would exist when, as in the present case, the corporation was required to hold in a special surplus account the money supplied for the purchase of the stock. Therefore, the present case is not one where the plaintiff had a choice to buy or not, as it pleased.

Under the Law of New York, a corporation has the right to purchase its own stock, but the purchase must be made out of surplus, and can not be made out of capital. The provisions of our Penal Law (Section 664) are that "A director of a stock corporation, who concurs in any vote or act of the directors of such corporation, or any of them, by which it is intended: * * * 5. To apply any portion of the funds of such corporation, except surplus, directly or indirectly, to the purchase of shares of its own stock, * * * is guilty of a misdemeanor." It is plain that no violation of this section could have been contemplated here for no illegal intention, as defined in the statute, could have been present when an arrangement was made whereby a special fund was being created with which the stock was to be purchased. The rights of general creditors of the corporation could not have been prejudiced by making this agreement, for this would be no impairment of capital because of said agreement. Even assuming that at the time of the performance of the contract, because the rights of general creditors might have become impaired meanwhile, the contract became impossible of performance, we think that the contract was legal when made, and that it may be enforced, unless the defendant shows the present impossibility of performance.

The order should be affirmed with $20 costs and disbursements, with leave to the defendant to answer within twenty days after service of order with notice of entry thereof, on payment of said costs.

Order unanimously affirmed with $20 costs and disbursements, with leave to the defendant to answer within twenty days after service of order upon payment of said costs. Order filed. All concur.[33]

(b) Effect on Shares: Treasury Stock

* * * Upon reacquisition of stock, a corporation may either retire it by an amendment of the certificate of incorporation and thereby decrease the number of authorized shares which may be issued, and cancel the certificates; or it may hold the certificates in the corporate treasury for a later resale. The latter is commonly known as "treasury stock".

Although reacquisition of its own stock by a corporation is prohibited in England, it has generally been permitted in the United States. * * *

[33] Motion for leave to appeal denied, 259 App.Div. 714, 19 N.Y.S.2d 770 (N.Y.App. 1st Dep't, 1940).

Today, thirty-four states have statutes on the subject[34], and only five states do not have statutes or judicial decisions on the permissibility of reacquisition[35]. All but two states[36] permit reacquisition of stock.

When a corporation reacquires its own stock, there is a manifest effect on the corporate structure. Primarily, a purchase by a corporation of its own shares really amounts to a reduction of the company's assets, and the shares purchased are for all practical purposes extinguished until a reissue has taken place. This is obvious. For, when a corporation repurchases its outstanding shares, it expends a certain amount of its assets that might be used for other purposes.

Another change in the corporate structure is the reduction of voting rights. When a corporation acquires treasury stock, the existent voting rights of the stock are extinguished, by statute, for the period that the stock is held by the corporation.

A further effect is that on the issuance of dividends. The assets expended for the treasury stock are not again available for dividends. Therefore, if a corporation has $50,000 as "earned surplus" and repurchases five hundred shares of its outstanding stock at $100 a share, it has nothing available for a possible declaration of dividends.

The acquisition of treasury stock may be advisable for bona fide business reasons. It may be to retain an established policy of the corporation; the desire of a corporation to retire some owner, or the owner's own desire to relinquish his stock, when there is no outside market for his shares; to provide shares for employees under agreements that they will be stockholders during their terms of employment; or to compromise claims or debts owed to a corporation by its stockholders.

There are, however, many known abuses of the rights to acquire treasury stock. Among the more flagrant are those of selling treasury stock at prices less than the original par value or issue price, to avoid legal restrictions on issuing stock below par; to permit "insiders" to gain control by juggling the voting control of the corporation; to protect "insiders" by repurchasing their stock at inflated figures, when the corporation is on the verge of ultimate insolvency; to avoid the doctrine of pre-emptive rights; to create an artificial market and effect manipulations of the market price[37]; and, to deceive the public and stockholders by concealing the effect of purchases on surplus and capital by use of deceptive accounting methods.

The accounting profession generally uses one of four principal methods of entering treasury stock on the balance sheet. The stock may be carried (1) as an asset; (2) as a deduction from capital stock; (3) as a deduction from surplus; or (4) as a deduction from the total of capital stock and surplus. * * *

37 On 18 December 1933, the N. Y. Stock Exchange took a strong position opposing this practice. In part, its statement read: "The Committee on Stock List has

Other methods: A number of other methods have been advanced by authorities in dealing with this problem. Among them is "to show treasury shares simply as a deduction from the number of shares outstanding without any entry in the asset column or liability column of the balance sheet. The surplus will stand diminished by the amount of the purchase price, as in the case of a withdrawal by way of a dividend."[38] A variant is to follow the method of deducting from capital stock and surplus, and create a further reserve. By this method, the total in the Treasury Stock Account should be deducted from the total of capital stock issued and legally outstanding. "Earned surplus should be debited and an account called 'Reserve for Treasury Stock' should be credited with the actual amount of the cash paid out for the stock. The effect of this transaction is to reduce the Earned Surplus to the amount which is still available for dividends and to earmark the amount paid for treasury stock as unavailable for dividends until the stock has been reissued or cancelled, after which it should be restored to Earned Surplus."[39]

It is obvious, however, that these are but variations of the fundemental theory that a deduction should be made from both capital stock and surplus to present an accurate picture of the purchase and retention, however temporary, of the treasury stock. * * *

The general trend seems to be in favor of deducting from capital stock and surplus. The American Institute of Accountants has recommended that: "If any stock of the company is held in the treasury it should preferably be shown as a deduction from capital stock or from surplus or from the total of the two, at either par or cost, as the laws of the state of incorporation and other relevant circumstances require. If it is included on the asset side of the balance sheet the circumstances justifying such treatment should be indicated in the caption or in a footnote."[40] * * * [Note by Warren H. Schnur, Esq.]

Court of Appeals of Colorado, 1902. 17 Colo.App. 212, 68 P.130.

Action by Walter F. Crosby against Winfield S. Stratton. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

THOMSON, J. Walter F. Crosby brought this suit against Winfield S. Stratton to recover damages from the latter for the alleged wrongful conversion by him of stock in the Portland Mining Company, to which the former averred himself to be entitled. The complaint set forth as follows: That the entire capital stock of the Portland Mining Company, a corporation, consisting of 3,000,000 shares, of the par value of $1 each, was at the date of the organization of the company, islong urged corporations not to trade in their own shares. The Committee can see no justification whatsoever for a corporation using its assets to influence the market quotation of its own shares. Until recently, the practice of a corporation either trading in their own stock or reacquiring substantial amounts of their outstanding stock was unusual."

sued, fully paid and nonassessable, in consideration of certain mining property then conveyed to the corporation; that afterwards, and prior to the 17th day of April, 1894, the stockholders of the company, of whom the plaintiff was one, transferred to the company 704,000 shares of this stock, to be held for its use and benefit, and to be part of its general assets; that this stock was not reported by the officers of the company as issued or outstanding, but as substantially unissued stock, not constituting part of the outstanding stock of the company; that the then stockholders, by virtue of their holdings, had each an undivided interest and right of property in and to the stock so turned into the company's treasury, equal to his proportionate ownership of the outstanding stock of the corporation; that on the 17th day of April, 1894, the plaintiff was the owner of 120,000 shares, and the defendant was the owner of 215,000 shares, of the then outstanding stock, and that the defendant then was, and continued to be, a director of the company; that on the last-named day the directors of the company, by resolution, authorized and directed the sale of the 704,000 shares which had been transferred to the company, for the price of 12½ cents per share, for the general purposes of the corporation; that, by virtue of the property of the stockholders in the stock so ordered to be sold, each stockholder, as incident to his ownership of outstanding stock, had the right to subscribe for, and to have allotted and issued to him, shares of the stock so ordered to be sold, in proportion to his then holdings; that of such stock the plaintiff was entitled to 65,000 shares, and the defendant to 117,424; that by reason of his office as director, and of his participation in the offer of the stock for sale, and the sale, the defendant was well acquainted with the rights of the stockholders in the stock to be sold; but, nevertheless, caused to be issued to himself 208,000 shares, an excess of 90,576 over the number to which, as a stockholder, he had any right; that, of those 90,576 shares, the proportion to which the plaintiff was entitled was 28,641 shares; that the plaintiff was, on the 17th day of April, 1894, and has ever since been, ready, able, and desirous to subscribe for, and have allotted to him, those 28,641 shares, but by reason of the wrongful act of the defendant in causing them to be allotted to himself, and holding and retaining them from the plaintiff, the latter has been unable to subscribe for, have allotted to him, or receive, those shares, or any of them, or any stock in lieu of them; and that on the 10th day of January, 1898, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant 12½ cents per share for each of the 28,641 shares, and demanded their delivery to him, but the plaintiff refused to comply with the demand. Judgment was demanded for $57,282, the alleged value of the stock withheld, and $13,461.27, the amount which the defendant was averred to have received as dividends earned by that stock. To the foregoing complaint, a demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered against him, and he appealed to this court.

The theory of the plaintiff, as outlined in the argument of his counsel, is that the stock transferred to the company, or, following an expression of counsel, covered back into the treasury of the company, became a fund, in the specific property constituting which all the stockholders were interested; that when the stock was offered for sale, it was the right of each stockholder, upon payment of the price, to receive such number of shares as, upon a division of the stock among the stockholders in proportion to their respective holdings, would be allotted to him; and that when the defendant received 90,576 shares in excess of the number to which he had any right in virtue of his holdings, he took 28,641 shares to which a calculation of the plaintiff's proportionate interest in such excess shows the latter to be entitled. We shall first examine the complaint to see whether, on the plaintiff's theory that, as a stockholder, he had the right to subscribe, pay for, and receive a certain portion of the stock which had been transferred to the company, it states a cause of action against the defendant; and we shall afterwards inquire into the soundness of the theory. * * *

We come now to an examination of the underlying theory of the case. Had the original stockholders of the corporation any right, in law, to a preference over strangers in the purchase of the 704,000 shares they had transferred to the company, or had one stockholder any preference over another in the purchase? Such preference does exist in relation to original stock which remains untaken, and therefore unissued, at the time of the incorporation; and, in case of an increase of the capital stock, each of the first stockholders has the right to subscribe for and purchase his pro rata share of the new stock. One reason on which the rule in either case rests is that the stockholder has the right to preserve the proportionate interest in the corporation first acquired by him. To dispose of the unissued or added stock to strangers, or to other stockholders, without affording him an opportunity to take his pro rata share, would be, without his consent, to impair his interest and influence in the corporation, and diminish the relative value of his holdings; and this the directors, who are trustees for the stockholders, may not lawfully do. Agricultural Soc. v. Eichholtz, 45 Kan. 164, 25 P. 613; Jones v. Morrison, 31 Minn. 140, 153, 16 N.W. 854; Eidman v. Bowman, 58 Ill. 444, 447, 11 Am.Rep. 90; Reese v. Bank, 31 Pa. 78, 72 Am.Dec. 726; Sewell, J., in Gray v. Bank, supra; Atkins v. Albree, 94 Mass. 359; Angell & A. Corp. § 554. But because, to prevent impairment of their interests, corporators have a preference in the purchase of unissued or new stock, it does not follow that they have any right over strangers in the purchase of stock which has been paid for and issued, but transferred back to the corporation as part of its general assets. Their right in the one case is founded on reasons which have no existence in the other. The issued stock of a corporation represents its paid-up capital. The holder owns it and disposes of it as he sees fit; and if it finds its way back into the treasury of the corporation, it becomes assets in the same sense that the corporation's other property is assets. It is still part of the paid-up capital; and its sale no more affects the value of the other stock, or the standing of the stockholders in the corporation, than the sale of the corporation's tools or machinery. The relative value of all the stock is the same whether the particular stock of which we are speaking remains in the hands of the original holders, or has been acquired from them by the corporation, and placed in its treasury. In the case at bar, the entire authorized capital stock of the company had been issued and paid for in full. The holders transferred a certain portion of it to the company; for what purpose is not explicitly stated, but, upon a fair presumption from all the averments in the complaint, to be sold, and the proceeds used in the development of the company's property, to the enhancement of the value of the remaining shares. The complaint says that it was to be held for the company's use and benefit, and as part of its general assets. If that language means anything, it means that the stock was to be used, like the company's other assets, in furtherance of the objects of the corporation. And further on the complaint states that it was ordered to be sold for the general purposes of the company. It was paid-up stock when it was in the hands of the holders, and by its transfer to the company its character was not changed. The complaint says "that said stock was not, and was not reported by the officers of said company as, issued or outstanding, but as substantially unissued stock, not constituting part of the outstanding capital stock of the company, and the issue of said stock, at any time, making it participate in the assets, dividends, and control of the said company, would decrease the pro rata participation of the other stockholders in said company in the same ratio as the number of said unissued shares bore to the total capitalization of said company." One portion of the above we do not understand very well, and the other portion we do not understand at all. How a report by the officers of the company, whatever it might be, could make issued stock unissued stock, or could reverse the effect of facts, is what we fail totally to understand. The complaint furnishes no solution of the difficulty, and, in the absence of explanation, we must remain of the opinion that the character of the stock was unaffected by the report. If, by the succeeding language, is meant that the reissue of the transferred stock would have the same effect upon the value of individual holdings that would follow an issue of new stock or of original but hitherto untaken stock, then the pleader has given us the statement of a false proposition. It is true that by parting with a portion of his stock, the influence of the holder at corporate elections would be diminished, and in case of dividends he would receive less money; but the relative value of each individual share would remain the same. The amount of issued stock would not be changed, and the proportion between each issued share and the total number of issued shares would be preserved. This would not be the case if dormant stock were released, or existing values lowered by a dilution of new stock. The evident purpose of the transfer to the company was to enable it to raise money for the purposes of the enterprise in which it was engaged. If the stockholders had sold their stock on the outside for 12½ cents per share, and paid the money into the company's treasury, the desired result would have been accomplished as effectually as by the method which was employed. It is altogether immaterial whether the stockholders sold the stock themselves or turned it over to the company to be sold. In either case, they parted with all their interest in the stock, and put its further disposition entirely beyond their control. So far as our research has extended, the authorities are unanimous that where stock, once issued, returns to the possession of the corporation, upon its reissue and sale the right of purchase of stockholders and strangers is the same. Hartridge v. Rockwell, R.M.Charlt. 260; State v. Smith, 48 Vt. 266; 1 Mor.Priv.Corp. § 455; 2 Thomp.Corp. § 2100. In Kimmell v. Geeting, 2 Grant, Cas. 125, there was a fraudulent combination and conspiracy among the defendants, who were the managers of the Sunset & Bedford Turnpike Company, to divide among themselves stock, the purchase of which for the benefit of the corporators they had directed by resolution. This case, although relied on by the plaintiff, is not in point. No conspiracy or fraudulent practice is charged in this complaint.

The demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment will be affirmed.[65]

BORG v. INTERNATIONAL SILVER COMPANY

District Court of the United States, S. D. New York, 1924. 2 F.2d 910.

WINSLOW, DISTRICT JUDGE. This is a motion for a preliminary injunction restraining the defendants from issuing shares of its common stock, of the par value of $100 each, to the record holders of its preferred and common stock, at $50 a share, in the proportion of one share for every ten held. The defendant contemplates issuing to such stockholders, common and preferred, sufficient stock to raise approximately $300,000. Three other persons have asked permission to intervene as a committee under an agreement known as a stockholder's protective agreement, and have joined in the motion.

Under the offer made by the defendant, each holder of preferred and common stock will be entitled to one share of new stock for every ten shares of old. Exclusive of treasury stock, there are now issued 9,353 common and 60,285 preferred shares. The propriety of the issuance of 2,500 shares of this common stock is, however, questioned by the plaintiffs. The proposal of the defendant is contained in a circular letter, dated December 26, 1923, copy of which is attached to the bill herein. The stock thus offered to the stockholders of record is now held in defendant's treasury. The plan provides either payment is full on or before February 1, 1924, or, at subscribers' option, in installments, the last of which installments will fall due November 1, 1924. The circular further states that the money thus raised is needed for new buildings, machinery, and equipment.

The effect of issuing this common treasury stock would give the major portion thereof to the preferred stockholders. The temporary restraining order was issued pending the hearing and determination of the motion for the preliminary injunction. On the motion, the plaintiffs and the intervening stockholders represented 3,994 shares of common stock. The proposed action of the directors is challenged on the following grounds:

(1) The common stock proposed to be issued has in equity the status of retired stock, and cannot be issued at less than par.

[65] See In The Matter of Thomas Bond, infra 807.

(2) If it be held to have the status of treasury stock, then, as a matter of equity, the shares can be issued only upon such condition as will give to the holders of the common stock the first right to take the full amount at the price offered, and any amount which they do not take may contemporaneously be sold to the holders of preferred stock or to strangers.

(3) The sale of the stock is sought to be made in any event at an inadequate price. The burden is upon the directors to establish the adequacy of the price, as well as that the offer is made in good faith, because the directors are contracting with the corporation.

(4) The action is not taken in good faith because the dominant intent of the directors is to obtain common stock for the preferred stockholders, not $300,000 for the corporation.

The preferred stock of the defendant corporation is limited to 7 per cent. cumulative dividends and the payment of par in the event of dissolution and distribution. All earnings and surplus after the satisfaction of the claims of the preferred stockholders inure to the benefit of the common stock. The common stock which has a par value of $100, it is contended, has a book value of $480 a share. Whether or not this be true, it is conceded that the defendant corporation has a substantial actual surplus. In order to entitle the plaintiffs to the preliminary injunction, it is evident that they must show a case of probable right, or, in any event, that the balance of convenience justifies the issuance of such restraining order in order to maintain the status quo. It is manifest that the issuance of additional common stock at 50 cents on the dollar will materially decrease the surplus available to the common stock, and enable the preferred stockholders under the offer to acquire the major portion of the stock sought to be issued. The stock to be issued and now in its treasury was acquired by the defendant corporation through the purchase of the stock of the United States Silver Corporation in 1903, which corporation was the owner of this stock. The United States Silver Corporation was dissolved in 1908, the stock in question passed to the defendant. The defendant contends that this stock has not been retired or canceled as provided by the laws of the state of New Jersey, under which the corporation was organized. Therefore it is contended that the stock thus previously issued and now held by it in the treasury may be resold for the benefit of the defendant corporation.

It does not appear to be necessary on this motion to decide the precise question as to whether or not this stock was canceled by its reacquisition, but assuming that it was not, the directors in selling it are acting in a fiduciary capacity. The majority of the directors of the defendant corporation who voted for the proposal under discussion, were all holders of substantial amounts of preferred stock, but held no common stock. It is manifest that these directors cannot take any action which would injure one class of stock, even if no benefit were conferred upon the other class. If it be true—and it appears not to be disputed—that the corporation has a substantial surplus to which the preferred stockholders would not be entitled in the event of dissolution, then the action of the directors in making an offer which results in the preferred stockholders getting the major portion of the proposed issue at 50 per cent. of its par value, would seem to work an injustice to the common stockholders. Whatever the intent of the directors may have been, the result is to confer specific benefits upon the preferred stockholders to the detriment of the common stockholders.

It is argued that no one has offered to pay more for it, and that there is no agreement as to what its market price, if any, may be. Indeed, it is asserted that 50 per cent. of its par is all it is worth: but apparently no effort has been made to get the par value of the stock, nor, indeed, to ask the common stockholders what they would be willing to pay. The price fixed would seem to be arbitrary. The burden is on the directors to prove that the price is adequate. Geedes v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., 254 U.S. 590, 41 S.Ct. 209, 65 L.Ed. 425.

The inquiry naturally suggests itself to the inquiring mind whether or not the dominant motive is to distribute common stock to the holders of preferred stock, rather than merely to obtain $300,000 for the corporation. The parties all admit that without any difficulty whatever the corporation, with its financial standing, could readily borrow $300,000 on easy and convenient terms if its needs so require. It may be conceded, however, that no attack is made upon the sincerity of the directors' motives and their integrity, but such integrity of purpose in no wise changes the result of the issuance of the stock. The only detriment to the defendant resulting from the issuance of a preliminary injunction would be that, if resort is had to borrowing the money needed, interest would necessarily be paid. The denial of the injunction would, on the other hand, change the relation of the parties and might result in irreparable injury. The granting of the injunction will inflict upon the defendant only relative and small inconvenience.

The comparative injury would be greater to the plaintiff if refused than to the defendant if granted. Russel v. Farley, 105 U.S. 433, 26 L.Ed. 1060. The issuance of the stock will largely increase the outstanding common stock, and the book value at least of the shares held by the plaintiffs and those similarly situated would be materially reduced. The questions as to the status of the stock sought to be issued, whether canceled or held for cancellation, and whether or not the price is wholly inadequate as the plaintiffs contend, may be reserved until the trial of the cause.

For the reasons stated, I think the preliminary injunction should issue in accordance with the prayer; the plaintiffs, however, to give a bond in an amount to be fixed on the settlement of the order. The amount of this bond must be sufficient to protect the rights and interests of those affected thereby.[66]

BORG et al. v. INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO.

11 F.2d 147.

Appeal from an interlocutory decree[67] denying a motion for an injunction pendente lite. The suit was originally filed by the plaintiffs, common shareholders of the defendant company, to enjoin it from selling 6,000 shares of its common stock to shareholders, common and preferred, at $50 a share, in the proportion of one share for each ten of their existing holdings. The defendant conceded that this was to be only the first installment of sales by which it proposed to raise some $800,000 or $900,000 for its corporate purposes. The plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction against this proposed action, and the court enjoined the sale.[68] Thereafter the defendant publicly offered the same shares at open competitive sales to the highest bidders on sealed bids. The bill was then amended, and an injunction prayed against this second sale. On motion for preliminary injunction, the court refused so to order, and this appeal results.

The controversy depends, first, upon the question whether the common shareholders have a pre-emptive right to buy the shares; and second, assuming this not to exist, whether the defendant's directors are making the sale, not for the honest purpose of raising funds, but to secure the shares at less than their value. The defendant was organized in 1898 under the laws of New Jersey. * * * Its certificate authorized the issue of $20,000,000 of capital stock—$9,000,000 preferred, and $11,000,000 common. The common shares were to have no vote until January, 1902, and thereafter only at the rate of one vote for two shares as against the preferred's right of one vote for each share. * * * Defendant issued $5,107,500 of its preferred shares and $9,944,700 of its common. In 1902, $9,168,000 of the common shares and $515,000 of preferred, constituting a control, had come into the hands of a firm of the name of Thomas & Thomas, who conveyed them to a corporation organized by them for the purpose, known as the United States Silver Corporation. Thomas & Thomas also conveyed to their company certain shares of a Connecticut corporation, C. B. Rogers & Bros. Co., and these, with the shares in the defendant, constituted all the assets of that company.

Thomas & Thomas held all the capital stock of the United States Silver Corporation and $3,000,000 out of $3,150,000 of its bonds; the remaining $150,000 being issued to C. B. Rogers & Bros. Company. The defendant wished to obtain their interests, probably to prevent control of itself, and for that purpose bought all their holdings in the United States Silver Corporation by issuing to them $1,500,000 in new preferred shares of its stock, and $2,000,000 of its bonds (3,900,000 having been issued to others during 1898). This was towards the end of the year 1902, the transaction being finally consummated on January 7th of 1903.

Thus matters stood until April 15, 1908, when the directors of the defendant passed a resolution that the company should acquire all the assets of the United States Silver Corporation "in consideration of an agreement by this company to assume, pay, and discharge all the debts, obligations, and liabilities of such corporation." On June 22, 1908, the defendant and its directors as sole stockholders of the United States Silver Corporation by unanimous consent dissolved that company under the New Jersey statute and acquired its assets, among them the shares of the defendant's stock formerly held by Thomas & Thomas, including $9,068,000 of the common. The shares to be sold are a part of the common shares so acquired.

Up to and including December 31, 1907, the balance sheet issued by the defendant had shown among its liabilities preferred shares amounting to $6,670,500, and common to $9,944,700. On December 31, 1908, this was changed, and the share liability read as follows:

Capital stock, preferred (issued)	$6,607,500.00
Less in treasury	578,912.50
		$6,028,587.50
Capital stock, common (issued)	$9,944,700.00
Less in treasury	9,249,300.00

A reduction was also made in the assets of over $11,000,000. * * * (Upon this balance sheet was a notation that the United States Silver Corporation had been dissolved, its assets transferred to defendant, which accounted for the reduction in the amount of outstanding stock.) * * *

On July 31, 1903, the defendant's board of directors passed an amendment to its by-laws (prohibiting the company from dealing in its own shares, except with the consent of two-thirds of the shareholders, either written or by vote at a special meeting. This was done so that defendant might secure quotation of its preferred shares among the unlisted securities of the New York Stock Exchange. The by-law was repealed in 1913.)

* * * The plaintiffs also alleged * * * certain conduct of the defendant's directors * * * showed their disposition to deal unfairly with the common stockholders. * * *

HAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE (after stating the facts as above). We do not see how it can be thought that the shares in question were in fact retired. The New Jersey statute (section 27, N.J.Corporation Law [P.L.1896, p. 277]),[69] prescribed a method by which this could be

[69] "The decrease of capital stock may be effected by retiring or reducing any class of the stock, or by drawing the necessary number of shares by lot for retirement, or by the surrender by every shareholder of his shares, and the issue to him in lieu thereof of a decreased number of shares, or by the purchase at not above par of certain shares for retirement, or by retiring shares owned by the corporation or by reducing the par value of shares * * * provided, no such decrease of capital stock shall release the liability of any shareholder, whose shares have not been fully done, and there was no pretense of following it. As between the state and the defendant, the shares were certainly not retired. Knickerbocker Importation Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 74 N.J.L. 583, 65 A. 913, 7 L.R.A.,N.S., 885. We shall for argument's sake assume, without deciding, that the defendant might have so conducted itself as to create an obligation, presumably sounding in contract, with the common shareholders by which it was bound to treat the shares in question as retired, leaving the formalities to be observed later. Just what the consideration for such a contract could be, and how any implied promise could therefore become binding, we do not stop to inquire, since we think that from nothing shown can a promise be inferred of that purport. It is this which we consider.

The only substance which we can find in the plaintiffs' contention arises from the resolution of January 31, 1903. In the first place, it is clear that at least its purpose was quite different. Its origin shows that it was meant only to prevent the defendant from speculating in its stock. While nominally the shares here in issue were not its property on January 31, 1903, in substance they were. The defendant owned every title of proprietary interest in the shares of the United States Silver Corporation and all but $150,000 of its bonds. When it took formal action of dissolution and acquired the shares, it paid nothing for them, and did no more than make their status legally what it had in every other sense been before. This was not to speculate in its shares and would presumably not have been so regarded by the Stock Exchange. It is, indeed, argued that its purpose was irrelevant, if the language of the resolution covered the transaction; but this is not true. We are not concerned with whether, in the face of the by-laws, the shares could actually pass to the defendant; each side asserts that. Rather the question is what must be the reasonable inference of the defendant's intent from its action in taking them over. Upon that issue the purpose of the resolution, quite independently of its legal effect, is pertinent.

Assuming that the defendant is not to be presumed to act in contradiction of its own by-laws, such a presumption becomes a fiction when applied to a by-law which was clearly not intended to cover such a transaction, whatever its effect in law. The question being one of fact—i. e., the reasonable significance of the transfer—such considerations are relevant. Moreover, presumption against presumption, any deduction is canceled, because, if the common shares had been retired, or were bought to be retired, the resulting distribution between the common and preferred stock would have violated section 18 of the New Jersey Corporation Law,[70] a point we consider below in another connection. Thus at the outset we cannot see that there was any basis for the conclusion urged by the plaintiffs. * * *

paid, for debts of the corporation theretofore contracted, nor effect any reduction of the taxes that may be required to be paid by the charters of corporations incorporated by special acts." Cf. N.J.S.A. § 14:11-5; N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 36.

[70] N.J.Corporation Law 1896, p. 277, § 18: "Every corporation shall have power to create two or more kinds of stock * * * but at no time shall the total amount of the preferred stocks exceed two-thirds of the actual capital paid in cash or property. * * *" Cf. N.J.S.A. § 14:8-1; N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 11.

So we think that the resolution created no presumption that the defendant intended to retire the shares. But, if it did, the presumption would be rebutted by what took place at the time and thereafter. It is clear, from the way in which it treated the shares in 1908 and afterwards, that the defendant did not suppose the shares were retired, or were to be. If so, it would not have carried them as treasury stock for 15 years. We can construe the balance sheets in no other way. The shares should not have appeared in the sheets at all, or, if they did, only as held for retirement. To mark them as held "in treasury" was to ticket them as treasury shares; it could mean nothing else. The original note on the sheet for 1908 does not say anything to the contrary; they were not "outstanding," because they were held by the defendant; to be "outstanding," they must be effective obligations against it.

Against this it is argued that the shares should have been carried among the assets either at cost—as prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission—or at par, and that the assets should not have been reduced. The affidavits are not clear as to the most approved way of carrying treasury shares, and anyway we think the issue immaterial. Such shares are of necessity retired in this sense: That they constitute no longer any liability of the defendant. A corporation can have no right of action against itself, as must be if the share is truly a liability. Indeed, the only difference between a share held in the treasury and one retired is that the first may be resold for what it will fetch on the market, while the second has disappeared altogether. Enright v. Heckscher, 240 F. 863, 874, 153 C.C.A. 549, C.C.A. 2; Rural Homestead Co. v. Wildes, 54 N.J.Eq. 668, 35 A. 896; Cook on Corporations, § 286. Therefore the best way to state the facts in the corporation's accounts is merely a matter of form, and it can make no difference in the case at bar how it was done, so long as the intent appears.

To carry the shares as a liability, and as an asset at cost, is certainly a fiction, however admirable. They are not a liability, and on dissolution could not be so treated, because the obligor and obligee are one. They are not a present asset, because, as they stand, the defendant cannot collect upon them. What in fact they are is an opportunity to acquire new assets for the corporate treasury by creating new obligations. In order to indicate this potentiality, it may be the best accounting to carry them as an asset at cost, providing, of course, all other assets are so carried. Even so, a company which revalued its assets might properly carry them at their sale value when the revaluation was made. In any event there can be no ambiguity in stating the facts more directly, as the defendant did; that is, in treating the shares as not in existence while held in the treasury, except as a possible source of assets at some future time, when by sale at once they become liabilities and their proceeds assets. It makes no difference whether this satisfies ideal accounting or not. * * * We do not understand that they maintain that shareholders have a pre-emptive right in treasury shares. If so, the cases, of which there are not many, are against them (Enright v. Heckscher, 240 F. 863, 874, 153

C.C.A. 549, C.C.A. 2; Page v. Smith, 48 Vt. 266; Hartridge v. Rockwell, R.M.Charlt. [Ga.] 260; Crosby v. Stratton, 17 Colo.App. 212, 68 P. 130; Cook on Corporations, § 286), though the right is well settled when new shares are sold after an increase of capital stock (Stokes v. Continental Trust Co., 186 N.Y. 285, 78 N.E. 1090, 12 L.R.A.,N.S., 969, 9 Ann.Cas. 738; Electric Co. v. Edison etc., Co., 200 Pa. 516, 50 A. 164; Way v. American Grease Co., 60 N.J.Eq. 263, 269, 47 A. 44; Gray v. Portland Bank, 3 Mass. 374, 3 Am.Dec. 156).

The distinction may appear tenuous, but rests upon the effect which a new issue has upon the voting control of the company. When a person buys into a company with an authorized capital, he accepts that proportion of the voting rights which his purchase bears to the whole. This applies certainly so far as the other shares are issued at the same time, and perhaps, also, though they are issued much later. But treasury shares have by hypothesis once been issued, and have diluted, as it were, the shareholder's voting power ab initio. He cannot properly complain that he is given no right to buy them when they are resold, because that merely restores the status he originally accepted. All he can demand is that they shall bring to the corporate treasury their existing value. If they do, his proportion in any surplus is not affected. However, when the capital stock is increased beyond the original amount authorized, the voting power is diluted along with it; the shareholders who had not originally bought into so large an issue may insist that the old proportions be observed. To deprive them of their right of pre-emption is to change their contract. At any rate it is only on this theory that any right of pre-emption exists, and since the shares at bar were never bought to be retired, and the capital was not increased, the right does not exist. * * *

Order affirmed.[71]

2. REDEMPTION AND RETIREMENT

NOTE

Not infrequently, corporate charters contain provisions permitting preferred stock to be retired or redeemed on call by the corporation at a fixed redemption price. Following is a typical clause:

REDEMPTION (PAR VALUE)

The corporation may at the option of the board of directors, redeem the whole or any part of the outstanding preferred stock on any dividend payment date after ——— by paying ——— Dollars ($———) for each share thereof, together with a sum of money equivalent to dividends at the rate of ——— per centum (———%) per annum on the par value thereof from the date on which the dividends thereon became cumulative to the date fixed for such redemption, less the amount of dividends theretofore paid thereon.

Notice of such election to redeem shall, not less than thirty (30) days prior to the dividend date upon which the stock is to be redeemed, be mailed to each holder of stock so to be redeemed at his address as it appears on the books of the corporation.

71 1927, 36 Yale L.J. 1181.

In case less than all of the outstanding preferred stock is to be redeemed, the amount to be redeemed and the method of effecting such redemption, whether by lot or pro rata or otherwise, may be determined by the board of directors. If on or before the redemption date named in such notice, the funds necessary for such redemption shall have been set aside by the corporation so as to be available for payment on demand to the holders of the preferred stock so called for redemption, then, notwithstanding that any certificate of the preferred stock so called for redemption shall not have been surrendered for cancellation, the dividends thereon shall cease to accrue from and after the date of redemption so designated, and all rights with respect to such preferred stock so called for redemption including any right to vote or otherwise participate in the determination of any proposed corporate action, shall forthwith after such redemption date cease and determine, except only the right of the holder to receive the redemption price therefor, but without interest. Stock redeemed pursuant to the provisions hereof shall not be reissued but shall be cancelled.

RETIREMENT AND REDUCTION OF STOCK.

A real distinction exists financially between the redemption, retirement, or purchase of preferred stock, and the redemption, retirement, or purchase of common stock.

The process of paying off a preferred shareholder and calling in a share of stock is analogous in financial practice to paying off a note. It cannot be done unless there is an agreement permitting such retirement, or unless a preferred stockholder agrees to turn in his stock.

"Redemption" normally means the calling in of a share of the preferred stock pursuant to a clause in the certificate permitting this. Normally preferred stock is redeemable at a price slightly higher than the amount paid for it by the shareholder on original issue—the premium being to compensate him for the loss of his shareholder's position, which may or may not be valuable. This permits a corporation to issue a preferred stock when money rates are high, carrying a dividend of say 8 per cent.; and, when money rates are lower, to redeem preferred stock and issue another preferred stock at say 6 per cent., saving the difference in dividends.

"Retirement" is another word for the same operation; but retirement usually connotes that the share thus paid out can never be reissued, but is "killed."

"Purchase" consists in buying preferred stock in the open market; but not pursuant to an option or privilege retained by the corporation in the certificate of incorporation. The law normally requires the purchase price of a share of stock to be paid out of surplus.

With common stock there is no such simple financial justification. The usual motive for purchasing common stock (which normally cannot be retired or redeemed) is the desire of the corporation or someone in it, either

(a) to eliminate some one man as an objectionable associate; or

(b) to reduce the number of participants outstanding on the theory that this will enhance the pro rata profits applicable to the remaining shares.

Less honestly, of course, the power may be used to create fluctuations in the market.

Historically, shares could not, in America at least, be redeemed, retired, or purchased out of capital; the theory being that the creditors of the corporation were entitled to be paid before a single dollar of capital was repaid to the shareholders.

As the conception of preferred stock as a substitute for notes and bonds began to appear, statutes not infrequently permitted corporations to redeem, retire, or purchase their preferred stock, and write-off a prescribed amount from their capital account. Corporations desire to do this in normal course so as to preserve a large surplus available for dividends on the common stock.

WESTERFIELD-BONTE CO. v. BURNETT.

Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1917. 176 Ky. 188, 195 S.W. 477.

HURT, J. The appellant, Westerfield-Bonte Company, is a corporation organized under the corporation laws of the state of Kentucky, with its home in the city of Louisville. The capital stock consists of two hundred and fifty shares of the par value of one hundred dollars each. Sixty shares of the capital stock, of the par value of one hundred dollars each, are what is denominated preferred stock, and the remainder of the shares are what is known as common stock. At the creation of the corporation all of the stock was what is denominated common stock, but on the 4th day of June, 1910, amended articles of incorporation were adopted, in the manner provided by law, by which it was provided that sixty shares of the capital stock should be of the class known as preferred stock, and the remainder should be common stock. These amended articles were adopted by the unanimous action of all the holders of the capital stock of the corporation. The amended articles provided as follows:

"The preferred stock may, by vote of the majority of the board of directors of said company, be redeemed on any dividend date, as fixed by the by-laws, at any time after one year from the first day of July, 1910, at the price of one hundred and five dollars ($105.00) per share, and any accumulated dividends, and this preferred stock shall, upon request to the board of directors of said company from the holders of two-thirds thereof, be retired at the price of one hundred dollars ($100.00) per share, and any accumulated dividends, at any time after July 1st, 1915." * * *

[The certificates stated that the preferred stock was part of a $6,000 par value issue, and that the holder was entitled to an 8% cumulative dividend.]

The appellee, Henry Burnett, became the owner of forty shares of the preferred stock, which was two-thirds of it, and on July 28, 1915, made a demand in writing to the board of directors of appellant, by which he requested it to retire the preferred stock, which he held, and to pay him therefor the sum of one hundred dollars per share, with interest at eight per centum per annum from July 1, 1915. The demand was acknowledged by the board of directors, but it refused to retire the stock or redeem the same, as provided by the articles of incorporation. The appellee, on October 15, 1915, instituted this action and in addition to the above stated facts, alleged that the corporation was amply able to retire his stock and to pay him the sum necessary for that purpose, according to the articles of incorporation, without detriment or danger to the rights of appellant's creditors, and that appellant did not owe anything beyond its current bills, and that the rights of its creditors would not be in any manner injuriously affected.

The appellant, by answer and two amendments thereto, denied that the effect of the articles of incorporation was to authorize the appellee to demand the retirement or to receive the par value of his preferred stock, so long as the corporation was a going concern, except that the preferred stock might be redeemed out of the surplus funds of the corporation and without infringement upon its capital stock, and denied that the preferred stock was entitled to any preference over the common stock, except in payment of dividends or upon a final dissolution of the corporation to be redeemed out of the assets of the corporation before the common stock should be redeemed. A denial was made that the corporation had no indebtedness beyond its current bills, or that the rights of the creditors would not be jeopardized by the payment of the appellee's claim without danger or detriment to the rights of its creditors. The answer, also, alleged that the regular dividends provided for had been regularly paid upon the preferred stock until January, 1915; that the corporation had no money or property of any kind, except its machinery, equipment and supplies used in the conduct of its business; that it had $3,903.55 face value of accounts, worth sixty per centum of their face value, and that its average amount of cash on hand was about two hundred and fifty dollars; that its pay-roll was about two hundred and fifty dollars per week, and that in order to raise the money necessary to retire the preferred stock and to pay appellee's claim it would have to sell or mortgage its property; that its machinery, equipment and supplies cost originally twenty thousand dollars, but some of it was several years of age and while valuable to a going concern, would probably sell for only a small percentage of its original cost; and that the corporation owed debts to the amount of fifteen hundred dollars, and that two hundred dollars par value of its common stock had never been subscribed for nor sold. The answer, furthermore, set out in full the amended articles of incorporation heretofore referred to, bearing upon the preference provided, for the preferred stock in the payment of dividends, and the redemption of the shares, upon a final dissolution.

A general demurrer was interposed and by the court sustained to the answer as amended. Before the submission of the case, however, the appellee took the deposition of the president of the corporation and by him it was shown that after the redemption of the entire preferred stock, and the payment of all creditors of the corporation, there would be a surplus of assets for distribution among the common stockholders of something between 12 and 15 hundred dollars. * * * [After trial, the court held for plaintiff for $4,197.33 with 6% interest on the ground that creditors would not be injured by requiring the corporation to redeem plaintiff's preferred stock. Defendant appeals from this judgment.]

It is an undisputed doctrine, that corporate property must first be appropriated to the debts of a corporation before there can be any distribution of it among the stockholders, holding either preferred or common stock, as both classes of stock are equally liable to the creditors of the corporation. There can be no lawful distribution of the capital of the corporation among the stockholders, without the corporate debts having been first paid or provided for, but in the absence of any creditors, or where provision has been made for them or exists for them, the rights of the preferred stockholder depends upon his contract with the corporation. 7 R.C.L. §§ 170, 171. A judgment should not be rendered, by which any of the assets of a corporation are appropriated to the payment of any claim of a stockholder growing up out of a contract for a preference among the stockholders, if such appropriation would endanger the collection of the corporate debts. The corporation, however, is the property of the stockholders, and if they contract in such a way as to be legally bound to appropriate a portion of the capital to redeem the share of the preferred stockholder, the contract may be enforced, if the enforcement does not affect the collection of the claims of the creditors of the corporation. In the instant case, the rights and remedies of any creditor of the corporation, either against the corporate property or against a preferred stockholder, whose stock might be redeemed out of the assets of the corporation, or who might receive the proceeds of the sale of the corporate property, are not here determined, as the questions are not before us upon the record, but suffice it to say, that the answer failed to show that the enforcement of the contract of appellee with the corporation would endanger the collection of the corporate debts. Hence, the judgment sustaining the demurrer is affirmed. It may be added, that the deposition of the president of the corporation, which is made a part of this record by appellant, affirmatively shows that after the redemption of the preferred stock and the payment of all the corporate debts, there will be a surplus equal to the amount of the corporate debts, of the assets of the corporation left for distribution among the stockholders.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

GENERAL INVESTMENT CO. v. AMERICAN HIDE & LEATHER CO.

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1925.
98 N.J.Eq. 326, 129 A. 244, 44 A.L.R. 60.

[Defendant corporation was organized in New Jersey in 1899 with an authorized capital stock of $35,000,000, divided into common and preferred $100 par stock. 125,483 shares of 7% cumulative voting preferred and 112,741 voting common shares were issued, 111,776 unissued shares remaining in the corporate treasury.

Plaintiffs own 7% cumulative preferred stock, upon which there was a 140% default in dividend payments.

The corporation, at the time of suit, had a surplus of $5,000,000.

The board of directors, three-quarters of the preferred and seven-tenths of the common stock voted in favor of the following plan: (1) to reclassify 35,000 unissued preferred shares into 35,000 8% cumulative prior preference shares, preferred as to principal and dividends over the outstanding preferred and common stock, redeemable any time after three years at 15% above par; (2) to decrease the total capital stock by about $10,000,000 by canceling 10,000 preferred and 60,000 common shares now in the treasury; (3) to purchase for retirement and cancellation 30,000 outstanding preferred shares at not above par (thereby canceling $4,200,000 accrued dividends); to purchase from the Chase Securities Co. (holder of 15,000 preferred shares) its holdings at about $69 per share, to be paid from surplus.

The outstanding capital stock would then be approximately:

1st preference 8% cumulative (new)	$ 3,500,000
Cumulative 7% preferred (remainder of old stock.)	$6,500,000
Common stock (approximately)	$11,500,000

Plaintiff filed a bill for an injunction restraining the execution of the plan on the ground that: (1) the issue of 8% cumulative prior preferred stock violates the vested rights of the existing preferred stockholders; (2) the preferred stockholders are entitled to sell their holdings pro rata for retirement; (3) the corporation cannot apply accrued dividends belonging to preferred stockholders, to the purchase; (4) the redemption provision is invalid.

Plaintiff appeals from the denial of a preliminary injunction.]

GUMMERE, CHIEF JUSTICE. * * * The next point submitted by counsel for the appellants is that they are entitled to be afforded an opportunity of selling to the corporation for retirement their pro rata holdings of the total amount of shares, the purchase of which is contemplated, and that this right is injuriously affected by the preference given to the Chase Securities Corporation in the making of such purchase. We concur in the view that, in the purchasing of this stock for retirement, it should be acquired ratably from each stockholder who desires to sell. It was so held by us in the Berger Case, 63 N.J. Eq. 506, 53 A. 14; and, if it be true that the proposed scheme is in violation of that right—which seems, at least, doubtful—the respondent company should be restrained from refusing to afford the complainants the opportunity to dispose of their stock to the corporation to the extent indicated. * * *

* * * the order appealed from will be affirmed, with the modifications indicated. * * *

NOTE

The court will enjoin the consummation of a promise to certain preferred stockholders to repurchase their stock at par, where no such agreement was made with all preferred shareholders, even though the corporation has the power to contract to repurchase its stock. All preferred stockholders must be treated equally. Hoops v. Leddy, 119 N.J.Eq. 296, 182 A. 271, 1936; 1936, 3 U. of Chi.L.Rev. 665.

If a corporation, by a majority stockholders' vote, resolves to retire its preferred stock and issue new preferred stock, a dissenting stockholder is entitled to have his shares appraised and bought in, if there is any question as to whether the stockholders are benefited by such change. Matter of Silberkraus, 250 N.Y. 242, 165 N.E. 279, 78 A.L.R. 1113, 1929; Matter of Seiler, 239 App.Div. 400, 267 N.Y.S. 567, 1st Dep't., 1933; Note, Capital Reclassification as an Alteration of Preferential Rights under Appraisal Statutes, 1933, 42 Yale L.J. 952.

A corporation was authorized to issue preferred stock redeemable at $105 per share. Complainant contended the redemption provision violated a statute prohibiting a corporation from purchasing its own stock. Held: the authorization was to redeem, not purchase, its stock; that "redemption means retirement of the stock redeemed", and was therefore valid by statute. Venner v. Public Utilities Comm., 302 Ill. 232, 235, 134 N.E. 17, 1922. But see Borg v. International Silver Co., supra, p. 701, which holds that where a corporation purchases its own shares and holds them in its treasury, there is no presumption that such shares were bought for retirement.

TAYLOR v. AXTON-FISHER TOBACCO COMPANY.

Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 1943. 295 Ky. 226, 173 S.W.2d 377.

Declaratory judgment action by Charlotte Taylor against the Axton-Fisher Tobacco Company to determine the power of defendant's board of directors to modify its action in calling defendant's Class A Common stock for retirement. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

STANLEY, COMMISSIONER. The case presents a novel question of power of the board of directors of a corporation to rescind or modify its action in calling certain stock for redemption or retirement.

The Axton-Fisher Tobacco Company, a Kentucky corporation, has or had three classes of stock, which are designated as Preferred, Class A Common and Class B Common. The preferred stock (13,698 shares outstanding) bears cumulative dividends at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. Class A Common stock (15,397 shares outstanding) bears cumulative dividends at the rate of $3.20 per share per annum and has other substantial rights. Class B Common stock (142,080 shares outstanding) has the sole voting power in the management of the corporation except in the event of default in the payment of as many as four quarterly dividends on either of the other two classes. The Preferred stock has first right to dividends. It is not involved in the case. Class A Common stock has few of the attributes of ordinary common stock, it being of the nature of secondary preferred stock. The character and general rights of these respective classes of stock are described in Franke v. Axton-Fisher Tobacco Co., 289 Ky. 687, 160 S.W.2d 23, and, in the particular respect involved, in the further course of this opinion.

The articles of incorporation contain a provision that all or any part of the Class A Common stock, at the option of the directors, upon sixty days notice, may be redeemed on any quarterly dividend-payment date by the company paying $60 a share therefor, and all accrued unpaid dividends. If less than all the stock be retired, all stockholders of the class must be treated alike. On April 3, 1943, the board of directors adopted a resolution reciting that pursuant to the above provision of the charter the entire outstanding Class A Common stock was called for redemption on July 1, 1943 at $60 per share plus the accrued unpaid dividends thereon, including one payable July 1st, amounting to $20.80 per share, an aggregrate of $80.80. A trust company was named as redemption agent and the officers of the corporation were authorized and directed to deposit $1,244,077.60 with the trust company as a special fund with which to effectuate the redemption.

On June 16, 1943, the directors adopted a resolution modifying their previous action and changing the call for the retirement of Class A Common stock from a mandatory to an optional one, leaving it to the option of the holders thereof whether they would surrender the stock for redemption on July 1st upon the same terms or would retain it without impairment of the rights appertaining thereto.

A holder of a small amount of Class B Common stock instituted this suit for a declaratory judgment respecting the power and right of the directors to modify the action of April 30th. She denied such power. The circuit court declared it was a proper exercise of power. On the appeal the Transamerica Corporation, claiming to be the owner of about 85 per cent of the Class B Common stock and none of Class A (having previously exchanged what it owned, a very large amount, for Class B) has joined the plaintiff on the appeal by filing a brief as amicus curiæ challenging the validity of the action of the board and the correctness of the judgment.

On first impression it would seem clear that the directors had a perfect right to change their minds, and that their action in modifying the first call for redemption was but a decision made in the course of management, well within the common law and statutory powers of a board of directors of a corporation in their discretion to manage its affairs intra vires. It is fundamental and elemental that the action of directors when exercised in good faith and not in fraud of the rights of the stockholders is not subject to their control and will not be interfered with by the courts. KRS 271.230; Manufacturers' Land & Improvement Co. v. Cleary, 121 Ky. 403, 89 S.W. 248; Reid Drug Co. v. Salyer, 268 Ky. 522, 105 S.W.2d 625; Fletcher, Cyclopedia of Law of Private Corporations, §§ 505, 2104. It would also appear that the power to recall or modify the original action existed until July 1st, as of which date the redemption would be consummated; and, further, that Class A stockholders alone might have complained of the modification but for the fact they were not prejudiced thereby. These are the essential arguments of the appellee.

The general and necessary conception of power and right of exclusive management in the directors, obviously, is subject to the elementary principle that if in a particular instance their action created rights in another they cannot alter or affect those rights to his prejudice. The first resolution of this board of directors materially changed the entire corporate structure. It changed the status of both holders of Class A and Class B common stock, very definitely and directly. The question is whether the new status could be altered. The subsequent resolution of June 16th did not effectually disturb that changed status of Class A stockholders for they had the right to continue it; but it could not and did not give any choice to the Class B stockholders.

The rights of the holders of Class A stock and of the corporation as to its redemption rested on an express contract, namely, the provision of the articles of incorporation which made them junior preferred stockholders and subject at all times to have their stock retired. [Citing cases.] * * *

We have a declaration of principle in Fox v. Johnson & Wimsatt, 75 U.S.App.D.C. 211, 127 F.2d 729 (an opinion by Mr. Justice Rutledge, presently of the Supreme Court) directly pertaining to the Class A stockholders and indirectly to Class B. A preferred stockholder sued for specific performance of a resolution of redemption of the class of stock he owned. It was stated that by the provision of the charter giving the corporation the right to redeem the stock the shareholders in effect contracted that their shares should be redeemable at the corporation's option. It was held that the stockholder could not enforce the redemption until the directors had exercised the option definitely and contractually in accordance with the power conferred on them. The denial of specific performance was rested on the ground that the resolution of the directors merely declared a policy of redemption and was conditional, so the stockholder's contractual right did not mature into an enforcible one because of the character of the action of the board and the conditions had failed to materialize. * * * Indeed, it is conceded by the appellee that the action of the directors on April 30th vested rights in the holders of Class A stock which could not have been voided. We think if it vested rights in one class it did in the other for the reasons to be stated.

We should not test the rights inuring to the holders of Class B stock by the fact that the later resolution made it optional with the Class A stockholders to accept or reject redemption, hence that they were not prejudiced. It may be reasonably presumed that at least some of them will accept it. The question is was the first change made in the status of Class B shareholders revocable without their consent, or did they acquire a vested right under the resolution making it obligatory on Class A stockholders to redeem their stock and sever all relationship to the corporation. This is to be determined by an examination of the charter rights of holders of Class B stock as affected by the charter rights of holders of Class A stock. They are fairly stated by the amicus curiæ to be: (1) The right to cumulative dividends on the $10 par value of $3.20 per share per annum, plus an amount payable to all of the holders of Class A stock as a class equal to the total of any additional dividend declared in any year in excess of $1.60 per share on all of Class B stock; (2) The right to vote at the stockholders' meetings so long as their dividends were in default; (3) The right, unless the holders of two-thirds thereof consented, to prevent the corporation from (a) incurring an indebtedness maturing later than twelve months other than in the ordinary course of business, or (b) mortgaging or pledging property to secure an issue of bonds, or (c) disposing by sale, consolidation, mortgage, lease or otherwise the property and business of the corporation as a whole; (4) The right in the event of dissolution, liquidation, merger or consolidation or sale of substantially all of the corporate assets, to receive per share twice the amount paid upon each share of Class B stock; and (5) The right, in the event of redemption, to receive all accrued and unpaid dividends and the sum of $60 per share.

Manifestly, it was very much to the interest of the holders of Class B stock to have all these priorities, obligations and restrictions on and conditional joint control of the management eliminated. A substantial advantage was given to and acquired by the Class B stockholders by the resolution definitely and unqualifiedly calling Class A stock for redemption. That being true, it was vested and fixed, so the directors could not withdraw or cancel or modify their action to the prejudice or detriment of Class B stockholders.

The first action of the directors may not be regarded as but an offer or proffer, or in the nature of such, capable of being withdrawn before acceptance or consummation. Rather it is the converse. The charter provision constituted a continuing contractual power and corresponding right which only waited action by the directors for use and consummation. It was a continuing option. They exercised their authority and thereby closed the matter insofar as it concerned the corporation and the two classes of stockholders affected thereby. It made Class A stockholders strictly creditors and thereby freed the Class B stockholders of the restrictions on management and of the subordination to the right to share in the earnings of the company.

Nor can we agree with the appellee that the result of this action of the directors is to be regarded only as an incidental benefit flowing to the Class B stockholders since they were not promisees of the contract nor parties to whom performance was to be rendered. See 2 Williston on Contracts, § 402. The provision of the articles of incorporation and the effect of the action of the directors are too substantial and too great to be so regarded. We think the provision for redemption of Class A stock was made as much for the one as for the other class. If it was not, then it was very delusive.

The principle applicable in cases where there has been a declaration of dividends is applicable here. Undivided profits of a corporation in a sense or qualifiedly belong to the stockholders, but disposition or distribution thereof rests within the fair discretion of the directors. Smith v. Southern Foundry Co., 166 Ky. 208, 179 S.W. 205. However, once they make a declaration of distribution or dividend and set apart a fund for the payment, their power is exhausted in the particular instance and their action is irrevocable without the consent of the stockholders. As respects the dividend, they have been changed from stockholders to creditors. Until the declaration of the dividend, the stockholders had only a potentiality. Afterward they have a vested right in the money and may maintain an action at law to enforce it. [Citing cases.] * * *

It seems to us that the rationale upon which rests this right to enforce collection of a declared dividend controls the decision of this case, namely, that the status of both classes of stockholders was changed. What were potential rights in Class B stockholders became vested rights by the first action of the directors. Class A stockholders were eliminated as of July 1st, 1943, for they could not at the same time be stockholders and creditors in relation to the same funds. In re Phœnix Hotel Co., 6 Cir., 83 F.2d 724. Class B stockholders thereby acquired the rights above described. The rights of the one nor the other could be impaired or modified without their consent. We are of opinion, therefore, the circuit court should have so declared and adjudged.

The judgment is reversed.

"Ordinarily the redemption is at the option of the company, and so is unobjectionable, for it is of concern to the corporation not to allow prior liens to pass beyond recall, and in case of a conflict between interests, it may be of advantage for the corporation to buy out the dissenting element by redemption of its stock. A redemption, however, compulsory at a certain date or the power granted to the preferred stockholder to convert himself into a creditor and demand cash if dividends are not paid, has been disallowed by the courts where the assertion of such a power by the preferred stockholder would militate against creditors." The holder of preferred stock, redeemable on a day certain, is not converted into a corporate creditor on the redemption date so as to entitle him to priority on the dissolution of the corporation. A preferred stockholder has no right to have the corporation return his money with interest when the financial condition of the company is such that it is unable to pay its debts. Rider v. F. REDUCTION OF CAPITAL

New York Stock Corporation Law, § 36:[1] "A stock corporation may effect one or more of the following purposes: * * * (A) To increase or reduce the amount of its capital stock where all of the capital stock is divided into shares having a par value; * * * (G) To reduce its capital so as to eliminate therefrom any or all of the amount thereof previously transferred thereto by resolution of the directors: or, if desired and without limitation of the corporation's power to reduce its capital in any other lawful manner, to reduce such capital to a specified amount in connection with any change, reduction of par value or elimination of shares, or other proceeding to be accomplished by the certificate: By filing a certificate which shall * * * state: * * * 8. * * * the amount to which (the capital) is reduced * * * 16. If it be proposed to reduce the amount of capital pursuant to paragraph (G), the certificate shall provide that the surplus, if any, resulting from such reduction shall be available for any one or more of the following purposes:[3] (a) to be used for any purpose for which surplus may be used; or (b) to be reserved and used for specified purposes; or (c) to be returned to the stockholders, according to their respective rights, at the times and in the manner specified."

New York Stock Corporation Law, § 37, requires that the reduction of capital stock be approved by a majority vote of the holders of outstanding voting shares, and that an affidavit of the corporate officers be attached to the certificate of reduction stating: sec. 37(4): "either (a) that no distribution of assets to the stockholders will be made in connection with the proposed reduction, or (b) that the actual value of the assets of the corporation is not less than the total amount of the debts and liabilities of the corporation plus the proposed amount of its capital".

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 28. Reduction of Capital:—Any corporation organized under this Chapter may reduce its capital at any time (a) by the written consent of the holders of record of the total number of shares of the corporation having voting powers at the time outstanding or (b) by resolution of its board of directors supplemented by a resolution adopted by the holders of record of a majority of said shares at a meeting of the stockholders called for that purpose upon at least ten days' notice given in accordance with the by-laws of the corporation to said stockholders. Any preferred or special shares which have been called for redemption and the payment of the redemption price of which has been provided for shall not be deemed to be outstanding. A certificate stating the fact of such consent or the adoption of such resolution and specifying the manner and the extent to which the capital of the corporation is to be reduced shall be made under the seal of the corporation and the hands of its President or a Vice-President and its Secretary or an Assistant Secretary and the President or such Vice-President shall acknowledge said certificate before an officer authorized by the laws of Delaware to take acknowledgments of deeds; and the certificate, so executed and acknowledged, shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State and a certified copy thereof shall be recorded in the office of the Recorder of the County in which the original Certificate of Incorporation is recorded. Upon the completion of such filing and recording the capital of the corporation shall thereby be so reduced. No such reduction, however, shall be made in the capital of the corporation unless the assets of the corporation remaining after such reduction are sufficient to pay any debts, the payment of which shall not have been otherwise provided for and said certificate shall so state.

[3] N.Y.Stock Corporation Law, § 38(4): "No corporation, except as otherwise provided by law, shall make any distribution of its assets in connection with the reduction of its capital * * * if the effect of such distribution will be to reduce the actual value of its assets to an amount less than the total amount of its debts and liabilities plus the amount, as reduced, of its capital."

Such reduction of the capital of the corporation may be effected by retiring or reducing the outstanding shares of any class or by drawing the necessary number of outstanding shares of any class by lot for retirement, or by the exchange by the holders of outstanding shares of any class of the shares of such class held by them for a decreased number of shares of stock of the same or of a different class of stock, or by the exchange of shares having par value for shares having no par value, or of shares without par value for shares with par value, or by the exchange of shares having par value for an increased number of shares of lesser par value, or by the exchange of par value shares for shares without par value and/or par value shares of any class, or by the exchange of shares without par value for par value shares and/or shares without par value of any class, the effect of which is to work a reduction of capital, or by reducing (in conjunction with appropriate action under Section 26 of this Chapter) the par value of the shares of any class of stock having par value, or where the amount of capital represented by shares of stock having par value exceeds such par value, by reducing the amount of capital represented by such shares by an amount not greater than such excess, or by reducing the amount of capital represented by shares of stock having no par value, or, in case the capital shall have been increased by the transfer thereto from surplus pursuant to the provisions of Section 14 of this Chapter and the transfer shall not have been made in respect of any designated class or classes of stock, by retransferring to surplus all or any part of the amount by which capital shall have been so increased, or by the purchase of shares for retirement, either pro rata from all holders of shares of that class of stock or by purchasing such shares from time to time in the open market or at private sale in both cases at not exceeding such price or prices as may be fixed or approved by the stockholders entitled to vote upon the reduction of capital to be effected in that manner, or by retiring shares owned by the corporation. If such reduction of capital of the corporation be effected by retiring shares, then, if the consent or resolution of stockholders above referred to shall so provide, an amount not exceeding that part of the capital of the corporation represented by such shares may be charged against or paid out of the capital of the corporation in respect of such shares.

If such reduction of capital shall have been effected by retiring or reducing the outstanding shares of any class in any of the manners above mentioned, including the retirement of shares already owned by the corporation, the shares so retired or by the acquisition of which in any manner the outstanding shares of such class shall have been reduced shall, upon the filing and recording of the certificate as provided in this Section, if the Certificate of Incorporation does not prohibit the reissue thereof, have the status of authorized and unissued shares of the class of stock to which such shares belong. If the Certificate of Incorporation prohibits the reissue of such shares the filing and recording of such certificate, containing a recital of such fact, shall constitute an amendment to the Certificate of Incorporation effecting a reduction of the authorized capital stock of the corporation to the extent of the aggregate par value of such shares, or, if such shares are without par value, to the extent of the total number of such shares. If such shares constitute all the outstanding shares of any particular class and the reissue thereof is so prohibited, the filing and recording of such certificate, containing a recital of such fact, shall constitute an amendment to the Certificate of Incorporation effecting a reduction in the authorized capital stock of the corporation by the elimination therefrom of all reference to said particular class of stock.

When any corporation shall decrease the amount of its capital as hereinbefore provided, the above-mentioned certificate shall be published for three weeks successively at least once in each week, in a newspaper published in the county in which the principal office of the corporation is located; the first publication to be made within fifteen days after the filing of such certificate, and in default thereof the directors of the corporation shall be jointly and severally liable to any creditors of the corporation who shall suffer loss by reason of the noncompliance with the provisions of this section and the stockholders shall be similarly liable up to the amount of such sums as they may respectively receive of the amount so reduced; provided that no such decrease of capital shall release the liability of any stockholder, whose shares have not been fully paid, for debts of the corporation theretofore contracted.

REDUCTION OF CAPITAL

It has been observed above (page 207ff.) that corporations are obliged to set up a figure on an estimated "capital" on their balance sheet; and that originally this was the aggregate par value of the issued shares having par value, and now it is calculated according to a statutory formula. It has further been noted that corporations are accorded the power to repurchase certain kinds of shares, especially preferred shares, with their assets and write down the item as "capital" by an amount equal to the "capital represented by" such preferred shares, also in accordance with statutory formula. This is the principal practical use of "reduction of capital". Clearly, if all the stock had to be retired out of surplus, the surplus fund might become so reduced that payment of dividends was impossible. A businessman will argue that if he paid off a note, he would reduce the assets side of his balance sheet by the amount paid; and he would likewise reduce his liability side by the face of the note. Why, he argues, can I not do the same thing when I buy in and cancel a share of stock? When he is told that he can do that—by reducing the item called "surplus" he points out that surplus is an all-purpose item capable of being used for dividends, repurchase of stock, etc; whereas "capital" is restricted. It gives him greater freedom therefore to reduce the capital item, leaving the surplus for further operations. Anyway, he argues, preferred stock is merely a weaker substitute for a credit instrument. He has been successful in these arguments.

But, in respect to common stock, the situation is not so clear. Repurchasing a share of common stock, with intent to cancel it, is very much like buying out one of the partners. If the capital "represented by" the common stock is paid out, there is no particular reason to assume that it will come back. There is also no reason to assume that it is being paid out merely because the corporation has no further need for the money. It is, in fact, a partial distribution of the corporate assets to one of the group, leaving the remaining members to stand the risks of not sharing the profits of the business. Carried to its extreme, and if there were no restrictions, reduction of capital by this route might leave the business without substantial capital, but with debts and other obligations for which no provision was made.

Accordingly, provisions permitting reduction of capital restrict the use of this power. Thus, under no circumstances can capital be reduced or paid out to shareholders if as a result the corporation is made insolvent. This is rather illusory as protection; theoretically, a corporation with a million dollars debts could reduce its capital to $1.00 provided its total assets remained $1,000,000. A creditor would not consider that it was "protected" by this arrangement; lenders and businessmen do not grant credit unless the borrower has a substantial margin over and above the amount of the debt.

Quite commonly, reduction of capital, occasioned by retiring common stock, is not permitted if the remaining capital is reduced below the amount "represented by" the preferred stock.

The theory is that a corporation should not be permitted to pay out the capital junior to its senior obligations (preferred stock, debts) unless

(a) sufficient assets remain within the corporation to provide for payment of its debts; and

(b) the capital "represented by" the preferred stock is likewise left intact.

In practice probably none of these protections are heavily relied on in the business community. A creditor follows not merely the statutory handling of capital, but also the total balance sheet position of the corporation. If he sees the assets going down, he is pretty apt to insist that his debt be paid. But he may have contracted away any right to insist on repayment of his debt: long-term bond issues, preferred stock issues and so forth do not usually leave it open to holders of the securities to insist on repayment if the capital is dissipated. Surplus, of course, can be distributed as dividends at any time without restrictions. Theoretically, statutes permitting reduction of capital would allow extreme financial mismanagement. Thus, a corporation having $2,000,000. in assets, and $1,000,000. of bonded indebtedness, $500,000. par value preferred stock, and 5,000 shares of non-par common stock would have a balance sheet as follows:

ASSETS: $2,000,000.	LIABILITIES:
	Bonds		$1,000,000.
	Capital:
	In respect of Preferred Stock	$500,000.
	In respect of Common Stock	50,000.	550,000.
	Surplus		450,000.
$2,000,000.			$2,000,000.

The Directors could:

(1) pay out the $450,000 as dividends to the common stock and then dump the common stock, leaving the preferred stock totally unprotected say by a $50,000 margin. This involves no reduction in capital; or

(2) they might pay out the $450,000 as dividends; and retire the preferred stock under a redemption provision for $500,000 leaving $1,050,000 in the corporation against a bonded indebtedness of $1,000,000. Needless to say the bondholders would then be in the position of being full-risk partners in the business—which is not what they expected. Students will think of variations of this theme. Legally, this is possible. Financially, it would be disastrous. Is the power to "reduce capital" subject to any control beyond the statutory requirements, either at the instance of creditors or at the instance of preferred or common stockholders?

BRITISH & AMERICAN TRUSTEE & FINANCE CORPORATION v. COUPER.

House of Lords. [1894] A.C. 399.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of LORD HERSCHELL, L. C.

The appellant company was incorporated in 1890 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, as a company limited by shares, with a registered office in England.

The capital was £2,000,000 divided into 188,600 ordinary shares of £10 each, and 114,000 general founders' shares of £1 each. The company had issued 63,109 of the shares of £10, on each of which £2 had been paid up, 72,298 of the general founders' shares, all of which were fully paid up. By the articles of association it was provided that the company might reduce its capital by paying off capital. On the 18th of May, 1892, the company presented a petition praying that a special resolution passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings of the company might be confirmed by the Court.

The resolution provided for a modification of the conditions of the memorandum of association by a reduction of the capital of the company to £1,691,737, divided into 160,767 ordinary shares of £10 each, and 84,067 general founders' shares of £1 each, and that the remainder of the capital, namely, the 27,833 ordinary shares, numbered as therein mentioned, and the 29,933 general founders' shares, numbered as therein mentioned, be paid off (the capital represented thereby being in excess of the wants of the company), and that such last-mentioned ordinary and general founders' shares respectively and all liability thereon be wholly extinguished.

The company had carried on business in the United States, and a portion of its investments were in that country. These investments had been made on the advice of a committee of the board by the directors resident in America. Differences arose between the board of directors in England and the American committee as to the management of the business of the corporation, which rendered it impossible to carry on such business both in England and the United States with advantage. It was accordingly determined that the best course to be adopted was that the company should cease to carry on business in the United States, and it was arranged that the American investments should be made over to the American shareholders, subject to the payment of £11,000 to the corporation, and that the shares held by the American shareholders should be cancelled, thus reducing pro tanto the capital of the company. This arrangement was approved by the shareholders at two extraordinary general meetings. All the creditors of the company were either paid or assented to the arrangement. The interests of the shareholders alone had therefore to be considered. On the hearing of the petition, confirmation by the Court was opposed by one of their number. North J., dismissed the petition with costs, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of appeal (Lindley, Bowen, and A. L. Smith L.JJ.) (1).

LORD MACNAGHTEN: * * *

Under the Companies Act 1862 it was not competent for a company limited by shares to reduce its capital. Such an operation would have been in contravention of one or more of the statutory conditions of the memorandum which the Act as it then stood made unalterable. The difficulty, however, was removed shortly afterwards by legislation. The Companies Act 1867 declares that any company limited by shares may by special resolution so far modify the conditions contained in its memorandum, if authorized so to do by its regulations as originally framed or as altered by special resolution, as to reduce its capital. The power is general. The exercise of the power is fenced round by safeguards which are calculated to protect the interests of creditors, the interests of shareholders, and the interests of the public. Creditors are protected by express provisions. Their consent must be procured or their claims must be satisfied. The public, the shareholders, and every class of shareholders individually and collectively, are protected by the necessary publicity of the proceedings and by the discretion which is entrusted to the Court. Until confirmed by the Court the proposed reduction is not to take effect, though all the creditors have been satisfied. When it is confirmed the memorandum is to be altered in the prescribed manner, and the company as it were makes a new departure. With these safeguards, which certainly are not inconsiderable, the Act apparently leaves the company to determine the extent, the mode, and the incidence of the reduction, and the application or disposition of any capital moneys which the proposed reduction may set free. * * *

Turning to the facts of the case under appeal, your Lordships have before you an English company limited by shares, and formed for the purpose of engaging in financial undertakings of every sort and description in every part of the globe. Its main purpose, however, was to make investments in English and American securities; and its operations so far have been confined to that field. The English business is under the control of the board of directors in London. The American business has been managed by some of the directors who are resident in America acting as a committee, under the supervisions of the London board. For some time past there has been friction between the London board and the American committee. The board were cautious and old-fashioned. The committee advocated a bolder policy, and demanded a freer hand. Matters were approaching a deadlock; at last, after much negotiation, both sides arrived at the conclusion that a separation of interests was desirable. It was seen that, in the state of the market, winding-up would be disastrous to all concerned; so it was proposed that the American shareholders, who were content to follow the American committee, should take over the American assets, and sever their connection with the company, and that the English shareholders should take the English assets, receiving an agreed sum by way of adjustment. The proposed arrangement has been approved by special resolution at general meetings, in which the American shareholders apparently took no part. The application to the Court was for an order confirming a reduction of capital to meet the arrangement. It is for the company and for the company alone, to judge of the prudence of the course proposed. The objects of the company are wide enough to employ or exhaust the wealth of Lombard Street or the City of London. But, again, it is for the company to determine, subject, of course, to the statutory provisions for the protection of creditors, whether its capital under the circumstances, and in view of the policy approved by the shareholders, is or is not in excess of its present wants. It is not suggested by the one shareholder who stands alone in opposing the application that the majority are acting oppressively, or that the arrangement is unfair or inequitable in the ordinary sense of those words. His real objection rather seems to be that he prefers the American system of doing business, and that he has more confidence in the American committee than in the London board. * * *

Undoubtedly, as Lindley, L.J., observes, "the cases upon reduction of capital are not in a satisfactory state." There are authorities in which it seems to be laid down that a proposed reduction of capital cannot be confirmed if it involves a purchase by the company of its own shares, and for that reason alone. That of itself, however, cannot be a sufficient objection. The shares are not to be purchased out of the company's capital, but out of moneys withdrawn from the capital and set free by the reduction. A company cannot employ any part of the capital with which it is registered, so long as it forms part of its capital, in the purchase of its own shares. But if it proposes to reduce its capital in accordance with the statutory provisions which empower it to do so, there is no reason why it should not employ the fund set free by the reduction in the purchase of shares which it is intended to extinguish. Nothing can be more contrary to the principle of the Companies Acts than the return of capital by a company limited by shares. But if capital money is set free by reduction of capital, no one ever suggested that it could not be returned to the shareholders, and indeed the Act of 1877 declares that such an operation is included in the power conferred by the Act of 1867. The fact that a thing is prohibited if it is done in the wrong way, and at a time when the circumstances of the case do not justify it, is no reason for holding the thing prohibited if it is to be done in the right way and when it is justified by circumstances.

Mr. Romer, who argued the case very well, did not press this point as constituting in itself a sufficient answer to the application. The reduction he said was not objectionable simply because it involved a purchase by the company of its own shares, but because a purchase by a company limited by shares of some of its own shares must involve dealing with shareholders, members of one and the same class, in different ways. You cannot, he said, reduce or extinguish all the others of the same class. That was the objection which in the opinion of the Court of Appeal would have been fatal to the application of the Denver Hotel Company if the Court had regarded the transaction as really a purchase of shares. The words of sect. 3 of the Act of 1877 "cannot in our opinion," said Lindley, L.J., "be construed so as to enable a company to prefer one shareholder to another of the same class as himself by buying up his shares." With all deference I venture to think that mode of stating the proposition is really begging the question. It assumes that the person whose shares are to be purchased is getting a preference—an undue advantage for himself at the expense of his fellow shareholders. But why should that assumption be made? The person whose shares are bought gets money or money's worth. The person on whose behalf the company buys have their own shares improved by the value of the shares extinguished. If the parties to the transaction come to the conclusion that the bargain is a fair one, why should the Court say that there is a preference on the one side or on the other? If there is nothing unfair or inequitable in the transaction, I cannot see that there is any objection to allowing a company limited by shares to extinguish some of its shares without dealing in the same manner with all other shares of the same class. There may be no real inequality in the treatment of a class of shareholders although they are not all paid in the same coin or in coin of the same denomination. * * *

In the result, therefore, I am of opinion that the objection on the part of the respondent is not well founded. I think the proposed reduction is within the powers conferred by the Act of 1867. "There is nothing in the Act," as North, J., has observed in the case of The Barrow Haematite Steel Company (4), "which requires that the reduction should be spread either equally or rateably over all the shares in the company." There is nothing, in my opinion, unfair or inequitable in the arrangement involved in the proposed reduction, and I see no reason why it should not be confirmed. * * *

Order appealed from reversed, and the special resolution confirmed; the appellant company to be allowed hereafter to discontinue the use of the word "Reduced;" Cause remitted to the Chancery Division.

PAGE v. AMERICAN & BRITISH MANUFACTURING CO.

129 App.Div. 346, 113 N.Y.S. 734.

Appeal by plaintiff, Ostinelli F. Page, from a judgment of the Supreme Court in favor of defendant, American & British Mfg. Co., after a trial at New York Special Term, sustaining defendant's demurrer to the complaint.

LAUGHLIN, J. The demurrer was interposed by the manufacturing company, defendant, and is upon the ground that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The point presented for decision is whether a domestic business corporation organized with preferred and common stock, each class of stock having the same voting power, may reduce one class of stock against the will of a holder of some of that class of stock, and thereby reduce his voting power and voice in the management of the affairs of the corporation. The defendant manufacturing company was organized on the 23d day of May, 1902, under the business corporation law, with a capital of $10,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. Eighty thousand of these shares were common, and 20,000 preferred, stock. The rights of the holders of preferred and common stock were the same, with the exception that the former were given a prescribed preference in the payment of dividends and in the distribution of the assets. The entire amount of the capital stock was duly issued and is outstanding. The company since its incorporation has been engaged in the business for which it was organized. On the 24th day of January, 1908, one Charles R. Flint assigned 10 certificates for 100 shares each of the common stock of the company, which were duly issued to him on the 15th day of January, 1903, to the plaintiff who thereupon became entitled to surrender such shares and have other shares issued in his name in order that he might be a stockholder of record. The company and the other defendant, its stock transfer agent, declined to accept a surrender of the shares or to issue new certificates to the plaintiff on due tender and demand therefor. This refusal was evidently made upon the ground that the common stock had been reduced, for it is alleged that at a meeting of the stockholders, the validity of which is questioned and it is unnecessary to decide, held on the 12th day of April, 1907, by a majority vote the capital stock was reduced from $10,000,000 to $2,000,000 consisting of 20,000 shares of common of the par value of $1,000,000 and 20,000 shares of preferred of the par value of $1,000,000. The stock, which was assigned to the plaintiff was not voted on at the meeting but 330 shares of preferred stock and 843 shares of common stock were voted on in opposition to the resolution. The effect of the action taken is to give the holders of the preferred stock, who only contributed one-fifth of the capital, an equal vote and voice in the management of the corporation with the holders of the common stock who contributed four-fifths of the capital, and it reduced the voting power and authority of the stock owned by the plaintiff four-fifths without any reduction in the voting power or authority of the preferred stock. We are of opinion that this action was clearly illegal, both on principle and under the recent decision in Stokes v. Continental Trust Company, 186 N.Y. 285, 78 N.E. 1090, 12 L.R.A.,N.S., 969.

The capital stock of a corporation may be increased or reduced as authorized by statute; but, in the absence of express statutory provision, the right of the individual stockholder to the proportionate voice in the conduct of the affairs of the corporation and equitable interest in its property which his stock gives him when he becomes a stockholder must be preserved. The interest of the plaintiff in the property, if dissolution were to take place now, might not be affected by the action taken because on dissolution the preferred stock was first to be paid in full; but the right of a stockholder to a voice in the management of a corporation in which he has invested money is a property right and vested interest entitled to protection under the Constitution. Kinnan v. Sullivan County Club, 26 App.Div. 213, 50 N.Y.S. 95; Lord v. Equitable Life, 47 Misc. 187, 94 N.Y.S. 65, affirmed 109 App.Div. 252, 96 N.Y.S. 10; Smith v. A., T. & S. F. R. R. Co., C. C., 64 F. 272; People v. Hawkins, 157 N.Y. 1, 51 N.E. 257, 42 L.R.A. 490, 68 Am.St.Rep. 736. Of course, it would be competent for the Legislature to provide that, as to corporations to be organized in the future, either the common or the preferred stock might be separately reduced, and no vested right of a stockholder becoming such in the light of a statutory provision to that effect would be impaired by such reduction. Section 44 of the stock corporation law[3] (Laws 1890, p. 1074, c. 564), however, which is the authority for increasing or reducing the capital stock, prescribes only in general terms for such reduction or increase, and that authority must be exercised in such manner that the rights of stockholders will be preserved. If the stock be increased, it was held in the Stokes Case that each stockholder must be afforded an opportunity to purchase the same proportionate interest therein as he held prior thereto. It must follow that, if the stock be reduced, a reduction must be upon lines which will leave each stockholder the same proportionate interest and right in the corporation as he had before the reduction. If, therefore, the capital stock be divided into preferred and common stock, there must be a reduction of both in the proportion that the issue of each bears to the other. It may be that there can be no reduction of preferred stock. If so, there can be no reduction as to common stock without unanimous consent, and in such case the general authority to reduce capital stock should be held not to be applicable.

Of course, as already observed, it would have been competent for the Legislature to have prescribed otherwise; but mere general authority for an increase or reduction of capital stock is not sufficient. The plaintiff succeeded to the rights of Flint. He brings the action to compel the corporation and its transfer agent to accept a surrender of his stock and to issue to him new stock which will enable him to enjoy all of the rights and privileges of a stockholder of record. It follows that the judgment should be reversed with costs and the demurrer overruled, with costs, with leave to the demurrant to plead over on payment of costs of the appeal and of the demurrer. All concur.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1943. 291 N.Y. 227, 52 N.E.2d 108.

Submission of a controversy pursuant to sections 546–548 of the Civil Practice Act by Jay Ronald Company, Inc., suing on behalf of itself and all other stockholders of the Marshall Mortgage Corporation similarly situated, against Marshall Mortgage Corporation and others for distribution of capital surplus. From an adverse judgment, 265 App.Div. 622, 40 N.Y.S.2d 391, defendant Marshall Mortgage Corporation appeals, and plaintiff Jay Ronald Company, Inc., files a cross-appeal.

Reversed and judgment directed for defendant; cross-appeal dismissed.

LOUGHRAN, JUDGE. This controversy was submitted to the Appellate Division upon agreed facts pursuant to Civil Practice Act, sections 546–548.

The defendants are a domestic corporation and its officers and directors. The corporate defendant was organized in 1926 with a stated capital of $300,000 represented by 100,000 common shares of no par value. Since April, 1938, a varying number of these shares have been in the ownership of the plaintiff.

At a meeting of the stockholders held on January 22, 1940, the stated capital of the corporate defendant was reduced from $300,000 to $100,000 and the resulting capital surplus of $200,000 was transferred to a surplus account "for all purposes for which a surplus may be used." When this corporate action was taken the assets of the corporate defendant were of an actual value in excess of $300,000 over and above its liabilities, exclusive of its liability on its capital stock. A certificate of such capital reduction was filed with the Secretary of State on January 31, 1940. These corporate proceedings were taken without participation by the plaintiff as a stockholder of the corporate defendant.

The Appellate Division has granted to the plaintiff a judgment which reads in part as follows: "The capital surplus of $200,000 created by the reduction in capital of the defendant corporation may not be retained by the defendant corporation as a corporate surplus, or for any other purpose, but said capital surplus shall be distributed in cash, without interest, among the persons who were stockholders of record * * * at the close of business on January 31, 1940, pro rata according to their then respective shares." As appellant here, the corporate defendant centers its attack upon this direction of the plaintiff's judgment.

Plaintiff maintains and the Appellate Division has held that a true surplus resulting from a reduction of corporate capital is at once owed by the corporation as a debt to its stockholders in accordance with their respective interests. So it was laid down in Seeley v. New York National Exchange Bank, 8 Daly 400, affirmed on opinion below 78 N.Y. 608. The reasons for that decision were precisely given. It was said by the court of first instance: "The abandonment by a corporation of all its corporate rights gives the stockholders a right to the distribution of all the net assets. Why should not an abandonment of a portion of those rights give the stockholders a right of distribution pro tanto? * * * That [surplus] money was paid as capital, and if it be no longer needed for that purpose, and if it be not required for the payment of debts, it has accomplished the end for which it was subscribed, and it ought to be returned to the shareholders. * * * If the retired capital be a liability of the corporation in favor of the shareholders who give up the stock that is called in, the payment of that debt cannot lie in any man's discretion." (8 Daly at page 403.)

The Seeley case was not decided under any New York statute. Our State courts there dealt with Federal legislation permitting national banks to reduce capital. No provision for disposition of surplus had been made therein. We first inquire, then, whether the reasoning of the Seeley case is compatible with the applicable New York statutes regulating reduction of the capital of stock corporations.

The decision of the Seeley case was made by this court in 1879. The first New York statute that made provision for the disposition of surplus resulting from reduction of corporate capital was chapter 306 of the Laws of 1882. The provision then made was that "the amount of capital left in the possession of the company over and above the amount to which the capital shall be so reduced shall be returned to the stockholders pro rata at such times and in such manner as the trustees or directors shall determine." We think this express allowance to directors of discretion to fix the time and manner of the return of such a surplus can hardly be reconciled with the rigid ideas on which the decision of the Seeley case was made to turn.

The statute so enacted in 1882 remained substantially unchanged until 1901. The text of chapter 354 of the Laws of that year was in part as follows: "Any domestic corporation may increase or reduce its capital stock in the manner herein provided * * *." (§ 44.) "Every such increase or reduction must be authorized either by the unanimous consent of the stockholders, expressed in writing and filed in the office of the secretary of state and in the office of the clerk of the county in which the principal business office of the corporation is located, or by a vote of the stockholders owning at least a majority of the stock of the corporation, taken at a meeting of the stockholders specially called for that purpose in the manner provided by law or by the by-laws." (§ 45.) "If the capital stock is reduced, the amount of capital over and above the amount of the reduced capital shall, if the meeting or consents so determine or provide, be returned to the stockholders pro rata, at such times and in such manner as the directors shall determine." (§ 46. The emphasis is ours.) This unqualified license to the stockholders to say whether or no there should be any distribution of such a surplus seems to us to have been a pretty complete negation of the rule of the Seeley case.

So the law stood until 1923. All provisions respecting disposition of surplus resulting from reduction of corporate capital were left out of the Stock Corporation Law, Consol.Laws, c. 59, § 1 et seq., as it was then recast by chapter 787 of the Laws of that year, with the result that the stockholders were no longer authorized to say whether such a surplus should be returned. But this omission, as we see it, affords no reason for saying that a distribution of every such surplus thereupon became compulsory upon the directors of the corporation. So belated a reversal of policy would scarcely have been conceivable in the face of the new comprehension of corporate structure that in 1912 had led to the introduction of no par shares. See Vaughan v. State of New York, 272 N.Y. 102, 5 N.E.2d 53, 108 A.L.R. 950.

At this point it is in order to answer the claim of an absence prior to 1929 of any statutory provision respecting disposition of retired capital of no par corporations. Section 23 of chapter 351 of the Laws of 1912 said that for the purpose of any statutory provision relating to the amount of the capital stock of a corporation or the amount or par value of its shares, the aggregate amount of the capital stock of a no par corporation was in general to be deemed to be the aggregate amount of its capital. Thus, as we think, any general statutory provision regulating reductions of par stock was made applicable to reductions of no par stock,—for there was no reason at all why reductions of no par stock should result differently from reductions of par stock.

Section 8 of chapter 441 of the Laws of 1924 re-established the capacity of the stockholders having par value shares to say "that the excess over the amount to which the capital stock is reduced shall be returned in whole or in part to the stockholders pro rata, at such times and in such manner as the directors shall determine". (The accentuated words were new.) In the main, this enactment restored the law to what it had been from 1901 to 1923; then by section 4 of chapter 652 of the Laws of 1929, the stockholders of no par value corporations were explicitly licensed to compel a return on a reduction of capital.

The present proceedings to reduce the capital of this defendant corporation were taken under section 36(15) of the Stock Corporation Law, Consol.Laws, c. 59, as amended by chapter 334 of the Laws of 1939. It was thereby enacted that "the certificate [of the stockholders] shall provide that the surplus, if any, resulting from such reduction shall be available for any one or more of the following purposes: (a) to be used for any purpose for which surplus may be used; or (b) to be reserved and used for specified purposes; or (c) to be returned to the stockholders, according to their respective rights, at the times and in the manner specified."

We have now canvassed the statutory provisions which seem to us to control the present controversy. Our conclusion is that from the year 1901 to the present time no distribution of a surplus created by reduction of capital of a stock corporation has been required by the law of New York except when pursuant to statute the stockholders so decreed. In that view, the 1939 statute last above indicated was in essence a declaration of what had been the law from a time long antecedently to the organization of the corporate defendant in 1926. It follows that the 1939 statute was here applicable and sanctioned the disposition of the surplus in question as made by the stockholders of the corporate defendant.

There are expressions in Strong v. Brooklyn Crosstown R. Co., 93 N.Y. 426 and in Roberts v. Roberts-Wicks Co., 184 N.Y. 257, 77 N.E. 13, 3 L.R.A.,N.S., 1034, friendly to the Seeley case, supra. But the question now decided was not presented in the Strong case or in the Roberts case and we have felt free to dispose of it as an open matter.

The judgment so far as appealed from by the corporate defendant, should be reversed, and judgment directed for that defendant as prayed for in the submission, without costs. The cross-appeal of the plaintiff from denial of its demand for interest and counsel fees and for directions as to distribution of the surplus in question is now futile and should be dismissed, without costs.

Judgment accordingly.

"If a corporation finds its capital either impaired or excessive, it may well be for the best interests of all shareholders to reduce the amount of outstanding stock. * * * This may be analyzed as being a matter of accounting adjustment which enables the corporation thereafter to show a surplus rather than a deficit in the balance sheet. The real, proportionate interest of each shareholder in the assets of the corporation is not affected thereby; nor will there be an appreciable effect on the market price through the reduction in par value. Again, where a corporation finds under changed conditions, that its working capital is too large for its present scope of operation, resort profitably may be made * * * to reduce the authorized or outstanding capital stock. If all stockholders are affected, the result is a partial return of the original investment to each one; if not, it amounts to a complete or a partial return of the investment with a lessened interest in the remaining assets on the part of those who are paid." Where a corporation, under a plan of recapitalization, issues new prior preferred stock and reduces its capital, the reduction has been held to be such a material alteration of preferential rights as to entitle a dissenting preferred stockholder to appraisal of his shares. "The reduction in capital constitutes a material alteration of the preferential rights of the old preferred for it has reduced materially and finally the amount of stated capital which theretofore had safeguarded the preferential rights of the old preferred stock." New York Stock Corporation Law, § 58: "* * * nor shall any (stock) corporation * * * make any distribution of assets to any of its stockholders * * * upon a reduction * * * of its capital, unless the value of its assets remaining after * * * such distribution of assets, * * * shall be at least equal to the aggregate amount of its debts and liabilities, including capital. * * *"

Where capital stock is impaired and a reduction is made to meet that impairment, there must not be a distribution to stockholders. But where this is not the case, the surplus realized from a reduction of capital belongs to the stockholders of record at the time of the reduction. Jerome v. Cogswell, 204 U.S. 1, 27 S.Ct. 241, 51 L.Ed. 343, 1906.

"The surplus, if any, which a corporation reducing the amount of its capital * * * is at liberty to pay to its stockholders, must, in every case, be ascertained, and depends upon the result of an examination into its affairs, and not upon the difference between the original amount of capital and the reduced amount, and whenever, by sales of property, or by means of earnings, or otherwise, the corporation comes in possession of funds which are in excess of the reduced amount as fixed capital, it can distribute that excess without violating any law." Strong v. The Brooklyn Cross-Town Railroad Company, 93 N.Y. 426, 435, 1883. See, also, Note, Reduction of Capital Stock and Distribution of Capital Assets upon Reduction, 1926, 44 A.L.R. 11.

Where a dividend declaration impairs capital, a subsequent capital stock reduction which sets up a surplus over and above all indebtedness, will save the directors from liability. Greene v. Boardman, 143 Misc. 201, 256 N.Y.S. 340, 1932, aff'd without opinion, 240 App.Div. 745, 265 N.Y.S. 965, 1st Dep't., 1933.

PART III

PUBLIC ISSUE OF STOCK

A. PURPOSE AND SCOPE OF THE SECURITIES ACT OF 1933

NOTE

The Securities Act of 1933 was passed to correct some of the abuses that had arisen in the distribution of securities. * * * All persons seeking to use the mails or means of interstate commerce for the disposition of securities must file a registration statement with the Commission. A prospectus based on the registration statement must be given to the investor prior to any offer of sale. The Act authorizes the Commission to adopt rules and regulations governing registration statements and prospectuses for various classes of securities and issuers. These rules and regulations prescribe the form or forms in which the required information shall be set forth, and methods to be followed in the preparation of financial statements and reports or valuations by experts. The information required to be furnished in these documents is guided by Schedule A of the Act, which sets forth the type of disclosure envisaged by Congress. MacChesney and O'Brien, Full Disclosure Under the Securities Act, 1937, 4 Law & Contemp. Problems 133.

The Securities Act * * * affects only new offerings of securities sold through the use of the mails or of instrumentalities of interstate or foreign transportation or communication. It does not affect the ordinary redistribution of securities unless such redistribution takes on the characteristics of a new offering by reason of the control of the issuer possessed by those responsible for the offering. It carefully exempts from its application certain types of securities and securities transactions where there is no practical need for its application or where the public benefits are too remote. Report of Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.[1]

FRAUDULENT INTERSTATE TRANSACTIONS

Sec. 17. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person in the sale of any securities by the use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or by the use of the mails, directly or indirectly—

(1) to employ any device, scheme, or artifice to defraud, or

(2) to obtain money or property by means of any untrue statement of a material fact or any omission to state a material fact necessary in order to make the statements made, in the light of the circumstances under which they were made, not misleading, or

(3) to engage in any transaction, practice, or course of business which operates or would operate as a fraud or deceit upon the purchaser.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person, by the use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or by the use of the mails, to publish, give publicity to, or circulate any notice, circular, advertisement, newspaper, article, letter, investment service, or communication which, though not purporting to offer a security for sale, describes such security for a consideration received or to be received, directly or indirectly, from an issuer, underwriter, or dealer, without fully disclosing the receipt, whether past or prospective, of such consideration and the amount thereof.

(c) The exemptions provided in section 3 shall not apply to the provisions of this section. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77q.

NOTE

Section 17(a) of the Securities Act of 1933 makes unlawful the use of any misrepresentations or fraudulent schemes in the sale of securities. A very considerable part of the Commission's litigation involves injunctive actions to restrain violations of this section. For example, in Securities and Exchange Commission v. Timetrust, Inc., 39 F.Supp. 145 (D.C.N.D.Calif.1941), an injunction was obtained where representations were made that Timetrust certificates were similar to a savings account, whereas the solicitation to purchase such certificates was merely a device for selling Bank of America stock on the instalment plan.[2] In S.E.C. v. Investors Syndicate (D.Minn.1943), an injunction was obtained where representations were made that the certificates sold were better or safer than United States War Bonds, that the purchase of such certificates was a patriotic duty and aided the war effort, that the yield was higher than War Bonds, and that the certificates were guaranteed by the United States or the Securities and Exchange Commission. (Tenth Annual Report of the Securities and Exchange Commission: A Ten Year Survey, 1934–1944, p. 8.)

CIVIL LIABILITIES ARISING IN CONNECTION WITH PROSPECTUSES AND COMMUNICATIONS

Sec. 12. Any person who—

(1) sells a security in violation of section 5, or

(2) sells a security (whether or not exempted by the provisions of section 3, other than paragraph (2) of subsection (a) thereof), by the use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or of the mails, by means of a prospectus or oral communication, which includes an untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state a material fact necessary in order to make the statements in the light of the circumstances under which they were made, not misleading (the purchaser not knowing of such untruth or omission), and who shall not sustain the burden of proof that he did not know, and in the exercise of reasonable care could not have known, of such untruth or omission shall be liable to the person purchasing such security from him, who may sue either at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction, to recover the consideration paid for such security with interest thereon, less the amount of any income received thereon, upon the tender of such security, or for damages if he no longer owns the security. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77e.

PROHIBITIONS RELATING TO INTERSTATE COMMERCE AND THE MAILS

Sec. 5. (a) Unless a registration statement is in effect as to a security, it shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly—

[2] On appeal, the Ninth Circuit Court on July 31, 1942, remanded the case to the trial court for specific findings of fact as to whether or not the defendants devised a fraudulent scheme within the prohibitions of the statute. On October 24, 1942, the trial court returned its additional findings of fact in which it found that all of the defendants employed Timetrust as a device, scheme and artifice to defraud. The Circuit Court on May 8, 1944, affirmed the judgment as to Timetrust, Inc., Parker, Wood and Blanchett, and reversed the judgment as to Bank of America, A. P. Giannini and L. Mario Giannini.

(1) to make use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or of the mails to sell or offer to buy such security through the use or medium of any prospectus or otherwise; or

(2) to carry or cause to be carried through the mails or in interstate commerce, by any means or instruments of transportation, any such security for the purpose of sale or for delivery after sale.

(b) It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly—

(1) to make use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or of the mails to carry or transmit any prospectus relating to any security registered under this title, unless such prospectus meets the requirements of section 10; or

(2) to carry or to cause to be carried through the mails or in interstate commerce any such security for the purpose of sale or for delivery after sale, unless accompanied or preceded by a prospectus that meets the requirements of section 10. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77c.

2. WHAT CONSTITUTES A SECURITY

DEFINITIONS

Sec. 2. When used in this title, unless the context otherwise requires—

(1) The term "security" means any note, stock, treasury stock, bond, debenture, evidence of indebtedness, certificate of interest or participation in any profit-sharing agreement, collateral-trust certificate, preorganization certificate or subscription, transferable share, investment contract, voting-trust certificate, certificate of deposit for a security, fractional undivided interest in oil, gas, or other mineral rights, or, in general, any interest or instrument commonly known as a "security," or any certificate of interest or participation in, temporary or interim certificate for, receipt for, guarantee of, or warrant or right to subscribe to or purchase, any of the foregoing. * * * Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77b.

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION v. CRUDE OIL CORPORATION OF AMERICA et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Seventh Circuit, 1937.
93 F.2d 844.

The plaintiff brought this suit to enjoin the defendants from selling securities in violation of section 5 of the Securities Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77e. The defendants denied: violations of the Securities Act; their engagements in interstate commerce; the constitutionality of the applicable sections of the Securities Act. They assailed the constitutionality of the act; denied that a "security" is an article of commerce that may be the subject of regulation by Congress; and challenged the court's finding that they made false and fraudulent representations with intent to deceive in the sale of their contracts.

At the close of the trial on the merits the court made findings and conclusions the essence of which is here briefly stated:

The Crude Oil Corporation of America is a Delaware corporation known as the "Corporation"; principal place of business is Tulsa, Oklahoma. B. E. Buckman & Company is a Wisconsin corporation; home office is at Madison. Wells-Kendall Company is a Delaware corporation with its principal place at Madison. The business of the Corporation is transacted as follows:

It purchases oil royalties commonly called "farmers' oil" of an estimated oil content of one and one-half times as great as the aggregate number of barrels called for in the delivery contracts here involved. It pays for the royalties at the rate of 25 cents a barrel of the estimated content. The farmer or owner who leases his property to a producer to market the oil removed therefrom ordinarily receives one-eighth of the proceeds of the oil produced on his property. It is a part of this one-eighth interest that the corporation purchases in the form of a royalty. These royalties are transferred to one W. C. Franklin as trustee under a trust agreement. Franklin is a director and treasurer of the corporation, also its attorney. The corporation then, through its salesmen in Wisconsin and other states, enters into delivery contracts with residents of said states. The purchaser signs an application in the following form:

"I hereby make application to purchase ——— barrels of crude oil of ——— gravity at $——— per barrel, to be deliverable in accordance with the terms and conditions set forth in your ———.

"Draft for $——— is handed you herewith, representing payment in full."

He receives a so-called bill of sale, material parts of which are:

"Crude Oil Corporation of America
"Tulsa, Oklahoma

"Bill of Sale and Delivery Contract for ——— Barrels of Crude Oil

"Crude Oil Corporation of America, the seller, has sold to and agrees to deliver, and ——— of ——— has purchased at the price of $——— per barrel, ——— barrels of crude oil of ——— Baume gravity, payment for which is hereby acknowledged by the seller.

At the time of signing the application purchaser pays to the Corporation salesman the sum of 50 cents (now 57 cents) for each barrel of oil specified in the application. The salesman mails the check or draft received as payment and copies of the application to the Corporation at Tulsa, Oklahoma. The Corporation mails, either to its salesmen or to the purchasers, delivery contracts in the form mentioned, together with a so-called Trust Certificate. Approximately 275 of these contracts, covering nearly 1,000,000 barrels of oil, have been entered into between the Corporation and the buyers. The average number of barrels of oil mentioned in each contract is 3000, although some of the contracts specify amounts less than 500 barrels.

Franklin, the trustee, receives from those operating the pipe lines, out of the proceeds of oil runs to the pipe lines, the royalty interests the Corporation owns, and he deposits these remittances in a special account. Checks for sums indicating that the delivery contracts are being fulfilled at a rate of approximately 4% of the whole each year are drawn against this account each month in favor of the purchasers and sent through the mails from Tulsa, Oklahoma, to the purchasers.

The Corporation may fulfill the contract over a period of twenty-five years, and has that length of time to perform its contract with the buyer. The contracts are not made with persons who contemplate taking actual delivery of the oil in the Texas field, rather than the proceeds derived from the sale of the oil. The contracts make such procedure impracticable and highly unprofitable to the buyer. The Corporation has been operating since 1934. It has made contracts with over 275 buyers specifying approximately 1,000,000 barrels of oil, and to date no buyer has asked for delivery of oil at the place of production.

On August 15, 1935, the Corporation entered into an agreement with the Wells-Kendall Company whereby the Wells-Kendall Company arranged for the employment of B. E. Buckman & Company to act as the agent for the Corporation in the procuring of the said delivery contracts. B. E. Buckman & Company was accordingly employed by the Corporation as its salesman in this territory and procured for it approximately 250 delivery contracts specifying, on an average, 3000 barrels of oil in each contract. For this service it received a commission of 7½ cents for each barrel of oil specified in the contracts. The Wells-Kendall Company received for its service rendered to the Corporation as aforesaid, 2½ cents for each barrel of oil specified in the said contracts obtained by B. E. Buckman & Company.

The defendant Corporation since 1935 has made use of the United States Mail and of instruments of transportation and communication in interstate commerce in the making and execution of said contracts.

It has used the mails to transport and deliver the said applications, the bill of sale and delivery contracts, trust agreements, trust certificates, checks and vouchers, prospectuses and advertising literature. The prospectuses are attached to the Bill of Complaint. One of the prospectuses carried a reproduction of a letter apparently received by the Corporation from a satisfied customer. It failed to state that this letter was written by a person who had also acted as its sales agent in procuring the bill of sale and delivery contracts.

The Corporation does not buy and sell crude oil in large and small quantities. It has but one marketing method, namely, that of buying oil royalties and the making of the delivery contracts. The purchaser under the delivery contract does not and cannot determine the amount of oil to be sold each month under his agreement with the Corporation.

The defendants, Crude Oil Corporation of America and B. E. Buckman & Company, have and are using the mails and instruments in interstate commerce in the making and execution of the said contracts.

No registration statement has been filed with the Securities & Exchange Commission.

The royalties conveyed to Franklin as trustee, subsequent to the execution of the delivery contracts, have been paid for out of the proceeds the Corporation has received from the purchasers of the delivery contracts. The operating expenses of the Corporation, including the commission paid its salesmen, are also paid out of these receipts.

A decree was entered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendants have prosecuted this appeal.

EVANS, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts as above). While numerous legal propositions are raised and argued in the briefs, there are only two vital and determinative questions before us. (a) Is the instrument denominated a "bill of sale and delivery contract" a "security" or "investment contract," as these terms are used in the Securities Act, or did defendants' contract evidence the sale of a commodity? (b) Is section 5(a) of the Securities Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77e(a), a valid exercise of legislative power as applied to defendants' transactions with their customers?

(a) Was the bill of sale and delivery contract a "security" or an "investment contract" as these terms are used in the Securities Act?

Section 77b(1), Title 15 U.S.C.A. reads as follows:

"The term 'security' means any note, stock, treasury stock, bond, debenture, evidence of indebtedness, certificate of interest or participation in any profit-sharing agreement, collateral-trust certificate, pre-organization certificate or subscription, transferable share, investment contract, voting-trust certificate, certificate of deposit for a security, fractional undivided interest in oil, gas, or other mineral rights, or, in general, any interest or instrument commonly known as a 'security,' or any certificate of interest or participation in, temporary or interim certificate for, receipt for, guarantee of, or warrant or right to subscribe to or purchase, any of the foregoing."

In view of its purpose we can not construe this section narrowly.[3] The Congress evidently intended to include all interstate transactions which were the legitimate subject of its regulation of sale of securities. Such has been the uniform holding of courts that have construed the act.

The legislation in question followed the enactment of what has generally been called the Blue Sky Laws of the various states, and the ingenuity and fertility of resources of those dealers in securities who deliberately attempted to avoid their application supplied the background of experience against which this legislation was written.

While there are many decisions which involve somewhat kindred transactions and define the contracts as "securities," there is one, other than that of the court below, which dealt with a contract almost similar to the one under consideration. In Securities and Exchange Commission v. Aldrich Blake, Inc., et al., decided by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, May 19, 1936, such a contract was held to be a "security." Similar holdings on quite similar contracts wherein avoidance of the state Blue Sky Laws was sought, appear in State v. Ogden, 154 Minn. 425, 191 N.W. 916; People v. McCalla, 63 Cal.App. 783, 220 P. 436.

Contracts of widely varying content which have been held under the state Blue Sky Laws to be "securities" are:

Sale of royalty interests in proceeds of oil wells—O'Connell v. Union Drilling & Petroleum Co., 121 Cal.App. 302, 8 P.2d 867.

If we look to the acts of the parties which accompanied and followed the execution of these contracts and ascertain the true intention of the contracting parties therefrom, strong confirmation of the conclusion which the District Court reached, appears.

Called a "Bill of sale and delivery contract" it recited in the first paragraph a sale of a designated number of barrels of oil, and there is found therein the express provision, "it is intended that actual delivery of such oil is to be made."

If this paragraph were the only provision of the agreement, it would clearly be a bill of sale and evidence the sale of a commodity. It was not, however, all of the contract. The statement "It is intended that actual delivery of such oil is to be made" was false. Far more significant and controlling than the recital is the fact that there was never a single barrel of oil delivered.

As a deed absolute on its face may nevertheless be a mortgage which secures a loan, so here, the denominated bill of sale was by its own terms a contract which was something quite different from a bill of sale. The provisions which appeared in subparagraphs (1) and (2) negative and in fact nullify that provision of the agreement requiring delivery of the oil, which provision appeared in a preceding paragraph. In effect we have a contract where the parties expressly and specifically agree that they are buying and selling oil and that the oil sold is to be delivered by the seller and received by the buyer, followed by provisions in the same agreement which in effect say that the said foregoing agreement shall be ineffectual and the seller is not to deliver the oil to the buyer, but is to sell the same. The buyer is not to receive the oil, but is to accept the proceeds of the sales, which proceeds are to be paid monthly and distributed over a maximum period of twenty-five years. Not only do we find provisions to this effect, but the uniform action of the parties bespeaks their intentions.

The speculative feature of the transaction, the lure held out by the seller, was to be found in the possible rise in the price of oil during this twenty-five year period. The language of the prospectus makes this perfectly clear:

"The fact that the known world supply of crude is sufficient for only a short span of years, that a tremendous amount of research work has not recently resulted in the finding of any new major pools leads those in position to know, to believe that crude oil will sell in the near future for prices far above to-day's figures.

"Every one desiring a given monthly income should investigate the regular monthly profit possibilities available through the ownership and sale each month of a given number of barrels of crude oil. Should investigate the simplicity of the purchasing and marketing arrangement available through this corporation and the possibilities of exceptional profits to be made as prices for crude oil advance."

By placing the acts and deeds of the parties against their professions of innocence and good faith, we are better able to reach the correct conclusion.

The burdens imposed upon the so-called purchaser by the contracts in question prevented him from acquiring possession of any oil. It is fair to say that actual delivery of the oil was not only not intended, but was impossible. The purchaser was required to give thirty days' notice before the month during which he desired to exercise his so-called right of delivery. He was required to go to the point of production and provide for the storage of oil in the East Texas oil field and to furnish tankage facilities for the unknown quantity of oil he was to receive. The gallon quantity of this oil was determined solely by the corporation, and no notice to the purchaser of the amount he was to receive in any month was required. The purchaser might be required to furnish a five gallon tank or a thousand gallon receptacle. To construe this contract as a contemplated sale of oil requires us to picture a Wisconsin purchaser making the journey to Texas to secure a monthly quota of oil which would be so small (as small as three barrels) that the cost of obtaining it would be grossly disproportionate to any possible profit. Further reasons for the conclusions reached by the District Court and approved by us require no elaboration.

The title of the contract, to-wit, "Bill of Sale and Delivery Contract," was a misnomer and a deceptive one. It was obviously conceived for the purpose of avoiding any regulatory control by state or Federal governments of a "security" speculative in nature. The seller hoped and intended to deceive the said Boards thereby, and this accounts for the false recital in the forepart of the agreement.

Without further discussion we state our conclusion which is that the District Court correctly held the document was a "security" and not a sale of a commodity and fell within the language of the above-quoted section of the Securities Act.

(b) Is section 5(a) of the Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77e(a), as amended, valid when applied to defendants' transactions?

Section 5(a) is as follows:

"Unless a registration statement is in effect as to a security, it shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly—(1) to make use of any means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or of the mails to sell or offer to buy such security through the use or medium of any prospectus or otherwise; or (2) to carry or cause to be carried through the mails or in interstate commerce, by any means or instruments of transportation, any such security for the purpose of sale or for delivery after sale."

The court found and it is not denied that there was no registration with the Securities Commission. * * *

Confining our attention to the narrower and more precise question, namely, the power of Congress to enact section 5 of the 1933 Securities Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77e, we are satisfied it is a valid exercise of the power by Congress.

Reaching this conclusion we adopt the following from Judge Manton's opinion in Electric Bond and Share Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 2 Cir., 92 F.2d 580, 587:

"Nor is the police power within the field of interstate commerce limited to prohibiting the transportation of articles that are themselves harmful. The stolen motor-car involved in the Brooks Case, 267 U.S. 432, 45 S.Ct. 345, 69 L.Ed. 699, 37 A.L.R. 1407, was not in itself different from an automobile lawfully acquired. There was nothing harmful or immoral about prison-made goods, governed by the Hawes-Cooper Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 60, involved in Whitfield v. Ohio, 297 U.S. 431, 56 S.Ct. 532, 80 L.Ed. 778, supra, or in the oil regulated by the Connally Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 715 et seq., Griswold v. President, etc., 82 F.2d 922, C.C.A.5. In each of these statutes, as in the registration provisions of this Act, it was held, Congress conditioned particular uses of the channels of interstate commerce upon certain safeguards to prevent those uses from being made the instruments of causing evil or harm in a state other than the state of origin, even though the articles or communications transported might not be inherently harmful. The use of the channels of interstate commerce, regulated by Congress, has been an essentially business or commercial use. The courts have never regarded the innocence or harmfulness of the mere physical movement of persons, goods, or communications as determinative of the limits of Congressional power, so long as the activities regulated were genuinely honest in character. The Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77a et seq. and § 78a et seq., make it unlawful to use the mails or channels of interstate commerce without complying with regulations prescribed by the Commission in respect of certain transactions in securities. We held this a valid exercise of Congressional power. Jones v. Securities and Exchange Comm., 79 F.2d 617, C.C.A.2, reversed in 298 U.S. 1, 56 S.Ct. 654, 80 L.Ed. 1015, on other grounds; Coplin v. United States, 88 F.2d 652, C.C.A.9; Securities and Exchange Comm. v. Torr, 15 F.Supp. 315, D.C.S.D.N.Y., reversed 87 F.2d 446, C.C.A.2, on other grounds."

The decree is affirmed.[4]

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION v. W. J. HOWEY COMPANY et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1946. 328 U.S. 293, 66 S.Ct. 1100.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

Suit by the Securities and Exchange Commission against W. J. Howey Company and Howey-in-the-Hills Service, Inc., to restrain alleged violations of the Securities Act. To review a judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals, 151 F.2d 714, affirming a judgment of the District Court, 60 F.Supp. 440, for defendants, plaintiff brings certiorari.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case involves the application of § 2(1) of the Securities Act of 1933 to an offering of units of a citrus grove development coupled with a contract for cultivating, marketing and remitting the net proceeds to the investor.

[4] 1940, 28 Calif.L.Rev. 410.

The Securities and Exchange Commission instituted this action to restrain the respondents from using the mails and instrumentalities of interstate commerce in the offer and sale of unregistered and non-exempt securities in violation of § 5(a) of the Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77e (a). The District Court denied the injunction, 60 F.Supp. 440, and the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment, 151 F.2d 714. We granted certiorari, 327 U.S. 773, 66 S.Ct. 821, on a petition alleging that the ruling of the Circuit Court of Appeals conflicted with other federal and state decisions and that it introduced a novel and unwarranted test under the statute which the Commission regarded as administratively impractical.

Most of the facts are stipulated. The respondents, W. J. Howey Company and Howey-in-the-Hills Service, Inc., are Florida corporations under direct common control and management. The Howey Company owns large tracts of citrus acreage in Lake County, Florida. During the past several years it has planted about 500 acres annually, keeping half of the groves itself and offering the other half to the public "to help us finance additional development." Howey-in-the-Hills Service, Inc., is a service company engaged in cultivating and developing many of these groves, including the harvesting and marketing of the crops.

Each prospective customer is offered both a land sales contract and a service contract, after having been told that it is not feasible to invest in a grove unless service arrangements are made. While the purchaser is free to make arrangements with other service companies, the superiority of Howey-in-the-Hills Service, Inc., is stressed. Indeed, 85% of the acreage sold during the 3-year period ending May 31, 1943, was covered by service contracts with Howey-in-the-Hills Service, Inc.

The land sales contract with the Howey Company provides for a uniform purchase price per acre or fraction thereof, varying in amount only in accordance with the number of years the particular plot has been planted with citrus trees. Upon full payment of the purchase price the land is conveyed to the purchaser by warranty deed. Purchases are usually made in narrow strips of land arranged so that an acre consists of a row of 48 trees. During the period between February 1, 1941, and May 31, 1943, 31 of the 42 persons making purchases bought less than 5 acres each. The average holding of these 31 persons was 1.33 acres and sales of as little as 0.65, 0.7 and 0.73 of an acre were made. These tracts are not separately fenced and the sole indication of several ownership is found in small land marks intelligible only through a plat book record.

The service contract, generally of a 10-year duration without option of cancellation, gives Howey-in-the-Hills Service, Inc., a leasehold interest and "full and complete" possession of the acreage. For a specified fee plus the cost of labor and materials, the company is given full discretion and authority over the cultivation of the groves and the harvest and marketing of the crops. The company is well established in the citrus business and maintains a large force of skilled personnel and a great deal of equipment, including 75 tractors, sprayer wagons, fertilizer trucks and the like. Without the consent of the company, the land owner or purchaser has no right of entry to market the crop;[5] thus there is ordinarily no right to specific fruit. The company is accountable only for an allocation of the net profits based upon a check made at the time of picking. All the produce is pooled by the respondent companies, which do business under their own names.

The purchasers for the most part are non-residents of Florida. They are predominantly business and professional people who lack the knowledge, skill and equipment necessary for the care and cultivation of citrus trees. They are attracted by the expectation of substantial profits. It was represented, for example, that profits during the 1943-1944 season amounted to 20% and that even greater profits might be expected during the 1944-1945 season, although only a 10% annual return was to be expected over a 10-year period. Many of these purchasers are patrons of a resort hotel owned and operated by the Howey Company in a scenic section adjacent to the groves. The hotel's advertising mentions the fine groves in the vicinity and the attention of the patrons is drawn to the groves as they are being escorted about the surrounding countryside. They are told that the groves are for sale; if they indicate an interest in the matter they are then given a sales talk.

It is admitted that the mails and instrumentalities of interstate commerce are used in the sale of the land and service contracts and that no registration statement or letter of notification has ever been filed with the Commission in accordance with the Securities Act of 1933 and the rules and regulations thereunder.

Section 2(1) of the Act defines the term "security" to include the commonly known documents traded for speculation or investment. This definition also includes "securities" of a more variable character, designated by such descriptive terms as "certificate of interest or participation in any profit-sharing agreement," "investment contract" and "in general, any interest or instrument commonly known as a 'security.'" The legal issue in this case turns upon a determination of whether, under the circumstances, the land sales contract, the warranty deed and the service contract together constitute an "investment contract" within the meaning of § 2(1). An affirmative answer brings into operation the registration requirements of § 5(a), unless the security is granted an exemption under § 3(b), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77c(b). The lower courts, in reaching a negative answer to this problem, treated the contracts and deeds as separate transactions involving no more than an ordinary real estate sale and an agreement by the seller to manage the property for the buyer.

The term "investment contract" is undefined by the Securities Act or by relevant legislative reports. But the term was common in many state "blue sky" laws in existence prior to the adoption of the federal statute and, although the term was also undefined by the state laws, it had been broadly construed by state courts so as to afford the investing public a full measure of protection. Form was disregarded for substance and emphasis was placed upon economic realty. An investment contract thus came to mean a contract or scheme for "the placing of capital or laying out of money in a way intended to secure income or profit from its employment." State v. Gopher Tire & Rubber Co., 146 Minn. 52, 56, 177 N.W. 937, 938. This definition was uniformly applied by state courts to a variety of situations where individuals were led to invest money in a common enterprise with the expectation that they would earn a profit solely through the efforts of the promoter or of some one other than themselves.

By including an investment contract within the scope of § 2(1) of the Securities Act, Congress was using a term the meaning of which had been crystallized by this prior judicial interpretation. It is therefore reasonable to attach that meaning to the term as used by Congress, especially since such a definition is consistent with the statutory aims. In other words, an investment contract for purposes of the Securities Act means a contract, transaction or scheme whereby a person invests his money in a common enterprise and is led to expect profits solely from the efforts of the promoter or a third party, it being immaterial whether the shares in the enterprise are evidenced by formal certificates or by nominal interests in the physical assets employed in the enterprise. Such a definition necessarily underlies this Court's decision in Securities Exch. Commission v. C. M. Joiner Leasing Corp., 320 U.S. 344, 64 S.Ct. 120, 88 L.Ed. 88, and has been enunciated and applied many times by lower federal courts. It permits the fulfillment of the statutory purpose of compelling full and fair disclosure relative to the issuance of "the many types of instruments that in our commercial world fall within the ordinary concept of a security." H.Rep.No.85, 73rd Cong., 1st Sess., p. 11. It embodies a flexible rather than a static principle, one that is capable of adaptation to meet the countless and variable schemes devised by those who seek the use of the money of others on the promise of profits.

The transactions in this case clearly involve investment contracts as so defined. The respondent companies are offering something more than fee simple interests in land, something different from a farm or orchard coupled with management services. They are offering an opportunity to contribute money and to share in the profits of a large citrus fruit enterprise managed and partly owned by respondents. They are offering this opportunity to persons who reside in distant localities and who lack the equipment and experience requisite to the cultivation, harvesting and marketing of the citrus products. Such persons have no desire to occupy the land or to develop it themselves; they are attracted solely by the prospects of a return on their investment. Indeed, individual development of the plots of land that are offered and sold would seldom be economically feasible due to their small size. Such tracts gain utility as citrus groves only when cultivated and developed as component parts of a larger area. A common enterprise managed by respondents or third parties with adequate personnel and equipment is therefore essential if the investors are to achieve their paramount aim of a return on their investments. Their respective shares in this enterprise are evidenced by land sales contracts and warranty deeds, which serve as a convenient method of determining the investors' allocable shares of the profits. The resulting transfer of rights in land is purely incidental.

Thus all the elements of a profit-seeking business venture are present here. The investors provide the capital and share in the earnings and profits; the promoters manage, control and operate the enterprise. It follows that the arrangements whereby the investors' interests are made manifest involve investment contracts, regardless of the legal terminology in which such contracts are clothed. The investment contracts in this instance take the form of land sales contracts, warranty deeds and service contracts which respondents offer to prospective investors. And respondents' failure to abide by the statutory and administrative rules in making such offerings, even though the failure result from a bona fide mistake as to the law, cannot be sanctioned under the Act.

This conclusion is unaffected by the fact that some purchasers choose not to accept the full offer of an investment contract by declining to enter into a service contract with the respondents. The Securities Act prohibits the offer as well as the sale of unregistered, non-exempt securities.[6] Hence it is enough that the respondents merely offer the essential ingredients of an investment contract.

We reject the suggestion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, 151 F.2d at page 717, that an investment contract is necessarily missing where the enterprise is not speculative or promotional in character and where the tangible interest which is sold has intrinsic value independent of the success of the enterprise as a whole. The test is whether the scheme involves an investment of money in a common enterprise with profits to come solely from the efforts of others. If that test be satisfied, it is immaterial whether the enterprise is speculative or non-speculative or whether there is a sale of property with or without intrinsic value. See S. E. C. v. C. M. Joiner Leasing Corp., supra, 320 U.S. 352, 64 S.Ct. 124, 88 L.Ed. 88. The statutory policy of affording broad protection to investors is not to be thwarted by unrealistic and irrelevant formulae.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

MR. JUSTICE FRANKFURTER dissenting.

"Investment contract" is not a term of art; it is a conception dependent upon the circumstances of a particular situation. If this case came before us on a finding authorized by Congress that the facts disclosed an "investment contract" within the general scope of § 2(1) [6] The registration requirements of § 5 refer to sales of securities. Section 2(3) defines "sale" to include every "attempt or offer to dispose of, or solicitation of an offer to buy," a security for value.

of the Securities Act, 48 Stat. 74, 15 U.S.C. § 77b(1), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77b(1), the Securities and Exchange Commission's finding would govern, unless, on the record, it was wholly unsupported. But that is not the case before us. Here the ascertainment of the existence of an "investment contract" had to be made independently by the District Court and it found against its existence. 60 F.Supp. 440. The Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit sustained that finding. 151 F.2d 714. If respect is to be paid to the wise rule of judicial administration under which this Court does not upset concurrent findings of two lower courts in the ascertainment of facts and the relevant inferences to be drawn from them, this case clearly calls for its application. See Allen v. Trust Co. of Georgia, 326 U.S. 630, 66 S.Ct. 389. For the crucial issue in this case turns on whether the contracts for the land and the contracts for the management of the property were in reality separate agreements or merely parts of a single transaction. It is clear from its opinion that the District Court was warranted in its conclusion that the record does not establish the existence of an investment contract:

"* * * the record in this case shows that not a single sale of citrus grove property was made by the Howey Company during the period involved in this suit, except to purchasers who actually inspected the property before purchasing the same. The record further discloses that no purchaser is required to engage the Service Company to care for his property and that of the fifty-one purchasers acquiring property during this period, only forty-two entered into contracts with the Service Company for the care of the property." 60 F.Supp. at page 442.

Simply because other arrangements may have the appearances of this transaction but are employed as an evasion of the Securities Act does not mean that the present contracts were evasive. I find nothing in the Securities Act to indicate that Congress meant to bring every innocent transaction within the scope of the Act simply because a perversion of them is covered by the Act.

NOTE

(A) A sale by a broker of unregistered instruments called "mineral right deeds in fee" which purported to grant to the holders "the entire interest in oil and gas" in certain undivided acres, and which instruments were subject to a collateral agreement whereby profits were prorated among all the owners of the undivided interests, was held to be a sufficient basis to deny the broker a registration since these instruments constituted "fractional undivided interests in oil, gas, or other mineral rights". However, even if this were not so, "it would nevertheless be a security within the meaning of the Act because it is an 'investment contract' and represents a 'participation in a profit-sharing agreement' ". In the Matter of Franklyn J. V. Stowitts, 6 S.E.C. 97, 1939.

A "receipt" for oil "when, as and if produced" was held to be a "security" as defined in Section 2(1). Securities and Exchange Commission v. Aldrich Blake, Inc., Sup.Ct. of D.C., May 19, 1936; C.C.H. Securities Act Service, ¶ 1610.015.

(B) Pursuant to a "conditional bill of sale", D agreed to deliver five barrels of oyster half-shells to certain docks in Florida, or in lieu thereof, at the buyer's option, to plant the shells on one acre of oyster bottom which the buyer should lease from the State of Florida. The court looked through the form to the substance of the scheme and found that this was in fact an "investment contract" within Section 2(1) of the Securities Act of 1933. Securities and Exchange Commission v. Cultivated Oyster Farms Corp., U.S.Dist.Ct., So.Dist. of Fla., Mar. 22, 1939; III C.C.H.Fed.Sec.Law Serv. ¶ 90,103.

(C) A "prosperity" plan whereby one dollar certificates were redeemed by D Co. when they were affixed with fifty-five two-cent D Co. stamps, the surplus going to persons designated by the original purchasers of the certificates was enjoined on the ground that these certificates constituted securities, that D Co. was not a charitable institution as alleged in its by-laws, and that the securities had not been registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Securities and Exchange Commission v. United Prosperity Plan, Inc., U.S.Dist.Ct., Dist. of Utah Cent.Div., Oct. 9, 1937; III C.C.H.Fed.Sec. Law Serv., ¶ 90,115.

(D) Where depositors contributed to a fund to establish a University of Plenocracy which, among other things, was to carry out agricultural operations and return to the "supporters of the faith of Plenocracy" 30% profit per annum, it was held that the certificates constituted "securities" within Section 2(1) of the Securities Act of 1933. The arguments that the "application" moved from the "investor" to the defendants and that the depositors were merely making a voluntary donation to a charitable use were rejected on the ground that the court would examine the set-up to discover the actual relationship existing between issuer and investor. Securities and Exchange Commission v. Universal Service Ass'n, 106 F.2d 232, C.C.A. Ill.1939, cert. den. 308 U.S. 622, 60 S.Ct. 378, 84 L.Ed. 519, 1940.

(E) It must be remembered that in enforcing either the fraud or disclosure provisions, it is necessary that a sale of a security be involved. Not only is the Commission presented with instances of flagrant disregard of the statute in the sale of ordinary securities without compliance with the statute, but more subtle efforts have been made to evade such provisions. Sales of securities have been disguised and camouflaged so as to appear to be simple sales of real or personal property. The scheme usually adopted is to execute to the investor what appears to be an ordinary bill of sale. Coupled with this is an oral or written understanding that the property sold is to remain in the possession and control of the promoter who is to distribute the profits to the purchaser. In S.E.C. v. Payne, 35 F.Supp. 873 (D.C.S.D.N.Y. 1940), the security was disguised as a purported sale of silver foxes. In S.E.C. v. Cultivated Oyster Farms, 1 S.E.C. Jud.Dec. 672 (S.D.Fla., 1939), it was oyster bottom acreage. In S.E.C. v. Tung Corporation, 32 F.Supp. 371 (D.C.N.D.Ill.1940), and S.E.C. v. Bailey, 41 F.Supp. 647 (D.C.S.D.Fla. 1941), it was interests in tracts for the development of tung trees. Other cases of the same nature were S.E.C. v. Pyne, 33 F.Supp. 988 (D.C.Mass.1940), shares in fishing boats; S.E.C. v. Bourbon Sales Corp., 47 F.Supp. 70 (D.C.W.D.Ky., 1942), whiskey bottling contracts; S.E.C. v. Universal Service Corp., 106 F.2d 232 (C.C.A.7, 1939) cert. den., 308 U.S. 622, 60 S.Ct. 378 (1940), contributions to a scientific crop growing enterprise; S.E.C. v. Crude Oil Corporation, 93 F.2d 844 (C.C.A.7, 1937) crude oil; S.E.C. v. Joiner, 320 U.S. 344, 64 S.Ct. 120 (1943), oil and gas leases; S.E.C. v. City Meter Service (D.N.J., 1939) and S.E.C. v. Parking Meter Corp. (N.D.Ohio, 1939), parking meters; S.E.C. v. Sentenal (S.D.Ohio, 1941), popcorn machines; S.E.C. v. Gilbert, 29 F.Supp. 654 (D.C.S.D.Ohio, 1939), shares in cargo boats; S.E.C. v. George Washington Cemetery (D.N.J.1942), cemetery lots; S.E.C. v. Monjar (D.Mass.1942), "personal loans". Such efforts to evade the statute are due usually to the inherent unsoundness of the securities sold. In the case of the sale of tung tree land, for instance, it was shown that the acreage being sold was not suitable for such production.

The Commission, of course, does not take the position that an ordinary sale of real or personal property involves the sale of a security. But where a purchaser has no intention of assuming any control of the property purchased, but is really buying only an interest in a business enterprise and looks solely to the efforts of the promoter to earn a profit for him, the courts have sustained the Commission's position that the substance controls the form and that there is involved the sale of a security and in the use of misrepresentations and fraudulent schemes an injunction should be issued. (Tenth Annual Report of the Securities and Exchange Commission: A Ten Year Survey, 1934–1944, p. 10.)

3. WHAT CONSTITUTES A SALE

(3) The term "sale", "sell", "offer to sell", or "offer for sale" shall include every contract of sale or disposition of, attempt or offer to dispose of, or solicitation of an offer to buy, a security or interest in a security, for value; except that such terms shall not include preliminary negotiations or agreements between an issuer and any underwriter. Any security given or delivered with, or as a bonus on account of, any purchase of securities or any other thing, shall be conclusively presumed to constitute a part of the subject of such purchase and to have been sold for value. The issue or transfer of a right or privilege, when originally issued or transferred with a security, giving the holder of such security the right to convert such security into another security of the same issuer or of another person, or giving a right to subscribe to another security of the same issuer or of another person, which right cannot be exercised until some future date, shall not be deemed to be a sale of such other security; but the issue or transfer of such other security upon the exercise of such right of conversion or subscription shall be deemed a sale of such other security. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77b(3).

S.E.C. RULES AS TO THE USE OF FORM E—1[7] (Note to Rule 5)

The Commission deems no sales to stockholders of a corporation to be involved, within the meaning of the definition quoted in Rule 5 (2), where, pursuant to statutory provisions or provisions contained in the certificate of incorporation, there is submitted to the vote of such stockholders a proposal for the transfer of assets of such corporation to another person in consideration of the issuance of securities of such other person, or a plan or agreement for a statutory merger or consolidation, provided the vote of a required favorable majority

(a) will operate, so far as the corporation the stockholders of which are voting is concerned, to authorize the transfer or to effectuate the merger or consolidation (except for the taking of action by the directors of the corporations involved and for compliance with such statutory provisions as the filing of such plan or agreement with the appropriate state authorities), and

(b) will bind all stockholders of such corporation, except to the extent that dissenting stockholders may, under statutory provisions or provisions contained in the certificate of incorporation, be entitled to receive the appraised or fair value of their holdings.

The Commission deems it immaterial in these circumstances whether the person the securities of which are to be issued is in existence or not; whether, if such person [is] in existence, the plan, agreement or proposal is submitted by or with its authority; or whether, in the case of transfer of assets, such securities are to be issued to stockholders directly, or are to be distributed to them as a liquidating dividend or otherwise.

When, in accordance with this Note, submission of a plan, agreement, or proposal to the vote of stockholders involves no sale to them, the Commission deems no sales to be involved in the delivery of securities to such stockholders.

Accordingly, neither the submission to the vote of stockholders of a plan, agreement or proposal of the character specified in this Note, nor the delivery of securities thereunder to such stockholders, requires the registration of such securities or the delivery of a prospectus meeting the requirements of Section 10 of the Act. * * *

NOTE

In several cases the courts have defined the statutory term sale of a security to include the stamping by a company of securities previously issued by it with a legend reciting an agreement of the holders to an extension of maturity (S.E.C. v. Associated Gas & Electric Co., 24 F.Supp. 899, D.C.S.D.N.Y., 1938), the solicitation of subscribers to an investment advisory service to sign statements that they would or "may" accept stock in a corporation not yet in existence (S.E.C. v. Starmont, 31 F.Supp. 264, D.C.E.D.Wash., 1939), and an exchange of property for stock (U. S. v. Riedel, 126 F.2d 81, C.C.A. 7, 1942). In U. S. v. Kopald-Quinn & Co., 1 S.E.C. Jud.Dec. 371 (N.D.Ga., 1937), a dealer's confirmation slips were held part of the securities transactions and the final step in their sale for the purpose of determining whether the mails were used in the sale of a security. In National Supply Co. v. Leland Stanford Junior University, 134 F.2d 689 (C.C.A.9, 1943), the Commission's interpretative rule excluding from the definition of a sale the issuance in a statutory merger or consolidation of new securities exclusively to the security holders of the constituent corporations was upheld. (Tenth Annual Report of the Securities and Exchange Commission: A Ten Year Survey, 1934–1944, p. 10.)

4. EXEMPTED SECURITIES AND TRANSACTIONS

NOTE

The exemptive provisions of the Act may be classified as:

First: Provisions exempting securities by reason of the character of the issuer.[8]

Second: Provisions exempting securities by reason of the character of the security or the issue of which the security is a part, regardless of the character of the issuer.[9]

Third: Provisions exempting securities by reason of the manner of their distribution, regardless of the character of the issuer, the security, or the issue of which it is a part.[10]

Fourth: Provisions exempting particular classes of transactions, regardless of the character of the issuer, the security, the issue of which the security is a part, or the manner in which the security was originally distributed.[11] Throop and Lane, Some Problems of Exemption Under the Securities Act of 1933, 1937, 4 Law and Contemporary Problems 89, 91.

Most securities or transactions "exempted" by the Securities Act are not entirely freed from the requirements imposed by that statute. The express exemptions enumerated in Sections 3 and 4, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 77c, 77d, except for transactions in the securities of the federal and state governments, their instrumentalities, and banking institutions, are "exemptions" only insofar as the registration and prospectus provisions are concerned. Thus the civil liabilities of Section 12, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77*l*, apply to a security "* * * whether or not exempted by the provisions of section 3 * * *", and the provisions of Section 17, 15 U.S.C.A. § q, are also expressly applicable to transactions otherwise exempt by Section 3. Finally, a brief prospectus or schedule sheet is required as to some of the exemptions adopted pursuant to Section 3(b).

(a) Securities

EXEMPTED SECURITIES

Sec. 3. (a) Except as hereinafter expressly provided, the provisions of this title shall not apply to any of the following classes of securities:

(1) Any security which, prior to or within sixty days after the enactment of this title, has been sold or disposed of by the issuer or bona fide offered to the public, but this exemption shall not apply to any new offering of any such security by an issuer or underwriter subsequent to such sixty days;

(2) Any security issued or guaranteed by the United States or any Territory thereof, or by the District of Columbia, or by any State of the United States, or by any political subdivision of a State or Territory, or by any public instrumentality of one or more States or Territories, or by any person controlled or supervised by and acting as an instrumentality of the Government of the United States pursuant to authority granted by the Congress of the United States, or any certificate of deposit for any of the foregoing, or any security issued or guaranteed by any national bank, or by any banking institution organized under the laws of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, the business of which is substantially confined to banking and is supervised by the State or Territorial banking commission or similar official; or any security issued by or representing an interest in or a direct obligation of a Federal Reserve Bank;

(3) Any note, draft, bill of exchange, or bankers' acceptance which arises out of a current transaction or the proceeds of which have been or are to be used for current transactions, and which has a maturity at the time of issuance of not exceeding nine months, exclusive of days of grace, or any renewal thereof the maturity of which is likewise limited; [12]

(4) Any security issued by a person organized and operated exclusively for religious, educational, benevolent, fraternal, charitable, or reformatory purposes and not for pecuniary profit, and no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any person, private stockholder, or individual;

(5) Any security issued by a building and loan association, homestead association, savings and loan association, or similar institution, substantially all the business of which is confined to the making of loans to members (but the foregoing exemption shall not apply with respect to any such security where the issuer takes from the total amount paid or deposited by the purchaser, by way of any fee, cash value or other device whatsoever, either upon termination of the investment at maturity or before maturity, an aggregate amount in excess of 3 per centum of the face value of such security), or any security issued by a farmers' cooperative associataion as defined in paragraphs (12), (13), and (14) of section 103 of the Revenue Act of 1932;

(6) Any security issued by a common or contract carrier, the issuance of which is subject to the provisions of section 20a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended;

[12] "In this manner a corporation may obtain funds for current transactions without filing a registration statement for the obligation which it incurs to the lender of the funds. Ordinarily, the latter is a bank or other institution in a favored position to require information about the financial condition of the corporation as a condition precedent to the loan of the funds. Need for control over this kind of situation is not so great as that over the issuance of other kinds of securities. Indeed, regulation of such transactions would be very difficult, and, moreover, would hamper the satisfaction of demands for current funds." Bumiller, Exemptions of Securities and Transactions under Federal Securities Act of 1933, 1936, 10 U. of Cinn.L.Rev. 125, 154.

(7) Certificates issued by a receiver or by a trustee in bankruptcy, with the approval of the court;

(8) Any insurance or endowment policy or annuity contract or optional annuity contract, issued by a corporation subject to the supervision of the insurance commissioner, bank commissioner, or any agency or officer performing like functions, of any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia;

(9) Any security exchanged by the issuer with its existing security holders exclusively where no commission or other remuneration is paid or given directly or indirectly for soliciting such exchange;[13]

(10) Any security which is issued in exchange for one or more bona fide outstanding securities, claims or property interests, or partly in such exchange and partly for cash, where the terms and conditions of such issuance and exchange are approved, after a hearing upon the fairness of such terms and conditions at which all persons to whom it is proposed to issue securities in such exchange shall have the right to appear, by any court, or by any official or agency of the United States, or by any State or Territorial banking or insurance commission or other governmental authority expressly authorized by law to grant such approval;[14]

(11) Any security which is a part of an issue sold only to persons resident within a single State or Territory, where the issuer of such security is a person resident and doing business within, or, if a corporation, incorporated by and doing business within, such State or Territory.[15]

13 See Rule 150.

The exemption is carefully guarded in that no remuneration may be given for the solicitation of the exchange of securities. In the majority of these exchanges, numerous kinds of expenses, as distinguished from commissions or remuneration, are usually incurred. The payment of clerical expenses, legal, accounting or other fees, the cost of engraving new certificates, does not destroy the exemption as the expenses were incurred in the effectuation and not in the promotion or solicitation of the exchange. It is a question of fact in each instance whether a charge is an expense incidental to the exchange, or compensation given for its solicitation. Bumiller, Exemptions of Securities and Transactions under the Federal Securities Act of 1933, 1936, 10 U. of Cinn.L.Rev. 125, 134.

That the exemption of Section 3(a) (9) does not permanently attach to securities which originally fell within its scope, see In the Matter of Thompson Ross Securities Co., 6 S.E.C. 1111, 1118, 1940.

14 See, also, Sections 171–175, Bankruptcy Act, 52 Stat. 840, 1938, 11 U.S.C.A. Sections 571–575; Clark, The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Chandler Act, 1939, 73 U.S.L.Rev. 147; Weiner, The Securities and Exchange Commission and Corporate Reorganization, 1938, 38 Col.L.Rev. 280; Fortas, The Securities Act and Corporate Reorganizations, 1937, 4 Law and Contemporary Problems 218.

15 * * * The legislative history of the Securities Act clearly shows that this exemption was designed to apply only to local financing of such a nature that it may practicably be consummated in its entirety within the single state in which the issuer is both incorporated and doing business. Accordingly, this exemption formerly contained in Section 5(c) of the Securities Act and now reenacted in Section 3(a) (11) of the Act, as amended, is so worded as to be available only to a security "which is a part of an issue sold only to persons resident within" the state in question. In any consideration of the exemption it is essential to appreciate that its application is thus expressly limited to cases in which the entire issue of securities is offered and sold exclusively to residents of the state in question.

Moreover, since the exemption is designed to cover only those security distributions which, as a whole, are essentially local in character, it is clear that the phrase "sold only to persons resident", as used in Section 3(a) (11) cannot refer merely to the initial sales by the issuing corporation to its underwriters, or even the subsequent resales by the underwriters to distributing dealers. To give effect to the fundamental purpose of the exemption it is necessary to take the view expressed by the Federal Trade Commission during its administration of the Securities Act, that if the exemption is to be available "it is clearly required that the securities at the time of completion of ultimate distribution shall be found only in the hands of investors resident within the state" (Securities Act Release No. 201; italics supplied). This

(b) The Commission may from time to time by its rules and regulations, and subject to such terms and conditions as may be prescribed therein, add any class of securities to the securities exempted as provided in this section, if it finds that the enforcement of this title with respect to such securities is not necessary in the public interest and for the protection of investors by reason of the small amount involved or the limited character of the public offering; but no issue of securities shall be exempted under this subsection where the aggregate amount at which such issue is offered to the public exceeds $300,000.[16] Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S. C.A. § 77c.

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION v. ASSOCIATED GAS & ELECTRIC CO. et al.

99 F.2d 795.

AUGUSTUS N. HAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE. The Securities and Exchange Commission brought the above suit against Associated Gas & Electric Company, hereafter called the "company", to restrain it and other defendants from extending the maturity date of certain of its bonds of an issue known as "5½% Convertible Investment Certificates" maturing on November 15, 1938. During the years 1928 and 1929 approximately $31,000,000 at par of the Investment Certificates were issued and sold position was adhered to by the Securities and Exchange Commission in its decision in the Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corporation case, 1 S.E.C. 147, 1935, that an issue of $8,000,000 principal amount of bonds approximately 15% of which, during the course of their distribution were offered and sold to persons resident outside the State of New York could not be exempted under the former Section 5(c) or the present Section 3(a) (11), despite the fact that the issuer, a New York corporation, had in the first instance sold the entire issue to underwriting houses resident in New York State. The bonds could not be considered to have been "sold" until they had reached the hands of purchasers buying for investment and not with a view to further distribution or for purposes of resale.

From these general principles it follows that if during the course of distribution any underwriter, any distributing dealer (whether or not a member of the formal selling or distributing group), or any dealer or other person purchasing securities from a distributing dealer for resale were to sell such securities to a non-resident, the exemption would be defeated. * * * Any such sales to non-residents, however few, and even though legal in themselves would preclude compliance with the conditions of Section 3(a) (11), and would render the exemption unavailable for that portion of the issue sold to residents through use of the mails. * * * Op.Gen. Counsel, Rel. No. 1459, May 29, 1937.

16 On December 9, 1940 the Securities and Exchange Commission made effective an important revision of its rules in connection with the granting of exemptions of security issues not exceeding $100,000 under the Securities Act of 1933. * * * The revision, made under the authority of sections 3(b) and 19(a) rescinded Rules 200 to 210 inclusive under Regulation A, and substituted five new rules, 220 to 224 inclusive.

The emphasis of the new rules is upon expedition and simplification of procedure. Prospectuses are not required in any case, and a domestic issuer need only notify the nearest regional office of its intention to sell. The letter of notification must contain only such information as the names and addresses of issuer, directors and officers, the person or persons for whose benefit the offering is to be made, the purposes for which the net proceeds are to be used, and the principal underwriters, the commission supplies a form letter of notification, but notification at the issuer's option may be by informal letter containing the required information. * * * Note, S.E.C.: Commission Broadens Rules for Exemption of Small Issues, 1941, 26 Corn. L.Q. 343, 343–344. See, also, In the Matter of Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corp., 1 S.E.C. 147, 1935. See Regulation A, Rules 220–224, 1 C.C.H.Fed.Sec.Law Serv. ¶ 4220, 4221, 4222, 4223, 4224, 1940, 2nd Ed.

or otherwise disposed of. As a result of various reacquisitions and exchanges for other securities, the amount of the certificates outstanding in the hands of the public (exclusive of $144,800 which had been extended under previous proposals) had by January 26, 1938, been reduced to about $3,200,000. In order to conserve cash and to avoid refinancing the securities of a public utility holding company in difficult and uncertain times, the company on January 26, 1938, submitted to the holders of the certificates a proposal to pay off 20% of the principal coming due and to extend the maturity date of the balance either for one year or for five years from the date of maturity at the option of the holder. As an inducement to the holders to extend payment of their certificates for five years an additional interest advance of 2% was offered. Enclosed with the extension offer was a form of letter of transmittal addressed to the company's agent, to be filled out and signed by the holder agreeing to the particular extension elected, with authority to stamp such extension on his certificate. No change in the certificates was proposed other than the extension of the maturity date of the principal that was to remain unpaid, and the interest was to continue at the original rate of 5½% per annum. The extension was to be effected by stamping (by a rubber stamp) a legend on such certificates as were payable to bearer and affixing coupons for the extended period. The form of the legend to be stamped on registered certificates when extended for one year was as follows:

"Twenty per cent (20%) of the principal amount of this Certificate has heretofore been paid. The holder of this Certificate, for value received has agreed to the extension of the maturity of the unpaid portion of the principal hereof to November 15, 1939, to which each successive holder hereof is bound by the acceptance hereof. This Certificate shall continue to bear interest, payable quarterly, upon the unpaid portion of the principal hereof, at the rate of five and one-half per cent (5½%) per annum."

The legend stamped on certificates extended for five years, as well as on those in bearer form, were substantially the same.

At the time of the extension proposed the company was not a registered holding company under the Holding Company Act, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 79 to 79z—6. It registered as such on March 29, 1938, but continued to make extensions without filing a declaration under Section 7 of the Holding Company Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 79g, because counsel advised that in their opinion an extension of the maturity did not constitute an issue or sale of a security within the meaning of Section 6(a) of that act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 79f(a), which reads as follows: "Sec. 6 [§ 79f]. (a) Except in accordance with a declaration under section 7 [section 79g] and with the order under such section permitting such declaration to become effective, it shall be unlawful for any registered holding company or subsidiary company thereof, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, directly or indirectly (1) to issue or sell any security of such company; or (2) to exercise any privilege or right to alter the priorities, preferences, voting power, or other rights of the holders of an outstanding security of such company."

The term "issue" is not defined in the act, but in Section 2 (a) (23), 15 U.S.C.A. § 79b (a) (23), the word "sell" is defined thus: " 'Sale' or 'sell' includes any sale, disposition by lease, exchange or pledge, or other disposition."

Judge Clancy held in the court below that the securities evidenced by the stamped certificates delivered to the holders of the old certificates were "sold" within the meaning of Section 6(a) of the Holding Company Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 79f(a), and made an order restraining the defendants pendente lite from "directly or indirectly extending the maturity date of any of the 5½% Convertible Investment Certificates of the Associated Gas and Electric Company to November 15, 1939, or to November 15, 1943, or to any other date by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, except in accordance with a declaration under Section 7 of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 and with the order under such section permitting such declaration to become effective, as required by Section 6 (a) of such Act." The defendants have appealed from his order. In our opinion it should be affirmed.

If it had been proposed that the old certificates should be surrendered and that new securities having later maturity dates shold be issued in their place it is not questioned that Section 6(a) (1), 15 U.S.C.A. § 79f(a) (1), would apply and a declaration under Section 7, 15 U.S.C.A. § 79g, and an order of the Commission would be necessary to render the new certificates lawful. The effect of the proposal under consideration would be identical. Why a stamp on the old certificates extending their maturity when accepted by the owner would not amount to the issue or sale of a security is hard to see. He would thereby surrender his right to have the certificate paid in full on November 15, 1938, and in place of it would receive 20% in cash and acquire the right to payment of the remaining 80% a year or five years later, instead of upon the original date. There would be a legal consideration for the new obligation and the fact that the same piece of paper would contain the earlier and the later obligation seems quite immaterial. To treat the proposed arrangement as beyond the jurisdiction of the Securities and Exchange Commission would seem to place form above substance and to defeat the statutory purpose of safeguarding the public interest by affording the means of investigating the merits of such transactions by the Commission so that issues of securities may be stopped if found inexpedient for the security-holders.

There may be doubt about whether the security-holder will be as well off if he extends the date of payment and leaves his claim at the risk of the business for one or five years more as he would be if he insisted upon its present liquidation. He is in effect making a further investment and if the general policy of the act is sound he is entitled to have the guidance of the Commission as to its desirability. It is true that some of the risks, such as the priority of certain liens to his claim, may have been settled when he made his original investment but the continuance of it necessarily involves new dangers.

rangements to extend the maturity of securities without invoking the provisions of Section 6(a) and 7. Section 12(e) reads as follows: "(e) It shall be unlawful for any person to solicit or to permit the use of his or its name to solicit, by use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise, any proxy, power of attorney, consent, or authorization regarding any security of a registered holding company or a subsidiary company thereof in contravention of such rules and regulations or orders as the Commission deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers or to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this title or the rules, regulations, or orders thereunder."

It is reasonably plain from the text of Section 12(e) that it aims at regulating the solicitation of proxies. The House Committee stated the object of Section 12(e) thus: "Subsection (e) covers the solicitation of proxies in connection with all holding company and subsidiary company securities so that such solicitations will not afford the basis for subtle control adverse to the interests of investors who have a right to be kept fairly and properly informed by representatives of their own choosing." H. R. Rep. No. 1318, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 18.

We do not think it is obvious that Section 12(e) covers the substance of transactions affecting the extension of payment of securities. But if it should apply there would be no conflict between its provisions and those of Section 6(a). If its provisions became applicable through regulations adopted by the Commission to control the solicitation of consents or proxies they would only afford means of protecting security-holders in addition to those embraced in Section 6(a).

It is urged that the interpretation put by the Commission upon Section 12(f) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 15 U.S.C.A. § 78*l* (f), as evidenced by Rule JF2 adopted thereunder is inconsistent with the interpretation which it has placed upon Section 6(a) of the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935. Rule JF2 continues the unlisted trading privileges of the owners of securities though the maturity, interest rate or amount of principal outstanding has been changed. But the fact that the Commission did not treat extended securities as new issues for the purpose of continuing trading privileges in no way involves the assumption that they should not be regarded as new sales or issues under Section 6(a) and 7 (c) and (d). Continuance of the owner's trading privileges under Section 12 (f) of the Securities Exchange Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 78*l* (f), affords no reason for depriving him of the protection afforded by Section 6(a) in a case where need of protection is just as great as though the old security had been physically surrendered and a new one issued differing from the former only in maturity date.

In Blue Mountain Consolidated Water Co. v. Public Service Commission, 125 Pa.Super. 1, 189 A. 545, the Pennsylvania Superior Court held that the reduction of the interest rate of a security did not constitute the issuance of a new security but expressly distinguished the reduction of interest from the extension of the maturity date. Whatever might have been the opinion of that court about the effect of an extension we find no justification for disregarding the construction of Section 6(a) which the Securities and Exchange Commission has adopted. Any interpretation of the meaning of the words "issue or sell" other than the one adopted would involve a tenuous distinction between a new certificate, identical with the old except as to its maturity date, and an old one in which the maturity is extended by an inscription written on the original document. Such a distinction is most unreal and serves to defeat the declared purposes of the act.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has uniformly treated the extension of outstanding obligations as within Section 20a of the Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20a, and as involving an issue of securities which must have its approval. The long settled practice of that Commission in upholding its jurisdiction over securities, the maturity of which is extended, affords a persuasive analogy in support of the ruling of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Moreover, we are dealing with a new act the administration of which is the peculiar function of the Securities and Exchange Commission. One of the principal reasons for the creation of such a bureau is to secure the benefit of special knowledge acquired through continuous experience in a difficult and complicated field. Its interpretation of the act should control unless plainly erroneous. In no other way can the objects of the act be attained without constant and disconcerting friction. Norwegian Nitrogen Products Co. v. United States, 288 U.S. 294, 315, 53 S.Ct. 350, 77 L.Ed. 796. In view of the foregoing the decision of the court below seems to us to have been plainly correct.

Order affirmed.[17]

IN THE MATTER OF BROOKLYN MANHATTAN TRANSIT CORPORATION.

Securities and Exchange Commission, 1935. 1 S.E.C. 147.

The Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corporation[18] applied on September 12, 1934, for temporary registration on the New York Stock Exchange of $8,000,000 principal amount of 15-year secured sinking-fund bonds, Series A, due June 1, 1949, and the New York Stock Exchange filed such application with the Commission pursuant to Rule JE1. The Commission, upon the ground that the bonds above referred to were not registered under the Securities Act of 1933, by telegram dated September 26, 1934, notified the company that the application for registration of these bonds on the New York Stock Exchange would be withheld pending a hearing, which hearing was held on October 3 and 4, 1934.

18 Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corporation is a holding company incorporated by and doing business within the State of New York. The company owns all of the capital stock of the New York Rapid Transit Corporation which operates subway and elevated lines in Brooklyn and partly in Manhattan; it controls by majority stock ownership Brooklyn and Queens Transit Corporation operating surface lines in Brooklyn, and through that company owns all the common stock of Brooklyn Bus Corporation which operates bus lines in Brooklyn; and the company owns all of the capital stock of Williamsburg Power Plant Corporation, a business corporation providing power facilities.

Pending this hearing and disposition of this matter, these bonds were removed from active trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Subsequent to the hearing the company, through its counsel, informed the Commission that it intended to register these bonds under the Securities Act of 1933. * * *

On May 9, 1935, the registration statement on Form A-2 was filed for these bonds in accordance with the requirements of the Securities Act of 1933. This statement became effective on May 29, 1935, pursuant to the provisions of the Securities Act of 1933. * * *

The Commission, however, deems it important to review the evidence adduced in the hearing above referred to, and to give its reasons for withholding registration under Section 12 (e) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 prior to the filing of a registration statement for these bonds under the Securities Act of 1933.

Inasmuch as the action of the Commission in withholding registration is to be regarded as having been taken pursuant to the provisions of Rule JE7,[19] the primary question that calls for consideration is whether the manner of the issuance and distribution of these bonds was such as to bring them within the traditional and recognized ambit of Federal power, inasmuch as the mails or instruments of transportation and communication in interstate commerce were employed in their distribution, and, that being the case, whether the manner of the issuance of these bonds was such as to grant the issue a specific exemption from registration under Section 5 (c) of the Securities Act of 1933, or Section 3 (a) (11) of the Securities Act of 1933 as amended. The consideration of the question, above stated, involves issues both of law and of fact. Before proceeding to the issues of law involved, it is best to rehearse the manner in which these bonds were issued and distributed as disclosed by the evidence adduced at the hearing.

On or about August 1, 1932, the Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corporation sold to certain banks through Chase, Harris, Forbes Corporation, Hayden, Stone & Co., and J. & W. Seligman & Co., $13,500,000

[19] Rule JE7. Denial or revocation of temporary registration under Securities Exchange Act of 1934 of securities which are neither registered nor exempted under Securities Act of 1933. If it appears to the Commission, upon complaint or otherwise, that any security for which application for temporary registration on a national securities exchange has been filed with the Commission, or that any security which has obtained temporary registration on a national securities exchange is a security which is neither registered pursuant to the provisions of Section 6 of the Securities Act of 1933, nor exempted pursuant to the provisions of Section 3 of such Act and that transactions in such security by dealers generally or by any particular dealer are not, at the time such facts are alleged before the Commission, exempted pursuant to the provisions of Section 4 of subsection (1) of the Securities Act of 1933, the Commission may, by order and notice to the issuer, direct the issuer to appear at a hearing before the Commission and show cause why temporary registration of such security should not be denied or revoked. If, after such notice and hearing, the Commission finds that the security is neither registered nor exempted pursuant to the provisions of the Securities Act of 1933 and that transactions in such security by dealers generally or by any particular dealer are not, at the time such facts are alleged before the Commission, exempted pursuant to the provisions of Section 4, subsection (1), of the Securities Act of 1933, the Commission may, by order, deny or revoke temporary registration of such security upon any national securities exchange. Upon issuance of notice of hearing to the issuer, in accordance with the foregoing, and pending a final determination of the cause, the Commission may, in its discretion, refuse to grant or may suspend temporary registration of any such security upon any national securities exchange.

Two-Year 6 percent Secured Gold Notes, due August 1, 1934. The company[20] then owed $6,500,000 of bank debt. Pursuant to an agreement or understanding with the bankers, the company suspended dividends on its common stock at the time of the 1932 financing, and agreed to retire the short term debt as promptly as practicable. By April 1934, $6,500,000 of the Two-Year Notes had been retired and at that time the company undertook to retire the Balance of $7,000,000 of notes with the proceeds of the sale of $5,583,000 of the New York Rapid Transit Corporation First and Refunding Mortgage 6 percent Sinking Fund Gold Bonds, due July 1, 1968, augmented by an additional bank loan of $1,500,000. The New York Rapid Transit Corporation Bonds referred to were sold on or about April 18, 1934, to the four banking firms[21] which were the purchasers of the bonds involved in this proceeding. It has been represented that the Rapid Transit bonds were resold by the bankers to a limited number of purchasers. The short term debt of the company was thus eliminated, with the exception of the bank debt, which was thereby increased to $8,000,000.

The $8,000,000 of bonds involved in this proceeding were sold for the purpose of raising funds to liquidate this bank debt of the company. Negotiations commenced in April or early May about the time of the arrangements for the sale of $5,583,000 of New York Rapid Transit Bonds discussed above. Gerhard M. Dahl, Chairman of the Board of Directors, represented the company in the preliminary negotiations with representatives of four banking firms, Hayden, Stone & Co., J. & W. Seligman & Co., Lehman Bros., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co. These firms were, at the time of the negotiations, represented on the board of directors of the Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corporations by the following men: Charles Hayden, a partner in Hayden, Stone & Co.; Frederick Strauss, a partner in J. & W. Seligman & Co.; Elisha Walker, a partner in Kuhn, Loeb & Co.; and Arthur H. Bunker, a vice president and director of Lehman Corporation, an investment trust managed and controlled by Lehman Bros.

At a regular meeting of the board of directors of the company on May 21, 1934, Dahl reported his discussions with "the bankers" concerning the possibilities of selling an issue of 15-year secured bonds. The directors representing the four interested banking firms withdrew from the meeting. To afford additional time for consideration of the matter, the meeting then adjourned without action to May 23.

Fourteen directors were present at the adjourned meeting of the directors on May 23. The chairman stated that since the regular meeting on May 21 it had been decided, subject to approval by the board, to create an authorized issue of $15,000,000 of Fifteen-Year 6-percent Sinking Funds Bonds, Series A, and to issue and sell at this time $8,-000,000 of such issue. He thereupon submitted to the meeting separate offers of Hayden, Stone & Co., J. & W. Seligman & Co., Lehman Bros., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co., dated May 23, 1934, each to purchase from the corporation, at 95 and accrued interest, $2,000,000 of such bonds. Hayden, Strauss, Bunker, and Walker then withdrew from the meeting, leaving 10 directors present and acting, who after full discussion adopted unanimously a resolution accepting the bids of the bankers.[22]

At a special meeting of the board on June 4, 1934, the directors authorized the creation of the issue of $15,000,000 Secured Bonds described previously and authorized the immediate issuance of $8,000,000 of the bonds.[23] On June 11, 1934, the $8,000,000 of bonds were authenticated and delivered in temporary form. The issuer applied for listing on the New York Stock Exchange on June 30, 1934 and the bonds were listed July 26, 1934.

The four banking firms whose bids for the bonds were accepted by the directors at 2 p. m. on May 23, 1934, resold all the bonds, commencing on a when, as, and if issued basis on May 23, 1934, and concluding their resales on July 17, 1934. The bonds were resold by the banking firms at prices varying from 96½ to 100½, but the major-portion of the issue was sold to the public at 98½.

A series of interrelated circumstances compel the conclusion that the Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corporation knew, when the transaction occurred, that the four banking firms purchased the bonds with a view to distribution and that such banking firms were acting as "underwriters", within the meaning of Section 2, subsection (11), of the Securities Act of 1933, in connection with the distribution of the issue to the public.

It has been stated that each of the four underwriters was represented on the board of directors of the issuer. In addition, counsel for the banking firms explained in detail to the chief of the Securities Division of the Federal Trade Commission the proposed method of distribution to the public, and the chief of the Securities Division gave his opinion orally that the exemption of the then-existing 5 (c) of the Securities Act would not be available unless the bonds should at the time of ultimate distribution be found only in the hands of investors resident within the State of New York.

Counsel for the issuer claimed that one reason for not registering the bonds was the inability to obtain firm commitments that would continue in effect during the time necessary for preparation of a registration statement, because the bankers would not hold the bonds during that period. All the bids submitted by the four underwriters contained identical provisions agreeing to comply with the Code of Fair Competition for Investment Bankers. Article IV of said Code, which expresses the obligations of issuers of securities, applies to offerings to the public exceeding $100,000. The identical bids significantly include an agreement by the Company to apply for listing on the New York 22 Dahl, chairman of the board, was connected with Hayden, Stone & Co. prior to 1923; C. B. Sargent, a director of the company, was and is a partner in G. M. P. Murphy & Co., which received substantial allotments of bonds at less than the offering price to the public, though counsel for the company asserted the issuers had no knowledge of any contemplated distribution to G. M. P. Murphy & Co.

23 There were fourteen directors present. The four interested directors withdrew from the meeting.

Stock Exchange upon request of the underwriters as well as to furnish permanent engraved coupon bonds therefor. The listing application of the issuer filed with the Committee on Stock List of the New York Stock Exchange stated: "Such Bonds were offered to the public at 98½ percent of the face amount thereof, plus accrued interest."

Again, on June 11, 1934, when the bonds were delivered in temporary form, the four bankers advised the issuer that in their disposition of the bonds they had employed and would employ no means or instruments of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or of the mails. Counsel for the issuer described these letters as "an understanding at the time the agreement was signed, but not included in the agreement. It was collateral to it."

Finally, counsel for the issuer, when questioned as to the actual knowledge of the issuer as to the resale of the bonds answered: "* * * The Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corporation, I assume, knew or assumed that these bankers would dispose of at least part of the bonds."

The Commission upon the basis of the foregoing evidence, finds that the issuer in fact knew that the four banking firms were purchasing with a view to the distribution of such bonds to the public and further finds that such banking firms were acting as "underwriters" for the issuer. * * *

The question presented on these facts was whether these bonds, assuming for the moment that the mails or instruments of transportation and communication in interstate commerce were employed, were exempt from registration upon the ground that they were an issue sold only to persons resident within the State of New York, within the meaning of either former Section 5 (c) of the Securities Act of the existing section 3 (11). * * *

The Federal Trade Commission with specific reference to the Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corporation issue, expressed the opinion that in order that the exemption of Section 3 (a) (11) might be available "it is clearly required that the securities at the time of completion of ultimate distribution shall be found only in the hands of investors resident within the State." F. T. C. Securities Act of 1933, Release No. 201. A similar opinion as shown by this record was rendered to counsel for the New York Stock Exchange by the Chief of the Securities Division of the Federal Trade Commission in a letter under date of July 28, 1934. Counsel for the company has admitted that the Chief of the Securities Division also gave a similar opinion orally to counsel for the underwriters, who reported it to the issuer, early in May 1934, before the bonds were offered.

Counsel for the company urged that the sales of the bonds to the four underwriters, copartnerships formed under the laws of the State of New York, were alone sufficient to give the bonds the character of "an issue sold only to persons resident within" the State of New York. * * *

In the customary course of distribution, securities pass from the issuer into the hands of underwriters, thence either directly into the hands of investors or into the hands of dealers who in turn pass the securities on to investors. These steps in the distribution of an issue are recognized and provided for, with a view to the protection of the ultimate investors, under the Securities Act. As a result of Section 4 (1) of the Act, the requirements of Section 5 with respect to registration and the furnishing of a proper prospectus meeting the requirements of Section 10 apply not only to transactions by the issuer and the underwriters but also to transactions by dealers during a period when such transactions are presumed to constitute a part of the distribution of the issue. Thus, the third clause of Section 4 (1) provides for an exemption for dealer's transactions as follows:

"Transactions by a dealer (including an underwriter no longer acting as an underwriter in respect of the security involved in such transaction), except transactions within one year after the first date upon which the security was bona fide offered to the public by the issuer or by or through an underwriter (excluding in the computation of such year any time during which a stop order issued under Section 8 is in effect as to the security), and except transactions as to securities constituting the whole or a part of an unsold allotment to or subscription by such dealer as a participant in the distribution of such securities by the issuer or by or through an underwriter." * * *

[The Securities Act, 1933] is, in the main, concerned with the problem of distribution as distinguished from trading. Obviously, an act designed to afford regulatory protection for investors in connection with the distribution of new security issues demands that its various component provisions should be construed in harmony with its general purpose. To construe the language of the former Section 5 (c) or of the present Section 3 (a) (11) in the way urged by counsel for Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corporation, so that any issuer might wholly escape from the regulatory provisions of the act by the simple device of making an original sale of a new security issue to one person residing in the same state as the issuer, followed by immediate interstate distribution by that person, would ignore the realities of the mechanics of distributing securities and nullify the expressed purpose of Congress. In the present case, the issuer apportioned the new bonds among the four principal banking houses whose representatives sat upon its board of directors. Under other circumstances, the entire issue might have been sold to a single underwriter, and similarly distributed at once to the public pursuant to a plan fully known and assented to by the officers of the issuer. Yet, in that case, the contention would likewise be presented that the single sale to a selected resident of the State of residence of the corporation should forever after exempt the securities from the provisions of the Securities Act, however wide-spread the interstate distribution. The contention is wholly untenable. * * *

In the absence of explicit language in Sections 5 (c) and 3 (a) (11) fixing the point at which the sale of the issue to residents is to be taken into account, that point must be determined by a reasonable construction of the provision, which will accord with the general intent and purpose, and with the other provisions of the Act. The language, reasonably construed cannot contemplate a consideration of every sale of an issue from the date of issuance till maturity. Clearly, also, as just pointed out, it does not contemplate only original sales by the issuer. Considering the clear purpose of the Act to control and regulate the distribution of new securities issues, it becomes clearly apparent that the sales of securities of an issue which are to be taken into account for the determination of whether the issue is sold only to residents of a State are the sales in connection with the distribution of the issue to the public. The point at which such distribution is completed is a question of fact to be determined in the light of all the circumstances of the offering.

As already noted, the Securities Act incorporates in Section 4 (1) a presumption that sales by dealers within a period of one year from the first date upon which the security was bona fide offered to the public by the issuer or by or through an underwriter are a part of the distribution of the issue. That presumption which Congress adopted should be applied here, not, however, as a conclusive presumption of law, as in the third clause of Section 4 (1) of the Act, but as a presumption of fact subject to refutation upon a showing of fact that distribution was completed within less than one year.

In the present case, the Commission is not called upon to determine whether distribution of the Brooklyn Manhattan Transit Corporation bond issue is now, or was at any particular time, completed. The finding that on September 1, 1934, a negligible amount of bonds remained in the hands of dealers would indicate that distribution may then have been completed. On the other hand, the existence at that time of very substantial amounts of bonds in the hands of corporations and trust funds controlled by the underwriters and subunderwriters may indicate a mere temporary pause in the process of distribution.

The Commission has found that an aggregate of $1,198,000 principal amount of bonds were sold to nonresidents by the underwriters, the subunderwriters, dealers purchasing directly or through intermediate dealers from the underwriters or subunderwriters, and by persons purchasing from the underwriters or subunderwriters, whose transactions characterize them as being equivalent to dealers. All such sales were clearly a part of the distribution of the issue and the finding that approximately 15 percent of the issue was thus sold to nonresidents prior to the completion of distribution conclusively negatives the existence of any exemption for the issue under either the former Section 5 (c) or the existing Section 3 (a) (11), and renders it unnecessary to pursue further an inquiry as to the point, if yet attained, of actual completion of distribution of this issue. * * *

NOTE

The exemption permitted by Section 3 (b) of the Act is not complete exemption from all provisions of the Act. It is limited by express provisions in Section 12, which imposes civil liability on persons who sell securities in interstate commerce or through the mails by means of untrue statements or misleading omissions, and in Section 17, which makes it unlawful to sell securities by such means or by other types of fraud. Each of these sections by its own terms is applicable to transactions regardless of whether the securities involved have been exempted under Section 3 (b). The principal effect of a Section 3 (b) exemption is to permit the sale of securities on the basis of a less complete disclosure than that required by the Act in the case of a registered security. Moreover, civil liabilities will be incurred only by the seller and the person controlling the seller, while in the case of the sale of a registered security, the full and fair disclosure described in the Act is required to be made and the civil liabilities of Section 11 run against all the persons specified in that Section. This latter sanction against practically all persons concerned in the distribution of a security is one of the most important of implements in carrying out the policy of the Act since it results in a concerted effort on the part of all concerned to provide full and fair disclosure of the character of the securities offered. In the Matter of UNITY GOLD CORPORATION.

3 S.E.C. 618, 1938.

Findings and Opinion of the Commission

This is a proceeding to determine whether a stop order should issue under Section 8 (d) of the Securities Act of 1933, suspending the effectiveness of the registration statement filed on Form A-1 by the Unity Gold Corporation on May 25, 1937.

The registrant, a Montana company incorporated on June 29, 1934, a successor in reorganization to a Colorado corporation of the same name against which a stop order was issued on June 27, 1934, by the Federal Trade Commission, which then administered the Securities Act of 1933. In the Matter of Unity Gold Corporation, 1 S.E.C. 25, 18 F.T.C.649, 1934. Its incorporators were a group of stockholders of the North Butte Mining Company, a Minnesota corporation, which is under common control with the registrant and which has assumed responsibility for the registrant's corporate management since the date of its organization. * * * The registrant has an authorized capitalization of 1,000,000 shares of common stock of a par value of 10 cents a share, of which 380,367 shares are outstanding. The registration statement covers the remaining 619,633 shares, which are authorized but unissued. The registrant's properties have been actively operated since May, 1935, but are still admittedly in the development stage.

[Subsequent to the effective date of the registration statement, June 14, 1937, a number of amendments to the registration statement were filed.]

* * * Our discussion will accordingly be limited primarily to the deficiencies which would remain on the assumption that the proposed amendments were a part of the original registration statement. These deficiencies are to be found in Items 18, 20, 25, 31, 34, 36, 38, 46 and 54, and in the prospectus.

1. Sales of Unregistered Shares in Violation of Securities Act (Items 25, 36, 38, as proposed to be amended). The initial question for discussion requires a determination whether sales by the registrant of certain shares of its stock not covered by the registration statement constituted a violation of Section 5 (a) of the Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77e(a). It is the registrant's contention that the shares were exempt from registration under the provisions of the Commission's Securities Act Release Number 182 and of Rule 202, adopted under Section 3 (b) of the Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77c(b). However, the authority conferred upon the Commission by Section 3 (b) of the Act to provide by rules and regulations exemptions for particular classes of securities is limited by a specific proviso that "no issue of securities shall be exempted under this subsection where the aggregate amount at which such issue is offered to the public exceeds $100,000." The scope of the exemptions provided under this section of the Act must be construed in the light of this limitation. If, therefore, the unregistered shares in question comprised part of a single "issue" offered to the public at a price in excess of $100,000, this exemption was not available. In that event, although the original answers to Items 25, 36 and 38 would not be deficient on this ground, the proposed amendment of November 1, 1937, to these items would be materially misleading in volunteering the affirmative statement that all the stock issued since the organization of the company had been sold in conformity with the exemption.

On March 19, 1937, the registrant entered into two contracts, covering the disposition of 600,000 shares of its authorized but unissued stock. By the terms of the first agreement, entered into with John L. Cronan of New York City, Cronan purchased 75,000 shares of the company's stock for $47,812.50 (to be paid in cash upon execution and delivery of the agreement) and was given an option to purchase on or before October 15, 1938, 25,000 shares more at 63¾ cents per share. It was further agreed that the company would file a registration statement with this Commission, and that by the first day of the month immediately after the statement should become effective Cronan would purchase an additional 10,000 shares for 50 cents per share. This was a firm commitment. Lastly, Cronan was given an option for 190,000 shares at 50 cents per share, exercisable in increasing amounts at 11 monthly intervals beginning the first day of the second month following the effective date of registration. * * * The second agreement was with the North Butte Mining Company. Entered into in substitution for a previous agreement dated January 16, 1936, it gave North Butte an option to purchase 300,000 shares of the registrant's stock at 50 cents per share. This agreement would terminate unless exercised to the extent of 10,000 shares on the first day of each month, beginning August 1, 1938, until exhausted, i. e., until January 1, 1941. * * *

The underwriting agreement with Cronan did not contemplate that the 75,000 shares which were purchased outright would be registered, and in fact they were not. Cronan asserted that these shares were offered to the public under a prospectus of the registrant dated May 1, 1936, which had been filed with the Commission on July 27, 1936, in order to comply with the conditions of the exemption provided by Rule 202. This prospectus covered an offering of 80,000 shares of the registrant's stock at 75 cents per share. The question, however, is whether the 75,000 shares comprised part of the same "issue" as the shares covered by the registration statement subsequently filed. If this was the case, the exemption was not available.

The manifest purpose of the $100,000 proviso contained in Section 3(b) of the Act is to limit the exercise of the Commission's exempting power to cases of small financing. It follows that the proviso cannot be construed to permit the exemption of small portions of large financing operations. This would defeat its very purpose. Thus, securities of the same class, offered on the same general terms to the public in an uninterrupted program of distribution, cannot be segregated into separate "issues" merely by claiming an exemption for a limited portion of such shares under Rule 202, or under any other rules of the Commission adopted in accordance with Section 3(b) of the Act, and registering the remainder. Nor can this be accomplished, it may be noted, by the mere formality of filing successive prospectuses under one or more of these rules if in fact the shares thereby offered otherwise constitute a single "issue" within the meaning of Section 3(b).

The determination whether securities are being offered as part of a single "issue" will depend upon a consideration of various factors concerning the methods of sale and distribution employed to effect the offerings and the disposition of the proceeds. If the offerings may be segregated into separate blocks, as evidenced by material differences in the use of the proceeds, in the manner and terms of distribution, and in similar related details, each offering will be a separate "issue." In the main, of course, each case must be determined upon the basis of its own facts. Proof of the relevant facts ordinarily can be obtained from such sources as the appropriate corporate records, contemporaneous agreements, and statements set forth in the prospectus.

Considered in the light of the foregoing, the record leads to the conclusion that the 75,000 shares which were purchased by Cronan and which were not registered were part of the same "issue" as the shares covered by the registration statement. The inference is clear—to be drawn from the provisions of the two contracts entered into on March 19, 1937, with Cronan and North Butte—that as of that date the registrant entered upon a detailed program, to extend over a considerable period of time, for the ultimate distribution of 600,000 shares of its stock. Except for variations in detail within the framework of the agreements respecting the issuance of particular shares, it is clear that these contracts involved a single, integrated plan for the distribution of these 600,000 shares. Accordingly, for the purposes of Section 3(b) of the Act the initial 75,000 shares purchased by Cronan cannot validly be claimed to constitute a separate "issue," and we find therefore that they were not exempt under Rule 202. Consequently, the proposed amendments to Items 25, 36 and 38 are deficient in the particulars heretofore noted. * * *

(b) Transactions

EXEMPTED TRANSACTIONS

Sec. 4. The provisions of section 5 shall not apply to any of the following transactions:

(1) Transactions by any person other than an issuer, underwriter, or dealer; transactions by an issuer not involving any public offering; or transactions by a dealer (including an underwriter no longer acting as an underwriter in respect of the security involved in such transaction), except transactions within one year after the first date upon which the security was bona fide offered to the public by the issuer or by or through an underwriter (excluding in the computation of such year any time during which a stop order issued under section 8 is in effect as to the security), and except transactions as to securities constituting the whole or a part of an unsold allotment to or subscription by such dealer as a participant in the distribution of such securities by the issuer or by or through an underwriter.

(2) Brokers' transactions, executed upon customers' orders on any exchange or in the open or counter market, but not the solicitation of such orders. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77d.[24]

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION v. SUNBEAM GOLD MINES CO. et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Ninth Circuit, 1938. 95 F.2d 699.

DENMAN, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This is an appeal by the Securities and Exchange Commission from an order denying a temporary injunction. The Commission brought a suit in equity against the defendant corporation seeking to enjoin it from an intended issue of securities without disclosing their character and registering them with the Commission pursuant to section 6 et seq., of the Securities Act of 1933, as amended, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77f et seq.

The facts are as alleged in the complaint and affidavits filed. They are not in dispute. The defendant Sunbeam Gold Mines Company is a Nevada corporation with stockholders in various states of the Union. Sometime prior to April, 1937, it entered into an agreement with another company, the Golden West Consolidated Mines, to purchase all the assets of the latter, subject to the approval of the stockholders of both companies.

This deal was subsequently approved by the stockholders of both companies. They gave their powers of attorney for the consolidation of the two companies, but this had not been accomplished when the bill was filed.

While the agreement was pending this approval, and on April 26, 1937, the defendant company issued through the mails a number of letters, 530 to be exact. Of the 530 recipients, 115 were stockholders of the defendant Sunbeam Company; 207 were stockholders of the Golden West Mines, and 208 were stockholders of both companies. These 530 people were scattered through various states.

The letters solicited pledge loan agreements from the stockholders for the purposes of completing the purchase by Sunbeam Company of the assets of the Golden West Mines and of raising enough money to register a contemplated new issue of stock with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Upon signing the pledge loan agreement, the stockholder was to receive a "shareholder's receipt"—in effect a promissory note of Sunbeam Company—promising to repay the sum loaned with interest. The complaint alleges that the defendant proposes to send through the mails these shareholders' loan receipts to the 530 mixed stockholders of Sunbeam Company and Golden West Mines; that such a shareholders' loan receipt is a security within the meaning of the Securities Act, and hence is subject to registration with the Commission. The Commission brought this suit under section 20(a) of the act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77t(a), authorizing injunctions against issuance of securities in violation of the act.

The court below, in denying an interlocutory injunction, held that the shareholders' loan receipt was a security within the meaning of the act, and that its distribution through the mails over state lines would make it subject to the required registration proceedings unless it came within the following exception stated in section 4(1) of the act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77d(1), that the provisions of section 5 as amended, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77e, making unlawful the distribution of securities without registration:

"Shall not apply to any of the following transactions: * * *

"Transactions by an issuer not involving any public offering."

The court denied the injunction on the sole ground of its interpretation of this exception as meaning that such a distribution to stockholders did not involve a public offering. The language of its conclusion of law is: "The transactions by the defendants herein being solely with stockholders of Sunbeam Gold Mines Company and Golden West Consolidated Mines, all of said stockholders being stockholders of respondent company through merger of said corporations do not, irrespective of the number of said stockholders, involve a public offering within the meaning of section 4(1) of the Securities Act of 1933, as amended, and the plaintiff's application for preliminary injunction is therefore denied."

At the hearing here both parties agreed that the correctness of the conclusion of law last stated is the sole question involved in the appeal. They also agree that it is the sole question involved in the case itself, and that its decision will dispose of the entire litigation. Since the findings of fact are unquestioned and agreed to be a full statement of the case, and since they show no ground for the exercise of discretion, no presumption arises that the court otherwise properly exercised it in denying the injunction. We are therefore warranted in considering and disposing of the appellant's challenge of the lower court's conclusion of law. * * * [Citations omitted.]

The purpose of the Securities Act is stated in its title to be: "To provide full and fair disclosure of the character of securities sold in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, and to prevent frauds in the sale thereof and for other purposes." 48 Stat. 74.

Sections 6, 7 and 8, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 77f to 77h, contain the provisions for the "disclosure" of information as to the security to be offered which shall be available to those to whom the offer is to be made. Section 4(1) makes an exception of those "transactions by an issuer not involving any public offering." Being an exception from the general policy of the act, anyone claiming to be within its terms has the burden of proof that he belongs to the excepted class—that is, that his offer is not to the public. Schlemmer v. Buffalo R. & P. R. Co., 205 U.S. 1, 27 S.Ct. 407, 51 L.Ed. 681, and cases there cited.

Furthermore, the terms of such an exception to the "general policy" of the act must be "strictly construed" against the claimant of its benefit. Spokane & Inland R. Co. v. U. S., 241 U.S. 344, 350, 36 S.Ct. 668, 671, 60 L.Ed. 1037.

The question here is, What was the Congress' intent when it required that the detailed information concerning the security should be made available to everyone considering its purchase, and then excepted transactions by an issuer not involving any "public" offering?

Appellees contend that the phrase "public offering" has but a single clear meaning, and that it is in effect equivalent to an offer to everyone. Hence, it is claimed, a restriction of an offer to a particular group of persons, such as here the 323 stockholders of the offering company and the 207 stockholders of the company sought to be merged with the offerer, must be a private rather than a public offering.

We cannot accept this contention. On the contrary, we agree with the view of the appellant that the word public "is one familiar to everyone, but of the most varied and indefinite connotations. In its broadest meaning the term 'public' distinguishes the populace at large from groups of individual members of the public segregated because of some common interest or characteristic. Yet such a distinction is inadequate for practical purposes; manifestly, an offering of securities to all red-headed men, to all residents of Chicago or San Francisco, to all existing stockholders of the General Motors Corporation or the American Telephone & Telegraph Company, is no less 'public', in every realistic sense of the word, than an unrestricted offering to the world at large. Such an offering, though not open to everyone who may choose to apply, is none the less 'public' in character, for the means used to select the particular individuals to whom the offering is to be made bear no sensible relation to the purposes for which the selection is made. For the purposes of an offering of securities, red-headed men, residents of San Francisco, and stockholders of General Motors are as much members of the public as their antithetical counterparts. To determine the distinction between 'public' and 'private' in any particular context, it is essential to examine the circumstances under which the distinction is sought to be established and to consider the purposes sought to be achieved by such distinction."

Since the phrase "public offering" does not ex vi termini determine its interpretation with reference to its exceptive purpose, it is proper to consider the reports of the committees of the two Houses of Congress and of the Conference Committees of both in the progress of the original bill through its amendments to its enactment. U. S. v. Great Northern R. Co., 287 U.S. 144, 154, 53 S.Ct. 28, 31, 77 L.Ed. 223.

The bill as originally passed by the House, following the recommendation of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, exempted from registration requirements the issuance of additional capital stock of the issuer among its own stockholders exclusively, where no commission or other remuneration was paid or given in connection with the sale or distribution, H.R. 5480, 73d Cong., 1st Sess., Sec. 4(3). This original House draft also exempted "transactions by an issuer not with or through an underwriter and not involving any public offering. * * *" Section 4(1). In reporting to the House, the Commerce Committee said of this exemption: "Paragraph (1) broadly draws the line between distribution of securities and trading in securities, indicating that the act is, in the main, concerned with the problem of distribution as distinguished from trading. It therefore exempts all transactions except by an issuer, underwriter, or dealer. Again, it exempts transactions by an issuer unless made by or through an underwriter so as to permit an issuer to make a specific or isolated sale of its securities to a particular person, but insisting that if a sale of the issuer's securities should be made generally to the public that that transaction shall come within the purview of the act." (Italics supplied.) H.R.Rep.No.85, 73d Cong., 1st Sess. p. 15.

Thus on the first draft of the measure it is clear that neither the Committee nor the House considered the test of "public offering" to be the inclusion or noninclusion of nonstockholders of the issuer in the group to whom the security was to be issued.

When the Senate received the measure, it eliminated the exemption contained in section 4(3), supra (including an exemption of stock dividends). The bill then went to conference, where the Senate's elimination of this exemption was approved by the Managers on the Part of the House, who stated, H.R.Rep.No.152, 73d Cong., 1st Sess. p. 25: "The House provision (Section 4(3) exempting stock dividends and the sale of stock to stockholders is omitted from the substitute since stock dividends are exempt without express provision as they do not constitute a sale, not being given for value. Sales of stock to stockholders become subject to the act unless the stockholders are so small in number that the sale to them does not constitute a public offering." (Italics supplied.)

Again, in 1934, when the Securities Act was amended, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77b et seq. and notes, a proposal to exempt from registration securities offered by an issuer to its employees was rejected by the Committee of Conference of the two Houses. In this connection, the Managers on the Part of the House stated: "The conferees eliminated the third proposed amendment to this subsection on the ground that the participants in employees' stock-investment plans may be in as great need of the protection afforded by availability of information concerning the issuer for which they work as are most other members of the public." H.R.Rep.No.1838, 73d Cong., 2d Sess., p. 41.

These Reports clearly demonstrate that the Congress did not intend the term "public offering" to mean an offering to any and all members of the public who cared to avail themselves of the offer, and that an offering to stockholders, other than a very small number, was a public offering.

Cases are cited by the appellees in which are given interpretations of the word "public" in regulatory statutes. None is shown to have the legislative history of the Securities Act and none applies the rule of strict construction of the instant exception to the general policy of the legislation required by the Supreme Court.

We therefore hold that an offering of securities under the Securities Act of 1933 may be a public offering though confined to stockholders of an offering company, a fortiori where the offerees include the stockholders of another company though seeking to become stockholders of the offeror.

Since the burden of proof is on the company claiming the benefit of the exception, and since it admits that it has no further facts to submit concerning the offeree stockholders than that they are stockholders, we are not required to determine whether such an offer becomes private rather than public if each of the 530 stockholders were shown to know everything about the mining properties, their operation, and the financial condition of the company, which would be disclosed if the management had complied with the Securities Act and furnished the information to the Commission.

The order denying the injunction is reversed, and the cause remanded for the further action of the District Court in view of the admission here that the companies rest the final decision of the case on the ruling on the order denying the temporary injunction.

(C) Purchases by Life Insurance Companies of Securities Privately Offered.— Prior to 1934, most securities acquired by life insurance companies had been those publicly offered, but the system of securities regulation, with its temporary repression of securities issues, induced the companies to purchase directly from the securities issuers, such sales being expressly exempted from regulation. That private financing constituted 16% of all corporate financing between January 1, 1934, and October 1, 1938, shows the importance which this new technique has assumed.

If the insurance company is interested in the offer made by the prospective issuer, by agents, or by bankers, the preliminary basic terms are determined in conferences between the issuer and the purchaser, and the transaction is then implemented by the negotiation of a purchase agreement, the initial draft of which is customarily prepared by the purchaser. Where practicable the indenture or supplemental indenture under which the securities are to be issued is attached in draft form to the purchase agreement. If available time does not permit this, the more important provisions of the proposed indenture are summarized in an exhibit to the purchase agreement which provides that the indenture shall incorporate such terms and shall be otherwise in form satisfactory to both the issuer and the purchaser. If there is more than one offeree, a single purchase contract form is finally agreed upon by all the purchasers and entered into by each of them with the issuer.

One of the main advantages of private financing is the elimination or reduction of the expenses incurred in public offerings, the average cost of which is 9.2% of the gross proceeds for issues under $250,000, 4.8% for issues from 1 to 10 million, 3.1% for issues from 10 to 25 million, and 2.3% for issues of over 25 million.

Economies effected by private financing are:

(1) Underwriting commissions are eliminated (amounting to 2.8% to 6.4% of gross proceeds for issues up to 10 million dollars);

(2) Legal expenses are reduced;

(3) Registration costs are eliminated (1/5 to 1/3 of 1% of total proceeds);

(4) Advertising costs are abolished ($3,000 for a 10,000,000 issue);

(5) Costs of printing registration statements, indentures, and the like ($10,000 to $30,000) and costs of preparing securities in small denominations ($2,500 for a $10,000,000 issue) are avoided;

(6) Transfer taxes, incurred when bankers acquire and distribute securities, are eliminated ($4,000 for a $10,000,000 issue);

(7) After the securities are acquired:

(a) Trustees fees are less (a saving of as much as $25,000 on a large issue);

(b) Cost of stock exchange listings for the securities are avoided (a minimum of $120 per $1,000,000); and

(c) Cost of publishing redemption notices (an economy of as much as $12,000 for large issues) and exchanges and transfers of securities are practically abolished.

To the issuer a more important advantage of private financing than the saving of expenses is the speed of placement which it affords. It takes fifty to eighty days, as a minimum, to prepare and make effective a registration statement, and this too readily allows market conditions to become adverse. Thus the issuer, at the last moment, may find it impossible to get underwriters to take the securities and thus have to cancel the effort and expense put into the preparation. Another important consideration for the issuer is that, with but one purchaser, provisions of the indenture can be easily adjusted in case of unforeseen events, a procedure almost impossible to carry out if the security holders are numerous and widely scattered.

In answer to the criticism of private financing that it is a circumvention of the spirit of the securities laws, it is pointed out that such laws were enacted to protect the ordinary investor who was ill-equipped to inform himself as to the worth of the securities. The argument is also made that private financing destroys the marketability of securities so purchased. To this the answer is made that the insurance companies buy these securities not for purposes of resale but for the investment afforded, that from the company's standpoint, their portfolios contain many other securities which are readily marketable, and that anyway the same criticism can be made as to the large block purchases made of publicly offered securities. Again, it is said that private financing deprives the smaller life insurance companies of a chance in participation. To a certain extent this is true, since issuers of large amounts of securities must turn to sources which can absorb the entire issue in order to keep the transaction within the scope of the exemption. However, smaller companies can and do engage in private purchases.

It has been suggested that issuers cannot do private financing without impairing their relationship with the bankers and injuring the market for their own junior securities, and that if the investment bankers take the risk connected with the distribution of equity securities they should have the profits of participating in the sale of the higher-grade loans. But, as previously stated, private placement with the insurance companies by enhancing the credit standing of the issuer may well improve the marketability of its junior securities. If junior securities have a market, the bankers will be glad to distribute them * * * Likewise * * * if (they) * * * do not have a market, the bankers are hardly to be expected to distribute such junior securities at a loss to themselves. Condensed from Rodgers, Purchase by Life Insurance Companies of Securities Privately Offered, 1939, 52 Harv.L.Rev. 773.

OPINION OF GENERAL COUNSEL OF COMMISSION CONCERNING EXEMPTION CREATED BY SEC. 4(1) OF SECURITIES ACT.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, feeling that the present tendency of large issuers to resort to so-called "private financing" may in many instances be at variance with the law, and that such a tendency is undesirable from the standpoint of thousands of prospective investors who are likely to be deprived of opportunities to participate in sound issues through this device, has today made public the following opinion of its General Counsel, John J. Burns. This opinion concerns the exemption created by the second clause of Section 4(1) of the Securities Act, which exempts "transactions by an issuer not involving any public offering."

Some misunderstanding has arisen as to the meaning of this provision because correspondents have failed to confine previous opinions of the General Counsel to the exact facts on which the opinions were based. The present opinion indicates the many factors which must be considered in determining the availability of this exemption, and points out that a definite opinion in advance is impossible except in a few clear cases.

The principal factors to be considered are: 1. The number of offerees and their relationship to each other and to the issuer; 2. The number of units offered; 3. The size of the offering; and 4. The manner of offering. Issuers are also warned of the practical difficulty which purchasers would have in redistributing securities originally issued without registration in reliance on this exemption.

The full text of the opinion, which was given in the case of a proposed offering of $1,766,000 of Preferred Stock to 25 offerees, follows:

"The opinion has been previously expressed by this office that an offering of securities to an insubstantial number of persons is a transaction by the issuer not involving any public offering, and hence an exempted transaction under the provisions of Section 4(1) of the Securities Act. Furthermore, the opinion has been expressed that under ordinary circumstances an offering to not more than approximately twenty-five persons is not an offering to a substantial number and presumably does not involve a public offering.

"As a result of such opinions there appears to be developing a general practice on the part of issuers desiring to avoid registration of their securities to seek to dispose of the same to insurance companies or other institutions, which, at the time of purchase, state that they are acquiring such securities for investment and not with a view to distribution.

"I would call your attention to the fact that in previous opinions it has been expressly recognized that the determination of what constitutes a public offering is essentially a question of fact, in which all surrounding circumstances are of moment. In no sense is the question to be determined exclusively by the number of prospective offerees. I conceive that the following factors in particular should be considered in determining whether a public offering is involved in a given transaction;

1. The Number of Offerees and Their Relationship to Each Other and to the Issuer

"You will note that this does not mean the number of actual purchasers, but the number of persons to whom the security in question is offered for sale. The word "offering" in this sense should not be limited to those cases wherein a formal proposal for a firm commitment is submitted. Any attempt to dispose of a security should be regarded as an offer. I have very serious doubt as to whether in many of those cases where it is stated that an offering is to be made only to an insubstantial number of persons, there may not be preliminary conversations for the purpose of ascertaining which of various possible purchasers would be willing to accept an offer of the security in question if it were made to them. Any such preliminary negotiations or conversations with a substantial number of prospective purchasers would, in my opinion, cause the offering in question to be a public offering, thereby necessitating prior registration of the security in question.

"Again, in determining what constitutes a substantial number of offerees, the basis on which the offerees are selected is of the greatest importance. Thus, an offering to a given number of persons chosen from the general public on the ground that they are possible purchasers may be a public offering even though an offering to a larger number of persons who are all the members of a particular class, membership in which may be determined by the application of some pre-existing standard, would be a non-public offering. However, I have no doubt but that an offering restricted to a particular group or class may nevertheless be a public offering if it is open to a sufficient number of persons.

"I also regard as significant the relationship between the issuer and the offerees. Thus, an offering to the members of a class who should have special knowledge of the issuer is less likely to be a public offering than is an offering to the members of a class of the same size who do not have this advantage. This factor would be particularly important in offerings to employees, where a class of high executive officers would have a special relationship to the issuer which subordinate employees would not enjoy.

2. The Number of Units Offered

"If the denominations of the units are such that only an insubstantial number of units is offered, presumably no public offering would be involved. But where many units are offered in small denominations, or are convertible into small denominations, there is some indication that the issuer recognizes the possibility, if not the probability, of a distribution of the security to the public generally. The purpose of the exemption of non-public offerings would appear to have been to make registration unnecessary in those relatively few cases where an issuer desires to consummate a transaction or a few transactions and where the transaction or transactions are of such a nature that the securities in question are not likely to come into the hands of the general public.

"In connection with a consideration of the number of units offered, I would also consider whether the same or other securities of the same issuer are being offered at the same time. I feel that this circumstance has a bearing on the character of the offering.

3. The Size of the Offering

"It should be noted that the exemption of Section 4(1) is of transactions by an issuer not involving any public offering. In view of this language, it would appear to be proper to consider not merely the specific transaction or transactions between the issuer and the initial purchasers, but also the extent to which a later public offering of all or part of the securities sold by the issuer is likely. Hence I feel that this exemption was intended to be applied chiefly to small offerings, which in their nature are less likely to be publicly offered even if redistributed.

"For the same reason I feel that a material consideration is whether the security in question is part of an issue already dealt in by the public, either on a national securities exchange or on the over-the-counter market, or, within the reasonable contemplation of the parties, is likely thus to be dealt in shortly after its issuance. This factor again may indicate whether public distribution of the security in question is likely within a reasonable time.

4. The Manner of Offering

"I have already indicated my opinion that the purpose of the exemption of non-public offerings is largely limited to those cases wherein the issuer desires to consummate a few transactions with particular persons. Consequently, I feel that transactions which are effected by direct negotiation by the issuer are much more likely to be non-public than those effected through the use of the machinery of public distribution.

"I have gone into this matter at length in order that you may be apprised of the many elements which in my opinion go into the determination of what constitutes a transaction not involving any public offering. There may be some situations where all the factors are so clear that it would be possible to express a definite opinion. In a situation such as you present, however, I feel that the offering would be carefully scrutinized by any court before which it may come and that any letter which purported to describe the situation, and on which my opinion would necessarily be based, could not adequately advise as to the various factors which are involved.

"I call your attention to the fact that any dealer who might subsequently purchase from an initial purchaser the securities which you propose to offer would be required to satisfy himself that the initial purchaser had not purchased with a view to distribution. If the initial purchaser had purchased with this intent, he would be an underwriter, and sales by a dealer of securities bought by him from such an initial purchaser would, as a general rule, not be exempt until at least a year after the purchase of the securities by the dealer. The sale of unregistered securities to a limited number of initial purchasers, therefore, leads to a practical situation in which such initial purchasers may have difficulty in disposing of the securities purchased by them. Any opinion which I might render in connection with the proposed offering might, I fear, be availed of by the issuer or by an initial purchaser as a means of satisfying a dealer, at a later date, that he might purchase the securities in question and market them without risk of violating the Act. You will appreciate that my opinion would not actually have this effect, since in the case of each transaction there would be involved various matters of fact on which I am not in a position to express an opinion.

"Accordingly, it seems a much wiser policy for me not to express an opinion in the situation which you present as to whether a public offering is involved."

IN THE MATTER OF IRA HAUPT & COMPANY

Exchange Act Release No. 3845, August 21, 1946.

* * * 3. Is the brokerage exemption of Section 4 (2) available to an underwriter who effects a distribution of an issue for the account of a controlling stockholder through the mechanism of a stock exchange?

Respondent's final argument on this phase of the case is that, notwithstanding the inapplicability of Sections 3(a) (1) and 4 (1) and even though Respondent may be found to be an underwriter, its transactions fall within Section 4 (2) which exempts "brokers' transactions, executed upon customers' orders on any exchange * * * but not the solicitation of such orders." Counsel for the staff takes the position, first that Section 4 (2) can never apply to exempt the transactions of an underwriter engaged in a distribution for a controlling stockholder and, second, that, even if Section 4 (2) can apply in such a situation, its applicability in the present case is destroyed by activities of Respondent which exceeded the normal functions of a broker and by the further fact that Respondent engaged in the solicitation of customers' orders.

The applicability and scope of the brokerage exemption in Section 4 (2) can be properly considered only against the background of the policy and purpose of the entire Act. We have already pointed out that the primary purpose of the Act was to provide prospective investors, through the registration and prospectus requirements, with a source of reliable information on the basis of which they can reach informed judgments whether or not to buy securities publicly offered. And it has also been shown that these requirements and the policy of the Act apply not only to securities newly issued but also to secondary distributions by persons in control of the company whose securities they offer. It is this application of the Act to secondary distributions with which we are here concerned. What we must determine is whether the broad provisions which by their terms plainly require registration and the disclosure of pertinent information to prospective investors in the case of public distributions by controlling persons, through underwriters, are so limited by the general language of Section 4 (2) as to withdraw the basic protection afforded by the Act where the securities are offered to the public in an avid market by a method which we will assume, arguendo, foregoes the sales effort usually considered necessary to accomplish similar distributions.

It is clear from Section 4 (1), read in conjunction with Section 2 (11), that public distributions by controlling persons, through underwriters, are intended generally to be subject to the registration and prospectus requirements of the Act. Section 4 (1) exempts transactions "by any person other than an issuer, underwriter, or dealer," "transactions by an issuer not involving a public offering" and "transactions by a dealer" other than those "within one year after the first date upon which the security was bona fide offered to the public * * * by or through an underwriter. * * *" This shows a specific intention to subject to the registration and prospectus requirements public offerings by issuers or by or through "underwriters." And, as we have seen, Section 2 (11) defines "underwriter" to include any person who sells for the issuer or a person controlling the issuer in connection with the distribution of a security.

These sections, by their terms, provide that whenever anyone controlling an issuer makes a public distribution of his holdings, in the controlled corporation by selling through another person acting for him in connection with the distribution, the sales by which the distribution is accomplished are transactions by an underwriter which are subject to the registration requirements. Applied to such transactions by which substantial quantities of securities are disposed of to the public, the registration requirement is consistent with and calculated to further the general purpose of the Act to provide investors with pertinent information as a means of self-protection. The legislative history of the Act strongly sustains this conclusion.[25]

We find nothing in the language or legislative history of Section 4 (2) to compel the exemption of this type of secondary distribution and the consequent overriding of the general objectives and policy of the Act. On the contrary, there are affirmative indications that Section 4 (2) was meant to preserve the distinction between the "trading" and "distribution" of securities which separates the exempt and non-exempt transactions under Section 4(1). This conclusion becomes apparent on examination of the legislative comments on Sections 4 (1) and 4 (2).

In referring to the exemption in Section 4 (1) for transactions by a person "other than an issuer, underwriter, or dealer," the House Report states:

Paragraph (1) broadly draws the line between distribution of securities and trading in securities, indicating that the act is, in the main, concerned with the problem of distribution as distinguished from trading. It, therefore, exempts all transactions except by an issuer, underwriter or dealer * * * (Italics ours.) [26]

And, in discussing the limited exemption for dealers in the third clause of Section 4(1), the House Report again emphasized the distinction between "trading" and "distribution":

"* * * Recognizing that a dealer is often concerned not only with the distribution of securities but also with trading in securities, the dealer is exempted as to trading when such trading occurs a year

[25] See H.R.Rep.No.85, 73d Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 13-14 which in referring to the definition of "underwriter" in Section 2(11) states:

"The last sentence of this definition, defining 'issuer' to include * * * persons controlling the issuer has two functions * * * Its second function is to bring within the provisions of the bill redistribution whether of outstanding issues or issues sold subsequently to the enactment of the bill. All the outstanding stock of a particular corporation may be owned by one individual or a select group of individuals. At some future date they may wish to dispose of their holdings and to make an offer of this stock to the public. Such a public offering may possess all the dangers attendant upon a new offering of securities. Wherever such a redistribution reaches significant proportions the distributor would be in the position of controlling the issuer and thus able to furnish the information demanded by the bill. This being so, the distributor is treated as equivalent to the original issuer and, if he seeks to dispose of the issue through a public offering, he becomes subject to the act. The concept of control herein involved is not a narrow one depending upon a mathematical formula of 51% of voting power, but is broadly defined to permit the provisions of the act to become effective wherever the fact of control actually exists." (Italics ours.)

See also the general statement of the purpose of the legislation at p. 5 of the same Report:

"The bill affects only new offerings of securities sold through the use of the mails or of instrumentalities of interstate or foreign transportation or communication. It does not affect the ordinary redistribution of securities unless such redistribution takes on the characteristics of a new offering by reason of the control of the issuer possessed by those responsible for the offering. It carefully exempts from its application certain types of securities and securities transactions where there is no practical need for its application or where the public benefits are too remote." (Italics ours.)

after the public offering of the securities. Since before that year the dealer might easily evade the provisions of the act by a claim that the securities he was offering for sale were not acquired by him in the process of distribution but were acquired after such process had ended, transactions during that year are not exempted. The period of a year is arbitrarily taken because, generally speaking, the average public offering has been distributed within a year and the imposition of requirements upon the dealer so far as that year is concerned is not burdensome." (Italics ours.) [27]

From the foregoing, it is apparent that transactions by an issuer or underwriter and transactions by a dealer during the period of distribution (which period for purposes of administrative practicality is arbitrarily set at one year) must be preceded by registration and the use of a prospectus. It is likewise apparent that Congress intended that, during this period, persons other than an issuer, underwriter, or dealer should be able to trade in the security without use of a prospectus. Since such persons would carry on their trading largely through the use of brokers (who are included in the general definition of dealers),[28] such trading through brokers without the use of a prospectus could be permitted during the first year after the initial offering only if there were a special exemption for dealers acting as brokers. The importance of this special exemption is emphasized in the case where a stop order might be entered against a registration statement. For, although such a stop order was intended to and would operate to stop all distribution activities, it would also result in stopping all trading by individuals through dealers acting as brokers unless a special exemption were provided for brokers. It was in recognition of this fact and to permit a dealer to act as a broker for an individual's trading transactions, while the security is being distributed and during the period of a stop order, that Section 4 (2) was enacted. That this was the specific purpose of Section 4 (2) is clearly seen from the comment on this provision by the House Committee which considered the legislation:

Paragraph (2) exempts the ordinary brokerage transaction. Individuals may thus dispose of their securities according to the method which is now customary without any restrictions imposed either upon the individual or the broker. This exemption also assures an open market for securities at all times, even though a stop order against further distribution of such securities may have been entered. Purchasers, provided they are not dealers, may thus in the event that a stop order has been entered, cut their losses immediately, if there are losses, by disposing of the securities. On the other hand, the entry of a stop order prevents any further distribution of the security. (Italics ours.)

To summarize: Section 4(2) permits individuals to sell their securities through a broker in an ordinary brokerage transaction, [27] H.R.Rep.No.85, 73d Cong., 1st Sess., p. 16.

[28] Section 2 (12) defines the term "dealer" to mean "any person who engages either for all or part of his time, directly or indirectly, as agent, broker, or principal, in the business of offering, buying, selling, or otherwise dealing or trading in securities issued by another person."

during the period of distribution or while a stop order is in effect without regard to the registration and prospectus requirements of Section 5. But the process of distribution itself, however carried out, is subject to Section 5.

What we have said also disposes of Respondent's argument that Section 4(2) would be rendered meaningless if it were interpreted not to apply to an underwriter "acting as a broker." Respondent has argued that such an interpretation would confine the 4(2) exemption to an area already covered by the dealer's exemption in 4(1) and thereby render Section 4(2) surplusage. But our discussion of the legislative history indicates the fallacy of this argument. It shows that the primary purpose of Section 4(2) was that it be available for trading activities during the period of distribution and during the period when a stop order might be in effect—precisely at the time when the dealer exemption is not available. Thus, far from rendering Section 4(2) meaningless, our interpretation gives it meaning in the situation to which the legislative history shows it was intended to apply.

We conclude that Section 4(2) cannot exempt transactions by an underwriter executed over the Exchange in connection with a distribution for a controlling stockholder. Respondent has suggested that this conclusion is contrary to administrative interpretations issued by our staff and to the implications in recent orders issued in connection with applications of The United Corporation under the Public Utility Holding Company Act with respect to United's sale of common stock of a subsidiary through brokers on the New York Stock Exchange.[29] The administrative interpretations referred to were to the general effect that an underwriter selling for a controlling stockholder over the exchange might conceivably be entitled to the exemption under Section 4(2) if his activities were confined strictly to the usual brokerage functions, but that, as a practical matter, his activities could not be so confined in connection with a distribution of any substantial block of securities. These interpretations arrived at the same ultimate result as that which we have reached here. But the theory and the qualification of the interpretations—which we agree are inconsistent with our conclusion herein—were developed against the background of a very different market than is now prevalent. It has been only comparatively recently that the problem has been presented in the context of a market in which large blocks can frequently be sold without solicitations or other sales activity. In that context, the invalidity of the theory on which the interpretations were based has become apparent. * * *

Company A had an "open end" mortgage upon its properties, the only issue of bonds then outstanding thereunder being denoted as Series A bonds. It was proposed to create two new series of bonds under the mortgage, to be called Series B and Series C bonds respectively, for the purpose of refunding the outstanding bonds. The Series B and Series C bonds would differ substantially from each other in respect of maturity date, interest rate, redemption prices and default provisions. The Series B bonds would be offered in exchange to the holders of the outstanding Series A bonds on the basis of an equal principal amount of Series B bonds for those of Series A, with interest adjustment. No commission or other remuneration would be paid or given, directly or indirectly, for soliciting such exchange. The necessary funds to redeem any unexchanged Series A bonds would be raised by the sale for cash of Series C bonds. The Series C bonds would be offered and sold to not more than twelve insurance companies, which would agree to purchase for investment and without a view to distribution. The Securities and Exchange Commission ruled that the Series B and Series C bonds appeared to be securities of different classes, they constituted separate "issues," and could be offered and sold in the manner described without being registered under the Securities Act. Why? (Securities Act Release No. 2029, August 8, 1939.)

5. WHAT CONSTITUTES AN UNDERWRITER

* * * (11) The term "underwriter" means any person who has purchased from an issuer with a view to, or sells for an issuer in connection with, the distribution of any security, or participates or has a direct or indirect participation in any such undertaking, or participates or has a participation in the direct or indirect underwriting of any such undertaking; but such term shall not include a person whose interest is limited to a commission from an underwriter or dealer not in excess of the usual and customary distributors' or sellers' commission. As used in this paragraph the term "issuer" shall include, in addition to an issuer, any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by the issuer, or any person under direct or indirect common control with the issuer. * * *

Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77b(11).

In the MATTER of SWEET'S STEEL CO.

4 S.E.C. 589, 1939.

Findings and Opinion of the Commission.

This is a proceeding under Section 8 (d) of the Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77h (d), to determine whether a stop order should issue suspending the effectiveness of the registration statement of Sweet's Steel Company, the registrant.

* * * After amendment, the registration statement became effective on June 15, 1937. * * *

In January, 1937, control[30] of the registrant was vested in five banks, located in Williamsport, Pennsylvania, which owned 2,065 shares of the registrant's 4,227 outstanding shares of $100 par value common stock. Representatives of these banks formed a majority of the registrant's directors. Comstedt acquired an option to purchase most of this stock plus additional shares, bringing the total to 3,028 shares at $100 per share, or an aggregate of $302,800. The option originally ran until March 15, 1937, but was extended to April 15, 1937.

Comstedt, who was characterized by witnesses as a "promoter type" or a "finder", did not have sufficient funds to purchase the shares. Consequently, with the options in hand, he approached several investment banking houses for assistance. Late in March, 1937, he talked with G. L. Ohrstrom, president of Ohrstrom, Inc., an investment banking firm, who agreed to provide the money to exercise the option. It was planned to split up the old stock 25 for one and to distribute the new shares to the public through an underwriting agreement with some third party.

Ohrstrom, Inc., could not finance the purchase of the 3,028 shares without assistance. It obtained aid from two English banking firms which were unwilling to participate if disclosure of their names were required. Further, Ohrstrom, Inc., did not wish to be held out as having originated the underwriting, since it had a short time previously sponsored another small steel issue that had not been successful. Accordingly, Ohrstrom, Inc., instructed its counsel that it was unwilling to provide the $302,800, if it were required to be named as underwriter. Subsequently two agreements were drawn by its counsel, who advised Ohrstrom, Inc., that nothing therein made it an underwriter.

These agreements, one between Comstedt and Ohrstrom, Inc., and another between Comstedt and G. L. Ohrstrom & Co., were entered into on April 19, 1937. These contracts, which contemplated a split up of the shares and a public offering, provided that Ohrstrom, Inc., was to furnish Comstedt the $302,800 needed by him for the purchase of 3,028 shares of the registrant's $100 par value stock; these shares were to be held by Ohrstrom & Co. in escrow as collateral security for this so-called "loan"; all dividends and other rights pertaining to the ownership of the shares were to accrue to Ohrstrom, Inc.; and Ohrstrom, Inc., was constituted agent to deliver shares as they were resold. Of the 75,700 shares ($1 par value) into which the 3,028 shares ($100 par value) were changed, it was contemplated that 70,000 shares would be distributed to the public through an offer sponsored by some third party; 2,000 shares would be delivered to Comstedt, and 3,700 shares would be retained by Ohrstrom, Inc., as compensation for services. It was also contemplated that the 70,000 shares would be sold for the aggregate amount of $367,500, of which $302,800 would be used to repay the alleged "loan"; $5,000 would be paid to Comstedt; and $59,700 would accrue to Ohrstrom, Inc. The agreements further provided that Ohrstrom, Inc., at its election, could take over the stock for its own account in full discharge of Comstedt's obligations.

This agreement does not possess the normal attributes of a loan or pledge in that Comstedt could not redeem the stock; dividends were not to apply to reduction of the alleged loan; no interest was to be paid thereon; and Comstedt was to receive compensation in cash and shares of the registrant's stock. Further, it is clear that the so-called "loan" was to be repaid from the proceeds of distribution of the shares to the public.

Having consummated these arrangements Ohrstrom, Inc., caused $100,000 to be paid to the optionors through the medium of Comstedt, the latter having obtained an extension of the options conditioned on the payment of that sum by April 20, 1937. The balance of the purchase price, $202,800, was paid in the same manner on May 4, 1937. By charter amendment of May 20, 1937, each of the registrant's $100 par shares of common stock was split up into 25 shares of $1 par value.

Next, agreements were entered into with Amott, Baker to handle the public offering of shares owned by Ohrstrom, Inc., and of a new issue for the account of the registrant. Under these agreements Amott, Baker had the following obligations and rights: (a) a firm commitment to buy 24,325 shares of the new stock from the registrant and 33,000 shares from Comstedt at $5.25 per share; (b) an option to purchase an additional 37,000 shares from Comstedt at $5.25 per share; and (c) warrants to buy 60,000 additional shares from the registrant. The underwriting agreements of Amott, Baker were the only ones disclosed in the registration statement. No mention was made therein of the agreements between Ohrstrom, Inc., and Comstedt. * * *

Prior to the filing of the registration statement, Ohrstrom, Inc., placed two representatives in the employment of the registrant one of whom was elected a director. These persons' duties primarily consisted of carrying out suggestions made by Ohrstrom, Inc., as to the registrant's policies. Prior to a meeting of the Board of Directors on May 4, 1937, undated resignations of the registrant's directors were obtained by Ohrstrom, Inc.

* * * During the time that the Comstedt "loan" agreements were in effect, Ohrstrom, Inc., made what is considered bona fide sales of 13,275 shares of the "pledged" stock. G. L. Ohrstrom testified that he was not conscious of the agreements; that he considered the shares belonged to Ohrstrom, Inc.; and that it could sell them whenever it desired. It did just that despite the fact that the shares, at the time of the sales, had not been reduced to possession under the Comstedt agreements, and that no permission for the sales was obtained from Comstedt. Although the public distribution occurred after the effective date of the registration statement, the activities of Ohrstrom, Inc., with respect thereto are evidence of the construction which it placed on the "loan" agreements.

In view of the foregoing, the loan made by the Ohrstrom syndicate cannot be considered bona fide. We find that Comstedt in purchasing the shares was not acting in his own behalf but for Ohrstrom, Inc., and its syndicate. The real purpose of Ohrstrom, Inc., in disguising the purchase as a loan was to avoid disclosure of itself and its syndicate as underwriters in compliance with the requirements of the Act.

Thus it is clear that the position of Ohrstrom, Inc., and its syndicate, was that of an underwriter as that term is defined in Section 2 (11) of the Act. The banks from whom the securities were purchased pursuant to the first Comstedt option were in control of the issuer. They were consequently issuers within the meaning of Section 2 (11). One purchasing from them with a view to distribution is an underwriter, and it is our finding that Ohrstrom, Inc., and members of the syndicate did purchase from those persons through the agency of Comstedt with a view to distribution. The nature of their interest is not compatible with that of a mere lender of money or a person performing a normal banking function. They were sharing the profits and risks of distribution.

Items 22, 23, and 24. The failure to name Ohrstrom, Inc., and its syndicate as principal underwriters, as well as the failure to indicate the affiliation of Ohrstrom, Inc., with the registrant in Item 22 makes the answer made to that item false and misleading and constitutes a material omission. * * *

Item 23 requires an outline of the material provisions of each underwriting contract with a principal underwriter. We find that the registrant's answer to this item omits facts required to be stated therein in omitting to outline the agreements between Comstedt and Ohrstrom, Inc.

Item 24 requires a statement of the price at which a security is to be offered to the public, the underwriting discounts, and the proceeds to be received by the issuer and by the stockholders in whose behalf the shares are offered. The registrant should have disclosed the total spread, that is, the difference between what Ohrstrom, Inc., and its syndicate paid to the prior owners and the amount at which the stock was to be sold to the public. The spread on the 70,000 shares involved in the syndicate transaction was $210,000, since the stock was purchased at $4 a share and retailed at $7 a share. The registration statement discloses only the spread between the price paid by Amott, Baker and the price to the public, which amounted to $122,500, or $1.75 a share. These misstatements constitute material deficiencies.

The remaining items to be considered are:

Item 5. This item requires a brief statement of the character of business done and intended to be done. The registrant's answer stated in part, "registrant does not contemplate any change in its present management." As above set forth, the registrant was under the control of Ohrstrom, Inc., which held undated resignations of the directors on the effective date of registration statement. Three days after the effective date of the registration statement, an officer of Ohrstrom, Inc., wrote, "The Board of Directors of the Company intends to make various changes with respect to the management. * * *" The evidence indicates that the changes which subsequently took place were contemplated at the time the registration statement became effective. We find that the answer to Item 5 was false and misleading.

Items 10, 33 and 34. In response to these items the registrant stated without qualification that 99,400 shares were owned by Comstedt. As has been said above, Comstedt's sole function was that of an intermediary for Ohrstrom, Inc. He was not the beneficial owner of the 99,400 shares of stock of the registrant on any of the dates indicated in these items. We conclude that these items contain untrue statements of material facts.

Item 26. This item requires a statement of persons to whom registered securities have been or are to be sold for a consideration varying from that at which the securities are to be sold to the general public. The registrant stated that no securities "are to be sold for a consideration varying from that at which the securities are to be sold to the general public." The record shows that Ohrstrom, Inc., had entered into an agreement with Belcaro Investment Co. to sell it 5,000 shares at $4.25 a share and to repurchase them at $5 a share within 60 days after the effective date of the registration statement. In order to fulfill this commitment Ohrstrom, Inc., purported to include Belcaro Investment Co. as a member of its syndicate. This was done without consultation with Belcaro Investment Co., which later contested the fact that it was a syndicate member. It seems clear that a person cannot be made a member of a syndicate against his will. We therefore conclude that Belcaro Investment Co. was not a member of the syndicate and that as of the effective date of the registration statement Ohrstrom, Inc., contemplated selling it securities at less than the price to the public. Therefore the answer to Item 26 was materially deficient. * * *

A stop order will issue in accordance with these findings and this opinion.

NOTE

(A) Although a mere "finder" who does no more than introduce a registrant to an underwriter and does not otherwise participate in the distribution may not himself be an "underwriter", the performance of a few additional services and the receipt of compensation therefor may bring a person within this category. Thus where B was to receive a cash sum plus a percentage of any financing it might obtain for the registrant, was to render financial advice, was to take an active part in the negotiations, and whose consent was required before the final consummation of any deal, it was held by the Commission that B was an underwriter. In the Matter of Puget Sound Distillery, Inc., 3 S.E.C. 355, 1938.

(B) (1) A, a stockholder of X Co., registrant, lent $1,000 to B to incorporate X Co. and register its securities, and "aided materially in the organization of the enterprise". A is a "promoter". In the Matter of Doris Ruby Mining Co., 4 S.E.C. 427, 1939. Cf. In the Matter of Gold Dust Mining & Milling Co., 3 S.E.C. 55, 1938.

(2) A law partner of the principal promoter and owner of all the voting stock who acted solely for the principal promoter and for whom part of the purchase price of land purchased by the principal promoter was withheld as "commissions" was held a promoter. In the Matter of Continental Distillers and Importers Corp., 1 S.E.C. 54, 1935.

(C) A $1,800,000 apartment-hotel was to be financed by the sale of "Amortization Notes", a share of stock being given free with each Note. 25% of the total authorized stock, denominated as "CP Sponsor Shares", was to be sold to the Highland Apartment Management Co., which was owned by the four promoters of the enterprise. The Commission issued a stop order suspending the effectiveness of the registration statement. As to the interests of the promoters, the prospectus was found to be deficient in failing to reveal: (1) that the Management Co. was enabled to purchase the 6,000 Sponsor Shares for $600, thus giving the promoters special treatment; (2) that the provision giving the X Construction Co. (owned by one of the promoters) a fixed fee for acting as general contractor did not explain that the X Co. was also empowered to act as sub-contractor; (3) that the statement in the prospectus, "There has been no amount paid and there is no amount intended to be paid to any promoter, as such", conflicted with other widely separated provisions and made it difficult for an investor to understand how much interest the promoters were in fact to receive; (4) that the provision giving one-eighth of the "available net income" to the Management Co. as a fiscal fee after the completion of the building meant "net income" not in the commonly used or accountant's meaning since there was to be no reserve set aside out of income for depreciation. In the Matter of West Park Apartments Corp., 3 S.E.C. 900, 1938.

(D) In a new corporation, on the other hand, the share of the promoter is of special interest and significance as the percentage of dilution of the stock for promotional payments is apt to be great. Form A-I is designed to force disclosure of the promotion process so that the investor may know what he is paying for this type of service. The form when answered properly will bring out the names and addresses of the promoters, the stock interest, whether beneficial or of record, payments to promoters and the nature of the consideration given therefor, a statement of the intention of such persons with respect to subscription to additional stock and the prices at which such subscriptions will be executed, and details of any property purchases already made from promoters and any property purchases to be made by use of the proceeds of the issue registered. The Commission has, in many instances, compelled the identification of certain payments ostensibly going to an individual not named as promoter, or disguised as a payment for tangible assets, as promotional payments. Administration has made these requirements of disclosure not merely formal. A superficial statement of what has been given and what has been received is not enough. The real character of the promotional operation must be clearly presented. This insistence on reality is present both in the cases decided without opinions as well as those in which an opinion has been published. The opinions, however, make clear the basis for the other rulings.

To date, the Commission has made no definitive statement of the type of participation or activity which will render one a promoter. The accretion of its rulings in this connection indicates quite definitely, however, that its concept of "promoter" does not vary significantly from the common law doctrine. It may be said without attempting to predict possible extensions of the rule that one who participates actively in bringing about the formation of a corporation or one who participates actively in the launching of the enterprise after its formation will be deemed to be a promoter. MacChesney and O'Brien, Full Disclosure Under the Securities Act, 1937, 4 Law and Contemp. Problems, 133, 136.

(E) Rule 142 was adopted in recognition of the value of secondary capital in facilitating the flow of investment funds into industry, and of the fact that the owners of such secondary capital cannot practicably perform the duty of thorough investigation and analysis imposed by the Act of the underwriter proper. The rule in no way limits the responsibility of the underwriter who actually serves as a conduit for the distribution of securities to the public, or of the underwriter who for a commission agrees with the issuer to purchase what the issuer is unable to sell to the public—thereby furnishing to the issuer the insurance without which the distribution would probably not be undertaken. The purpose of the rule is merely to make clear, what has admittedly been the subject of some debate in the past, that a person who does no more than agree with an underwriter to take over some or all of the undistributed portion of the issue, and who purchases for investment any securities which his commitment thus obliges him to take up, does not thereby subject himself to liability as an underwriter of the securities of the issue actually distributed to the public.

In considering the application of the rule to particular situations, it should be appreciated that it applies only to persons whose connection with a distribution is essentially non-distributive in character. Any person enjoying substantial relationships with the issuer or underwriter, or engaging in the performance of any substantial functions in the organization or management of the distribution, would be outside the scope of the rule. Basically, the rule is designed to cover the conditional purchaser who, in spite of the conditional nature of his contract, is primarily interested in securing a portion of the issue for investment, and finds his incentive not in a commission based on the size of the issue or other similar factors, but in the investment advantage afforded by a discount from the public offering price. Disproportionate commissions or service fees would raise a serious doubt whether the functions of the person concerned were in fact confined as prescribed in the rule, for such disproportionate commissions or fees would tend strongly to show that such person was primarily interested as an "underwriter" in the distribution.

Some question will undoubtedly be raised as to the meaning of the term "purchases * * * for investment", as used in the rule. The application of this term is of course to be ascertained in any given case by reference to the intention of the purchaser at the time of purchase. What his intention was at that time is a question of fact.

Although it is not impossible to conceive of a situation in which a person who had purchased securities for investment changed his mind in good faith on the next day, and proceeded to dispose of the securities, it must nevertheless be remembered that a state of mind can ordinarily be ascertained only by weighing evidentiary factors, and that a person's actions may be of far greater evidentiary significance than his statements as throwing light on what his state of mind was at a given time. Thus, self-serving statements that a particular purchase was made for investment would carry very little weight in the face of more concrete facts and circumstances inconsistent with such an intention.

Most prominent among the relevant evidentiary factors would undoubtedly be the length of time elapsing between the acquisition of the securities and their proposed resale. Although retention of the securities for any given length of time would in no event be conclusive, it is obvious that the longer they were held the easier it would be to maintain that they had originally been purchased for investment; and it is my opinion that if they were retained for a period as long as a year that fact would be sufficient, if not contradicted by other evidence to create a strong inference that they had been purchased for investment. However, such an inference would be rebuttable; for example, it would fall in the face of evidence of a pre-arranged scheme to effect a distribution at the end of the year.

Another factor which may be of considerable importance is the character of the regular business of the person who seeks to come within the rule. Thus, I have little doubt that insurance and investment companies not ordinarily engaged in the business of dealing in securities or underwriting distributions could quite readily sustain the burden of proof that they had purchased for investment. On the other hand, in the case of a securities dealer or an investment banking house, the nature of the business ordinarily carried on would create an extremely strong presumption of purchase for resale. It is perhaps possible that a person engaged in the investment banking business or in the securities business might, under some circumstances, come within the provisions of the rule; but in order to reach this result it would be necessary to establish by the clearest kind of evidence that the scope and character of the person's business were consistent with the purchase of large blocks of securities for investment rather than with a view to distribution. Opinion of General Counsel of the Commission (Chester T. Lane), Securities Act Rel. No. 1862, Dec. 13, 1938 (I C.C.H., Fed.Sec.Law Serv., ¶ 2168.18).

In the Matter of REITER-FOSTER OIL CORP.

6 S.E.C. 1028, 1940.

This is a proceeding under Section 8 (d) of the Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77h(d), to determine whether a stop order should issue to suspend the effectiveness of a registration statement filed June 29, 1936, on Form A-1, by Reiter-Foster Oil Corporation. The registration statement covers 549,850 shares of common stock, which comprise all of the authorized unissued stock of the corporation.[31] * * *

The registrant was organized under the laws of Delaware in 1924 for the purpose (inter alia) of producing and marketing crude oil and gas and dealing in leases and royalties. In its early years it was a substantial company, with assets of nearly $2,000,000; but its properties continually declined in value until, as of March 30, 1937, they were carried on the balance sheet of the corporation at $255,203.59.

On December 12, 1931, a mortgage on part of the registrant's producing properties (hereinafter referred to as the Gibson-Bailey trust) in favor of certain creditors was given to secure an aggregate indebtedness of $250,000. This debt, reduced to judgment, was scaled to $61,947 by agreement of the parties on condition that it would be paid on or before October 27, 1936. These creditors constantly pressed the registrant to discharge that indebtedness and threatened to enforce their lien unless payment were made. That threat led to the present financing.

On December 22, 1934, practically all of the producing properties remaining to the registrant were placed in another trust (under an instrument referred to hereinafter as the Ache trust). Its purpose was to secure claims aggregating $13,584.61 in favor of persons connected with the management of the registrant for services and salaries, as well as "all future indebtedness" due these persons. The original cost of these properties was $191,839.49. The trust agreement provided that if the claims secured thereby were not paid within six months after the date of the instrument, absolute title should vest in Paul S. Ache, for the benefit of the claimants thereunder.

The registrant, for the five years preceding the filing of the registration statement, was relatively dormant. Such revenues as it derived during this period were paid to creditors under both trusts.

In the latter part of 1935, the management of the registrant, in an effort to prevent the loss of its properties to creditors, designated Paul S. Ache to procure financing for it. On February 27, 1936, Ache received a letter from Walter Clifford evidencing an interest in acquiring 200,000 shares of the registrant's stock for a "client."

Ache investigated Clifford's financial responsibility and was told that he was without funds, but apparently energetic and capable of handling any commitments he might make. Thereafter, an underwriting agreement was entered into between the registrant and Clifford which provided, in substance, that within thirty days after notice that the registration statement had become effective and the stock had been listed for trading on the New York Curb Exchange, Clifford would purchase for cash 100,000 shares at 50 cents per share, and that "upon payment of the purchase price thereof to wit, $50,000," the underwriter agreed at certain designated times "to purchase and pay for" an additional 31 The total authorized capital of the corporation is 1,000,000 shares of common stock.

100,000 shares at 50 cents per share, and another 100,000 shares at 62½ cents per share. Provision was made for a series of options on the remaining 249,850 registered shares, which could be exercised at graduated prices.[32] The agreement provided that the underwriter would offer 200,000 shares at 65 cents per share to existing stockholders "who shall have 30 days from the date of mailing the offer within which to subscribe for stock." That portion of the 200,000 shares not subscribed for by stockholders plus the balance of the shares included in the underwriting were to be "offered to the public from time to time at the market price as it exists from day to day on the New York Curb Exchange." If the underwriter performed all commitments and exercised all options, the total net proceeds to the registrant would have been $337,-387.50.

On August 17, 1936, the registrant applied to the New York Curb Exchange for listing of the underwritten shares. The Curb, however, on September 2, 1936, refused to list until $162,500 had been deposited by Clifford to meet his commitments. Unable to deposit cash, Clifford, with the knowledge of the registrant, printed and sold temporary certificates which provided that they might be exchanged for listed shares in the event that the stock was listed.[33] During the period of the Clifford underwriting, temporary certificates purporting to represent approximately 60,000 shares were sold.[34]

Clifford's manifest inability to provide the money necessary to allay creditors led to the intervention of a new group of underwriters,—the Hiltz & Company and Harry K. Greenfield group,—who on February 24, 1937, took an assignment of Clifford's underwriting contract.[35] At the instance of the new underwriters, the Curb lessened its deposit requirements, and cash was provided to enable the registrant to pay the Gibson-Bailey creditors. Upon such payment the properties mortgaged under the Gibson-Bailey trust were returned to the registrant.

[32] The following is illustrative of the option provisions:

"(3) That within the next sixty (60) days thereafter, which would be two hundred ten (210) days after the notice as originally provided for, the underwriter agrees to purchase and pay for one hundred thousand (100,000), additional shares of said stock, at the price of sixty-two and one-half cents (62½ cents) per share, if at any time within said two hundred and ten (210) days Reiter-Foster Oil Corporation stock shall sell on the New York Curb Exchange at a price of One Dollar ($1.00) per share, or better, but the underwriter shall have an option in any event to purchase said additional 100,000 shares within said two hundred and ten (210) days at the option price of sixty-two and one-half cents (62½ cents)."

A similar arrangement was made as to the acquisition of the remaining 149,850 shares at 75 cents if the stock sold on the New York Curb Exchange at $1.12½ per share.

[33] No registration of these certificates was attempted.

[34] Upon subsequent listing of the stock, the vast majority of these certificates were exchanged for listed certificates. Temporary certificates representing a small amount of shares remained outstanding at the time of the hearing, although an offer for exchange had been promulgated.

[35] The substitution of Hiltz & Company and Harry K. Greenfield as underwriters of the registrant is reflected in the post-effective amendments of March 30, and April 12, 1937.

The underwriting agreement was modified to provide for a firm commitment on 145,000 shares at 50 cents per share, and an option on 99,863 shares at 62½ cents per share. The contract of assignment provided that Clifford would receive 8 cents per share on all shares sold by Hiltz & Company and Harry K. Greenfield.

The offering to the public by the new underwriters was made through the medium of a revised prospectus. We shall hereinafter refer to that prospectus as the Hiltz & Company prospectus. The prospectus employed by Clifford will be referred to as the Clifford prospectus.

The Alleged Deficiencies

For convenience, the alleged deficiencies will be considered according to subject matter rather than in the order of the items in the registration statement.

First. Item 31 calls for the name and address of each underwriter of the registered issue. The registrant's amended answer to this item is that "Walter Clifford was the former underwriter," and that he had assigned to Hiltz & Company, Inc., and Harry K. Greenfield all of his rights to underwrite the stock, and that the latter are the underwriters with respect to an aggregate of 244,863 shares of the registered stock. Item 35 requires a list of the persons or classes of persons (other than underwriters as such) to whom securities are proposed to be offered at prices varying from the price at which the securities are proposed to be offered to the general public, naming such persons or specifying each class, and the price to each. The amended answer to this item is that 55,137 shares were sold to Clifford, "a former underwriter," at 50 cents per share, and that "no persons or classes of persons, other than Hiltz & Company, Inc., and Harry K. Greenfield, the underwriters, are to be offered any part of the 244,863 shares of the capital stock of the registrant * * * at prices varying from the price at which the securities are proposed to be offered to the general public. * * *" Item 36 calls for a detailed list showing, in respect of each and every underwriter of the registered issue, the amount underwritten and all commissions or discounts to be paid, directly or indirectly, by the issuer in respect of the sale of the security to be offered. The amended answer to that item summarizes the terms of the registrant's prior agreement with Clifford, and the new agreement between Hiltz & Company, Inc., Greenfield, the registrant, and Clifford relative to underwriting the registered shares.

Counsel to the Commission charges that the answers to items 31, 35, and 36 of the registration statement as originally effective, and the post-effective amendments of March 30, and April 12, 1937, to these items, the Clifford prospectus, and the Hiltz & Company prospectus are materially deficient for failure to disclose required information relative to certain individuals alleged to be underwriters.

An underwriter, as defined in the Act, is one "who has purchased from an issuer with a view to, or sells for an issuer in connection with, the distribution of any security, or participates or has a direct or indirect participation in any such undertaking or participates or has a participation in the direct or indirect underwriting of any such undertaking; but such term shall not include a person whose interest is limited to a commission from an underwriter or dealer not in excess of the usual and customary distributors' or sellers' commission."

The term "underwriter," it may be noted, is broadly defined. It includes one who purchases an issue outright with the view to selling that issue to the public, as well as one who, for a commission, guarantees that an issue will be disposed of at a certain price. It includes the so-called "underwriters of the underwriter," a group which, for a commission, agrees to take over all or a portion of the underwriting risk assumed by the initial underwriter. It includes persons who participate, or have a direct or indirect participation, in any underwriting transaction. One may be an underwriter within the meaning of the Act even though he is not a formal party to the underwriting contract. See H.R. Rep.No.85, 73d Cong., 1st Sess., May 4, 1933; H.R.Rep.No.152, 73d Cong., 1st Sess., May 20, 1933.

The persons concerning whom required information was allegedly omitted from the registration statement are Paul S. Ache, Morris C. Rosenbaum, William E. Housel, Howard J. O'Connor, and Victor B. Zeman. We turn to a consideration of whether each of those persons is an underwriter within the statutory definition.[36]

Paul S. Ache. Ache, who had no official connection with the registrant, was designated to procure financing for it. For "his services in securing the contract with Walter Clifford * * * and in bringing about the refinancing of the company," the Board of Directors of the registrant, on March 23, 1936, voted to award Ache "a sum equal to ten per cent (10%) of all sums paid into the company by Clifford & Company, or Walter Clifford, under said contract. * * *"

Ache actively participated in the distribution of the underwritten securities. He touted those securities in an effort to induce purchases. He contacted security holders to persuade them to refrain from selling their securities, because such sales might render the distribution more difficult. He suggested to Clifford the names of persons whom he termed "great boosters when you are making a market," and supplied the names of many dealers who might participate in the distribution. He assisted in obtaining extensions of the Gibson-Bailey mortgage, without which financing by the registrant would have been impossible. He was instrumental in obtaining a loan of 5,000 shares of stock from one Warwick M. Downing to Clifford[37] which were sold and the proceeds employed to pay certain expenses connected with the underwriting. He constantly supplied information which was needed or desired by Clifford concerning the registrant.

Ache's participation in the distribution brought him squarely within the statutory definition of an underwriter. The award by the registrant of 10% of the amount paid into the company by Clifford may explain Ache's conduct. Since the amount of his compensation depended upon the amount paid into the company by Clifford, it was to Ache's pecuniary interest to stimulate buying power and to facilitate the distribution of the registrant's securities. But even if this monetary incentive were not present, we would be constrained to hold that Ache was an underwriter.

[36] We have held on numerous occasions that it is highly important that investors be adequately and accurately informed of arrangements for the underwriting and distribution of registered securities. See e. g., Bering Straits Tin Mines, 2 S.E.C. 486, 1937; Sweet's Steel Company, 4 S.E.C. 589, 1939.

[37] The registrant promised to return these 5,000 shares, or their stated value, which amounted to $3,750.

Morris C. Rosenbaum. Clifford's attempt to underwrite the registrant's stock, in view of his admittedly impecunious condition, is explained by the fact that Rosenbaum had represented to him that Rosenbaum could find purchasers for the shares and that he would "contact all the dealers he knew * * * and help me (Clifford) on the stock." Rosenbaum attended conferences between Ache and Clifford relative to arranging the terms of the underwriting. At these initial conferences, market operations in the stock were discussed and Rosenbaum related "what he could do" in that regard.

There existed between Rosenbaum and Clifford an agreement that "we are to share equally (50-50) in all monies received by us, over and above the price we pay for the stock of the Reiter-Foster Oil Company." Further, Rosenbaum shared the override of 8 cents per share given to Clifford as consideration for his subsequent assignment of the underwriting to the Hiltz-Greenfield group. Frequent mention is made by Clifford and others in their correspondence of Clifford's "associates" or "associate." Rosenbaum was revealed as the associate.

Counsel for the registrant urges that Rosenbaum was merely a "finder," and that the profit-sharing arrangement between him and Clifford was entered into because Clifford was unable to pay a flat sum. The record shows, however, that Rosenbaum was to take, and in fact did take, a far more active part in the proposed distribution than that of a mere "finder." [38] He induced a Mr. Sedlis of Boston to purchase 8,400 shares of the registrant's stock on the representation that he could double or triple his money. He was instrumental in obtaining the sale of 1,200 shares through another dealer. He participated in some of the conferences between Clifford and Housel which finally resulted in the assignment of the underwriting contract to Housel,[39] under which Clifford and Rosenbaum were to retain an override of 5 cents per share of each share sold. He frequently inquired of Housel as to sales, and urged greater activity in the distribution of the shares. He made arrangements for the sale, through a broker, of 6,400 shares of treasury stock of the registrant in order to provide funds for the payment of expenses of the financing program.

The existence of his agreement to share the proceeds of the underwriting provided Rosenbaum with an impulse to aid the distribution of the securities. And he did, in fact, actively participate in the distribution. He was, therefore, an underwriter.

William E. Housel. On December 14, 1936, Clifford and Housel entered into an agreement whereby Housel was constituted "exclusive selling agent, with the power to appoint subagents, dealers, and sell wholesale and retail." The agreement obligated Housel to take down [38] While an agreement to share in the profits of an underwriting does not, of itself, make the profit-sharer an underwriter, it is to be taken into account with other evidence. Puget Sound Distillery Inc., 3 S.E.C. 357, 1938.

[39] The assignment to Housel is more fully considered later.

by December 20, 1936 [40] a sufficient amount of stock to yield at least $7,000. Except for an override of 5 cents per share, Housel was to retain the proceeds from all sales of the underwritten securities. This agreement was superseded by a new contract, dated December 22, 1936, between Clifford and Housel. The new contract bore substantially the same terms as the old contract, except that it provided for a minimum take-down of 20,000 shares per month by Housel from Clifford.

Upon being advised that the contract with Housel would establish Housel as an underwriter, Clifford purported, by letter, on January 15, 1937, to cancel it. Immediately thereafter however, Clifford informed Housel that the letter was a formality and did not affect their arrangement.

Prior to and after the purported cancellation of this contract, Housel actively participated in the distribution of the stock. In aid of the distribution, he had been given a list of the registrant's stockholders by Clifford's secretary, with the consent of Lyons, president of the registrant at that time. He used that list to circularize stockholders, urging them to purchase stock at 65 cents per share. Of the 55,137 shares sold during the entire period of the "Clifford" underwriting, Housel was responsible for the sale of 26,500 shares. In one case he induced the purchase of 300 shares on the representation that the "stock could be disposed of within four months at between $2.50 and $3 per share."

Housel also made purchases on the Curb in an effort, as alleged, to arouse interest in the stock through an indication on the ticker tape of activity in the stock.[41] Together with Clifford, he had an understanding with Howard J. O'Connor that O'Connor was to make daily purchases on the Curb which would be reflected on the ticker tape. When O'Connor failed in this task, Housel himself stepped in to put "a print on the tape."[42]

Housel's sales, his interest and participation in the market operations in the stock, and his arrangement with Clifford, make it clear that he was an underwriter within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77b(11).[43]

Howard J. O'Connor.[44] O'Connor was the "market man" in the dis-

40 This was the date of termination of an extension granted by the creditors under the Gibson-Bailey mortgage for payment of the underlying debt.

41 This conduct will be discussed in detail in a later portion of this opinion.

42 Housel explained this conduct on the ground that, "We had orders and there had to be a price established, and the only way to have a price established was by having a print on the tape." Housel was referring to the provision of the underwriting agreement between Clifford and the registrant to the effect that the shares were to be sold at the last recorded sales price on the New York Curb Exchange, or at the last reported closing sales price on such Exchange. It is obvious, however, that whether or not a sale takes place on any day, the stock maintains the price established by the last transaction of a previous day.

43 The record leaves no doubt that the registrant was aware of Housel's participation. In fact, the record contains correspondence between the president of the registrant and Clifford, prior to the date the post-effective amendments were filed, noting the existence of Housel's participation. Housel was certain that Kahn, attorney for the registrant, was aware of his participation.

44 Housel assigned his agreement with Clifford to O'Connor and Kauder & Company on December 14, 1936. The results under that assignment were unsatisfactory, and that assignment was apparently nullified under the new contract of December 22, 1936, between Clifford and Housel.

tribution during the "Clifford" underwriting. It was his job to keep a print on the tape daily, as well as sell stock in the course of the distribution. He managed not only to keep a print on the tape,[45] but, on several occasions, by purchase orders at the close of the market scaled to the asked price, to raise the price of the stock. O'Connor admitted that care of the market was discussed in preliminary conferences with Housel.[46]

Clifford denied that he knew of the arrangement between Housel and O'Connor. However, Housel testified that it was agreed among Clifford, Housel and O'Connor that O'Connor was to maintain a print on the tape. O'Connor testified that Clifford complained to him several times that he had not induced sufficient activity on the market. Furthermore, Housel wrote to Clifford requesting authorizations to deliver shares to O'Connor to cover deliveries on O'Connor's sales.[47]

Counsel for the registrant argues that O'Connor was merely "a dealer or a salesman working for and on behalf of Housel" and was not an underwriter. The evidence shows that O'Connor's functions lay far beyond those of a dealer or salesman. We find him to be an underwriter. Simple vigilance in making disclosures to investors as to the manner in which the stock was being distributed required that the information disclosed in the registration statement be amplified to include O'Connor's participation.

Victor B. Zeman. In December, 1936, or January, 1937, Zeman was requested by his brother-in-law, Kenton, then vice president of the registrant, to assist in raising the capital that had not been forthcoming under the Clifford underwriting. Thereafter, Zeman undertook to obtain a successor to Clifford. Through his efforts, the Clifford underwriting contract was assigned to Hiltz & Company and Greenfield.[48]

In an effort to procure listing of the stock, Zeman, who then was an employee of Ferd. Loeb & Co.[49] in charge of all customers' men, appeared before the Listing Committee of the New York Curb Exchange and made various statements which were subsequently found to be "seriously misleading in various respects.[50] Once the distribution pro-

[45] At least four of the purchases made on the Curb by O'Connor were the only transactions of the day.

[46] "When we first discussed this thing, I told Housel, 'Let me take care of this, whoever is in, let us take care of that market.' "

[47] Kahn, the attorney procured by Rosenbaum to prepare the registration statement, testified that he was unaware of O'Connor's interest. However, he did have knowledge that O'Connor was making sales and wrote to Clifford asking for a statement of O'Connor's interest. Clifford replied that it was none of Kahn's business.

[48] Zeman and Greenfield had worked together in financial ventures in the past. All the stock taken by Greenfield pursuant to the present underwriting went into his account at Ferd. Loeb & Co.

[49] Ferd. Loeb & Co. was a member of the New York Curb Exchange. It took a commission on all shares taken down by Greenfield and brought into his account at Ferd. Loeb & Co. That firm likewise benefitted by obtaining commissions from purchases and sales on the New York Curb Exchange by the underwriters and their associates.

[50] For his conduct before the Listing Committee, Zeman was called before the Committee on Membership of the New York Curb Exchange on March 23, 1937, and was reprimanded and warned that a repetition of his conduct would bring about "a much more serious form of punishment."

gram of the new underwriting group was inaugurated, Zeman's efforts to insure the success of the undertaking were unremitting.

Zeman actively participated in the distribution of the stock. David Lewis, a customer of Ferd. Loeb & Co., whose account was handled by Zeman and Harold Loeb, a partner, testified that he purchased 1,000 shares of the registrant's stock on the representation by Zeman that the stock was in for a rise. Zeman endeavored to interest the Proucul Realty Company in distributing Reiter-Foster stock in upper New York. The Proucul Realty Company rejected that proposition. It appears, however, that the Proucul Realty Company had previously advanced $20,000 to Greenfield upon pledge of 40,000 shares of Reiter-Foster stock. Payments on the loan lagged, and the Proucul Realty Company threatened to dispose of the pledged securities on the market. Disposition of those shares would have depressed the market price, and disrupted the proposed distribution. Zeman participated in negotiations which led to the payment of the loan to Proucul Realty Company, thereby averting the threatened dumping of stock on the market.

In the course of the Hiltz-Greenfield underwriting, over $2,000 was expended in California, ostensibly to "blue sky" the shares in that state. Frank Ware, one of the partners of Hiltz & Company, wired to Hiltz in California: "Zeeman (sic) agreeable to expenditure of $2,000. * * *" This was explained by Hiltz on the ground that "We sort of took it for granted that * * * either Greenfield was representing Zeman or Zeman was representing Greenfield, or they were working together or something of that kind because one would deliver a message. * * * Zeman would come in and say 'Greenfield said so and so, or such and such.' "

Zeman was active in matters relating to the management of the registrant, which might affect the underwriters' ability to distribute the registered shares. It appears that the question of procuring a new president satisfactory to the new underwriters was discussed with Zeman. After the new president, Campbell, was chosen, he was instructed (although he declined to abide by the instruction) to report to Zeman.[51] Moreover, Zeman was consulted on one occasion as to the price at which producing properties might be acquired for the registrant in exchange for underwritten shares.

Counsel for the registrant contends that Zeman's activity can be explained on the ground that he "was attempting to aid in making successful a venture that he had persuaded others to enter into."[52] But

51 While the underwriters were pressing Campbell, president of the registrant, for "good news" from the oil fields to aid in moving the stock up, Ware, partner in Hiltz & Company, wrote a congratulatory letter to Campbell on the commencement of drilling: "I was delighted indeed to back your judgment in this new undertaking. Zeman felt the same way."

52 Apart from the facts set forth in the text, it appears that a portion of the funds employed by Greenfield to meet his underwriting commitment was traceable to various brokerage accounts, in some of which Zeman had a 50% interest. Zeman had several judgments outstanding against him. It may be, therefore, that he wished to conceal his participation in any venture which might result in a profit. Greenfield denied, however, that Zeman had a surviving interest in the funds which Greenfield removed.

000 shares might be obtained, on terms later to be arranged. The purpose was publicly to distribute the stock. From February 13 to May 6, 1936, defendants exercised the option to the extent of 6,200 shares, which they sold through the use of the mails and of the facilities of interstate commerce, both over-the-counter and on the New York Stock Exchange. Park & Tilford stock has not been registered under the 1933 Securities Act.

Defendants contend that their transactions were exempt under Sections 3(a) and 4 of the Act. Neither exemption applies to "underwriters" as defined in Section 2 (11). David A. Schulte controls both Park & Tilford, Inc., and the 1931 Corporation through stock ownership. As under the statutory definitions, 1931 Corporation is an "issuer" because under common control with the issuer, Park & Tilford, Inc., and defendants as purchasers of the stock from 1931 Corporation with a view to its distribution, are "underwriters," the transactions, as alleged in pleadings and affidavits, show violations of section 5(a).

Defendants, however, here, too, contend that there is no such danger of future violations as to justify a preliminary injunction, inasmuch as they ceased all activity in the stock on May 6, 1936, and assert that they do not contemplate any resumption thereof. Here, too, these transactions like those in General Bronze stock, were not discontinued until after the commission had begun its investigation, and there are still perhaps available to the defendants 3,800 shares under the terms of the option, as well as the possibility of obtaining a further 10,000 shares. While the situation offers a strong temptation to resume operations as the option for the 3,800 shares is at a fixed price far below the present market quotations, and while there is no such conflict as to the facts and law as in the General Bronze deals, nevertheless, I am not persuaded that there is such an imminent danger of statutory violations before the final hearing, that a temporary injunction should at this time be granted against such unlawful dealings in Park & Tilford stock.

While, therefore, the motion must be denied at this time as to such alleged unlawful dealings in General Bronze, in Park & Tilford, or as prayed for, in other stocks, it will be without prejudice to its renewal on a showing of any later unlawful transactions by defendants in any stocks. In the circumstances, an application may well be made for a preference on the trial calendar.

In the Matter of IRA HAUPT & COMPANY.

Exchange Act Release No. 3845, August 21, 1946.

Findings and Opinion of the Commission.

This proceeding was instituted under Sections 15(b) and 15A (1) (2) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 * * * to determine whether Ira Haupt & Co. ("Respondent") willfully violated Section 5 (a) of the Securities Act of 1933 and, if so, whether the revocation of its registration as a broker-dealer and its explusion or suspension from membership in the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc. ("NASD"), a registered securities association, would be in the public interest.

The alleged violation of Section 5(a) is based on Respondent's sale, for the accounts of David A. Schulte, a controlled corporation of Schulte's and David A. Schulte Trust (sometimes hereinafter referred to collectively as the "Schulte interests"), of approximately 93,000 shares of the common stock of Park & Tilford, Inc. during the period November 1, 1943, to June 1, 1944. It is conceded that the Schulte interests were in control of Park & Tilford during this period, that the sales were effected by use of the mails and instrumentalities of interstate commerce, and that the stock was not covered by a registration statement under the Securities Act. * * *

After appropriate notice a hearing was held before a trial examiner. At the hearing a stipulation of facts was submitted in lieu of testimony. A trial examiner's report was waived, briefs and reply briefs were filed, and we heard argument. * * *

Before discussing the particular problems of statutory interpretation which have been raised, it will be helpful to consider the general purposes and policy of the Securities Act.

The Securities Act.

The general policy of the Securities Act is to provide for "full disclosure of every essentially important element" attending a distribution of securities. This policy is equally applicable to the distribution of a new issue and to a redistribution of outstanding securities which "takes on the characteristics of a new offering by reason of the control of the issuer possessed by those responsible for the offering." The disclosure required takes the form of a registration statement filed with this Commission and a prospectus, summarizing the information in the registration statement, which must be furnished to prospective investors. Unless and until these requirements are fulfilled, the mails and the channels of interstate commerce are closed to the distribution or redistribution of an issue. Thus Section 5(a) prohibits the use of the mails or any means of interstate commerce to sell, or to deliver after sale, any unregistered security and Section 5(b) prohibits any such transaction with respect to registered securities unless a prospectus containing the required information is used.

Sections 3 and 4 of the Act provide certain specific exemptions from these requirements. But these exemptions are plainly designed to do no more than mark out specific situations in which Congress considered the protection afforded by registration either unnecessary, unduly burdensome, or an inappropriate subject for Federal legislation. The general pattern of the Act—a sweeping prohibition, subject to a limited number of carefully defined exemptions—considered together with the nature and particularity of the exemptions themselves emphasizes rather than obscures the basic purpose of the Act to protect investors and stresses the generality of its intended application. In this setting, it is clear that the exemptions must be strictly construed and that the claimant of an exemption has the burden of showing that he falls within the terms of the exemption he claims.[54]

The Issues Involved.

It is conceded that Respondent's transactions in Park & Tilford stock for the account of the Schulte interests constitute a violation of Section 5(a) unless an exemption was applicable to such transactions. Respondent contends that one or more of the following exemptions was applicable: Section 3(a) (1) which applies to

Any security which, prior to * * * the enactment of this title, has been sold or disposed of by the issuer * * * but this exemption shall not apply to any new offering of any such security by an issuer or underwriter * * *;

The third clause of Section 4(1) which exempts

> transactions by a dealer (including an underwriter no longer acting as an underwriter in respect of the security involved in such transaction), except transactions within one year after the first date upon which the security was bona fide offered to the public * * * by or through an underwriter * * * and except transactions as to securities constituting the whole or a part of an unsold allotment to or subscription by such dealer as a participant in the distribution of such securities * * * by or through an underwriter;

and Section 4(2) which exempts

> Brokers' transactions, executed upon customers' orders on any exchange or in the open or counter market, but not the solicitation of such orders.

The applicability of the foregoing exemptions involves the following sub-issues:

(1) Was Respondent an "underwriter" as that term is defined in Section 2 (11)?

(2) Did Respondent's transactions constitute a new offering of Park & Tilford stock by an underwriter?

(3) Is the brokerage exemption of Section 4 (2) available to an underwriter who effects a distribution of an issue for the account of a controlling stockholder through the mechanism of a stock exchange? * * *

1. Was Respondent an "Underwriter"?

Section 2 (11) defines an "underwriter" as > any person who * * * sells for an issuer in connection with, the distribution of any security * * * As used in this paragraph the term "issuer" shall include * * * any person * * * controlling * * * the issuer * * *

The purpose of the last sentence of this definition is to require registration in connection with secondary distributions through underwriters by controlling stockholders. This purpose clearly appears in the House Report on the Bill which states that it was intended:

> to bring within the provisions of the bill redistribution whether of outstanding issues or issues sold subsequently to the enactment of the bill. All the outstanding stock of a particular corporation may be owned by one individual or a select group of individuals. At some future date they may wish to dispose of their holdings and to make an offer of this stock to the public. Such a public offering may possess all the dangers attendant upon a new offering of securities. Wherever such a redistribution reaches significant proportions, the distributor would be in the position of controlling the issuer and thus able to furnish the information demanded by the bill. This being so, the distributor is treated as equivalent to the original issuer and, if he seeks to dispose of the issue through a public offering, he becomes subject to the act.[55]

It is conceded that the Schulte interests controlled Park & Tilford and that Respondent was, therefore, "selling for" a person in control of the issuer. However, Respondent denies that these sales were effected "in connection with the distribution of any security." It asserts that at no time did it intend, nor was it aware that Schulte intended, a distribution of a large block of stock. It emphasizes that, in connection with the sales by which Schulte disposed of approximately 52-000 shares over a period of six months, each order was entered by Schulte to maintain an orderly market and was limited to 200 or 300 shares at a specific price; that the authority to sell 73,000 shares for the Trust was dependent upon a market price of at least 80; that the total amount which would be sold was never fixed or ascertained, and that consequently it did not intend to sell in connection with a distribution.

"Distribution" is not defined in the Act. It has been held, however, to comprise "the entire process by which in the course of a public offering the block of securities is dispersed and ultimately comes to rest in the hands of the investing public." [56] In this case, the stipulated facts show that Schulte, owning in excess of 50,000 shares, had formulated a plan to sell his stock over the Exchange in 200 share blocks "at 59 and every quarter up" and that the Trust, holding 165,000 shares, specifically authorized the sale over the Exchange of 73,000 shares "at $80 per share or better." A total of 93,000 shares was in fact sold by Respondent for the account of the Schulte interests pursuant to these authorizations. We think these facts clearly fall within the above quoted definition and constitute a "distribution." We find no validity in the argument that a predetermination of the precise number of shares which are to be publicly dispersed is an essential element of a distribution. Nor do we think that a "distribution" loses its character as such merely because the extent of the offering may depend on certain conditions such as the market price. Indeed, in the usual case of an offering at a price, there is never any certainty that all or any specified part of the issue will be sold. And where part of an issue is outstanding, the extent of a new offering is almost always directly related to variations in the market price. Such offerings are not any less a "distribution" merely because their precise extent cannot be predetermined.

Nor can we accept Respondent's claim that it was not aware of the distribution intended by the Schulte interests. The record shows that Respondent was informed of the extent of Schulte's holdings and of his plan to sell 200 share blocks "at 59 and every quarter up." And in the case of the Trust, Respondent received its express authorization to sell up to 73,000 shares "at $80 per share or better" and affirmatively undertook to sell this block subject only to the contingency that the market reach the specified figure. Once sales were made under these authorizations we believe the foregoing facts, in themselves, show that Respondent was an underwriter selling for the Schulte interests in connection with the distribution of Park & Tilford stock. But even if we assume that the nature of the contingency and Respondent's belief as to the possibility of its fulfillment are relevant in determining the existence of a "distribution" and Respondent's status, the facts in this case show that Respondent had every reason to believe that the distribution would in fact take place.

At the time of the first discussion with Schulte, Respondent knew that the Schulte orders were to be placed after an announcement of a possible liquor dividend which was expected to create greatly increased market activity and a sharp rise in price and that the stated purpose of these orders was "to have an orderly market." Moreover, the fact that the public announcement of the possible liquor dividend was made much in advance of the date the dividend was actually declared, together with Schulte's statement as to the probable effect of the general announcement, was additional evidence that Schulte intended to distribute his holdings to the public at rising prices. The only reasonable conclusion that could have been reached by Respondent was that it was intended that a large block would be sold. This is, of course, what actually happened. In the two days after the general announcement of the liquor plan, the stock advanced from 57⅝ to 70⅞ and Respondent sold 15,700 shares for Schulte. And from December 1943 through May 1944 Respondent sold, in addition, approximately 38,000 shares for Schulte and the 1924 Corporation.

The authorization to sell 50,000 shares for the Trust was received by Respondent on March 7, 1944. At that time Respondent had already sold in excess of 45,000 shares for Schulte. Moreover, when Respondent sold 8,000 shares for the Trust in 8 trading days, its authorization from the Trust was increased to 73,000 shares. Respondent's actual sales for the Trust totalled approximately 50,000 shares in March, April and May 1944.

We conclude from the foregoing facts that Respondent was selling for the Schulte interests, controlling stockholders of Park & Tilford, in connection with the distribution of their holdings in the stock and was, therefore, an "underwriter" within the meaning of the Act.

2. Did Respondent's Transactions Constitute a New Offering of Park & Tilford Stock?

The exemption of Section 3(a) (1) does not apply to "any new offering * * * by an * * * underwriter" and the exemption in the third clause of Section 4 (1) is not available to transactions in a security within one year after the first date upon which such security is "bona fide offered to the public * * * by or through an underwriter." The applicability of these exemptions to Respondent's transactions depends, therefore, on whether these transactions were part of a new offering to the public by or through an underwriter. We have already found that Respondent acted as an underwriter in connection with the distribution of the Park & Tilford stock to the public. We think it clear that, in the context of this case, the "distribution" of a controlling block of stock is a "new offering." [57] Respondent has not attempted to make any distinction between these terms and appears to treat them as synonomous.[58] Accordingly, we find that Respondent's transactions in Park & Tilford stock were made as an underwriter and as part of a new offering to the public and that the exemptions of Section 3(a) (1) and the third clause of Section 4 (1) were not, therefore, applicable to such transactions. * * * we find it appropriate in the public interest and for the protection of investors to suspend Respondent from membership in the NASD for a period of 20 days.

An appropriate order will issue.

6. REGISTRATION STATEMENT AND PROSPECTUS

REGISTRATION OF SECURITIES AND SIGNING OF REGISTRATION STATEMENT

Sec. 6. (a) Any security may be registered with the Commission under the terms and conditions hereinafter provided, by filing a registration statement in triplicate, at least one of which shall be signed by each issuer, its principal executive officer or officers, its principal financial officer, its comptroller or principal accounting officer, and the majority of its board of directors or persons performing similar functions (or, if there is no board of directors or persons performing similar functions, by the majority of the persons or board having the power of management of the issuer), and in case the issuer is a foreign or Territorial person by its duly authorized representative in the United States; except that when such [57] See H.R.Rep.No.85, 73d Cong., 1st Sess., p. 14 which in discussing the scope of a "new offering . . . by an issuer or underwriter" (the exception to the exemption provided in Section 3(a) (1) states:

"Also the exemption does not apply to any redistribution of outstanding issues which would otherwise come within the act." (Italics ours.)

[58] Respondent's brief, pp. 24-25 states:

"The terms 'new offering' and 'distribution' are nowhere defined in the statute. However, they undoubtedly connote a pre-arranged program for the distribution of a substantial block of securities, so that it finally rests in the hands of the investing public."

registration statement relates to a security issued by a foreign government, or political subdivision thereof, it need be signed only by the underwriter of such security. Signatures of all such persons when written on the said registration statements shall be presumed to have been so written by authority of the person whose signature is so affixed and the burden of proof, in the event such authority shall be denied, shall be upon the party denying the same. The affixing of any signature without the authority of the purported signer shall constitute a violation of this title. A registration statement shall be deemed effective only as to the securities specified therein as proposed to be offered.

(b) At the time of filing a registration statement the applicant shall pay to the Commission a fee of one one-hundredth of 1 per centum of the maximum aggregate price at which such securities are proposed to be offered, but in no case shall such fee be less than $25.

(c) The filing with the Commission of a registration statement, or of an amendment to a registration statement, shall be deemed to have taken place upon the receipt thereof, but the filing of a registration statement shall not be deemed to have taken place unless it is accompanied by a United States postal money order or a certified bank check or cash for the amount of the fee required under subsection (b).

(d) The information contained in or filed with any registration statement shall be made available to the public under such regulations as the Commission may prescribe, and copies thereof, photostatic or otherwise, shall be furnished to every applicant at such reasonable charge as the Commission may prescribe.

(e) No registration statement may be filed within the first forty days following the enactment of this Act.

INFORMATION REQUIRED IN REGISTRATION STATEMENT

Sec. 7. The registration statement, when relating to a security other than a security issued by a foreign government, or political subdivision thereof, shall contain the information, and be accompanied by the documents, specified in Schedule A, and when relating to a security issued by a foreign government, or political subdivision thereof, shall contain the information, and be accompanied by the documents, specified in Schedule B, except that the Commission may by rules or regulations provide that any such information or document need not be included in respect of any class of issuers or securities if it finds that the requirement of such information or document is inapplicable to such class and that disclosure fully adequate for the protection of investors is otherwise required to be included within the registration statement. If any accountant, engineer, or appraiser, or any person whose profession gives authority to a statement made by him, is named as having prepared or certified any part of the registration statement, or is named as having prepared or certified a report or valuation for use in connection with the registration statement, the written consent of such person shall be filed with the registration statement. If any such person is named as having prepared or certified a report or valuation (other than a public official document or statement) which is used in connection with the registration statement, but is not named as having prepared or certified such report or valuation for use in connection with the registration statement, the written consent of such person shall be filed with the registration statement unless the Commission dispenses with such filing as impracticable or as involving undue hardship on the person filing the registration statement. Any such registration statement shall contain such other information, and be accompanied by such other documents, as the Commission may by rules or regulations require as being necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

TAKING EFFECT OF REGISTRATION STATEMENTS AND AMENDMENTS THERETO

Sec. 8. (a) Except as hereinafter provided, the effective date of a registration statement shall be the twentieth day after the filing thereof or such earlier date as the Commission may determine, having due regard to the adequacy of the information respecting the issuer theretofore available to the public, to the facility with which the nature of the securities to be registered, their relationship to the capital structure of the issuer and the rights of holders thereof can be understood, and to the public interest and the protection of investors. If any amendment to any such statment is filed prior to the effective date of such statement, the registration statement shall be deemed to have been filed when such amendment was filed; except that an amendment filed with the consent of the Commission, prior to the effective date of the registration statement, or filed pursuant to an order of the Commission, shall be treated as a part of the registration statement.

(b) If it appears to the Commission that a registration statement is on its face incomplete or inaccurate in any material respect, the Commission may, after notice by personal service or the sending of confirmed telegraphic notice not later than ten days after the filing of the registration statement, and opportunity for hearing (at a time fixed by the Commission) within ten days after such notice by personal service or the sending of such telegraphic notice, issue an order prior to the effective date of registration refusing to permit such statement to become effective until it has been amended in accordance with such order. When such statement has been amended in accordance with such order the Commission shall so declare and the registration shall become effective at the time provided in subsection (a) or upon the date of such declaration, whichever date is the later.

(c) An amendment filed after the effective date of the registration statement, if such amendment, upon its face, appears to the Commission not to be incomplete or inaccurate in any material respect, shall become effective on such date as the Commission may determine, having due regard to the public interest and the protection of investors.

(d) If it appears to the Commission at any time that the registration statement includes any untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state any material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, the Commission may, after notice by personal service or the sending of confirmed telegraphic notice, and after opportunity for hearing (at a time fixed by the Commission) within fifteen days after such notice by personal service or the sending of such telegraphic notice, issue a stop order suspending the effectiveness of the registration statement. When such statement has been amended in accordance with such stop order the Commission shall so declare and thereupon the stop order shall cease to be effective.

(e) The Commission is hereby empowered to make an examination in any case in order to determine whether a stop order should issue under subsection (d). In making such examination the Commission or any officer or officers designated by it shall have access to and may demand the production of any books and papers of, and may administer oaths and affirmations to and examine, the issuer, underwriter, or any other person, in respect of any matter relevant to the examination, and may, in its discretion, require the production of a balance sheet exhibiting the assets and liabilities of the issuer, or its income statement, or both, to be certified to by a public or certified accountant approved by the Commission. If the issuer or underwriter shall fail to cooperate, or shall obstruct or refuse to permit the making of an examination, such conduct shall be proper ground for the issuance of a stop order.

(f) Any notice required under this section shall be sent to or served on the issuer, or, in case of a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, to or on the underwriter, or, in the case of a foreign or Territorial person, to or on its duly authorized representative in the United States named in the registration statement, properly directed in each case of telegraphic notice to the address given in such statement. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 77 f, g, h.

INFORMATION REQUIRED IN PROSPECTUS

Sec. 10. (a) A prospectus—

(1) when relating to a security other than a security issued by a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, shall contain the same statements made in the registration statement, but it need not include the documents referred to in paragraphs (28) to (32), inclusive, of Schedule A;

(2) when relating to a security issued by a foreign government or political subdivision thereof shall contain the same statements made in the registration statement, but it need not include the documents referred to in paragraphs (13) and (14) of Schedule B.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a)—

(1) When a prospectus is used more than thirteen months after the effective date of the registration statement, the information in the statements contained therein shall be as of a date not more than twelve months prior to such use, so far as such information is known to the user of such prospectus or can be furnished by such user without unreasonable effort or expense.

(2) there may be omitted from any prospectus any of the statements required under such subsection (a) which the Commission may by rules or regulations designate as not being necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

(3) any prospectus shall contain such other information as the Commission may by rules or regulations require as being necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

(4) in the exercise of its powers under paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection, the Commission shall have authority to classify prospectuses according to the nature and circumstances of their use, and, by rules and regulations and subject to such terms and conditions as it shall specify therein, to prescribe as to each class the form and contents which it may find appropriate to such use and consistent with the public interest and the protection of investors.

(c) The statements or information required to be included in a prospectus by or under authority of subsection (a) or (b), when written, shall be placed in a conspicuous part of the prospectus in type as large as that used generally in the body of the prospectus.

(d) In any case where a prospectus consists of a radio broadcast, copies thereof shall be filed with the Commission under such rules and regulations as it shall prescribe. The Commission may by rules and regulations require the filing with it of forms and prospectuses used in connection with the sale of securities registered under this title. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77j.

DEFINITIONS

Sec. 2. (4) The term "issuer" means every person who issues or proposes to issue any security; except that with respect to certificates of deposit, voting-trust certificates, or collateral-trust certificates, or with respect to certificates of interest or shares in an unincorporated investment trust not having a board of directors (or persons performing similar functions) or of the fixed, restricted management, or unit type, the term 'issuer' means the person or persons performing the acts and assuming the duties of depositor or manager pursuant to the provisions of the trust or other agreement or instrument under which such securities are issued; except that in the case of an unincorporated association which provides by its articles for limited liability of any or all of its members, or in the case of a trust, committee, or other legal entity, the trustees or members thereof shall not be individually liable as issuers of any security issued by the association, trust, committee, or other legal entity; except that with respect to equipment-trust certificates or like securities, the term "issuer" means the person by whom the equipment or property is or is to be used; and except that with respect to fractional undivided interests in oil, gas, or other mineral rights, the term "issuer" means the owner of any such right or of any interest in such right (whether whole or fractional) who creates fractional interests therein for the purpose of public offering. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77b (4).

(A) The phrase "other legal entity" of Section 2(4) does not include a corporation. Landay v. United States, 108 F.2d 698, C.C.A.Mich.1939, cert. den. 309 U.S. 681, 60 S.Ct. 721, 84 L.Ed. 1024, April 1, 1940 (the indicted defendants had voted their shares of stock in a block thereby dominating B Co., which, as "issuer," had violated Section 17(a) (1) and (2). It was held that defendants, by their acts, had made the acts of B Co. their own, thus making them "issuers" and criminally liable for the violations).

(B) The principal objective of the Securities Act is to protect investors by requiring a full and accurate disclosure of the material facts regarding securities offered for sale in interstate commerce or by the use of the mails. In order to accomplish this, the Act provides that, before non-exempt securities may be offered or sold to the public through the mails or in interstate commerce, a registration statement must be filed with the Commission and must become effective. In general, government and municipal securities and the issues of banks, railroads, and cooperatives are exempt from the provisions of the Act.

In order to register securities the issuer must file a registration statement on the particular form prescribed by the Commission as appropriate to the type of security proposed to be offered. When a registration statement is filed it becomes a public document designed to set forth all the material facts known to the issuer and the underwriters with regard to the company and the securities to be sold. These include, among other things, statements with regard to the character, size and profitableness of the business, its capitalization, the purpose of the issue, options outstanding against securities of the issuer, remuneration of officers and directors, bonus and profit-sharing arrangements, underwriters' commissions, and pending or threatened legal proceedings. Certified financial statements must be included. In order that investors may have in convenient form the basic material contained in the registration statement, the Act also requires that they be furnished a prospectus containing at least the more important information in the registration statement. In addition to providing the public information on which to reach an informed judgment with regard to whether or not to purchase securities, the registration statement and prospectus serve as a record of the representations made at the time the securities were sold, and thereby simplify the problem of proof in any legal proceedings which may arise with regard to whether the registration statement or the prospectus contains untrue or misleading statements or omits material information.

Experts were drafted from specialized classes of issuers to assist in the preparation of forms and rules suitable to the specialized needs of their particular fields. It has been the Commission's established practice from the outset to submit every proposed registration form to those persons to whom it would apply and to seek their comments and criticisms. Through this system improvement has been made from time to time in the process for registering securities. It has been the constant aim of the Commission to devise additional ways of simplifying the mechanics of registration that could be made effective without foregoing the protection of the public and investors. It should be borne in mind, however, when it is asserted that some of the disclosures required appear to be needlessly searching, that the evaluation of a corporate security by the public is difficult under the most favorable circumstances and it is rendered unnecessarily hazardous if it must be done without all the relevant facts. It is not a simple thing to draft a registration form to meet the needs of vast corporations which are not simple, which had intricate capital structures, scores of subsidiary companies and far-flung and varied business activities. Late in 1942 the Commission effected a comprehensive simplification of a number of registration and reporting requirements under several of the statutes, including a new general form for registration of commercial and industrial corporate securities. This form, S-1, permits the filing of the prospectus as a principal part of the registration statement, thus eliminating much duplication between the prospectus and the registration statement proper.

The examination of a registration statement by the Commission's staff does not involve and is not concerned with an appraisal of the merits of the security as an investment since the Commission is not authorized to and does not pass judgment upon the soundness of any security. Under the Act, speculative or apparently unsound issues can be registered and sold provided the whole truth is told. It follows that the Commission does not direct the flow of capital or try to do so, although, of course, the necessity of disclosing the truth concerning the security flotations may affect their reception. The basic policy is not to attempt to protect the investor by insulating him from risk but to make available to him the information with which to gauge the risk.

The Commission has no authority specifically to require an amendment to the registration statement. However, it is authorized by Section 8 of the Act to issue an order preventing or suspending the effectiveness of a registration statement if, after notice and opportunity for hearing, it finds that the statement is inaccurate or incomplete in any material respect. Ordinarily this procedure is unnecessary and the Commission does not resort to it except in those cases where there has been a definite or intentional effort to conceal or mislead.

In the interest of good administration, fair treatment of registrants, and minimum interference with business, a procedure not specifically spelled out in the Act was adopted early in its administration. Registrants are informally advised of any material misrepresentations or omissions as promptly as possible after the statements are filed, thus affording an opportunity for the filing of correcting amendments before the statements become effective. Through this "letter of deficiencies" the Commission is able to advise the registrant of the information that must be corrected or supplemented in order to meet the disclosure standards prescribed by Congress. Another informal procedure that has proved useful is the pre-filing conference in which representatives of registrants and underwriters discuss problems in connection with the proposed filing with the Commission's staff for the purpose of determining in advance what types or methods of disclosure would be necessary under the circumstances of the individual case. This informal method of handling cases has injected an element of flexibility into the registration procedure which has proved so satisfactory that it has not been necessary to issue a stop order since 1941.

The time required to examine and clear a registration statement depends largely on whether a simple or complex situation is involved. The original Section 8(a) of the Act required a twenty-day waiting period after filing before the registration statement could become effective. Moreover, any amendment filed prior to the effective date starts the twenty-day period running anew unless the Commission accelerates the amendment by dating its filing back to the original filing date of the registration statement. The principal objectives of the waiting period are to give the public an opportunity to absorb the information in the prospectus or registration statement and to get away from the hasty methods of distribution previously in vogue which practically compelled minor distributors and dealers to make commitments blindly.

The Commission has endeavored to adapt its procedures to the accustomed practices of business men and distributors of securities in so far as this is consistent with the intent of Congress and the protection of investors. When the Commission found, therefore, after a study of the needs of the business, that a twenty-day waiting period after the filing of amendments would, in many cases, involve an unnecessary hardship, it adopted the policy, when amendments are not too important and complicated, of permitting registration to become effective on the twentieth day after the original filing date or as soon thereafter as possible.

On August 22, 1940, Section 8(a) was amended, with the support of the Commission, to give the Commission discretionary authority to accelerate the effective date under certain circumstances without regard to the original twenty-day period. In other words, the amended section provides that the effective date shall be the twentieth day after the filing of a registration statement or such earlier day as the Commission may determine but the Commission is required to give due regard to such matters as the adequacy of the information respecting the issuer which has previously been made public and the ease with which the rights of the holders of the securities to be issued can be understood. The Commission cooperates with registrants in expediting registration as much as possible consistent with the public interest and the protection of investors. Registrants who are able readily to meet the standards of the Act and the rules of the Commission obtain effective registration of their securities in substantially less than twenty days after filing.

Since Section 5 of the Act prohibits offers or sales to be made prior to the effectiveness of the registration statement, issuers and underwriters were, at first, reluctant to send out any information to potential investors during the waiting period for fear such circulation would be construed as an offer to sell securities. Early in its history, therefore, the Commission, in order to make information available to potential investors, published several opinions of its general counsel to the effect that distribution of information contained in the registration statement prior to the effective date of the registration statement would not constitute an illegal offer provided it were very clearly explained that the circulation was not intended as an offer of the security. This has resulted in the more or less common practice of underwriters and dealers circulating, prior to the effective date of the registration statement, the so-called "red herring" prospectus which derives its name from the practice of printing in red letters either diagonally across or along the margin of each page a clear statement that the document is not intended as an offer of the security and directing attention to the prohibitions in the Act against offers prior to effective registration. IN THE MATTER OF THOMAS BOND, INC.

5 S.E.C. 60, 1939.

This is a proceeding under Section 8(d) of the Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77h(d), to determine whether a stop order should issue suspending the effectiveness of a registration statement filed September 28, 1938, on Form A-1 by Thomas Bond, Inc., a Delaware corporation. * * *

In our opinion the principal deficiency in this registration statement relates to the balance sheet submitted in answer to Item 54.

The registrant's authorized capital stock consists of 50,000 shares of Class A Common, par value $5, and 150,000 shares of Class B common, par value 50 cents. Registration is sought for the Class A shares and 50,000 of the Class B, which are to be sold in units of one share each at $5 per unit. With the proceeds the registrant intends to engage in the manufacture and sale of cosmetics and allied lines, especially a product developed by its president, Thomas Bond, and described as an easily self-applied face dressing unlike any other preparation on the market.

All of the authorized Class B stock, 150,000 shares with a par value of $75,000, was issued to Bond in exchange for a formula for the cosmetic and in consideration of disbursements and advances made on behalf of the issuer amounting to $2,792.07. As part of the same transaction Bond donated back to the issuer 50,000 shares. The formula thus acquired is carried in the registrant's balance sheet, as of August 31, 1938, at $72,207.93, which sum represents the difference between the par value of the shares issued to Bond and the advances made by him to the corporation.

We have frequently held that to permit the amount at which property is carried on the balance sheet to include the par value of shares issued therefor and concurrently donated back to the issuer is improper and misleading. In the matter of Unity Gold Corporation, 1 S.E.C. 25, 32, 1934; In the matter of Yumuri Jute Mills Company, 2 S.E.C. 81, 85–86, 1927; In the matter of Bering Straits Tin Mines, Inc., 2 S.E.C. 486, 496, 1937; In the matter of Virginia City Gold Mining Company, 2 S.E.C. 855, 858, 1937.

In addition to setting up the formula at the full amount of the par value of the shares issued for it, without deducting the shares donated to the issuer, the registrant credited "surplus" with $25,000 representing the shares donated. This "surplus" is as fictitious as the excess amount at which the formula was carried on the balance sheet.

The balance sheet item for the formula should have been further reduced by an amount equal to the par value of shares issued for promotional services. Out of the 100,000 shares of Class B stock remaining in Bond's possession after the donation previously referred to, Bond issued 25,900 shares to Norman W. Cook, secretary-treasurer of the issuer, and 1,000 shares to O. William Goes, vice-president. Although Bond is the only person named in the registration statement as a promoter, it is disclosed elsewhere in the registration statement that these shares were issued "in consideration of valuable services rendered to him and to the Company during the organization period." Bond, being at the time in complete control of the company, was merely a conduit through which these shares were in effect transferred by the company to the other promoters. Proper accounting practice, we have previously held, requires that shares issued for promotional services be listed separately from expenditures representing the consideration paid for physical property. In the matter of Unity Gold Corporation, supra; In the matter of Richard Ramore Gold Mines, Ltd., 2 S.E.C. 377, 390, 1937. We know of no sound reason for any different treatment in the case of an intangible asset such as the registrant's formula.

Finally, even if the amount at which the formula was carried on the balance sheet had been reduced to eliminate the shares donated back and those issued for the promotional services, still the remaining figure is misleading in the absence of a statement that it was arbitrarily fixed by the registrant and the vendor, who was the principal promoter, without arms-length bargaining and without any reference to the cost of the formula to the vendor. A dollar-and-cents figure set opposite an item of property implies that it was reached on some rational or precise basis; the fact that it was arbitrarily reached should be disclosed.

It follows that the balance sheet submitted in response to Item 54 is inaccurate and materially misleading.

There are several other matters remaining to be considered. Several of them are of such a nature that, in the absence of the important deficiency already noted, it would be at least questionable whether it would not be best to permit amendments to be made rather than resort to a stop order.

Facing Page. The date of the proposed public offering, among other information, is required to be disclosed on the facing page. Since this was not done, the facing page is deficient.

Item 3. This item requires a brief statement of the business done and intended to be done by the issuer. The registrant's answer mentions the name under which it proposes to market its products, but fails to disclose that the name selected has, for some time, been the registered trade-mark of another concern. This was one of the more important omissions.

Item 11. This item calls for the names and addresses of directors and the chief executive, financial and accounting officers of the issuer. The registrant's answer indicates that Bond, Cook and Goes are president, secretary-treasurer, and vice-president, respectively, of the issuer, but fails to disclose the fact that they are also the directors of the corporation. The answer to the item is therefore materially deficient.

Item 13. This item calls for the names and addresses of the promoters of the corporation. The registrant named only Thomas T. Bond. The evidence shows that both Norman W. Cook and O. William Goes assisted Bond in getting the enterprise under way. The three consulted together frequently. Cook contributed financial aid, and Goes, who was in the advertising business, frequently advised Bond concerning marketing problems. Not only were these two men recompensed by payments in stock out of the 100,000 shares received by Bond, but both became members of the registrant's original board of directors. They were not engaged by Bond to do any particular task, but joined with him in planning and financing the enterprise. We find that both Cook and Goes were promoters and that the answer to Item 13 omitted to state material facts.

Item 15. This item requires the name and address of the independent certified or public accountant, if any, preparing and certifying audits or examinations of the issuer's accounts, together with the scope, frequency, and regularity thereof. The registrant's answer consisted merely of the name and address of the accountant who prepared the financial statements submitted as a part of the registration statement. There is evidence in the record that the registrant had made tentative arrangements for periodic audits although none had been made up to the time of the filing of the registration statement. The answer, in our opinion, is deficient for failure to disclose the nature of these arrangements.

Items 19 and 20. Items 19 and 20 call for certain information concerning the stock authorized, outstanding, and to be issued under the registration statement. The registrant's answer to Item 19 states that 150,000 shares of Class B stock are outstanding, without indicating that 50,000 shares of this amount had been donated to the corporation. There was no indication in these items that 50,000 of the 150,000 shares were treasury stock rather than outstanding in the hands of the public. Both Item 19 and Item 20 require disclosure of the dividend rate, if any, for each class of stock. The registrant's answers stating that the dividend rate of the Class A stock is 35 cents are inadequate. The fact should also have been disclosed that dividends on the Class A stock are cumulative when earned, and only to the extent earned. It follows that Items 19 and 20 are materially deficient.

Item 27. This item calls for a detailed statement of the uses to which the proceeds of the issue are intended to be put. The registrant answered with estimates in certain fairly broad categories, such as: "Estimated cost of raw materials, packaging, labels, etc., sufficient for one year's supply * * * $49,000;" "Estimated cost of machinery and equipment (Factory $3,000.00; Office $2,000.00) * * * $5,000;" "Estimated expenditure for advertising through newspaper and radio channels, counter and window displays * * * $54,000." Counsel for the Commission challenged the answer on the grounds that the estimates were inaccurate and not sufficiently detailed. None of the estimates was proved to be inaccurate, and we agree with the trial examiner's finding that they are as detailed as can be expected from a corporation in a promotional stage. We find no deficiency in this item.

Item 33. Item 33 calls for a statement of the price per unit at which the securities are to be sold to the underwriter. The answer states, among other things, that the underwriter, Franklin Flick & Company, Incorporated, has agreed to "take down" the entire offering. This expression, as we have previously held, creates the impression that the underwriter has entered into a binding commitment to purchase the registrant's securities. Since the underwriter of the present offering is required by his contract merely to use his best efforts to sell the issuer's securities, the statement above referred to is materially misleading.

Item 34. This item calls for the price per unit at which the security is proposed to be offered to the public. The registrant has stated that its securities will be offered at $5 a unit of one share of Class A and one share of Class B, but that if the shares are listed on an exchange then the price shall be determined for each day by the closing price on the exchange for the previous day. Counsel for the Commission points out that in the underwriting agreement it is provided that the underwriter reserves the right to trade in units for its own account. In view of this provision it was claimed that the answer to Item 34 was deficient for failure to state whether or not the underwriter intends to stabilize the market. We have previously held that where securities are offered "at the market" and where there has been activity influencing the market or where it is intended to influence the market in the future, such facts must be set forth. Since the underwriter reserved the right to trade in these securities for its own account, we find that it was incumbent on the registrant to disclose that fact and the intention of the underwriter as to whether this right was to be used to stabilize the securities. We therefore find that the registrant omitted to state material facts necessary to be stated.

Item 36. This item requires a statement of the commissions to be paid to each underwriter. The answer, like the answer to Item 33 discussed above, implies that there is a firm obligation on the part of the underwriter to take the entire issue. The item is materially deficient in this respect.

Furthermore, there was not disclosed in answer to the item a service contract between the issuer and Franklin Flick & Company, the underwriter, pursuant to which the underwriter has received $1,250 in recompense for services in connection with the registration of the issue. We find that this agreement was so closely connected with the "sale" of the securities that it should have been disclosed in response to the item.

Finally the underwriting contract provided for an alternative measure of compensation to the underwriter in the event the registrant should fail to perform its part of the agreement. We find that the omission to set this forth was material.

Item 37. This item requires an itemized statement of expenses, other than commissions, incurred or to be incurred in connection with the sale of the securities to be offered. The statement of expenses furnished was not itemized. Furthermore, the expenses to be incurred for printing stock certificates, for stamp tax, etc., enumerated by the registrant under Item 27 were not included. We find the answer to the item materially deficient.

Item 39. This item, among other things, calls for the names and addresses of promoters to whom any amounts have been paid within two years preceding the filing of the registration statement, or to whom any amount is intended to be paid, and the consideration therefor. Although the registrant's answer supplies information concerning the issuance of stock to Bond, Cook and Goes, no mention is made of the fact that Bond will receive $6,000; Cook, $4,000; and Goes, $2,000 for their services as president, secretary-treasurer, and vice-president, respectively, during the issuer's current fiscal year. This information, it is true, is furnished elsewhere in the registration statement, but, as we have said, "it is Item 39 to which investors will naturally turn for a complete statement of the promoters' total compensation." In the matter of West Park Apartments Corporation, 13 S.E.C. 900, 1938, Securities Act Release No. 1811. These salaries should have been disclosed, and the answer to Item 39 is materially deficient for this reason. Cf. In the matter of Doris Ruby Mining Company, 4 S.E.C. 427, 1939, Securities Act Release No. 1884.

Items 40–44. These items require information as to the use to be made of the proceeds of the issue in making purchases not in the ordinary course of business. The registrant has answered that it does not intend to make any such purchases. It is evident that a corporation in the promotional stage must make initial expenditures which are not "in the ordinary course of business." In this case the answer to Item 27 shows an intention to do so. Therefore the answers to these items omit material information. In view of the fact that it would be obvious to investors that the registrant must make purchases not in the ordinary course of business, we would not, in the absence of other deficiencies, base a stop order on these omissions alone.

Item 45. This item calls for the details of any sales within the past two years of property to the corporation by directors, officers, underwriters or principal stockholders. The registrant has set forth briefly the sale of the formula and trade name by Bond to the corporation. Counsel for the Commission asserts that the answer should be amplified by setting forth the cost of the formula and the trade name to Bond. The purpose of this item is obviously to disclose profits made by the named persons from sales to the corporation. If a promoter had purchased property sold to a corporation, we believe the price he paid, and the profit he received, should be set forth. In the matter of La Luz Mining Corporation, 1 S.E.C. 217, 1935. Similarly, where the promoter and principal stockholder's interest in the property is a result of discovery or invention, the cost of development is the only measure of his financial interest. Although the property may be worth the amount paid therefor by the registrant, investors are entitled to full information as to the extent of the promoters' interest and profit.

Item 46. This item calls for the dates of, parties to, and general effect of, all material contracts not made in the ordinary course of the issuer's business. We find that the registrant's summary of its agreement with Franklin Flick & Company is incomplete. It does not disclose a provision whereby the issuer, in the event the agreement is not carried out by it, becomes liable to the underwriter to the extent of $1,000 per month and 10% of the public offering price of any unsold securities. This was a material omission.

The answer is further deficient in failing to summarize the contract with the underwriter by which the latter agreed to have the securities registered.

Item 52. Under this item the registrant is required to submit, among other things, a complete list of the parents of the issuer. The answer states that the issuer has no parents, and further that it is controlled jointly by Bond, who owns 73,100 shares or 48.73%, and Cook, who owns 25,900 shares or 17.2% of the present outstanding Class B (voting) stock. These percentages are incorrect, having been based upon the supposition that 150,000 shares of Class B stock were outstanding. As previously noted under Items 19 and 20, the issuer has but 100,000 shares of Class B outstanding in the hands of the public. On this basis, Bond would appear to own 73.1% of the outstanding stock and thus control the issuer. The term "parent" is defined by our rules as a person that directly, or indirectly, through one or more intermediaries, controls another. Item 52 is therefore deficient in failing to name Bond as a parent. In the matter of Austin Silver Mining Company, 3 S.E.C. [601] 1938, Securities Act Release No. 1774.

Item 53. This item calls for a description of the voting rights, preferences, conversion, exchange rights, rights to dividends, profits, etc., for each class of capital stock previously authorized and outstanding. The registrant in its answer summarized pertinent provisions of its charter. Counsel for the Commission claims that the answer is deficient because it fails to state that there are no exchange or conversion rights. We believe that the absence of a description of such rights implies a negation that such rights exist and that the item is not deficient in this respect.

Item 54. The deficiencies in this item have been discussed above.

Accountant's Certificate. Rule 651 of the General Rules and Regulations under the Securities Act of 1933 specified the minimum contents for accountants' certificates required to be filed with financial statements. Among other things, this rule provides that the certificate of the accountant shall state clearly the opinion of the accountant as to "the accounting principles and procedures followed by the person or persons whose statements are furnished." The registrant included in its registration statement a certificate by Herman A. Mueller certifying that the financial statements were in accordance with accepted principles of accounting, but omitting entirely any reference to the principles and procedures followed by the registrant. We find that the certificate failed to comply with Rule 651 in this respect.

Attorney's Consent to Use of Statement in Registration Statement. An opinion of an attorney for the registrant on the legality of the formation of the corporation and on the issue of its stock was included in the registration statement as Exhibit F. The opinion concluded with a consent by the attorney to the use of the opinion in connection with the registration statement. However, the opinion and consent filed with the Commission is not signed by counsel although there is a certificate by the secretary of the corporation that it is a true copy. Section 11 of the Securities Act imposes certain liabilities on a person "whose profession gives authority to a statement made by him, who has with his consent been named as having prepared or certified any part of the registration statement." Section 7 of the Act requires that "the written consent of such person shall be filed with the registration statement." We interpret this provision, in view of the serious consequences which might result from the improper use of the opinion of an expert, to require that an original (or duplicate original) of the consent be filed. We find that the filing of an unsigned duplicate does not comply with Section 7.

Prospectus. The statement is made in the prospectus that the cosmetic proposed to be manufactured by the registrant "conquers lines, blackheads, oily skins and coarse pores." Government experts, however, testified that the product had no medicinal or curative properties and would not accomplish the results claimed. In fact, officers of the registrant corporation admitted at the hearing that it merely concealed these conditions. It follows that the statement above quoted is untrue.

The registrant has included in its prospectus a statement of the "investment and speculative possibilities" of its securities. Under this heading the registrant has first stated that "The Corporation's earnings possibilities can only be correctly estimated at such time as production is in full operation on a regular Schedule." After this warning the prospectus goes on to estimate (on the basis of the total number of drug stores and a sale of 40 jars a store by half of them) annual sales of over 1,000,000 jars a year, and further states, "The profit margin, after allowing the highest expense burden possible against a sales figure well under one million jars, is still slightly in excess of 25%, a figure which should increase as time goes on and the merits of the product become more widely known and a new business and repeat orders swell the sales volume." It is our opinion that these statements lend an appearance of predictability of future profits which is improper for a corporation which has yet to start business. Although stated as an estimate of future profits, the use of definite figures is misleading.

The prospectus is also deficient in so far as it reflects the omissions and misstatements previously discussed.

To sum up: We find that the facing page, Items 3, 11, 13, 15, 19, 20, 33, 34, 36, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 52, and 54, the accountant's certificate, the attorney's consent and the prospectus are, for reasons stated, materially deficient. We find no material deficiencies in Items 14, 27, and 53 and in Schedules 2, 3, and 5 to the balance sheet.

Although the proposed amendments submitted after the record was closed would seem to cure many of the deficiencies charged in the original notice, they appear on their face to be incomplete and inaccurate in certain material respects. The Commission is therefore precluded by Section 8(c) of the Act from exercising its discretion to permit the amendments to become effective. In the matter of Unity Gold Corporation, 3 S.E.C. [618], 1938.

A stop order will issue in accordance with these findings.

NOTE

The provisions of the Securities Act authorize the Commission to refuse to permit a registration statement to become effective if it appears on its face to be incomplete or inaccurate in any material respect, and empower the Commission to issue a stop order suspending the effectiveness of any registration statement which at any time is found to include any untrue statement of a material fact or to omit to state any material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading. These provisions of the Act have been construed by the courts in several important cases. In Jones v. S.E.C., 298 U.S. 1, 56 S.Ct. 654 (1936), a majority of the Supreme Court (Justices Cardozo, Brandeis and Stone dissenting) held that the commencement of stop order proceedings by the Commission prevented Jones' registration statement from ever becoming effective and that since none of the securities sought to be registered had been offered or sold there was no public interest which could be prejudiced by its withdrawal in accordance with Jones' request. On this basis the Court held that the Commission had erred in denying withdrawal of the statement. This decision has been considered as largely limited to the procedure which the Supreme Court deemed proper for the Commission to employ in connection with the suspension of the effectiveness of registration statements. In a later case in 1939, Oklahoma-Texas Trust v. S.E.C., 100 F.2d 888, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit unanimously affirmed an order of the Commission suspending the registration of securities because of fraudulent misstatements contained in the registration statement. There it appeared that all of the securities registered had been sold prior to the commencement of the stop order proceedings and the Trust contended that under the authority of the Jones case the Commission had lost its power to issue a stop order. The court distinguished the Jones case, however, on the ground that here the public interest would be prejudiced by permitting the registrant to withdraw its registration statement. Immediate and subsequent purchasers of the securities were entitled to be apprised of the fact that the registration statement, a matter of public record, upon which they had relied, was false and misleading, and to have the benefit of the civil liability provisions which gave them various remedies for the losses which they sustained on the securities. In other cases the courts have held that a stop order suspending the effectiveness of a registration statement is not reviewable by the courts after it has been lifted upon the filing of amendments in accordance with the stop order (Austin Silver Mining Co. v S.E.C., 1 S.E.C. Jud.Dec. 732, App.D.C., 1939), and that an order denying a motion for permission to withdraw a registration statement without prejudice to renewal at the conclusion of the hearing then pending in connection with the stop order proceedings is merely interlocutory and not reviewable under the Act (Resources Corporation v. S.E.C., 97 F.2d 788, C.C.A.7, 1938). (Tenth Annual Report of the Securities and Exchange Commission: A Ten Year Survey, 1934–1944, p. 9.)

7. LIABILITIES ARISING FROM VIOLATIONS OF THE ACT

Thousands of complaints are received from the public each year in addition to matters brought to the attention of the Commission by the several state securities officials, Better Business Bureaus and other federal and state authorities. All of these receive careful attention and where it appears that the statutes have been violated, an investigation is instituted. The bulk of the investigative work is performed by the ten regional offices which are strategically located in financial centers throughout the country. Where violations have occurred legal action is instituted by the Commission. Such action may be either civil or criminal. The civil actions consist primarily of actions for injunctions against the continuance of the violations. Such actions are instituted in the appropriate United States District Court and permanent injunctions are obtained in the great majority of cases. These are usually preceded by preliminary injunctions, and in instances where serious and immediate violations are threatened, by a temporary restraining order. * * *

The most stringent remedy possessed by the Commission is its power to refer cases for criminal prosecution to the Department of Justice. When such action is warranted after a thorough investigation, a detailed report is made and submitted to the Attorney General. Members of the Commission's staff work in conjunction with the Department of Justice in preparing the case and presenting it to the Grand Jury and also frequently participate in the trial. (Tenth Annual Report of the Securities and Exchange Commission: A Ten Year Survey, 1934-1944, p. 13.)

(a) Civil

CIVIL LIABILITIES ON ACCOUNT OF FALSE REGISTRATION STATEMENT

Sec. 11. (a) In case any part of the registration statement, when such part became effective, contained an untrue statement of a material fact or omitted to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, any person acquiring such security (unless it is proved that at the time of such acquisition he knew of such untruth or omission) may, either at law or in equity, in any court of competent jurisdiction, sue—

(1) every person who signed the registration statement;

(2) every person who was a director of (or person performing similar functions) or partner in, the issuer at the time of the filing of the part of the registration statement with respect to which his liability is asserted;

(3) every person who, with his consent, is named in the registration statement as being or about to become a director, person performing similar functions, or partner;

(4) every accountant, engineer, or appraiser, or any person whose profession gives authority to a statement made by him, who has with his consent been named as having prepared or certified any part of the registration statement, or as having prepared or certified any report or valuation which is used in connection with the registration statement, with respect to the statement in such registration statement, report, or valuation, which purports to have been prepared or certified by him;

(5) every underwriter with respect to such security.

If such person acquired the security after the issuer has made generally available to its security holders an earning statement covering a period of at least twelve months beginning after the effective date of the registration statement, then the right of recovery under this subsection shall be conditioned on proof that such person acquired the security relying upon such untrue statement in the registration statement or relying upon the registration statement and not knowing of such omission, but such reliance may be established without proof of the reading of the registration statement by such person.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a) no person, other than the issuer, shall be liable as provided therein who shall sustain the burden of proof—

(1) that before the effective date of the part of the registration statement with respect to which his liability is asserted (A) he had resigned from or had taken such steps as are permitted by law to resign from, or ceased or refused to act in, every office, capacity, or relationship in which he was described in the registration statement as acting or agreeing to act, and (B) he had advised the Commission and the issuer in writing that he had taken such action and that he would not be responsible for such part of the registration statement; or

(2) that if such part of the registration statement became effective without his knowledge, upon becoming aware of such fact he forthwith acted and advised the Commission, in accordance with paragraph (1), and, in addition, gave reasonable public notice that such part of the registration statement had become effective without his knowledge; or

(3) that (A) as regards any part of the registration statement not purporting to be made on the authority of an expert, and not purporting to be a copy of or extract from a report or valuation of an expert, and not purporting to be made on the authority of a public official document or statement, he had, after reasonable investigation, reasonable ground to believe and did believe, at the time such part of the registration statement became effective, that the statements therein were true and that there was no omission to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading; and (B) as regards any part of the registration statement purporting to be made upon his authority as an expert or purporting to be a copy of or extract from a report or valuation of himself as an expert, (i) he had, after reasonable investigation, reasonable ground to believe and did believe, at the time such part of the registration statement became effective, that the statements therein were true and that there was no omission to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, or (ii) such part of the registration statement did not fairly represent his statement as an expert or was not a fair copy of or extract from his report or valuation as an expert; and (C) as regards any part of the registration statement purporting to be made on the authority of an expert (other than himself) or purporting to be a copy of or extract from a report or valuation of an expert (other than himself), he had no reasonable ground to believe and did not believe, at the time such part of the registration statement became effective, that the statements therein were untrue or that there was an omission to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, or that such part of the registration statement did not fairly represent the statement of the expert or was not a fair copy of or extract from the report or valuation of the expert; and (D) as regards any part of the registration statement purporting to be a statement made by an official person or purporting to be a copy of or extract from a public official document, he had no reasonable ground to believe and did not believe, at the time such part of the registration statement became effective, that the statements therein were untrue, or that there was an omission to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, or that such part of the registration statement did not fairly represent the statement made by the official person or was not a fair copy of or extract from the public official document.

(c) In determining, for the purpose of paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of this section, what constitutes reasonable investigation and reasonable ground for belief, the standard of reasonableness shall be that required of a prudent man in the management of his own property.

(d) If any person becomes an underwriter with respect to the security after the part of the registration statement with respect to which his liability is asserted has become effective, then for the purposes of paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of this section such part of the registration statement shall be considered as having become effective with respect to such person as of the time when he became an underwriter.

(e) The suit authorized under subsection (a) may be to recover such damages as shall represent the difference between the amount paid for the security (not exceeding the price at which the security was offered to the public) and (1) the value thereof as of the time such suit was brought, or (2) the price at which such security shall have been disposed of in the market before suit, or (3) the price at which such security shall have been disposed of after suit but before judgment if such damages shall be less than the damages representing the difference between the amount paid for the security (not exceeding the price at which the security was offered to the public) and the value thereof as of the time such suit was brought: Provided, that if the defendant proves that any portion or all of such damages represents other than the depreciation in value of such security resulting from such part of the registration statement, with respect to which his liability is asserted, not being true or omitting to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, such portion of or all such damages shall not be recoverable. In no event shall any underwriter (unless such underwriter shall have knowingly received from the issuer for acting as an underwriter some benefit, directly or indirectly, in which all other underwriters similarly situated did not share in proportion to their respective interests in the underwriting) be liable in any suit or as a consequence of suits authorized under subsection (a) for damages in excess of the total price at which the securities underwritten by him and distributed to the public were offered to the public. In any suit under this or any other section of this title the court may, in its discretion, require an undertaking for the payment of the costs of such suit, including reasonable attorney's fees, and if judgment shall be rendered against a party litigant, upon the motion of the other party litigant, such costs may be assessed in favor of such party litigant (whether or not such undertaking has been required) if the court believes the suit or the defense to have been without merit, in an amount sufficient to reimburse him for the reasonable expenses incurred by him, in connection with such suit, such costs to be taxed in the manner usually provided for taxing of costs in the court in which the suit was heard.

(f) All or any one or more of the persons specified in subsection (a) shall be jointly and severally liable, and every person who becomes liable to make any payment under this section may recover contribution as in cases of contract from any person who, if sued separately, would have been liable to make the same payment, unless the person who has become liable was, and the other was not, guilty of fraudulent misrepresentation.

(g) In no case shall the amount recoverable under this section exceed the price at which the security was offered to the public. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77k.

CIVIL LIABILITIES ARISING IN CONNECTION WITH PROSPECTUSES AND COMMUNICATIONS

Section 12, supra, p. 732.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS

Sec. 13. No action shall be maintained to enforce any liability created under section 11 or section 12 (2) unless brought within one year after the discovery of the untrue statement or the omission, or after such discovery should have been made by the exercise of reasonable diligence, or, if the action is to enforce a liability created under section 12 (1), unless brought within one year after the violation upon which it is based. In no event shall any such action be brought to enforce a liability created under section 11 or section 12 (1) more than three years after the security was bona fide offered to the public, or under section 12 (2) more than three years after the sale. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77m.

CONTRARY STIPULATIONS VOID

Sec. 14. Any condition, stipulation, or provision binding any person acquiring any security to waive compliance with any provision of this title or of the rules and regulations of the Commission shall be void. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77n.

LIABILITY OF CONTROLLING PERSONS

Sec. 15. Every person who, by or through stock ownership, agency, or otherwise, or who, pursuant to or in connection with an agreement or understanding with one or more other persons by or through stock ownership, agency, or otherwise, controls any person liable under section 11 or 12, shall also be liable jointly and severally with and to the same extent as such controlled person to any person to whom such controlled person is liable, unless the controlling person had no knowledge of or reasonable grounds to believe in the existence of the facts by reason of which the liability of the controlled person is alleged to exist. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77*o*.

ADDITIONAL REMEDIES

Sec. 16. The rights and remedies provided by this title shall be in addition to any and all other rights and remedies that may exist at law or in equity. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77p.

UNLAWFUL REPRESENTATIONS

Sec. 23. Neither the fact that the registration statement for a security has been filed or is in effect nor the fact that a stop order is not in effect with respect thereto shall be deemed a finding by the Commission that the registration statement is true and accurate on its face or that it does not contain an untrue statement of fact or omit to state a material fact, or be held to mean that the Commission has in any way passed upon the merits of, or given approval to, such security. It shall be unlawful to make, or cause to be made, to any prospective purchaser any representation contrary to the foregoing provisions of this section. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77w.

SHONTS et al. v. HIRLIMAN et al.

District Court of the United States, S. D. California, 1939. 28 F.Supp. 478.

Three actions which were consolidated for trial, by Sydney L. Shonts and others against George A. Hirliman and others by W. W. Caldwell against the same defendants, and by Lester E. Wogahn against the same defendants, for damages, under the provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, § 11, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77k, establishing civil liability against persons for falsity in a registration statement. On defendants' motions to dismiss the complaints.

Motions granted.

The plaintiffs, who were purchasers of stock in Condor Pictures, Incorporated, brought three actions against certain officers of the corporation and Webster, Atz & Company, the auditors, to recover damages, the price paid for the stock, under the provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, section 11, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77k, establishing civil liability against certain persons for falsity in the registration statement. The cases were consolidated for trial. The falsity relied on related to misrepresentations and omissions concerning a lease by the Condor Pictures, Incorporated, and Western Service Studios, and more particularly, the failure to set forth in the amendments to the registration statement, dated January 23, 1937, and February 1, 1937, that Condor Pictures, Incorporated, was obligated under the lease to use the studio a minimum of one hundred days a year at a total rental of thirty-five thousand dollars. The form in which the alleged false statements appeared on the respective dates in the second and third amendments was:

The second amendment to Registration Statement, paragraph No. 3 read:

"The issuer is fully equipped to carry out its present program and business. It owns no substantial physical properties or studios but carries on its production program at the present by rental of the use of studio and equipment at RKO Pathe Studio, Culver City, California. This policy will be continued by the issuer until such time as it becomes advantageous to purchase or build its own studio. At the present time this does not appear advisable as there are fully equipped operating studios available for rental one of which the issuer is now leasing and which is more than ample for the present requirements. There are sufficient space, equipment and facilities to meet Issuer's requirements even should the present production program be doubled. The issuer's leasing arrangement with the studio provides the issuer with all necessary equipment for the production volume above stated in addition to all necessary offices for production staff.

"It is not necessary for the issuer to make any substantial investment in equipment because the studio lease provides the issuer with the essentials.

"The affiliate of the issuer, The Van Beuren Corporation, does not own any physical property or equipment of material account, neither does it require the ownership of such property or equipment for the present or proposed program. The properties and studio or location and equipment used by said Company are likewise leased. The volume that may be produced with properties and equipment so leased is more than double the present program."

The third amendment read:

"The issuer is fully equipped to carry out its present program and business. It owns no substantial physical properties or studios but carries on its production program at the present by rental of the use of studio and equipment at the Western Service Studios, Hollywood, California. This policy will be continued by the issuer until such time as it becomes advantageous to purchase or build its own studio. At the present time this does not appear advisable as there are fully equipped operating studios available for rental one of which the issuer is now leasing and using and which is more than ample for the present requirements. There are sufficient space, equipment and facilities to meet issuer's requirements even should the present production program be doubled. The issuer's leasing arrangement with the studio provides the issuer with all necessary equipment for the production volume above stated in addition to all necessary offices for production staff.

"The Western Service Studios are rented to the registrant by Grand National Films, Inc., the present lessee, for a period of approximately one (1) year from the date of this registration statement with options to renew granted solely to the registrant for a further nine (9) year period terminable only by the registrant at the end of any year during the first four (4) years of the 9-year period but not terminable during the succeeding five (5) year period if the registrant exercises its option to renew at the commencement of said 5-year period. The rental basis is at the rate of $350 per shooting day with no payments for any days on which there is no shooting. It is not necessary for the issuer to make any substantial investment in equipment because the studio lease provides the issuer with the essentials.

"The affiliate of the issuer, The Van Beuren Corporation, does not own any physical property or equipment of material account, neither does it require the ownership of such property or equipment for the present or proposed program. The properties and studio or location and equipment used by said Corporation are likewise leased. The volume that may be produced with properties and equipment so leased is more than double the present program."

Paragraph No. 46 read:

"The registrant has entered into a rental agreement with Grand National Films, Inc., the present lessee of the Western Service Studios in Hollywood, California, whereby space, facilities and equipment to meet the requirements of the registrant's production program, even should it be doubled, together with all necessary offices for production staff are rented to the registrant. The studio is a fully equipped operating studio and the amount of space varies and is made available according to the stage and settings required.

"The Western Service Studios are rented to the registrant by Grand National Flims, Inc. for a period of approximately 1 year from the date of this registration statement with options to renew granted solely to the registrant for a further 9-year period terminable only by the registrant at the end of any year during the first 4 years of the 9-year period but not terminable during the succeeding 5-year period. The rental basis is at the rate of $350 per shooting day with no payments for any days on which there is no shooting. A copy of this agreement is to be filed as a post effective amendment to the registration statement."

The evidence showed that a formal lease was not entered into until March 9, 1937. However, a telegram signed by the President of Western Service Studios, dated January 31, 1937, committed the company to a rental arrangement to be followed by a formal leasing. This telegram, however, did not refer to a minimum guarantee. On May 11, 1937, the Securities Exchange Commission issued a stop order by reason of the alleged misrepresentations in the registration statement. The auditors, in their certificate dated January 19, 1937, did not set up the obligation to pay a minimum rental of $35,000 as a contingent liability. The defendants stipulated, without conceding the materiality of the matter, that the stock had no market value. The plaintiffs did not offer any evidence as to the actual value of the stock at the time the actions were instituted. At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case, the defendants moved to dismiss the complaints upon the ground that no damage had been shown and that the actions were barred by Section 13 of the Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77m. * * *

YANKWICH, DISTRICT JUDGE (after stating facts as above). * * * This Act, however, creates a civil liability of a specific character. It provides that if any part of the registration statement contains an untrue statement of material facts or omits to state material facts, the person who acquires the security, wihout knowledge of the untruth or omission, may sue either at law or in equity, the person who signed the registration statement, the officers or directors of the corporation which applied for the registration, and the accountants or others who certified to the registration statement or prepared it. 15 U.S.C.A. § 77k.

The measure of damages is not the one which usually obtains in fraud,—the difference between the value of the thing bought and what it would have been if it had been as represented. * * *

The Act, in section 11, subdivision (e), provides that the recovery shall be of such damages as shall represent the difference between the amount paid for the security and "(1) the value thereof as of the time such suit was brought, or (2) the price at which such security shall have been disposed of in the market before suit, or (3) the price at which such security shall have been disposed of after suit but before judgment if such damages shall be less than the damages representing the difference between the amount paid for the security (not exceeding the price at which the security was offered to the public) and the value thereof as of the time such suit was brought." 15 U.S.C.A. § 77k (e).

It is evident that the Congress intended to make the action, notwithstanding its origin in fraud, purely compensatory. And so, it provided for the recovery of the price paid. It anticipated three possible contingencies: (1) Where there has been no sale of the stock; (2) where there has been a sale of the stock before the action was brought or (3) a sale after the action was brought.

Where there has been no sale of the stock, the recovery is for the difference between the value of the stock when purchased, and its value as of the time suit is brought. Where there has been a sale, the recovery is for the difference between the price received by the seller and the price he paid.

Before disposing of this question and the question of limitation, I comment briefly on the evidence in the record as it relates to the elements of the action created by the statute.

I am satisfied that the omission from the statement of the minimum requirements in the leases, which obligated Condor Pictures, Inc., to shoot at least 100 days a year, is material. It is not of any great signifiance that the lease was not actually entered into until later. For that reason, I am of the view that there is no falsity in the statement that they had certain rental arrangements with a particular company. I think the oral negotiations and the telegram of January 1, 1937, showed a commitment which the parties themselves considered binding, and which was to be later embodied in a more formal instrument. The effect of these conclusions is this: No misstatement or omission appears in the registration statement until after the last certificate of Webster, Atz & Co., dated January 19, 1937. Prior to January 31, 1937, there were merely discussions of rental, and no definite undertaking by either side or guarantee of a minimum, which was binding on the company. The failure of the certificate of Webster, Atz & Co. to set up the rental undertaking and the minimum guarantee of $35,000 as a contingent liability, is not the omission of anything which existed then. The rental arrangement was not called to their attention. There was no entry on the books at their disposal, from which, by further inquiry, they might have discovered that there was such an undertaking. Absent these, they cannot be charged with a misrepresentation which was made later—long after their certification.

In sum, we cannot, as to Webster, Atz & Co., take the subsequent omissions and retroject them to the date of January 19, 1937, so as to "tie" them to a certificate, which they made on the basis of facts as they then existed and which showed no rental arrangement of any kind.

We return to the element of damages. It is stipulated that, at the time the actions were begun, the stock had no "market value." But it is not conceded that it had no intrinsic value. In the view I take, this value is of utmost importance. The object of the statute is not to penalize promoters or auditors for the full value of the stock, merely because the stock—which may be that of a new corporation—might not have a "market value." The object of the Congress was to compensate a person for the depreciation in the value— the actual value of his security.

Mark you, the object of this section is compensatory. No penalties are intended. The object is not to recover the full value of the stock, under all circumstances. The plaintiffs are not required, as a condition precedent to recovery, to surrender for cancellation to the defendants or to the court, the stock, or even to tender it back. They retain it. If, as counsel claim, they may retain the stock and then recover its full value by showing that there is no market for it at a particular time, then we have this situation: A person might recover the full value of the stock, retain his position as a stockholder in the corporation, exercise his full rights as such, and then, at some future time, when the stock had acquired a "market value," reap the full benefit of his investment, after he has already been repaid it. This would be a penalty, inconsistent with the compensatory nature of the Act.

The finding of insolvency in the reorganization proceedings is not proof that the stock was valueless. * * *

Judge Jenney did not order liquidation. Had he ordered liquidation, it might be argued that we are in bankruptcy and ought to consider it as though an adjudication had been made upon an involuntary petition, and that it refers back to the date of the petition. But, he did not do so. He continued the efforts at reorganization. His only object in making the finding was to say to the reorganizers: "You may proceed to formulate a plan, and if that plan is approved by me, it will be confirmed when you secure the assent of two-thirds of the creditors. You do not need the assent of a majority of the stockholders."

We cannot retroject into the past this finding, which says that insolvency exists "at this time," so as (in the language of the street) "to pin" insolvency on the corporation as of November 29, 1937.

The documentary evidence offered to show insolvency is insufficient. We have an auditor's summary of the books of the company, which shows an operating loss, during a certain period of time. But an operating loss is not the equivalent of insolvency, either in the sense of inability to meet debts—which, of course, would not help us here —or in the sense that the assets, at a fair valuation, are less than the liabilities.

I am of the view, therefore, that the evidence does not show insolvency, so as to warrant the court in concluding that, on the date when these suits were instituted, between March and October, 1937, the stock was of no value, so as to entitle the plaintiffs to recover without proof of value. * * *

It follows that the motions to dismiss should be granted as to all the defendants. It is so ordered. The causes are also dismissed as to defendants named but not served.[59]

DECKERT et al. v. PENNSYLVANIA CO. FOR INSURANCES ON LIVES AND GRANTING ANNUITIES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1940. 311 U.S. 282, 61 S.Ct. 229, 85 L.Ed. 189.

On Writs of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

Suit by Robert J. Deckert and others against the Independence Shares Corporation, the Pennsylvania Company for Insurances on Lives and Granting Annuities, and others, for the appointment of a receiver and the liquidation and dissolution of the Independence Shares Corporation and for certain injunctive relief. From an order denying motions to dismiss the bill of complaint, 27 F.Supp. 763, the Independence Shares Corporation and others appealed, and from an order enjoining the Pennsylvania Company for Insurance on Lives and Granting Annuities from paying over a certain sum of money to the Independence Shares Corporation, or otherwise disposing of it during pendency of the suit, the Pennsylvania Company for Insurances on Lives and Granting Annuities appealed, and to review a decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, 108 F.2d 51, which reversed the orders and remanded the cause with directions, the plaintiffs bring certiorari.

Reversed and remanded.

MR. JUSTICE MURPHY delivered the opinion of the Court.

Two important questions are presented by these petitions. The first is whether the Securities Act of 1933, 48 Stat. 74, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77a et seq., authorizes purchasers of securities to maintain a suit in equity to rescind a fraudulent sale and secure restitution of the consideration paid, and to enforce the right to restitution against a third party where the vendor is insolvent and the third party has assets in its possession belonging to the vendor. The second question is whether such purchasers must show that the amount in controversy exceeds $3,000 exclusive of interest and costs as required by Section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended, 28 U.S.C. § 41, 28 U.S.C.A. § 41.

Petitioners, with one exception residents of Pennsylvania, are owners and holders of Capital Savings Plan Contract Certificates purchased from Capital Savings Plan, Inc., since merged with and now Independence Shares Corporation, a Pennsylvania corporation. These certificates required the holders to make certain installment payments to The Pennsylvania Company for Insurances on Lives and Granting Annuities, also a Pennsylvania corporation. Pennsylvania, after deducting certain fixed charges, used the balance of these installment payments to purchase Independence Trust Shares for the benefit of the certificate holders. Independence Trust Shares, issued by Pennsylvania, represented interests in a trust of common stocks of 42 American corporations deposited by Independence with Pennsylvania. Pursuant to trust agreement and indenture between Pennsylvania and Independence, Pennsylvania collected dividends and profits from the stocks and administered the trust. * * *

Respondents answered the bill and thereafter moved to dismiss it. The motions were heard with petitioners' motions for a temporary injunction and the addition of two plaintiffs. The trial judge denied the motions to dismiss, approved the addition of two plaintiffs, but reserved decision on the application for a receiver. He directed the appointment of a master to take testimony and file a report on the question of the insolvency of Independence, and enjoined Pennsylvania from transferring or otherwise disposing of the sum of $38,258.85 representing certain charges, income, and proceeds received in administration of the trust. D.C., 27 F.Supp. 763.

Pennsylvania, Independence, and the individual defendants appealed from these orders. The Circuit Court of Appeals did not expressly consider whether the appeals were premature. It thought that the Securities Act did not authorize a bill seeking equitable relief against a third party which has assets belonging to the vendor, and therefore, that Pennsylvania was not a proper party to the suit since no cause of action under the Securities Act was stated against it. It reversed all of the orders appealed from and remanded the cause with directions to allow petitioners to amend their complaint to state a claim for a money judgment at law against Independence only. 3 Cir., 108 F.2d 51. We granted certiorari because of the importance of the questions presented. 309 U.S. 648, 60 S.Ct. 715, 84 L.Ed. 1000. * * *

Respondents' motions sought to dismiss the bill because it failed to state any cause of action and because the District Court lacked jurisdiction. We hold that these motions were correctly denied.

We think the Securities Act does not restrict purchasers seeking relief under its provisions to a money judgment. On the contrary, the act as a whole indicates an intention to establish a statutory right which the litigant may enforce in designated courts by such legal or equitable actions or procedures as would normally be available to him. Undoubtedly any suit to establish the civil liability imposed by the Act must ultimately seek recovery of the consideration paid less income received or damages if the claimant no longer owns the security. Section 12(2), 15 U.S.C. § 77(l) (2), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77(l) (2). But Section 12 (2) states the legal consequences of conduct proscribed by the Act; it does not purport to state the form of action or procedure the claimant is to employ.

Moreover, in Section 22(a), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77v(a), specified courts are given jurisdiction "of all suits in equity and actions at law brought to enforce any liability or duty created by this subchapter". The power to enforce implies the power to make effective the right of recovery afforded by the Act. And the power to make the right of recovery effective implies the power to utilize any of the procedures or actions normally available to the litigant according to the exigencies of the particular case. If petitioners' bill states a cause of action when tested by the customary rules governing suits of such character, the Securities Act authorizes maintenance of the suit, providing the bill contains the allegations the Act requires. That it does not authorize the bill in so many words is no more significant than the fact that it does not in terms authorize execution to issue on a judgment recovered under Section 12(2).

We are of opinion that the bill states a cause for equitable relief. * * * The principal objects of the suit are rescission of the Savings Plan contracts and restitution of the consideration paid, including recovery of the balance, held by Pennsylvania for account of Independence, which consisted in part of the payments alleged to have been procured by the fraud of Independence. That a suit to rescind a contract induced by fraud and to recover the consideration paid may be maintained in equity, at least where there are circumstances making the legal remedy inadequate, is well established. * * *

It is enough at this time to determine that the bill contains allegations which, if proved, entitle petitioners to some equitable relief. Whether or not they sufficiently allege or prove their right to all of the relief prayed in the bill we do not decide because the question is not before us. Hence, if the District Court had jurisdiction it was proper to consider whether injunctive relief should be given in aid of the recovery sought by the bill.

We agree with the courts below that the Securities Act confers jurisdiction of the suit upon the District Court irrespective of the amount in controversy or the citizenship of the parties. Section 22(a) provides in part: "The district courts of the United States * * * shall have jurisdiction * * * of all suits in equity and actions at law brought to enforce any liability or duty created by this subchapter." This is plainly a suit to enforce a liability or duty created by the Act. That the District Court therefore has jurisdiction is evident from the provision quoted. Accordingly, the only remaining question is whether the injunction was proper.

We hold that the injunction was a reasonable measure to preserve the status quo pending final determination of the questions raised by the bill. * * *

The injunction was framed narrowly to restrain only the transfer of $38,258.85, and the trial judge required petitioners to furnish security for any losses respondents might suffer. In view of this we cannot say that the trial judge abused his discretion in granting the temporary injunction.

We conclude that the orders granting the temporary injunction and denying the motions to dismiss were correct and should have been sustained. * * *

The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.[60]

CADY et al. v. MURPHY.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, First Circuit, 1940. 113 F.2d 988.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the District of Maine; John A. Peters, Judge.

Action by Clifford J. Murphy against Everett Ware Cady and others for damages for false representations in the sale of a block of stock. From a judgment of the District Court, 30 F.Supp. 466, in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants appeal.

MAGRUDER, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This appeal requires for its disposition an interpretation of § 12(2) of the Securities Act of 1933, 48 Stat. 74. The challenged judgment for plaintiff-appellee cannot stand if, as the defendants maintain, the liability imposed by § 12(2) applies only to owners of securities, selling their own property as principals.

The plaintiff is a small securities broker and dealer doing business in Portland, Maine, under the name of Clifford J. Murphy Co. For many years he had extensive dealings with the defendants, a firm of stock brokers carrying on a general brokerage business under the name of Rhoades & Company with offices in New York and Boston. Negotiation of the transaction out of which the present lawsuit arose was conducted by Murphy and Frank Lynch, the head trader of Rhoades & Company, by means of numerous telephone conversations between Boston and Portland. Early in March, 1937, Lynch persuaded Murphy to purchase voting trust certificates representing 1,700 common shares of South American Utilities Corporation (incorporated in Delaware), part of a block of 1,970 shares which had been held by E. E. Smith & Company, a small unlisted dealer in New York. The court below found that Lynch had effected the sale by misrepresentation of material facts, and further found that the defendants had not sustained the burden of proof that Lynch did not know, nor in the exercise of reasonable care could have known, of the untruth of the misrepresentations. These findings are amply sustained by the testimony and indeed are not assailed by appellants. The stock was actually without substantial value at any time. When Murphy learned the facts, he tendered back the securities to Rhoades & Company. Upon the refusal of the latter to take them back, Murphy sold the securities at a loss, and brought the present action. He has recovered a judgment for the amount he paid for the stock, with interest, less the amount realized upon the subsequent sale, with interest.

At the trial the plaintiff sought to prove that Rhoades & Company had acted as principal in the transaction; that Rhoades & Company on its own account had bought from E. E. Smith & Company the block of 1,970 shares of South American Utilities common a day or two before Lynch sold 1,700 of these shares to the plaintiff. Murphy testified that he had never heard of E. E. Smith & Company prior to his purchase of the securities. On the other hand Lynch, who was the main witness for the defendants, offered quite a different version. He testified on direct examination, as follows:

"Q. Now will you relate what your conversation was with Mr. Murphy on the first of March? A. It was after four o'clock, March 1st, that E. E. Smith & Company called me and said he had a block of 1970 shares of South American Utilities common. He wanted to know if—

"Q. Who is he? A. E. E. Smith.

"Q. E. E. Smith was E. E. Smith and Company? A. Yes. He wanted to know if I could find a buyer for the stock. I told him I had one possibility and to hold on the line until I talked with him. I called Mr. Murphy through our Portland wire and told Mr. Murphy about this block of South American Utilities common—

"Q. Just a minute. What block did Mr. Smith speak of to you? A. A block of 1970 shares of stock.

"Q. And did you mention the number of shares to Murphy? A. I did, sir.

"Q. All right. What else did you say? A. I told Mr. Murphy that Mr. Smith had this block of stock and wanted to know if he was interested in the stock. I quoted the market to Mr. Murphy, $4\frac{1}{4}$ to $4\frac{3}{4}$. Mr. Murphy wanted to know if it possibly could be bought cheaper. I said I would be glad to try. He gave me a bid for 1700 shares of stock at $4\frac{1}{2}$. Before I had actually purchased that stock from Mr. Smith on the wire I told Mr. Murphy I had a long position in the stock which I wasn't going to sell and if I was going to buy this block of stock for Mr. Murphy I would act as agent in the transaction. He asked me what commission I would charge and I said I would charge a fair commission. We agreed on four cents a share—"

The District Court did not find it necessary to resolve the conflicting versions. It found, upon sufficient evidence, that the stock was "sold to the plaintiff by the defendants, acting either as brokers or owners". Though the evidence did not satisfy the court that Rhoades & Company acted as principals, it concluded that this was immaterial since "Section 12 of the Securities Act of 1933 applies to brokers when selling securities owned by other persons". The court found, as clearly warranted by the evidence, that Rhoades & Company, whether acting as brokers or owners, "solicited from the plaintiff an offer to buy the stock mentioned, and as a result of Lynch's solicitations and representations, the plaintiff bought the stock, paying the price named and a brokerage commission of four cents a share". This, the court thought, brought Rhoades & Company within the meaning of § 12(2) as a "person who sells a security", in view of the broad definition of "sell" in § 2(3) of the Act, which includes within the meaning of the word the "solicitation of an offer to buy". If Rhoades & Company, though not selling its own property, is a "person who sells a security" then it follows that Murphy is "the person purchasing such security from him" within the meaning of the corresponding phrase in § 12(2).

We agree with the court below that § 12(2) imposes a liability for misrepresentations not only upon principals, but also upon brokers when selling securities owned by other persons. This is not a strained interpretation of the statute, for a selling agent in common parlance would describe himself as a "person who sells", though title passes from his principal, not from him. This broader interpretation of § 12(2) is warranted by the definition of "sell" in § 2(3) and is also supported by comparison with other sections of the statute. If the security in question had been a security required by law to be registered, but as to which no registration statement was in effect, Rhoades & Company under the facts of the present case would certainly have been guilty of selling a security in violation of § 5(a) (1), and would not have come within the exemption provided in § 4(2). As a person who "sells a security in violation of section 5", Rhoades & Company would have been under a civil liability to Murphy under § 12(1). But the phrase "any person who sells a security" occurs both in § 12(1) and in § 12(2), and would seem to mean the same thing in both subsections, one of which deals with selling an unregistered security and the other of which deals with selling a security by means of misrepresentation of material facts.

It is argued that the remedy provided in § 12(2) is basically rescission, which contemplates a restoration of the status quo as between the principals to the transaction; and that Congress could hardly have intended to give this remedy to the buyer as against an agent of the seller. But the section does not use the word "rescission" nor indicate that the remedy provided is limited to rescission in the narrower sense as between the principals to the transaction. The remedy provided can be applied without difficulty to an agent of a vendor; the agent, by misrepresentations having effected a sale, is required to take over the securities from the defrauded buyer and to restore to the latter the price he paid. Even apart from statute this remedy of "rescission" in its wider sense, against the agent of a vendor, is not unknown. See Peterson v. McManus, 187 Iowa 522, 545, 172 N.W. 460 ff.; 3 Neb.L.Bull, 436, note.

At one point in its opinion the court below makes a statement of law which is broader than necessary to support the judgment rendered. It says [30 F.Supp. 466, 469]:

"Whether the seller, being a broker, himself owns the security, or whether he is acting as the agent for the owner, or for the purchaser, or for both, is immaterial. If, in the course of an attempt to dispose of, or solicitation of an offer to buy a security, he makes false statements under circumstances referred to in section 12, the purchaser is given a right of action to recover any damages he has suffered on account of the false representations."

We need not decide whether § 12(2) applies to the case of a broker acting solely for a purchaser, where the broker makes misrepresentations in the course of soliciting from the purchaser an order to buy. Even if the version of the defendants' witness Lynch is accepted, Rhoades & Company was acting either as agent for the seller or in a dual capacity as agent for both parties, in either of which cases § 12(2) is applicable. See Douglas & Bates, The Federal Securities Act of 1933, 43 Yale L.J. 171, 206, 207.

The plaintiff's declaration contained a count for deceit at common law. The court below held that recovery could not be allowed on this count because the plaintiff had failed to exercise reasonable care to ascertain the falsity of the representations. In view of our conclusion that the judgment for the plaintiff may be sustained under the statute, we do not consider the correctness of the trial court's ruling on the common law court.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed, with costs to the appellee.

McLELLAN, DISTRICT JUDGE (dissenting).

While I agree that within the meaning of the Securities Act (the material portions whereof appear in the majority opinion) one who sells as agent is a "seller" and subject to the statutory liabilities of a seller, I cannot concur in the result here reached. There was abundant evidence, which would have justified, if it did not require, a finding that the defendant acted not as agent for the seller but as agent for the plaintiff who was the buyer. The trial judge, after instructing himself that "whether the seller, being a broker, himself owns the security, or whether he is acting as the agent for the owner, or for the purchaser, or for both, is immaterial" found for the plaintiff upon the theory that the defendant was a "seller". To me, it seems, that one who acts solely as agent for the purchaser cannot be regarded as a seller and that the liability of such an agent for misrepresentations rests upon common-law principles, not upon the Securities Act which relates to misrepresentations by a seller.

The trial judge having proceeded upon a contrary view, I think justice requires that the judgment of the District Court be set aside and a new trial ordered.[61]

NOTE

There have been a number of private suits by investors to enforce the civil liabilities imposed by the Act for the sale of securities which were not registered, in violation of the Act, and for the sale of securities by means of registration statements or prospectuses containing false statements of or omitting to state material facts. The Commission has no statutory duties with respect to such suits and is not fully advised of their number or outcome. However, a search of the court records covering a period of eight years reveals that there were less than two dozen actions under all three of the civil liabilities of the Act. Moreover, so far as could be determined, not more than five suits resulted in recovery by the plaintiffs. PENALTIES

Sec. 24. Any person who willfully violates any of the provisions of this title, or the rules and regulations promulgated by the Commission under authority thereof, or any person who willfully, in a registration statement filed under this title, makes any untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state any material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both. REX v. KYLSANT.

Court of Criminal Appeal, 1931. 22 Cr.App.R. 83.

AVORY, J. The indictment in this case is under section 84 of the Larceny Act of 1861. It charged the appellant in the first two counts with publishing accounts which he knew to be false in material particulars, he being a director of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, with intent to deceive shareholders; and in the third count it charged him that he as a director of that company issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions to a debenture issue with intent to induce persons to subscribe or advance money to the company.

Before the appellant pleaded, an application was made by learned counsel (Sir John Simon), on his behalf, that further particulars should be given by the prosecution of the matters alleged to be false in the several documents. The learned judge adjourned his decision on that application till he had heard the opening of the case for the prosecution.

The case having been opened by the learned Attorney-General for the prosecution, at the close of that opening the learned counsel (Sir John Simon) said: "With regard to the request I made earlier in the day, I have been following closely what the Attorney-General has said, and I have his assurance that what he proposes to submit at the end, after the evidence is called, is what he has opened here. I think it is only reasonable to say that that gives me the particulars I am entitled to, and I do not wish to put the Crown to any further trouble."

In order to appreciate the effect of that concession, it is just necessary to look at one or two passages in the opening of the learned Attorney-General, where he said: "Now, members of the jury, let me make this observation to you about that document"—referring to the prospectus—"I am not for a moment going to consider detailed words and phrases. Think of the type of person to whom this was addressed. It was addressed to the prospective investor, and presumably the prospective investor of a more or less cautious type. This is not anything like a gamble. This is almost gilt-edged stock, debenture issue of the Royal Mail. Consider that you are addressing to him. See how this document strikes him and must have been intended to strike him. What is the relevance of setting out the past at all? Why say what you were doing in the past? Why say that you have been earning—and saying it in leaded type—more than £500,000 a year, unless it be that you obviously mean anybody to draw this conclusion: 'From what has taken place in the past, you may legitimately draw an inference what will take place in the future.' It is quite obvious to every one of us that that is the object. Now could you possibly, on the facts of this case, as you know them, draw any inference as regards the future, from the fact that during these years these sums of money had been expended in dividend? That is the simple point. If this company has been throughout these years with all the figures and all the relevant facts that I have opened to you, expending millions, five to six million pounds and each year a deficit, is it not utterly dishonest—and I do not mince my words—utterly dishonest, to put a document before a prospective investor and say to him, 'Now this is what we have done in the past,' and imply to him, 'What we have done in the past is a fair indication of what you may reasonably expect we shall do in the future'?"—and following on that observation the learned Attorney-General quoted from the opinion of the late Lord Halsbury in the case of Aaron's Reefs v. Twiss, reported in 1896 Appeal Cases to which we shall have occasion to refer later.

So bearing in mind those passages of the opening, and the concession which was made by the learned counsel that that supplied him with sufficient particulars of this indictment, the issue before the jury was defined, and the trial on that issue proceeded. We are not saying, of course, for a moment, that that concession about particulars in any way precluded the learned counsel from his further argument on the proper construction of section 84 of the Larceny Act.

In the result, the appellant was acquitted on counts 1 and 2, and he was convicted upon count 3. In case it should be thought that there is any apparent inconsistency in the verdict of the jury, we think it right to say that with regard to counts 1 and 2 the jury may have thought that existing shareholders had some information from the published accounts which the outside public had not, particularly in view of the fact that in the Profit and Loss Accounts for those years and previous years there had been some indication of what was called an "adjustment of taxation reserves," a somewhat abstruse expression which gave rise to considerable discussion during this case.

Now coming to count 3, on which the appellant was convicted, the prospectus in question was issued on June 29, 1928. The subscription list was opened on July 3 and closed on or before July 4. It was an issue of 5 per cent. debentures at £92 10s., and in fact it was oversubscribed.

The material portions of that prospectus are first of all the statement of the capital issued and fully paid, of the existing Debenture Stock, and of the Reserve Fund of £1,450,000, and the Insurance Fund of £1,311,755; and on page 2 of the prospectus, after setting out the history of the company and stating that the object of the issue was to provide additional capital for a new freehold building and for the general purposes of the company, it proceeded: "The interest on the present issue of Debenture Stock will amount to £100,000 per annum. Although this company, in common with other shipping companies, has suffered from the depression in the shipping industry, the audited accounts of the company show that during the past ten years the average annual balance available (including profits of the Insurance Fund), after providing for depreciation and interest on existing Debenture Stocks, has been sufficient to pay the interest on the present issue more than five times over. After providing for all taxation, depreciation of the fleet, etc., adding to the reserves and payment of dividends on the Preference Stocks, the dividends on the Ordinary Stock during the last seventeen years have been as follows:"—and then it sets out a table of the dividends paid from the year 1911 to the year 1927 inclusive, those dividends varying from 5 up to 8 per cent., and down on one occasion in the year 1926 to 4 per cent., in 1927 again showing 5 per cent.

One purpose for which this issue was made appears to have been to pay off an overdraft at the bank of £500,000, which had been agreed with the bank in the year 1926. That overdraft, granted in 1926 for a period of three or six months, had been renewed from time to time for short periods on the promise of this new issue being made, out of which the bank hoped to be paid the overdraft.

We now come to consider the grounds of appeal in this case, which are: (1) That there was no evidence that the appellant made or published or concurred in making or publishing a written statement which was false in any material particular; (2) that there was no evidence that he made or published that prospectus knowing it to be false in any material particular; and (3) no evidence that he made or published that prospectus, which he knew to be false in a material particular, with intent to induce persons to entrust or advance property to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. The third ground is immaterial, because it is now admitted that if it was published, and if it was false, and known to be false, there can be no question that it was published with intent to induce persons to entrust or advance property to the company.

These grounds of appeal were supplemented by the further ground that the learned judge at the trial had misdirected the jury and that he ought to have directed them that there was no evidence that the prospectus contained any false statement; and it then sets out certain extracts from the summing-up of the learned judge, which, it is complained, were in fact wrong, amounting to a wrong direction in law. These are long extracts, and they are, as I have said, only extracts. It will be necessary to refer to some other passages in the summing-up to which exception is not specifically taken.

These are the passages which are complained of, in which the learned judge said, referring to the section: "These are the words which it is said require some consideration, and I confess I think they do. It is these words 'make, circulate, publish or concur in making, circulating or publishing any written statement or account which he shall know to be false in any material particular.' What exactly does that mean? The conclusion that I have arrived at is this, that it is not limited to a case where you point to a written account or written statement and say: Here are certain figures, here are certain words which are false. I think that is to narrow unduly the words 'in any material particular.' It is perfectly true that in a criminal act, which carries with it the penalties of the criminal law, the Act must be strictly construed, but it must be reasonably construed, and in my judgment to construe it in that way would be to shut out a type of fraud in connection with written documents or written accounts which may be of the utmost importance, and that is the type of fraud which may be found in a document, not fraudulent in the sense of what it states, but in the sense of what it conceals or omits. You may have a definite and positive falsehood in a document, and then when that obviously is the case, where in respect of the words pertaining to that specific falsehood you could say, 'This is a material particular'—it is for the judge to say what is material, but clearly I am taking a case, as indeed in this case, where what is alleged is definitely material. It may be said where you have specific words or figures containing a falsehood which you can put your finger on and say 'it is false in a material particular, and it is in this material particular,' but I think the language which is used means more than that, according to its reasonable interpretation. It will cover the case where you have a written statement which is false, not in any specific words or any specific figures which it contains, but which is false in the way in which a document may be fraudulent, namely, where you may take every word and every figure and say, 'Now there is nothing false about this, there is nothing false about that,' but the document as a whole may be false—the document as a whole may be false not because of what it states, but because of what it does not state, because of what it implies. Of course, that type of falsity, which is indeed the type of falsity in the main in question here, is more difficult to establish than the case where you can point to a specific false word in a sentence, because where the falsity consists in a fraudulent desire to create a false impression, while keeping accurately to the limited facts which appear in the document, where the falsity consists of that, you have to show affirmatively that there was a deliberate intent to create a false impression. If you have a definite falsehood, that speaks for itself. A man who has told a definite falsehood or written a definite falsehood may perfectly well be able to show that though it was false he did not know that it was false, or in certain cases, that he knew it was false, he did not intend to deceive anybody, but made a false statement, an inaccurate statement thinking that it was substantially true, though he knew all the facts which ought to have told him that it was untrue. That is a much simpler case than where you have a case in which a written statement is alleged to have been false in the sense that it was concealing true facts. Then you have to show before you can get any further at all that it was a deliberately concocted instrument, the instrument of a definite scheme to defraud or to deceive, as the case may be, and therefore in order to prove a case of fraud of this latter type, fraud as it were by concealment, the intent of the parties must be established at the outset. But to construe section 84 so as to exclude from its ambit that type of fraud in a written statement of account is, in my judgment, to limit unduly the scope of the enactment, to exclude from it some of the most important types of false documents which in this class of case may have to be dealt with and—which, I think, is the guiding feature—to do an injury to the language; the language must be construed reasonably, according to its natural meaning, and in my view, having regard to the whole of this section, its purpose and its character, I think the construction which I have given to it is the true construction."

Then there follows another long extract from the summing-up of the learned judge, which it is not necessary to read in full, but which contains this passage, and it is a part of the summing-up which is complained of as being wrong in law, amounting to a wrong direction, in which the learned judge said: "Was the form which was adopted here, and which erred by reticence, deliberately adopted with an intention to deceive? Was it, not merely a case of prudent and well-advised reticence, but a case of malignant, deliberate, wicked and treacherous deceit in order to defraud? This is one of those difficult cases, but not impossible cases, which have occurred from time to time in the course of company transactions, where a document has been put forward in order to be acted upon (prospectuses and other things) and put forward in such a form that though it stated every fact correctly fact by fact, everything was correctly stated by the card, and yet the true effect of what was said was completely false and completely misleading. Now that result might be achieved with the best of intentions, and by a man who, while his mind was fixed on attaining his object, and floating an issue, and while he was in a sense thinking of what was best to achieve that object, was not thinking and was not conscious to himself that he was going to mislead people and that he was going to induce them to subscribe to the issue under a belief which was completely false and completely delusive. People sometimes say to themselves, 'Well, this is all I need tell; I will only tell as little as it is necessary, but what I will tell I will tell quite accurately, and then I can quite fairly and honestly leave it to the person who reads this prospectus to make up his own mind.' That is to say, he may have no dishonest intent, he may have perhaps no real consciousness that what he is doing is delusive and mischievous. He may, of course, be, in some cases, if he is under a legal obligation to disclose all the relative facts, liable to a civil action. Here you are not concerned with the civil liability, you are concerned with the offence under this Act as stated in the indictment."

Then he reads again the charge in the indictment, and he proceeds: "Of course that means that he fraudulently and with wicked intent and deliberately published that with that wicked design of defrauding. Now that, again, is a question entirely for you. Do you think that this was a document which by accident or design innocently or criminally did mislead people? Do you think that people invested on the faith of this document, and in the belief that it contained all that it ought to contain, whereas if they had been told the true facts they would not have put money into this concern at all, because they would have wanted some guarantee of the earning capacity of the company?"

That passage that I have just read is followed by a further passage, in which the learned judge said: "As we all know, though a debenture-holder in a sense is secured, indeed, in fact is secured on the assets which, in certain events, he may realise, which he may enter into possession of in certain events, yet the man who takes debentures is not thinking of that; he wants to take a debenture which is secure as regards the assets and which is also likely to be a useful debenture to him and yield him an income year by year, an income which will come in due course from the earnings of the company, and therefore it seems common-sense that a man would not invest in a company at a time when it had a record of unfruitful working for some years past, however much it may have had of the special credits to keep it going and to provide dividends. That may be perfectly true, but, as I say, you have to go on a step further, you have to consider the really anxious aspect of this account, you have to consider, assuming that you are satisfied that it was in truth and in fact a misleading document, was it deliberately concocted, was it deliberately put together with the intention of stating certain things and not stating other things so that anyone reading what was said, not knowing what was not said, would be deluded and deceived about the true nature of the company? It is said by Lord Kylsant that he knew what the position had been, he knew what the earning capacity had been, and he would say, 'Well, there is a well-secured asset here'; and then, 'We are in the trough of the wave now or we are just coming from the trough of the wave, and things will soon improve again, and then all will be well.' That is a matter which you will have to take into account. You will bear in mind that it is always possible to be wise after the event, but on the other hand you will consider whether there was such necessity at this time for obtaining further money as to form a motive for deceit. Even that will not be enough. You must satisfy yourself, before you can find Lord Kylsant guilty, not only was there a motive, but was there an actual intention, a deliberate and criminal intention, to obtain from the investor money which he would not have parted with if he had known the true facts. It is not a question here whether what was done was done within strict business lines. It is not a question whether what was done was strictly honourable. It is a question whether an offence was committed under this penal section which carries with it in the event of conviction the consequences which invariably flow from conviction under the criminal law."

Then a little lower down he adds these words: "In the main it is quite obvious that this is, letter by letter, word by word, an accurate document, so far as it goes, and it can only be found"—(probably it should read "It can only form")—"the basis of a charge of fraud if you are satisfied, as I have said more than once, that there was this deliberate and wicked and criminal intent to concoct a false and misleading document."

It is convenient now to refer to one or two authorities which in our view support the view of the law expressed by the learned judge in his summing-up. In the case of Gluckstein v. Barnes, reported in 1900 Appeal Cases, at page 250, Lord Macnaghten said, giving his opinion in that case, which concerned a company and its prospectus: "My Lords, it is a trite observation that every document as against its author must be read in the sense which it was intended to convey. And everybody knows that sometimes half a truth is no better than a downright falsehood." Then he proceeds to deal with the facts of that particular case.

In the present case we find that the learned judge on more than one occasion specifically called the attention of the jury to the distinction which they must bear in mind between a possible civil liability and a criminal liability, and in the opinion of this Court there was ample evidence upon which the jury could come to the conclusion that this document, the prospectus, was false in a material particular, in that it conveyed a false impression, the falsity in this case consisting in putting before intending investors as material upon which they could exercise a judgment about the existing position of the company, figures which apparently disclose the existing position but in fact conceal it. In other words, the document implied that the company was in a sound financial position, and that a prudent investor could safely invest in its debentures. This implication arises particularly from the statement that the dividends have been regularly paid over a term of years, although times have been bad, a statement which is entirely misleading when the fact that they were paid not out of current earnings but out of earnings in the abnormal war period, is omitted.

The further question is whether there was evidence upon which the jury could properly find that the appellant knew that this document was false. If there was evidence that the document was false in the particulars already indicated, there was ample evidence upon which the jury could find that the appellant knew of its falsity, knowing as he did of the means by which the dividends had been paid; and it is not and cannot be disputed that the prospectus was published with the intent to induce persons to entrust or advance money to the company, which was sufficient to satisfy the section. But the learned judge told the jury, in the passage that I have already read, that upon this third count also they must find the intention to defraud, and he repeated this, after the jury had retired and sent their written question to him. In these circumstances the jury must be taken to have found that what was done in this case was done with an intent to defraud.

In the result, we come without hesitation to the conclusion that in the summing-up, regarded as a whole, there was no misdirection, that there was ample evidence upon which the verdict of the jury can be supported, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

I intended to add, with reference to what took place after the jury had retired and asked a question of the learned judge, that in the opinion of the Court the direction to the jury by the learned judge was too favourable to the accused, and that he ought to have told them that on this third count it was sufficient if they found an intent to induce persons to subscribe or advance money to the company.

Appeal dismissed; leave to appeal against sentence refused.

NOTE

(A) Contempt: Where a decree had been entered enjoining the sale of unregistered securities it was held to be criminal contempt for the persons enjoined to solicit "contributions" for their plan since "* * * it was the same false and fraudulent program appearing in a new garb." Securities and Exchange Commission, 109 F.2d 6, C.C.A.Ill.1940, cert. den. 309 U.S. 687, 60 S.Ct. 889, 84 L.Ed. 1030, 1940 (the injunction here involved was the one issued in Securities and Exchange Commission v. Universal Service Ass'n, supra, (D), p. 746).

(B) Perjury: A person who testifies falsely as to material facts in an ex parte investigation made by the Commission, even though the information be volunteered, may be indicted and convicted for perjury. NOTE

TYPES OF CASES

The frauds and other statutory violations encountered by the Commission in its investigations under the various Acts are as varied as human imagination and ingenuity can contrive. Many of the cases have entirely novel features or present a new "twist" of one kind or another. As a rule, however, the cases fall into certain broad patterns, set out below:

(1) Express Misrepresentations. The most common type of fraud is the simple promotion based upon express misrepresentations, which does not involve any of the complex and refined devices not infrequently employed in securities schemes. The promotion of mining ventures, usually gold mines, and the sale of oil and gas interests frequently present opportunities for perpetration of this type of fraud. Thus, in the case of United States v. Samuel J. Mustain, et al. (S.D.N.Y.), three individual defendants and four corporate defendants, among the latter a company known as Continental Securities Corporation, were convicted in connection with fraudulent sales of oil royalty securities. In the course of such sales it had been falsely represented to investors that they were certain of a definite income for life if they purchased the oil interests; that they could have their money back at any time if not satisfied; that their principal would be fully returned within two and one-half years; and that the securities were being purchased by banks.

The alleged fraudulent promotion is also encountered in the exploitation of so-called inventions. Thus, convictions have been obtained in promotions of a new type of revolving top for commercial buildings, United States v. Charles Thelman Rice, et al. (D.N.M.), and of a vessel said to be capable of attaining speeds of 80 to 100 miles per hour, United States v. Mark L. Gilbert, et al. (S.D.Ohio). An indictment is currently pending with respect to a pinless diaper promotion. United States v. Philip A. Frear, et al. (D.C.)

In a number of the mining company cases, securities have been sold by persons resident in Canada and operating from across the border without compliance with the statutes of this country. The Commission has been cooperating with the State Department and the Department of Justice in efforts to secure a treaty with Canada which would permit extradition from Canada of persons violating the federal securities laws and cognate statutes. The treaty was ratified in the United States Senate in 1942, but to date it has not been ratified by the Canadian Parliament.

(2) "Ponzi" Schemes. This type of case, a perennial favorite of the securities swindler, involves the payment of "profits" or "dividends" out of capital. The apparent success of the venture makes the investor susceptible to further investment, a process sometimes colloquially described as "reloading." The "Ponzi" system is a recurrent motif in fraudulent small loan company ventures. Illustrative of these cases is United States v. Dewitt T. Simpson, et al. (S.D.Ga.), involving Standard System Investment Corp., a holding company which had obtained control of a number of industrial loan companies operating in various cities in Georgia. Prominent business and professional men who were not aware of the scheme were persuaded to act on the board of directors. Actual control, however, was exercised by Simpson and two associates, who made fictitious book entries and paid dividends out of capital, despite lack of real earnings. All three were convicted in 1943, in Savannah, Georgia, for violations of the fraud provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, and for other statutory offenses.

The "Ponzi" method is sometimes employed in vending machine promotions. Thus, in United States v. Maurice A. Levine, et al. (D.Mass.), cigarette and peanut vending machines were sold to investors under a lease-back arrangement whereby the promoters were to operate the machines for the investors on a profit-sharing basis. "Profits" were paid periodically out of capital until the entire structure collapsed, leaving the victims with machines worth far less than they had paid for them. Six defendants pleaded guilty in this case.

(3) "Switch" Schemes. Some individuals sell their victims bona fide securities, thereby cultivating their trust and confidence, and then persuade them to dispose of their holdings and to substitute securities which are frequently worthless. In other cases the scheme is to obtain lists of persons previously sold a security and then induce them to accept a new security in exchange. This "switch" device was one aspect of the fraudulent scheme involved in United States v. John Factor, et al. (N.D.Iowa), a bottling contract case, in which John (Jake the barber) Factor and a group of confederates, operating through United Bottling and Distributing Company, a Delaware corporation, defrauded some 250 investors to the extent of an estimated $1,000,000. The owners of whisky warehouse receipts were induced to exchange them for bottling contracts, by the terms of which United Bottling was to hold the whisky until it matured, see to its bottling and distribution, and transmit the profits, less a stated service fee, to the investors. In a number of instances, persons who did not own whisky warehouse receipts were sold such receipts and then "switched" into bottling contracts. United Bottling was a mere paper organization, and the whisky warehouse receipts were sold or hypothecated as soon as possession was obtained. Eleven defendants pleaded guilty and received substantial prison sentences, Factor himself being sent to the Federal penitentiary at Leavenworth for a term of ten years.

(4) Front Money Schemes. This device involves the exploitation of small business enterprises upon a promise to procure for them needed financing. Perhaps the most important of the "front money" cases developed by the Commission was that of United States v. E. J. Hill, et al. (N.D.Ohio), stemming from an intensive investigation conducted in cooperation with the Post Office Department and the Department of Justice. It was disclosed that, for approximately six years, hundreds of enterprises or prospective entrepreneurs had been victimized by the operations of this racket. The victims had been induced to pay advance fees estimated to total some $1,000,000 for various services in connection with incorporation, registration, and the preparation of sales literature. This was accomplished by false and misleading representations as to the ability of the respondents to secure financing and capital upon the payment of an advance fee; actually, the investigation failed to disclose a single instance in which a share of stock had been sold or a dollar of capital secured for the victims. Ten persons were convicted in this case. (Tenth Annual Report of the Securities and Exchange Commission: A Ten Year Survey, 1934–1944, pp. 143–145.)

B. PURPOSE AND SCOPE OF "BLUE SKY" LAWS

(Prior to enactment of the Securities Act, various state laws were in force dealing with the problem of sales of securities to the public. The following material merely indicates the continuing effectiveness of such statutes, and the necessity for taking them, as well as the Securities Act, into consideration.)

STATE CONTROL OF SECURITIES

Sec. 18. Nothing in this title shall affect the jurisdiction of the securities commission (or any agency or office performing like functions) of any State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, over any security or any person. Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77r.

NATURE AND SCOPE OF THE STATE LAWS [1]

Securities laws have been enacted in this country in all of the states except Nevada. The various laws may be roughly classified as follows: (1) the "fraud" type of law, which does not require either "qualification" (i.e., registration or approval) of securities or "licensing" of security dealers, but, in general, merely provides penalties for fraud and authorizes injunctive proceedings to prevent fraud;[2] (2) the "licensing" type of law, which, in general, requires dealers in securities to be licensed, but does not require that securities be qualified;[3] (3) the "inspection" type of law, which, in general, requires that securities be qualified, but does not require that dealers be licensed;[4] and (4) the "licensing and inspection" type of law, which requires both that securities be qualified and that dealers be licensed, and which is the most common type of law.[5]

The fraud type of law raises no problem so far as ordinary, legitimate transactions in securities are concerned, whether such transactions are local or interstate in character, since affirmative action is not required to be taken as a condition precedent to sales of securities. [Smith, "State 'Blue-Sky' Laws and the Federal Securities Acts," 1936, 34 Mich.L.Rev. 1135, 1137.]

In the licensing of dealers, required in most states, several problems arise, the initial one, of course, being "who is a 'dealer'?" the typical definition is well illustrated by the Michigan statute as follows:

"The terms 'dealer' or 'broker' shall include every person and every company,

[2] Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey and New York. Both New York (since 1931) and Maryland (since 1937) now require the licensing of dealers.

[3] Connecticut, Kentucky, Maine, Montana, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Vermont. The issuer of securities himself, however, is not ordinarily permitted, under this type of statute to sell his own securities until they have been definitely approved by the State.

The Uniform Sale of Securities Act (see Handbook of National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, 1929), requiring both the registration of securities and the licensing of dealers, has been adopted in substance in four jurisdictions: Alabama, Florida, Michigan and Hawaii (ibid., 1939).

firm, trust, partnership or association, incorporated or unincorporated, other than a salesman or issuer, that engages either wholly or in part in the business of selling, offering for sale, negotiating for the sale of or otherwise dealing in any securities issued by another or by others, or underwriting, purchasing or otherwise acquiring such securities from another for the purpose of reselling them or of offering them for sale, or offering, buying, selling or otherwise dealing or trading in securities as a broker, agent or principal, or who deals in futures or differences in market quotations of prices or value of any securities or accepts margin on purchases or sales or pretended purchases or sales of such securities." Comp. Laws 1929, ch. 188, Sec. 2(g), as amended.

Certain exceptions, however, are commonly made to the statutory definitions. Thus if an ordinary investor who has acquired securities for his own account wishes to dispose of his holdings, he will not be required to comply with the statute. Cf. Opinion of Attorney General of Indiana, Dec. 23, 1925. Again, persons engaged in selling exempted securities may be excused from obtaining licenses, although ordinarily they would be deemed "dealers." See Opinion of Attorney General of Calif., Oct. 21, 1931. Usually, as in the Michigan statute, no distinction is made so far as regulation is concerned between "dealers" and "brokers," although some states use the latter rather than the former term.

The application for a dealer's license is made to the local regulatory body, usually a specially created securities commission or a branch of the state banking department. (See II C.C.H., Stocks and Bonds Law Serv., Chart I, p. 6503.) The information which the application is required to contain varies greatly from one state to another, this result being encouraged by the fact that the exact information required is largely a matter of administrative determination. An examination of the Illinois form of application, somewhat typical of those generally used, will reveal the broad scope of the investigation made before licenses are issued. The cost of a dealer's license ranges from $25 (Arizona, California, Illinois) to $100 (Arkansas, Michigan), and in most states must be renewed annually. In many states there is the additional requirement that the dealer furnish a bond,[6] made payable to the People of the state and ordinarily of $5,000 in amount. These bonds are for the protection of persons injured by violations of the Blue Sky Laws, and in at least one state (California) the securities commission may require the furnishing of a new bond as soon as an action is begun on the old one.

Agents of dealers, referred to in some statutes as "salesmen," are also commonly subjected to regulation. Thus they must also obtain licenses before selling securities, although the information required in the application is considerably less than that required of dealers, and the fees are also less. In addition a bond is sometimes required. (E.g., Alabama, $500.)

As to what securities must be registered under the particular state law, the first point of reference, as always, is the statutory definition of that state. The Michigan law [Comp.Laws 1929, ch. 188, sec. 2(c)] provides as follows:

"The term 'security' or 'securities' shall include any note, stock, treasury stock, bond, debenture, evidence of indebtedness, pre-organization certificate or pre-organization subscription, transferable certificate of interest or participation, certificate of interest in a profit-sharing agreement, certificate of interest, units and/or shares in an oil, gas, or mining lease, oil or gas well, collateral trust certificate, any transferable share, investment contract, or beneficial interest in or title to property or profits, or any other instrument commonly known as security." [Comp. Laws, 1929, ch. 188, Sec. 2(c), as amended.]

Such a definition, it will be seen, is extremely broad in its effect. Indeed, there have been comparatively few situations where litigation was necessary to determine whether or not the contract involved constituted a "security." The question with which a lawyer planning a transaction will be concerned is whether or not that transaction or the securities involved therein fall within any of the express statutory exemptions. Although the laws of each state must be studied for the exact exemptions granted by that state, a few of the more commonly found ones are:

Exempt transactions: Bona fide isolated sales by individuals, distribution of stock dividends to stockholders, judicial sales, public auction sales, sales by pledge holders or mortgagees, sales to banks, trust companies and insurance companies.

Exempt securities: securities issued by the United States, states and territories, by foreign governments and subdivisions thereof, by national and state banks, by building and loan associations, insurance companies, public utilities, savings banks, trust companies, corporations organized under acts of Congress or domestic corporations, cooperative associations, non-profit and eleemosynary associations, under the federal Farm Loan Act, commercial paper issued in the regular course of business, conditional sales contracts, public utility equipment trust certificates, stock subscriptions, securities issued to security holders in the course of merger or reorganization, personal and real property mortgage bonds and notes, and securities listed on specified stock exchanges. See II C.C.H., Stocks and Bonds Law Serv. Chart IV, p. 6525.

As to the securities other than those which escape regulation by means of the various exemptions, approval of the local regulatory body must be obtained before they are sold. In a number of states (e.g., Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio, Oklahoma and Oregon) this can be accomplished by one of two procedures, "qualification" or "notification." [7] The latter is a comparatively simple device expressly reserved for certain types of securities. (In other states these same securities may be found within the class of exemptions.) The only information required in a "notification" is the name of the issuer, the amount and price of the issue, a brief descriptive statement of the issue, and a brief statement of the facts which show that the issue is entitled to notification. The process of "qualification" [8] is a more difficult matter, and is carried out, as in "notification," by either the underwriter or the issuer. An idea of the large amount and diversity of information required can best be gained by a study of an application form. The fees charged for "notification" or "qualification" usually vary depending upon the total proposed sale price of the issue, but a minimum ($10–$25) and a maximum ($100–$500) prescribed by statute fix the upper and lower limits.

Once an application is filed, the administrative board charged with supervision of security issues makes an examination into the information set forth, and may shortly thereafter grant a permit for the sale of the particular issue or may require furtner data to be furnished before such approval is given. Sometimes a hearing will be necessary upon certain matters and in such case the administrative body must give notice to the applicant. If permission is refused, the applicant may thereupon take advantage of statutory provisions and demand a hearing upon his application.

State regulation, however, does not cease even after authority has been given for the sale of the securities. The blue sky laws often provide for examinations by the board after the sale has begun, and if facts are found to have been misrepresented, or certain other specified defects in the application appear, the board has the power to withdraw its permission, thus making any further sale a violation of the statute. In some states the issuer must file periodic reports with the administrative body, a procedure similar to that adopted under the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934.

[7] Illinois at an early date, met the problem of different classes of securities in an interesting manner. The Blue Sky law of that state divides securities into six classes: "A", "B", "C", "D", Investment Contracts and Investment Trusts. The first two classes, covering securities issued by the United States, states, banks, trust companies and other such "gilt-edged" securities ,are exempt from regulation. Class "C" securities may be registered by a simple process, similar to "notification," while Class "D" securities must be qualified and must bear in bold face type the words "SECURITIES IN CLASS 'D'. THESE ARE SPECULATIVE SECURITIES." The constitutionality of the Illinois act was upheld in Stewart v. Brady, 300 Ill. 425, 133 N.E. 310, 1921.

ASSOCIATED GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION.

Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1936. 221 Wis. 519, 266 N.W. 205.

FOWLER, J. The plaintiff Associated Gas & Electric Corporation petitioned the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin for registration of bonds it was issuing. The commission denied the application. The appellants brought action in the circuit court to review the order of the commission. The court confirmed the order.

The appellants contend, (1) that registration of the bonds was not necessary; and (2) that if it was registration should have been granted.

The plaintiff Associated Gas & Electric Company, hereinafter referred to as the "Company," owns all the stock of the plaintiff Associated Gas & Electric Corporation, hereinafter referred to as the "Corporation." The Company had outstanding debentures to the amount of $264,000,000 bearing fixed interest rates and maturing at different times. Its income is practically all derived from the Corporation. The Corporation's income is derived from its subsidiaries. During the period of the general business depression commencing about 1931, the income of the numerous subsidiaries of the Corporation fell off, and thus the income of the Company fell off to a point where the Company claims it became likely that it would default in its debenture obligations and be forced into receivership. To avoid this, the two corporations devised a plan of converting such portion of their interest-bearing debentures into income debentures, rearranging dates of maturity and rates of interest of the new interest-bearing debentures, and procuring exchanges of the old securities for the new, so as to enable the Company to avoid defaults and escape receivership. Some holders of the debentures of the Company were residents of Wisconsin. To enable the Company to negotiate with Wisconsin residents for exchange of the new securities for the old, the Corporation filed with the Public Service Commission of the state, which will hereinafter be referred to as the "commission," a petition for a "permit to sell" the new bonds. An exchange is a sale within the terms of the statutes governing the granting of permits to sell. Securities are "registered" when a permit to sell them is granted, and the term "registration" is hereinafter used as synonymous with the word "permit" and the phrase "issuance of a permit." The commission denied registration, except as to one of the three classes of the new bonds proposed.

The proposed plan provided for giving the debenture holders the choice of three options: (a) The debenture holders might take in exchange for their debentures new debentures due in 1973 to the amount of fifty per cent of the old bonds surrendered bearing the same rate of interest as the old bonds. The new debentures were not those of the Company, but of the Corporation. The amount of these new bonds to be issued was limited to $50,000,000. The new bonds might be exchanged within ten years from June 15, 1935, to income debentures of the Corporation due in 1978, of the kind covered by option (b) and of the same amount as if originally accepted under option (b). Option (a) was terminable at any time. The bonds were to be subject to $10,000,000 of outstanding bonds of the Corporation. Registration of these bonds was denied, but as the amount to be issued is now fully subscribed by nonresidents of Wisconsin, the question whether registration of them by the Wisconsin commission was necessary is moot.

(b) Debenture holders might take for their old bonds debentures of the Corporation to the amount of the bonds exchanged with interest payable out of earnings after payment of the obligations of the Corporation. The bonds were cumulative in nature. Five and a half and five per cent bonds were reduced in rate one per cent, four and a half reduced to three and three-quarters per cent, and four per cent reduced to three and a half per cent. These bonds were to be subject to the $10,000,000 of outstanding bonds of the Corporation.

(c) Debenture holders might take sinking-fund income debentures of the Company, due in 1983, of the same amount as the debentures surrendered, with interest at the same rate, cumulative, additional interest to be added under specified conditions which need not be stated, as the commission ruled that registration of these bonds was not necessary on the ground that the exchange would merely be one form of bond of the Company for another form of bond of the same Company of the same denomination.

As the plaintiffs are not prejudiced by the ruling of the commission respecting exchanges of bonds under options (a) and (c), we will limit our consideration of the case to the questions arising respecting option (b), which are above outlined under headings (1) and (2).

(1) Whether any permit was necessary to authorize exchanges under option (b) depends on the terms of the statutes exempting certain classes of bonds from the restrictions respecting the negotiations of securities. The constitutionality or validity of the statutory regulations respecting registration is not attacked. The only question raised is respecting the construction of the statutes relating to exemption from those regulations. The statute which the plaintiffs most strenuously contend exempts the bonds to be transferred under option (b) from the permit regulation is sec. 189.05(6), which is as follows:

"189.05 Exempt sales. Except as hereinafter provided the provisions of this chapter prohibiting the sale of securities unless registered by the commission shall not apply to the following transactions: * * *

"(6) The sale of securities when made by or on behalf of a vendor not the issuer thereof who, being a bona fide owner of such securities, disposes of his own property for his own account, provided such vendor at the time of such sale is not engaged either wholly or in part in the business of selling securities and such sale is not made, directly or indirectly, for the benefit of any other person or company, or for the purpose of violating or evading any provision of this chapter."

The meaning of the word "sale" in this statute is fixed by sec. 189.02(6), Stats., as covering "every disposition, offer, negotiation, agreement or attempt to dispose of a security * * * and every exchange of a security for property." The word "vendor" is not defined in the statute, but it is obviously used as referring to a person effecting a "sale," and would thus cover the party negotiating or attempting to negotiate the transfer of securities in exchange for property.

As the matter of registration first came before the commission, and as matters stood when the commission first determined the matter, only the Corporation was before the commission, and the right of the Corporation to registration of bonds issued by itself was the only question involved. The Corporation was, within the language of the statute, a "vendor" proposing to "sell" bonds issued by itself, and was not exempted from the provisions of sec. 189.06 (1), Stats., requiring registration before the bonds could be "sold."

After the commission first denied the Corporation's application, the Corporation asked for a rehearing, which was granted, and it was then first contended that it was the Company that was in fact disposing of the bonds, and it was disposing of them as the owner thereof in good faith within the meaning of sub. (6) above quoted. The theory upon which it claimed to be such owner is that as part of the plan of reorganization the Corporation had declared a dividend of $265,000,000 to the Company, and in payment of the dividend had delivered to the Company the new bonds covered by the options. Said sub. (6) provides that to exempt from registration the vendor must be a "bona fide owner" of securities, disposing of "his own property for his own account," and that the sale contemplated cannot be made "directly or indirectly for the benefit of any other person or company, or for the purpose of violating or evading any provision of this chapter." The commission found that the Company was not a bona fide holder of the Corporation bonds within the meaning of this statute. This conclusion was correct. The Company, if it had possession of the Corporation's bonds at all, did not hold them as an absolute owner. It could not lawfully sell them to the general public. Its disposition of them was restricted. It could part with them only by exchanging them for its own bonds of like denomination. It could not deliver one of them to a resident of Wisconsin except in exchange for one of its own bonds of like denomination. This was not bona fide ownership. Moreover, the exchange was at least indirectly for the benefit of the Corporation, and within the language of sub. (6) was thus indirectly if not directly "for the benefit of any other [another] person or company." The exchange of the bonds was manifestly for the benefit of the Corporation, for without it the Corporation could not pay the dividend it had declared. The Corporation was the one that was disposing of the bonds to the public as a means of paying its dividend. It was to pay its dividend with bonds of the Company and attempting to effect the contemplated exchanges for the purpose of procuring Company bonds with which to pay it. That was the Corporation's own view of the matter, as is evidenced by the fact that it was the Corporation that applied for the "permit to sell" the bonds in the first instance. In the proceedings for registration, up to the time the permit was first denied, no suggestion of Company ownership was made. The belated contention of ownership by the Company involves the concluding condition of sub. (6)—that the vendor shall not be making the sale "for the purpose of violating or evading any provision of this chapter." The contention of Company ownership was presented for the purpose of evading the statutory provisions requiring registration by the Corporation as prerequisite to disposition of the bonds.

It is also contended that the Company is entitled to exchange the Corporation bonds without registration under the portion of sec. 189.05 (15), Stats., declaring that the provisions of the statutes prohibiting the sale of securities without registration shall not apply to "the issue in good faith of securities by a company to its security holders, or creditors, in the process of a bona fide reorganization of the company made in good faith, or the issue in good faith of securities by a company, taking over substantially all the assets and continuing the business of another company, to the security holders or creditors of such other company." But the Corporation does not come within this language because the new bonds are not "issued" to "its security holders," but to the security holders of the Company; and the Company does not come within the language because it is not "a company taking over * * * the assets and continuing the business" of the Corporation. The Corporation continues the business, not the Company. It is suggested that the two corporations are so connected that the one is the other. If so, why the other? But even so, on this hypothesis, the language would not apply because the Company would not be continuing the business of another company, but merely continuing its own.

It is urged that the word "issue" in the statute should be construed to cover the bonds of the Corporation as well as the bonds of the Company. We do not so regard the matter. The statute was not intended to exempt from registration bonds to be issued by companies not in process of reorganization. The value of the bonds offered in exchange depends on the value of the securities back of them. New bonds of a reorganizing company might rightly be presumed to have back of them the same security that the old bonds had, and therefore be of the same value as the old bonds. New bonds of another company offered would presumably have different security back of them. They might therefore be of less value than the bonds for which they were offered in exchange. The exchange of such bonds therefore ought not to be permitted without examination by the commission as to how they are secured, while the exchange of new bonds of the reorganizing Company for its old bonds might properly be admitted without such examination.

In support of the commission's ruling that registration was necessary, it may be stated further that avoidance of registration of the bonds issued by the Corporation for the purpose of taking up the bonds of the Company cannot be justified merely by entries on the books of the two corporations. The Corporation was issuing new bonds. There can be no question about that. Before those bonds could be sold in Wisconsin, registration of them was necessary under the letter and within the spirit of the law. The naked fact is that the new bonds were new bonds of the Corporation, and according to the law of the state they had to be registered before they could be disposed of in this state. To contend to the contrary is to quibble.

(2) The statute under which the appellants claim the right to registration of the securities is sec. 189.07, Stats. The commission denied the application because in its opinion the provisions of the statute in three particulars were not met. One of these particulars is in respect to unfairness and inequitableness of the plan. The statute provides as to this matter that:

"(1) Upon the filing of an application for registration of securities, the commission shall examine the same and the other papers and documents filed therewith. * * * If * * *

"(b) The plan of financing is not unfair, inequitable, dishonest, or fraudulent. * * *

"(h) The commission * * * shall register such securities; otherwise it shall issue its findings and order denying the application. * * *

In support of the action of the commission in denying the registration, we need and will only consider the finding of the commission respecting the unfairness and inequitableness of the plan. There were outstanding bonds of the Company to the amount of $264,000,000 bearing fixed rates of interest and with successive fixed dates of maturity. The plan proposed that, pursuant to acceptance of opinion (a), fifty million of interest-bearing bonds should be issued, and no more, and the issuance of these might be cut off at any time. The acceptance under option (a) of fifty million of these bonds would cover a hundred million of the bonds of the Company, as those exercising option (a) had to accept new bonds of only one half the face value of the bonds surrendered. This would leave the holders of a hundred and sixty-four million of the Company bonds without the privilege of procuring any of the fifty million fixed interest-bearing bonds. If more than fifty million of these bonds were subscribed for, the fifty million would be allotted according to the whim or favoritism of the officers of the Company, perhaps to officers themselves in preference to others if any officers were among the holders exercising option (a). At any rate, the holders of one hundred sixty-four million of the bonds would have no chance to secure any interest-paying bonds. They were relegated, willy-nilly, to taking one class or the other of the income bonds due in fifty years or so. If perchance no income above interest requirements should be earned, those receiving the income bonds would not only receive no interest, but would be barred from recovering any principal for fifty years, by which time all of them will doubtless be in their graves. This is not treating all bondholders alike. It is not equality, and where equality is lacking so is equity.

By another provision of the plan the surrendered bonds are all to be placed in escrow, and specified persons, as escrow agents, are given the power at their discretion to resurrect the lifeless Company bonds and substitute them for those received in exchange for them by the Company bondholders. There is no protection against purely arbitrary action of these agents in this respect. Two of the escrow agents are vice-presidents of both the Company and the Corporation. Another is a director of both corporations. The relations of the others to the Company are not disclosed by the record, but the three mentioned are a majority of the agents, and the majority control the acts of the agents. Thus the holders of the new bonds would not know what they had. They would acquire only a "pig in a poke" and would have no means of opening the poke.

While the ostensible purpose of the reorganization was to avoid a receivership, power to force a receivership was merely taken from the hands of the Company bondholders and placed in the hands of the escrow agents who could throw the Company into the hands of a receiver at any time they might arbitrarily choose, perhaps to their own advantage as receivers or otherwise, and to the disadvantage of the bondholders. This suggests a suspicion that the reorganization was in reality conceived in the interest of others than the bondholders. This suspicion is somewhat supported by the fact that while the interest burden of the Company was less than $12,400,000 in 1923, the year next preceding the filing of the application, its net earnings were over $14,800,000, from which it would appear that the imminence of a receivership was more fanciful than real.

The holders of bonds accepted under option (a) could not after ten years exchange these bonds for the income-bearing bonds of the Corporation offered under option (b). In case of failure of the Company and its reorganization or the winding up of its affairs after expiration of that period, fifty millions of the losses of the Company would be borne entirely by the holders of these bonds. Neither the stockholders nor the other bondholders would bear any portion of this loss. And in case the Company should not fail, fifty millions of the Company's debts would be discharged, wholly at the loss of the holders who accepted option (a) and to the benefit of those who accepted the other options and of the Company.

All this is enough in our opinion to warrant the view of the commission that it could not find that the "plan of financing was not unfair and inequitable" and to justify its refusal to register the securities.

The appellants claim that the commission did not make findings as required by the statute. They claim that to justify denial of registration the commission must affirmatively find that the plan of reorganization is either "unlawful, dishonest, fraudulent or otherwise contrary to public policy," or "is unfair, inequitable, dishonest or fraudulent." If such an affirmative finding is necessary, we are of opinion that the commission's decision contains an affirmative finding that is sufficient to support its determination. All the commission was required to find in denying registration in order to satisfy the calls of sec. 189.07, Stats., is that the Company's plan of financing is unfair and inequitable. As has been above stated, the commission filed two decisions. The second was in effect but an affirmance of the first. In the body of the first decision filed it is stated:

"We are of opinion that * * * [certain matters referred to] establish that the Company's plan of financing is unfair and inequitable."

This is a finding of fact, and it constitutes adequate support for the order denying the application before the commission.

By the Court.—The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

A motion for a rehearing was denied, with $25 costs, on June 2, 1936.

NOTE

(A) The state Blue Sky laws vary considerably in their scope of application. From the point of view of the investing public, however, the important inquiry for a state is whether its laws provide sufficient protection for its citizens in regard to securities not subject to regulation by the federal acts of 1933 and 1934. Some of the state laws fall far short of this standard. Thus the New York "Martin Act" has been criticized on the ground that it only undertakes to "prevent" fraud after the fraud has occurred. 1931, 8 N.Y.U.L.Q. 465. The same charge applies with equal force to the other "fraud" laws, found in Delaware, Maryland and New Jersey.

(B) The prevalent unfamiliarity of commissions and more especially of prosecuting attorneys of the states with securities acts and their rights and duties thereunder is a serious burden upon the effective administration of the blue sky laws. The frequent changes which take place in administrators result in the removal from office of commissioners who have really learned their business and have become expert in the administration of the law, and the filling of the positions with inexperienced men, to the great injury of the legitimate interests whose business activities are hindered, and also to the detriment of the enforcement of the laws against fraud. Ashby, Economic Effect of Blue Sky Laws, 1926, p. 43.

(C) The selling circular of the 20's was unsatisfactory because it told practically nothing; the present-day prospectus is unsatisfactory because it tells too much. * * * In any case, prospectuses did become cumbersome and technical, so issuers or underwriters devised supplemental literature which subsequently, in effect, took the place of the prospectus and defeated its purpose. Handblotters, booklets, pamphlets, brochures, slides, and movies were created featuring various points contained in the prospectus, and even, in some cases, not in the prospectus. Of course, they were careful to insert a statement in such supplemental literature, that it was not to be construed as the prospectus, to which prospects were referred for complete information. First, only two or three pieces were used, but they kept growing until some issuers had as many as ten or fifteen in use. Some of them contained charts and graphs, or pictures which distorted rather than clarified the true situation. * * * The feeling was created that the prospectus was something that regulatory bodies arbitrarily forced the issuers to prepare and use in their sales. * * * Last October (meaning 1937), the Michigan Corporation and Securities Commission passed a rule forbidding any sales literature to be used in the sale of securities in the State of Michigan except the prospectus. No supplemental literature of any kind may be used unless such supplemental literature in effect only brings up to date material already contained in the prospectus, and it must not contain any other information whatever. * * * Olson, "Regulation of Dealers and Brokers", Proceedings 21st Annual Convention of National Association of Securities Commissioners, 1939, 63, 65, 66.

(D) Consider first the altogether proper desire of issuer and underwriter that the various steps to be taken in the qualification of a security for distribution be so timed that the issue may be offered simultaneously in the various states in which distribution is to be effected. The federal Act, as you know, provides for a "cooling period" of twenty days following the filing of the registration statement, at the expiration of which, in the absence of the prior filing of an amendment, the statement becomes effective. * * * Prior to the effective date of the registration statement, neither the issuer nor any underwriter or dealer may offer the security for sale or solicit purchases of the same, except that the issuer may, during that period, enter into preliminary negotiations or agreements with the underwriter. In consequence of this requirement, which was designed to prevent the precipitate "forced feeding" of securities to dealers and the public, sub-underwriting groups and selling groups may not be formed prior to the effective date of the statement. In a state having only a "fraud" type of statute, this limitation presents no problem. But in a state which has a "disclosure" or "qualification" type of statute, it is evident that, prior to the effective date, only the issuer itself or the principal underwriters—that is, those distributors who are purchasing directly from or selling directly for the issuer—are in a position to initiate steps for state qualification of the issue. Since in many states qualification must be by a registered dealer doing business in the state in question, difficulties may arise in the initiatng of steps looking toward state qualification with sufficient timeliness to permit clearance of the issue at a date corresponding substantially with the effective date under the federal act. This may not be a serious problem in the case of a large issue having a far-flung network of wholesale distributors; but the difficulties may be genuine where it is desired to effect a reasonably wide distribution of a small but sound issue, having only one or two principal underwriters. One possible solution would be to permit the out-of-state underwriter to file the necessary application and thus to qualify the security, such qualification, however, being conditioned upon the adoption of the application by a local dealer, prior to any sale of the security in the state. An alternative would be to permit qualification by the out-of-state underwriter upon his appointment of the state commissioner as his agent to accept service of process in suits based on the purchase of such security. Either solution would make possible the filing of the state application in ample time to permit adequate examination of the data submitted, and would not deprive any state of its fair portion of sound issues publicly offered upon or immediately after the federal effective date. Throop, "Coordinate Administration of Federal and State Securities Laws," Proceedings 20th Annual Convention of National Association of Securities Commissioners, 1937, 92–94. Consider the accentuation of the problem of simultaneous clearance by the shortening of the 20-day period under the Securities Act within which the registration statement may become effective (infra, pp. 806, 807).

(E) Thus, after the preparation of the registration statement required by the federal act it becomes necessary to meet the diverse registration requirements of the various states. This is no small matter. If the issue is a large one a ready market probably cannot be found in a single state. Furthermore, the issuer may desire to secure the benefits from a widespread market covering most of the country. If the issue is an especially desirable security the investors of one state should have an opportunity to acquire their portion of the distribution. These factors will require the registration of the securities under the laws of a number of states. The magnitude of this undertaking is illustrated by the experiences of those who have attempted to follow a registration through the Securities and Exchange Commission and securities commissions of the various states. Their studies show an unorganized, expensive and wasteful procedure. * * * If state registration requirements should not be barriers to the proper flow of investments for industry, especially at a time when the country is trying to step up its production in many lines of national defense, there is reason for seeking correlation of the state provisions with those of the federal Securities Act. To do this it has been suggested that the issuer of interstate issues be permitted to file copies of the federal registration statement or prospectus with the states in satisfaction of their registration requirements. * * * It is the purpose of the federal Securities Act to require that the registration statement shall not contain an untrue statement of a material fact, or omit to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to keep the statements therein from being misleading. The Securities and Exchange Commission has defined the term "material" to include "such matters as to which an average prudent investor ought reasonably to be informed before purchasing the security registered." * * * It seems inconceivable that the omission of any fact which is necessary to be stated to prevent the working of a fraud upon the purchaser, or to show the unsoundness of the issuer's business principles, would be permissible under the federal requirements, for surely such facts are "matters as to which an average prudent investor ought reasonably to be informed before purchasing the security", and are necessary to be stated to make other statements not misleading.

The writer by personal letter recently addressed * * * the securities commissions of ten states where by statutes or regulations federal prospectuses or registration statements are accepted as state registration statements or as exhibits thereto. * * * The Commissions of Indiana and Missouri were firm in their beliefs that the federal forms do not contain sufficient information, while the Vermont commission stated simply, "We sometimes find need for different information than is contained in the federal registration prospectus. * * *" The Commissions of Illinois, Massachusetts, Michigan, Ohio, South Carolina, Texas and West Virginia stated that generally the federal registration statements provide ample information. C. FEDERAL SECURITIES LEGISLATION SINCE 1933 [1]

1. THE SECURITIES EXCHANGE ACT OF 1934 [2]

NOTE

(A) The broad purpose of the Securities Act of 1933 is to protect the buyer of a newly issued security by requiring a fair disclosure of material facts and by penalizing the failure to furnish them in connection with the sale of the security through the use of the mails or of the instrumentalities of interstate commerce. * * *

The Securities Act itself contains no provisions requiring issuers of securities registered under it to supply investors with current information about these securities. It is not concerned in any way with dealings in securities already issued nor, except to a limited extent, with dealings in securities issued in accordance with its provisions. It is obvious that many factors besides the information available at the time of registration may have a bearing upon the attractiveness of a security to a purchaser. The information provided in the registration statement becomes obsolete in a comparatively brief period. Moreover, whatever the intrinsic merits of a security its desirability for the purpose of investment or speculation is affected by an actual and apparent demand for it. If the purchaser is induced to buy for $200 a security fairly worth $100 the effect upon his solvency may be substantially the same as if he bought for $100 a security worth nothing. While the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 has other purposes, notably the regulation of credit used in security dealings, one of its primary objects is to supplement the protection given the investor by the Securities Act.

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 supplements the Security Act in two principal ways: (1) It makes available reliable information about the current business conditions of the issuers of what are on the whole the most important securities bought and sold in the United States; (2) It prohibits practices tending to create fictitious values for securities and gives the Securities and Exchange Commission broad powers over the trading in securities. Hanna, The Securities Exchange Act as Supplementary of the Securities Act, 1937, 4 Law and Contemporary Problems 256, 256–257. See also, Hanna, The Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 1934, 23 Calif.L.Rev. 1, 1–10.

(B) The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 has four main purposes: first, the regulation of stock exchanges; second, the prevention of the excessive use of credit for speculation; third, the prevention of manipulation; and fourth, the disclosure of adequate information in regard to securities dealt in on exchanges. The Act also aims at the prevention of unfair methods in the solicitation of proxies in regard to such securities or the use, for personal profit, of confidential information by the directors, officers or principal stockholders of the issuers of such securities.

"Control of securities exchanges is accomplished by making their registration a condition precedent to the lawful transaction of business. The Commission may deny, suspend or revoke any registration, and it likewise has power to compel registered exchanges to make such changes in their rules and practices as the Commission may deem necessary to insure fair dealing on such exchanges. The registration of brokers and dealers engaged in business in over-the-counter markets is likewise required. The Commission, through its power to suspend or expel from membership any member or officer of an exchange and its right to revoke any registration, has a direct and effective power over exchanges, members of exchanges, and over-the-counter brokers and dealers. The disciplinary power of exchanges is made an additional means of enforcement by requiring each registered exchange to incorporate in its rules the provisions of the Act and of the rules and regulations adopted thereunder. Each exchange must also agree to comply with "and to enforce so far as is within its power compliance by its members" with the Act and any rule or regulation made thereunder. * * * Redmond, The Securities Exchange Act of 1934: An Experiment in Administrative Law, 1938, 47 Yale L.J. 622.

(C) The regulatory provisions of the Act, to which all registered exchanges are subject * * * can be roughly divided into three classes: (1) those which undertake to limit speculation; (2) those which undertake to prevent manipulations; and (3) those which place under governmental oversight the finances of corporations whose securities are traded in throughout the country, whether listed on an exchange or not.

(1) Provisions Limiting Speculation

* * * the two stock exchange practices which have been criticized because they tend to encourage speculation are short selling and margin trading. The Act attempts to correct or limit both of these practices.

Short Selling

The Act disposes of the problem of short selling by making it unlawful for any person to use any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or of the mails, or of any facility of any national securities exchange to effect a short sale, except in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as appropriate or necessary in the public interest or for the protection of investors. While the Commission may, by its rules, exempt certain classes of transactions from this prohibition it is to be expected that the Commission will respect the opinion of Congress to the effect that short selling should be prohibited and will confine its exemptions to very necessary cases. * * *

Margin Trading

The Act first undertakes to limit loans by brokers to customers. It provides that for the purpose of preventing the excessive use of credit in purchasing or carrying securities, the Federal Reserve Board shall, * * * prescribe rules and regulations with respect to the amount of credit that may be initially extended and subsequently maintained on any security (other than an exempted security) registered on a national securities exchange. * * *

Another major provision of the Act relates to loans by banks and others to brokers; it is aimed to prevent the furnishing by brokers to their customers of excessive amounts of credit for purposes of speculation. No stock exchange member or broker or dealer doing business with a member may borrow money on registered securities, except through a member bank of the Federal Reserve Banking system or a non-member bank which shall have filed with the Board an agreement to comply with all its rules and regulations relative to the use of credit in financing security transactions which are applicable to member banks; nor may a stock exchange member permit his total indebtedness to all other persons, including customers' credit balances, to exceed such percentage of the net capital employed in the business as the Commission may prescribe, not exceeding 2,000 per cent in any case; nor may he hypothecate any securities carried for the account of any customer in a manner to permit the commingling of the customers' securities with those of other customers, without the customers' consent, nor hypothecate securities carried for the accounts of customers so as to permit them to be commingled with securities of any person other than a bona fide customer, or for a sum in excess of the aggregate indebtedness of such customers in respect of such securities; nor may he lend any securities carried for the use of a customer without the written consent of such customer. * * *

(2) Provisions to Prevent Manipulations

The provisions regulating stock exchange practices are contained in Sections 9, 10 and 11 of the Act. They attempt to prevent practically every manipulative device that critics of stock exchange practices have suggested, including wash sales and fictitious trades; pool operations; the dissemination of information that the price of a security is likely to rise or fall by reason of individual or pool activities; the dissemination of false or misleading tips as to market operations; operations for the pegging or stabilizing of stock market prices in contravention of any rules of the Commission; trading in options, such as puts, calls and straddles, and the guaranteeing of such options in contravention of such regulations as the Commission may prescribe, making of short sales and the use of stop-loss orders, except under such regulations as the Commission may prescribe; and the use of any manipulative or deceptive device or contrivance in contravention of any rules ot the Commission. * * * The Act * * * empowers the Commission to prescribe rules to regulate floor trading on the exchanges, and to prevent excessive trading off the floor by exchange members. * * *

(3) Provisions to Insure Publicity Regarding Corporate Affairs

The Act also undertakes to insure adequate publicity as to corporate management and finances. * * * Section 12 provides for the registration of securities traded in on national securities exchanges and requires for all such securities the type of information demanded on new issues under the Securities Act. The registration statement demanded under this section thus fills in the gap left by the Securities Act and the listing requirements of the exchange; it secures similar information regarding securities already outstanding. The provisions relating to unlisted securities provide for a desirable discretion in the Commission and an opportunity for further study on problems that will be difficult to solve in any nice fashion.

The Commission may require every issuer of a registered security to file such information and documents as are necessary to keep reasonably current the material filed pursuant to Section 12. * * *

Section 14(a) makes it unlawful for any person to use the mails or the facilities of interstate commerce or a national securities exchange to solicit proxies without complying with the regulations of the Commission. * * *

Section 14(b) makes it unlawful for any exchange member or any broker or dealer who operates through such a member to give proxies for stock which he carries on account. * * *

Every beneficial owner of more than 10 per cent of any class of registered "equity security", and every director or officer of the issuer thereof, must file a statement of his holdings and report any changes occurring therein at the end of each calendar month. If any such person shall buy a security and shall within six months sell such security at a profit, the profit shall be recoverable by the issuer, irrespective of any original intent to keep the same market position for more than six months. The same rule shall apply to a sale of a security followed within six months by the purchase of the said security at a profit. * * * (The) general purpose (of this section) is to prevent insiders from deriving profit from dealing in securities of their corporation on the basis of information not available to shareholders generally. * * * Tracy and MacChesney, The Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 1934, 32 Mich.L.Rev. 1025, 1039–1056.[3]

(D) The Act and many of the rules and regulations so adopted are made effective by criminal penalties. As an additional sanction, the Commission may invoke the aid of the courts to enforce its orders by injunction or mandamus. In order to give force to these sanctions, the Commission has been given broad powers of investigation. It may also make public its findings; * * * The Act also contains a number of civil penalties, intended to implement its provisions. The obligation of directors, officers and principal stockholders to account for profits realized on purchases and sales made within a six months period can be enforced by the issuer or any owner of the securities concerned. Any person who purchases or sells a security at a price which was affected by a violation of the anti-manipulative provisions of the Act may recover damages from any person who wilfully participated in the forbidden act. Any one who purchases or sells a security at a price which was affected by a false or misleading statement in any document filed pursuant to the Act, or any rule or regulation thereunder, may recover damages from whoever made the false statement or caused it to be made. Every contract made in violation of any provision of the Act or of any rule or regulation thereunder, or the performance of which involves such a violation, is declared void and may be set aside at the instance of any person who did not have knowledge of its illegality at the inception of the contract. 2. THE PUBLIC UTILITY HOLDING COMPANY ACT OF 1935[5]

NOTE

(A) The most dynamic legislation of the New Deal affecting corporations may very well be the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935. Quite apart from its program of economic planning in which the "death sentence" provisions play so prominent a part, the Act provides a basis for realigning the legal principles of corporate practice. * * * The broad objective of the Act is to protect investors, consumers and the public in general from certain abusive practices in corporate finance and management. * * * The Act proposes to eliminate some of these practices and modify others by a comprehensive program of simplification which is designed to narrow the gap between ownership and management and affects the securities of the individual company, its corporate structure, and the set-up of the holding company system to which it belongs. * * * Meck and Cary, Regulation of Corporate Finance and Management under the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, 1938, 52 Harv.L.Rev. 216, 216–217.

(B) After a preliminary declaration of policy and a definition of the major terms as used in the context of the Act, Title One provides for the exemption of those holding companies which, because of the nature of their organization or operation cannot be of great importance to interstate commerce or the national public interest. The next section, Section 4 of Title One, is by far the most important single provision of the Act. It makes various interstate activities unlawful for all holding companies unless registered in accordance with Section 5. And it is this registration which brings holding companies within the scope of the remainder of the Act. Sections 6 and 7 impose conditions on the security practice of registered holding companies. It is made unlawful for a registered holding company or its subsidiary to issue, sell, or alter securities unless a declaration has been filed with the Commission. Before such a declaration can become effective, a reasonable time must elapse, during which the Commission may issue an order to show cause why the proposed security action should be taken. After a hearing it may forbid or permit the declaration to become effective; but at no time is commission approval to be given unless detailed requirements prescribed by Congress are complied with. A second set of obligations is directed at the acquisition of any interest in any business by registered holding companies or their subsidiaries. With certain exceptions the approval of the Commission must be obtained before such acquisition can be lawful. And here again Congress names the terms on which such approval shall be given and outlines the information which must be provided in the applications of those companies desiring new properties. The third set of obligations which Congress has decreed shall bind registered holding companies and their subsidiaries is contained in Section 11, which provides, in subsection (a), that the Commission shall examine and determine to what extent (1) holding company systems may be simplified, (2) voting power equitably distributed among security holders, and (3) the properties and business of the system confined to those necessary or appropriate to the operations of an integrated public utility system. Paragraph (1) of subsection (b) makes it the duty of the Commission to require by order, after January 1, 1938, the limitation of holding companies to single integrated systems unless (A) such integrated systems are less economical than diversified ownership, (B) additional systems are regionalized within one power shed, and (C) the combined systems are not so large as to impair the advantages of "localized management, efficient operation, or the effectiveness of regulation." Paragraph (2) of subsection (b) empowers the Commission to require by order, likewise after January 1, 1938, that registered holding companies and their subsidiaries take steps to "ensure that the corporate structure or continued existence of any company in the holding company system does not unduly or unnecessarily complicate the structure, or unfairly or inequitably distribute voting power among security holders of such holding company system." This paragraph, then, seeks to eliminate the intermediate holding company; but even more specifically this paragraph is directed, in express words, at the elimination of the top or "super" holding companies. The objective of Section 11, the remainder of which is devoted largely to the procedural aspects of the inevitable reorganization in the structure that must accompany compliance with the Act, is removal from corporate structures of those units which serve no desirable social or economic function. Having thus made provision for a simpler and more integrated system, Congress in the next section of the Act makes some stipulations as to future fiscal policy. "Upstream loans" to registered holding companies are henceforth absolutely banned and all loans and credit extensions made by registered holding companies to the members of their systems are subjected to Commission rules. Excessive dividend payments and other objectionable fiscal practices are likewise prohibited. Also of interest are the clauses forbidding political contributions by members of a registered holding company system, and the declaration making it unlawful to lobby before certain government bodies unless registration and information statements are recorded with the Commission by such lobbyists. A fifth group of provisions centers about service, sales and construction contracts, the power to participate in which is denied by Section 13 to registered holding companies. Such contracts are restricted to mutual service companies or subsidiaries of registered holding companies, or affiliates, or other persons who operate in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Commission. Exceptional circumstances however will, as usual, justify exemptions. The final set of obligations imposed on registered holding companies provides for the submission of accounts, reports, and general information on holding company affairs. The bulk of the remaining sections merely specify the procedure to be followed by the Commission and the courts in the enforcement of the Act, and set forth both the civil and criminal liabilities incurred by any infraction of its terms. 4. THE INVESTMENT COMPANY ACT OF 1940[8]

NOTES

(A) The Investment Company Act of 1940 is the newest comprehensive piece of national legislation drawn in the "interest of investors" and entrusted for administration to the Securities and Exchange Commission. That its passage was achieved with the complete cooperation of the industry adds significance to the Act, whether it be considered purely as a much needed regulatory measure in that particular industry, or whether it be considered as suggesting the temper of any further federal legislation supervising corporations. Note, The Investment Company Act of 1940, 1941, 50 Yale L.J. 440.

(B) * * * the Federal Investment Company Act of 1940 * * * declares formally that both the national public interest and the interest of investors are adversely affected by certain specified occurrences, such as the issuance by investment companies of securities which fail to protect the preferences and privileges of their holders, or the operation of such corporations in the interest of the management or affiliated persons rather than in the interest of all classes of the corporation's security holders. (C) The regulatory mechanism established by the Act employs the jurisdictional basis of other recent securities acts and follows the now familiar pattern of requiring that all but certain exempt companies register with the SEC or else be denied use both of the mails and of the instrumentalities of interstate commerce. While the publicity attendant to registration is expected to prove a corrective to many of the evils in the industry, experience has shown that in many cases publicity alone is insufficient. Consequently the Act goes further and forbids certain organizational and operational practices, fortifying these prohibitions with both injunctive relief and criminal penalties. * * *

The difficult and important task of framing a workable definition of an investment company was solved by including in general language all issuers actually, professedly, or prospectively engaged "primarily in the business of investing, reinvesting, or trading in securities," and by prescribing a statistical formula to amplify this general definition and to determine questionable cases. * * * specific provisions are made in the Act to exclude any securities companies which might fall within the letter of the definition but without the spirit of the regulation. * * * The SEC is in general given power to see that the conditions annexed to the exemptions are met; and a final bit of "rubber" in the definition gives the SEC power to exempt any person, security, or transaction from any or all provisions of the Act provided such exemption is in accord with the policy of legislation and consonant with the protection of investors. * * *

The Act divides investment companies into "face-amount companies", "unit investment trusts," and "management companies"—a classification which conforms closely to the categories existing in the industry today. * * *

Unlike the Public Utility Holding Company Act, the present measure does not effect radical changes in the structure of existing companies. However, in the future no company may make public offering of its securities unless it has or originally had a net worth of at least $100,000 * * * or has firm commitments from not more than twenty-five responsible persons to purchase securities which will bring the net worth to this figure. * * *

Structures involving cross and circular ownerships are handled by forbidding registered companies to purchase any securities making for such a situation and by requiring any such ownership extant in the industry at the present time to be eliminated within five years from the date of the Act. * * *

Strict limitations are placed upon the kind and amount of senior securities which may be issued in the future either by existing companies or by those subsequently formed—limitations made necessary by the malpractices which have previously centered about such securities. * * *

Virtually all of the host of sharp practices which formerly attended the issuance of investment company securities are sought to be curbed by the present Act. Under its terms no stocks can be issued for services or for property other than cash and securities, except as a dividend or distribution to its security holders or in connection with reorganizations; thus the familiar practice of exchanging choice securities for "promotional expenses" is eliminated. The equally familiar practice of "diluting" securities by selling them below their asset value is likewise curbed; and another avenue of dilution is closed by limiting the issuance of stock warrants or rights to subscribe to short term rights. Contracts with principal underwriters are subject to approval by an independent board of directors or by the holders of outstanding securities, and are limited as to duration and assignability; * * *

Dividend payments are subject both to the asset coverage requirements * * * and to the additional requirement that such payments be made only from net income, as determined by good accounting practice, or if not so made, that they be accompanied by a written statement which adequately discloses the source of such payments. * * *

Under the Act every share of stock hereafter issued by management or face-amount companies must be a voting stock, possessing equal voting rights with every other outstanding voting stock. An exception to this requirement is provided in the case of management companies already organized as common law trusts. * * *

The Act requires that various fundamental matters be submitted to the vote of stockholders, chief among these being the approval of management contracts, the effecting of vital changes in the policy or purpose of the companies, and the election of directors. * * *

Finally, further provisions safeguarding voting rights prohibit public offerings of voting trust certificates and confer upon the SEC the power to establish rules and regulations governing the soliciting of proxies. * * *

The present legislation plugs the loopholes whereby investment companies have escaped registration under the Acts of 1933 and 1934, and subjects both outstanding and prospective security issues to the requirements of those Acts. Moreover, the registration required by the present Act insures still additional disclosures, for all registrants must choose the classification and sub-classifications within which they propose to operate and must define their policy with regard to activities such as those discussed above as well as several others. Changes and deviations from the policies established by the registration statement may be made only when authorized by the vote of a majority of the outstanding voting securities. * * * Teeth are placed in these provisions by giving the SEC power to suspend registrations if a company fails to provide the information required or makes material misstatements therein, and by granting the SEC the further powers of prohibiting the use of misleading names and of supervising the sales literature employed by investment companies.

Likewise, adequate information relative to current activities is assured investors and the SEC by requiring the periodic submission to both of detailed reports covering the financial status of the company, the securities owned, recent security turnover, and the remuneration of company officials. * * *

Recognizing the limitations inherent in publicity as a corrective or preventive device, the present Act contains specific prohibitions against self-dealing and greatly curtails the potentialities accompanying conflicts of interest. * * * the Act provides for an independent majority on the board of directors, the function of which majority is to check any untoward activities on the part of those minority directors who are also serving the company in other capacities. * * *

A novel attempt to purge the industry of undesirable persons is found in a provision which closes the doors of the industry to persons who, within ten years, have been convicted of any felony or misdemeanour arising out of securities transactions or who are permanently or temporarily enjoined from engaging in such transactions. * * * Finally, these protections are buttressed by sweeping aside the exculpatory clauses which formerly shielded questionable practices, by subjecting the settlement of "strike suits" and other civil actions to the scrutiny of the SEC, and by authorizing the SEC to require the bonding of any officers or employees who have access to funds or securities of investment companies. * * * Note, The Investment Company Act of 1940, 1941, 41 Col.L.Rev. 269, 275–291. The Act also contains provisions relative to the activities of investment companies. Permissible investments, the safeguarding of assets, the redemption and resale of company securities and the exchanges of securities are all dealt with in regulatory sections of the statute. See, Investment Company Act of 1940, §§ 11, 12, 17, 22, 23, 26 and 28; Note, The Investment Company Act of 1940, 1941, 41 Col.L.Rev. 269, 291–294.

5. THE INVESTMENT ADVISERS ACT OF 1940 [9]

§ 201: Upon the basis of facts disclosed by the record and report of the Securities and Exchange Commission * * * it is hereby found that investment advisers are of national concern, in that, among other things—

(1) their advice, counsel, publications, writings, analyses, and reports are furnished and distributed, and their contracts, subscription agreements, and other arrangements with clients are negotiated and performed by the use of the mails and means and instrumentalities of interstate commerce;

(2) their advice, counsel, publications, writings, analyses, and reports customarily relate to the purchase and sale of securities traded on national securities exchanges and in interstate over-the-counter markets, securities issued by companies engaged in business in interstate commerce, and securities issued by national banks and member banks of the Federal Reserve System; and

(3) the foregoing transactions occur in such volume as substantially to affect interstate commerce, national securities exchanges, and other securities markets, the national banking system and the national economy.

§ 202(a) (11) "Investment adviser" means any person who, for compensation engages in the business of advising others, * * * as to the value of securities or as to the advisability of investing in, purchasing or selling securities, or who, for compensation and as part of a regular business, issues or promulgates analyses or reports concerning securities. * * *

The Act exempts from its provisions banks, brokers, lawyers and the like, whose financial advice is merely incidental to the practice of their profession or business.

No investment adviser may use the mails or any instrumentality of interstate commerce in connection with his business as adviser unless he is properly registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission (§ 203).

In addition to its registration requirements, the Act provides for the filing of annual and special reports with the Commission (§ 204) and for the publicity of registration statements and annual reports (§ 210). Investment advisory contracts are regulated (§ 205), and all contracts made in violation of the Act are expressly declared void (§ 215).

Registered investment advisers are prohibited from employing any fraudulent practices or devices (§ 206); from making any material misstatements or omissions in any registration application or filed report (§ 207); and from making any unlawful representations (§ 208).

Under the Act, the Commission is empowered to make investigations (§ 209), to conduct public hearings (§ 212), and to make rules and regulations incidental to the carrying out of the provisions of the statute (§ 211).

The Commission is also given power to bring injunctive proceedings in United States District Courts to enforce the provisions of the Act, and, in addition, to transmit evidence of violations to the Attorney-General, who may in his discretion, institute appropriate criminal proceedings (§ 209).

In addition to voiding contracts made in violation of the Act, the statute provides (§ 217) that any person who wilfully violates any of its provisions may be subject to a maximum $10,000 fine and/or be imprisoned for not more than two years.

PART IV

FUNDED DEBT

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 16. Power to borrow money and mortgage property. 1. Every stock corporation other than a moneyed corporation shall have the power to borrow money and contract debts, when necessary for the transaction of its business, or for the exercise of its corporate rights, privileges or franchises, or for any other lawful purpose of its incorporation; and it may issue and dispose of its obligations for any amount so borrowed, and may mortgage its property and franchises to secure the payment of such obligations, or of any debt contracted for such purposes. The consent to the execution of such mortgage, except a purchase-money mortgage, by the holders of not less than two-thirds of the total number of shares outstanding entitled to vote thereon, given either in writing, or by vote at a meeting of the stockholders called for that purpose in the manner prescribed by section forty-five, shall be required. * * * When authorized by like consent, the directors, under such regulations as they may adopt, may confer on the holder of any debt or obligation, secured or unsecured, the right to convert the principal thereof within such period and upon such terms and conditions as may be fixed by the resolution of the directors conferring the right of conversion, into stock of the corporation.

NOTE

A corporation cannot have an economic life unless it have adequate capital to finance the activities for the performance of which it was formed. This capital may be acquired either through subscription to equity securities (such as capital stock) or through the exercise of the corporation's borrowing power. If the latter alternative be adopted, the corporation has several avenues open to it, but perhaps the best for the needs of the larger corporate entity is the borrowing of comparatively great sums of money against its corporate obligations which are of such a character that they may be held by investors. The predominant corporate obligation in use in the United States has been the corporate bond secured by an indenture of mortgage upon the property of the obligor. * * *

The thought that property might be security for a loan of money has existed for many centuries, but the American form of corporate bond secured by a deed of trust modeled after the general form of mortgage on real estate is of comparatively recent origin. Apparently the first corporate mortgage was made by the Morris Canal and Banking Company, in 1830, to one Willink, as Trustee, to secure a loan of $750,000. * * * It is of course more than well known that since that time financing through the issue of secured corporate bonds has been undertaken by practically all of the leading corporations, whether railroad, public utility or industrial.

The mortgages securing such corporate bonds are almost invariably in the form of a deed of trust containing a power of sale. The use of trustees to take and hold the mortgaged property as security for the benefit of the bondholders affords a device for unified action which otherwise would be impossible, especially since the holders of the bonds are numerous and of changing identity. This relative facility of action between the mortgagor and the trustee is of particular advantage in matters entire issue may be paid off; and, under the same trust indenture, the entire amount may be reissued; or, part may be paid off and an equal amount reissued at once. Thus the security stands as permanent security for a maximum obligation which need never be reduced, although individual bonds may be paid off and new bonds issued to new holders in their place.

(b) Another type secures not merely a stated maximum amount of bonds, but also permits that amount to be increased, usually in proportion to increased value of, or additions to, the property of the issuing corporation. Public utility bonds are apt to be issued under this type of indenture.

In a very loose type the mortgage or trust indenture mortgage or indenture may secure an absolutely unlimited principal amount; permitting the corporation to issue bonds indefinitely. This, of course, is an unsafe type. Or, and more usually, the mortgage or indenture permits the corporation to issue bonds up to a stated percentage of the value of the corporate property then existing or thereafter acquired. A machinery is set up for having the cost or fair value of such additional property ascertained and proved to the satisfaction of the trustee. It will be seen that this type of mortgage literally runs forever; and the bond issue is an indefinite amount, though in theory a relation is preserved between the amount of the outstanding bonds and the value of the property. Today, the idea of corporations having steady requirements for new capital (as is the case with public utilities) is to have an open end mortgage or trust indenture with some bank as trustee, available as security for any new bond issues which it may wish to put out; thereby avoiding the expense and difficulty and loss of time in discharging old bond issues and getting up new mortgages, etc.

Certain of such mortgages or trust indentures, permit additional bonds to be issued against additions to property account, but require deductions because of retirements (and sometimes maintenance or replacement requirements as well) from the additional property on which the new bond issue is based. This type of mortgage or trust indenture is called a "net additions mortgage", and is commonly used by public utilities. Mortgages or trust indentures which do not require such deductions to be made from additional property are called "gross additions mortgages", and are commonly used by railroad corporations.

NOTE

The courts have determined that the fact that an instrument is called a "bond" is not conclusive as to its character. * * * The distinguishing feature of a bond is that it is an obligation to pay a fixed sum of money with stated interest. The distinguishing feature of stock is that it confers upon its holder a part ownership of the assets of the corporation and gives him a right to participate in the management of the corporation and to share in the surplus profits and on dissolution to share in the assets which remain after the debts are paid. THE TRUST INDENTURE ACT OF 1939

The Trust Indenture Act of 1939 requires that bonds, notes, debentures, and similar securities publicly offered for sale, sold, or delivered after sale through the mails or in interstate commerce, except as specifically exempted by the Act, be issued under an indenture which meets the requirements of the Act and has been duly qualified with the Commission. The standards of the Act outlaw many provisions previously incorporated in indentures to exculpate the trustee. The Act is designed to insure that he will act on behalf of the bond or debenture owners and to insure his complete independence of the issuer and the underwriters. The provisions of the Securities Act of 1933 and the Trust Indenture Act of 1939 are so integrated that registration pursuant to the Securities Act of 1933 of such securities to be issued under a trust indenture shall not be permitted to become effective unless the indenture conforms to the specific statutory rquirements expressed in the Trust Indenture Act of 1939. The indenture is automatically 'qualified' when registration becomes effective as to the securities themselves.

The Trust Indenture Act of 1939, approved August 3, 1939, is the second of the two statutes which resulted from the Commission's study and investigation of protective and reorganization committees. It was designed to correct certain defects which had existed in trust indentures and to provide means whereby the rights and interests of security holders can be more effectively safeguarded. In order to accomplish this objective, the Act provides that issues of bonds, notes, debentures and similar debt securities exceeding one million dollars in principal amount, except certain classes which are specifically exempted, may not be offered for sale to the public unless they are issued under a trust indenture which conforms to specific statutory standards. The Commission has no powers with respect to the enforcement of the provisions of the indenture. Its only functions under the Act are to see that the trustee is eligible and qualified as provided in the Act and that the provisions of each indenture filed for qualification conform to the prescribed statutory standards. The Act is based on the theory that, if the terms of the trust indenture provide adequate protection for investors, it is appropriate to leave the enforcement of such terms to the bondholders without the continuing supervision of a governmental agency. * * *

An indenture, to be qualified under the Act, must incorporate certain specific provisions, including those governing the eligibility and qualification of the trustee, and must provide for periodic reports by both the obligor and the trustee to the security holders with respect to compliance by the obligor with conditions and covenants contained in the indenture and the trustee's continued eligibility. The Commission is required to issue an order refusing to permit qualification of an indenture if the indenture does not conform to the statutory requirements or if the trustee has any conflicting interests as defined in the statute.

The indenture, in order to facilitate the cooperation of security holders in the protection of their interests, must provide that the trustee will maintain a reasonably current list of their names and addresses and either make the list available to such of their number as desire to communicate with the others or mail communications, to those whose names appear on the list, when they are submitted by security holders with a remittance to cover the cost. If the trustee is of the opinion that the mailing of the material to the bondholders would be detrimental to their interests or in violation of applicable law, it may file with the Commission a copy of the material with a written statement specifying the basis for its opinion. After opportunity for hearing upon the objections specified in the trustee's statement, the Commission is authorized to enter an order either sustaining or refusing to sustain the objections made by the trustee.

One of the principal objectives of the Act is to insure that the holders of indenture securities will have the services of an effective and independent trustee.

Standards relating to the eligibility and qualification of trustees are established in the Act. Provision must be made for a corporate trustee with a minimum capital and surplus of not less than $150,000 and with certain specified powers and duties to insure the more adequate protection of investors.

If a trustee has or acquires an interest in conflict with that of the security holders under the indenture, it must either eliminate the conflict of interest or give up the trusteeship. The conditions under which a trustee shall be considered to have such a conflicting interest are set forth in detail in the Act. In general, the trustee must not be affiliated with either the obligor or an underwriter of the securities. Obviously, the trustee should not be permitted to be too closely affiliated with the obligor because the creditor interests represented by the trustee will clearly be adverse to the interests of the obligor and its stockholders in case there is a default or the threat of one. To a lesser extent there may be a conflict of interest between the two all during the life of the indenture securities with regard to such matters as substitution of collateral, disclosure of financial condition, declaration and payment of dividends, and wasting or diversion of assets.

Experience has proved that there is also grave danger in permitting the trustee to be affiliated with an underwriter of the indenture securities. This is true particularly in default situations where underwriters may consider it to their interest to conceal the default long enough to secure control of reorganization committees. The Trust Indenture Act is designed to eliminate the use of friendly or complacent trustees who fail to warn security holders and take no steps contrary to the wishes of the obligor or underwriter.

In case of default by the obligor (as this term is defined in the indenture), the duties and responsibilities assumed by the trustee are increased. A qualified indenture may provide that, prior to default, the trustee shall not be liable except for the performance of duties specifically set out in the indenture but in case of default it must require the trustee to exercise such of the rights and powers vested in it by the indenture and to use the same degree of care and skill in their exercise as a prudent man would exercise or use under the circumstances in the conduct of his own affairs. These provisions are designed to bring all indenture trustees up to the high level of diligence and fidelity which has traditionally been associated with the more conscientious trustees. ENOCH v. BRANDON

Court of Appeals of New York, 1928. 249 N.Y. 263, 164 N.E. 45.

Appeal from a judgment, entered May 10, 1928, upon an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the fourth judicial department, reversing a judgment in favor of defendants entered upon a dismissal of the complaint by the court at a Trial Term without a jury and directing judgment in favor of plaintiff.

ANDREWS, J. The question before us is whether certain bonds are negotiable instruments. If so, the purchaser in due course from a thief may retain them.

The Manitoba Power Company issued a series of bonds. It promised to pay the bearer of each on November 1, 1941, a certain sum at a certain place, with interest. They are said to be "all equally secured by and entitled to the benefits and subject to the provisions" of a trust mortgage. They may be redeemed at 105 per cent and interest at certain dates. The obligor must create a sinking fund to provide for their purchase or redemption and the principal may become due in advance of maturity in case of default under the mortgage; all as provided in the mortgage "to which reference is hereby made for a description of the property mortgaged and pledged, the nature and extent of the security, the rights of the holders of the bonds with respect thereto, the manner in which notice may be given to such holders, and the terms and conditions upon which said bonds are issued and secured." The bonds may be registered in the usual way and except where registered "they are to be treated as negotiable and all persons are invited by the Company to act accordingly."

At times this last provision might aid in the construction of doubtful clauses contained in the instrument before the court. It at least shows that the parties intended to omit anything that might impair negotiability. But no such statement will make negotiable a bond not in the form provided by our statute. Whether the result was or was not fortunate it is too late to argue that the Legislature did not refer to bonds in its all-inclusive definitions of negotiable paper. True, to become negotiable an instrument need not follow any precise language. (Negotiable Instruments Law [Cons.Laws, ch. 38], sec. 29.) But it "must conform" to the definition specified in section 20. In the face of a command so explicit we must adhere to the design of the Legislature (American Nat. Bank v. Sommerville, 191 Cal. 364, 216 P. 376.) At times contract rights may be enforced or some theory of estoppel adopted, but no intention, no agreement, may make negotiable an instrument which the statute declares to be non-negotiable.

We turn, therefore, to the more serious question. The statute deals with the form of the instrument—with what a mere inspection of its face should disclose. It must contain an unconditional promise to pay a fixed sum, on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time, to order or to bearer. Only if it fulfills these requirements is it negotiable. If it does, no collateral agreement affects its character.

If in the bond or note anything appears requiring reference to another document to determine whether in face the unconditional promise to pay a fixed sum at a future date is modified or subject to some contingency, then the promise is no longer unconditional. What that document may provide is immaterial. Reference to the paper itself said to be negotiable determines its character. Old Colony Trust Company v. Stumpel, 247 N.Y. 538, 161 N.E. 173.

Provisions other than those required by section 20 may be contained in a bond or note without impairing its negotiability. There may be included, among other things, a statement of the transaction giving rise to the instrument (sec. 22) or a statement as to collateral security. (Sec. 24.) And it may refer to a trust mortgage, or to an agreement as to the collateral which fixes the remedies of the parties with respect thereto. (Chelsea Bank v. Warner, 202 App.Div. 499, 195 N.Y.S. 419.)

The rule itself is not a difficult one. The trouble, as often happens, lies in its application to particular facts. There is no infallible test as to whether there is a modification of the promise. Because of differences in the words used, or in the arrangement of paragraphs, sentences or clauses, each instrument must be interpreted by itself. Only then may we solve the question as to its character.

Three cases in this State will serve as an illustration. In McClelland v. Norfolk Southern R. R. Co. (110 N.Y. 469, 18 N.E. 237) the bond itself showed that the promise to pay was a conditional one. It was to become payable upon the terms and with the effect mentioned in the trust mortgage. In Hibbs v. Brown (190 N.Y. 167, 82 N.E. 1108) the precise form of the bond involved does not appear in the printed case and exceptions. It did, however, contain a clause referring "to the deed of trust for a statement of the rights of the bondholders and of the securities and property securing the payment of the bonds," and we said that this clause had only to do with procedure under the trust indenture. In Old Colony Trust Company v. Stumpel (247 N.Y. 538, 161 N.E. 173) the note stated that it was "subject to the terms" of a conditional sales agreement. Here by no possibility did the clause relate to security. Necessarily it had to do with the terms of payment.

Do then the references in these particular bonds to the trust mortgage modify the promise to pay; do they subject it to some possible condition or contingency described elsewhere, or do they merely determine the rights and remedies of the holder under the mortgage? We must consider the instrument as a whole, not wresting any one phrase from its context and concentrating our attention upon it alone. Further, where the meaning is doubtful, we must adopt the construction most favorable to the bondholder.

The bonds are part of an issue of $7,500,000, "all equally secured by and entitled to the benefits and subject to the provisions" of the trust mortgage. Then, speaking of possible redemption, of acceleration of payment, of a sinking fund and of notice, it continues "all as provided" in the trust mortgage "to which reference is hereby made for a description of the property mortgaged and pledged, the nature and extent of the security, the rights of the holders of the bonds with respect thereto, the manner in which notice may be given to such holders, and the terms and conditions under which said bonds are issued and secured."

We hold that here there is no modification of the promise to pay, made in explicit terms. The provisions all have to do with the trust mortgage. They refer to the rights conferred by it upon the bondholders and limit and explain those rights. They are so linked together as to indicate that the obligor was speaking solely of the security. A purchaser scanning the bonds would have the same thought. It would never occur to him that when November 1, 1941, arrived, because of something contained in the mortgage he might be unable to collect the amount due him. He would interpret the statement that the bonds were secured by and entitled to the benefits and subject to the provisions of the mortgage, as meaning that a foreclosure or other relief might be had thereunder only subject to its provisions. He would see that reference to it is also made to determine the terms and conditions under which the bonds are issued and secured. Again it would mean to him as it means to us, that only by turning to the mortgage might he discover the precise nature of the lien he is to obtain. He would see that the bonds were to be issued not only upon the general credit of the corporation, but upon the faith of some collateral mortgage. To it he must go if further knowledge as to this security is desired.

Some minor matters are also to be considered. There is the possibility of the acceleration of the date when the bonds are due if there is default under the mortgage. Such a possibility does not make them non-negotiable. (Higgins v. Hocking Valley Ry. Co., 188 App.Div. 684, 177 N.Y.S. 444; Chicago Railway Equipment Company v. Merchants' Bank, 136 U.S. 268, 284, 10 S.Ct. 999, 1003; Mackintosh v. Gibbs, 81 N.J.L. 477; Schmidt v. Pegg, 172 Mich. 159, 137 N.W. 524; White v. Hatcher, 135 Tenn. 609, 188 S.W. 61). A note is payable at a determinable future time if payable on or before a fixed date. (Sec. 23.) And in one case acceleration of payment in case of default is expressly recognized. (Sec. 21.) The same thing is true of the privilege given the obligor to redeem at 105 per cent before the bonds became due. That does not limit its absolute promise to pay on November 1, 1941. The bonds are payable to bearer or if registered to the registered holder. This does not affect their negotiability. (Dickerman v. Northern Trust Company, 176 U.S. 181, 20 S.Ct. 311.) Nor does the provision requiring the obligor to create a sinking fund.

The Judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed and that of the Trial Term affirmed, with costs in this court and in the Appellate Division.

CARDOZO, Ch. J., CRANE, LEHMAN, KELLOGG and O'BRIEN, JJ., concur; POUND, J., dissents.

Judgment accordingly.

A. THE TRUSTEE

NOTE

The trustee as an intermediary for security purposes between corporate debtors and their creditors is a development of the "blanket" corporate mortgage. Originally loans were of such character that security could be given by mortgage made directly to the lender-mortgagee. The growth and development of modern corporate activity, however, entailed such large scale borrowing that single mortgagee creditors were no longer equal to the task.[1] To meet the problem, corporations began to finance their operations by is-

[1] Welch v. Northern Bank & Trust Co., 100 Wash. 349, 356, 170 P. 1029, 1032 (1918): 'The sale of corporate securities through the mediumship of trust companies is a method of reaching the individual investor. Such securities are generally issued in large amounts, and because of the impracticability of disposing of them, or obtaining loans in single payments, the business world has resorted to the method of mortgaging properties and securities to a trustee company to be disposed of piecemeal to investors who are able to make small investments.

It is interesting to note that Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the past several years has again been assisting 'large-scale financing' by direct mortgage, reserving the trustee device for those cases where a substantial amount of 'local financing' was to be secured on a substantial parity with its own.

suing their indebtedness to an underwriting concern for apportionment among a larger and more diverse group of creditors or bondholders. Recourse was then had to the device of a trustee as mortgagee so that the impossible task of securing each credit by a separate mortgage could be dispensed with. TRUST INDENTURE ACT OF 1939, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77 jjj.

Eligibility and Disqualification of Trustee—Persons Eligible for Appointment as Trustee

(a) (1) The indenture to be qualified shall require that there shall at all times be one or more trustees thereunder, at least one of whom shall at all times be a corporation organized and doing business under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory or of the District of Columbia (referred to in this subchapter as the institutional trustee), which (A) is authorized under such laws to exercise corporate trust powers, and (B) is subject to supervision or examination by Federal, State, Territorial, or District of Columbia authority.

(2) The indenture to be qualified shall require that such institutional trustee shall have at all times a combined capital and surplus of a specified minimum amount, which shall not be less than $150,000. If such institutional trustee publishes reports of condition at least annually, pursuant to law or to the requirements of said supervising or examining authority, the indenture may provide that, for the purposes of this paragraph, the combined capital and surplus of such trustee shall be deemed to be its combined capital and surplus as set forth in its most recent report of condition so published.

(3) If the indenture to be qualified requires or permits the appointment of one or more co-trustees in addition to such institutional trustee, such indenture shall provide that the rights, powers, duties, and obligations conferred or imposed upon the trustees or any of them shall be conferred or imposed upon and exercised or performed by such institutional trustee, or such institutional trustee and such co-trustees jointly, except to the extent that under any law of any jurisdiction in which any particular act or acts are to be performed, such institutional trustee shall be incompetent or unqualified to perform such act or acts, in which event such rights, powers, duties, and obligations shall be exercised and performed by such co-trustees.

TSCHETINIAN v. CITY TRUST COMPANY OF NEW YORK

Court of Appeals of New York, 1906. 186 N.Y. 432, 79 N.E. 401.

Appeal from a judgment, entered December 21, 1905, upon an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the second judicial department, which affirmed a judgment of Special Term sustaining a demurrer to the complaint.

The nature of the action and the facts, so far as material, are stated in the opinion.

HISCOCK, J. This action, as evidenced by the complaint, sought to hold defendant responsible for the value of certain bonds purchased by plaintiff which became valueless. It was based upon a certificate made by defendant, as mortgage trustee under a corporation mortgage, upon an issue of $100,000 of bonds which included those purchased by the plaintiff. This certificate was indorsed upon each bond, and read as follows: "This bond is one of a series of bonds mentioned and described in the mortgage referred to." The bonds so certified were each indorsed by the mortgagor as a "First Mortgage Bond," whereas in fact they were not such, being subsequently cut off by the foreclosure of a first mortgage.

Plaintiff claims that defendant's certificate was broad enough to be a guaranty that they were first mortgage bonds. The Appellate Division has decided that the facts stated in the complaint do not sustain this view, and we concur in the conclusion thus reached by that court.

In addition to the facts already stated by way of introduction, reference may be made to a few others. The United States Carbonate Company executed to defendant, as trustee, a mortgage upon certain real estate and other property to secure the issue of bonds above mentioned. These bonds were issued in the denomination of $500 each. The prior mortgage amounted to $15,000, and, when subsequently foreclosed, absorbed practically all of the proceeds of the property covered by the mortgage securing the bonds in question. Plaintiff had purchased twenty of these bonds, which were thus rendered valueless.

His counsel advances various reasons for sustaining the sufficiency of his complaint against the attack of the demurrer which are not at all based upon the allegations of the complaint, and, therefore, need not be considered.

The complaint itself contains some allegations against the sufficiency of the mortgage given to secure the bonds, which are conclusively contradicted and qualified by the terms of the mortgage and bonds which are made a part of the complaint. For instance, it is alleged "that said bonds were not secured by a first mortgage or any other mortgage upon the property and franchises of the United States Carbonate Company." This allegation is utterly at variance with the terms of the mortgage, and this contention seems to have been abandoned.

It is also alleged that at the time of the execution of the mortgage the mortgagor owned valuable franchises, etc., which were not included in any mortgage to the defendant as trustee, "although the said bonds purported to be secured by a mortgage to the defendant as trustee of all the property and franchises of the company." In opposition to this allegation each of the bonds in its body sets forth that it is secured by the mortgage in question, and makes express reference to said mortgage for a description of the property and franchises mortgaged, etc., thus by reference specifically indicating the nature and extent of the property conveyed.

There is no allegation in the complaint that the defendant was in any manner a party to or responsible for having the indorsement upon the bonds that they were first mortgage bonds, or that it in any manner was guilty of fraud or misrepresentation in connection with said statement or that it suppressed any knowledge or in fact knew that said bonds were not first mortgage bonds. Upon the other hand, it is to be noted as bearing upon this point that the resolutions passed by the mortgagor, authorizing the execution of the mortgage and bonds, expressly provided that the proceeds thereof should be applied to the payment and satisfaction of any existing indebtedness of the company. If this resolution had been complied with the prior mortgage would have been retired when the bonds were issued and the latter would have been in reality first mortgage liens.

Therefore, we are presented with the narrow question whether the defendant, solely on account of the certificate which it placed upon the bonds, should be held to have guaranteed the nature and extent of the security therefor, because the mortgagor had placed upon them a statement purporting to be descriptive of the latter. This, of course, involves a consideration of the terms of the certificate which the defendant executed, for plaintiff's complaint is based upon nothing else. As already indicated, we think that it would be unreasonable to impose upon defendant any such liability. The language employed when interpreted in its natural and ordinary meaning simply amounts to a statement identifying the bond whereon it is written as one of those mentioned in the mortgage, and the effect of this is an assurance to the purchaser that his bond is amongst those entitled to the benefits and protection afforded by such mortgage. But the statement does not upon any reasonable construction, in the absence, as in this case, of any allegation of fraud or deceit, active or passive, make the trustee a guarantor of the quality and extent of the security given by the mortgage, or responsible for the accuracy of statements indorsed upon the bond by the mortgagor purporting to describe the nature of such security. This is as plain upon a mere reading of the certificate as it could be made by any extended argument or reasoning. There is involved the construction of very few and simple words, and we could not reach the views urged by plaintiff through any justifiable course.

It is not necessary to consider various clauses found in the mortgage and referred to by defendant as exempting it from liability as a trustee. Some of those clauses manifestly refer to duties entirely different from those which would arise in connection with this certificate, and we do not intend to determine how far such clauses might serve to relieve a trustee like defendant from liability otherwise incurred. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to determine as we do that the certificate upon which plaintiff's claim to a cause of action must rest does not sustain that claim.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

DOYLE v. CHATHAM & PHENIX NATIONAL BANK

Court of Appeals of New York, 1930.

[Appeal from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, affirming a judgment in favor of defendant entered upon a decision of the court at a Trial Term, a jury having been waived.]

KELLOGG, J. The plaintiff is the owner of "Collateral Trust Gold Bonds" executed by the Motor Guaranty Corporation, a Delaware corporation. Certain bonds were issued directly to the plaintiff for value paid; others were issued for value to persons from whom the plaintiff purchased. The bonds are expressed to have been issued in pursuance of the provisions of a certain indenture of trust entered into between the Motor Guaranty Corporation and the defendant, the Chatham & Phenix National Bank of the City of New York, as trustee. Each of the bonds bears a certificate, signed by the defendant as trustee, which reads as follows: "This bond is one of the series of bonds described in the Collateral Trust Indenture mentioned therein." The securities pledged by the Motor Guaranty Corporation to protect its bond issue, which were deposited with the defendant as trustee, have proven worthless, and the bonds are uncollectible. The plaintiff, as assignee of all causes of action accruing to the persons from whom he purchased, and in his own right, brings this action to recover from the defendant trustee the losses sustained, on the ground that its certificates were issued negligently and without authority, and that the plaintiff and his assignors were thereby induced to acquire worthless bonds and pay value therefor.

The collateral trust indenture was executed on the 1st day of February, 1922. It recites that the Motor Guaranty Corporation proposes from time to time to issue its collateral trust gold bonds, to draw interest at 8 per cent. payable semiannually; that each bond is to be written in accordance with a form of bond set up in the indenture. This form, with which the bonds of the plaintiff comply, contains the statement that the bond is "secured by the trade acceptances or notes of dealers, guaranteed by the Motor Guaranty Corporation; cash or notes of purchasers in part payment for motor vehicles, or other first lien mortgages, such purchasers' notes being endorsed by dealers and guaranteed by the Motor Guaranty Corporation." It also contains the following: "This bond is secured by said collateral of a face value of at least one hundred and ten per centum (110%) of the principal amount of the bond." It also states: "This bond shall not be valid for any purpose until the Trustee's certificate endorsed hereon shall have been duly executed." The form of the prescribed certificate, to be signed by the defendant as trustee, is identical with each of the certificates attached to the plaintiff's bonds, the reading of which has already been given.

The indenture provides that bonds shall from time to time be executed by the Motor Guaranty Corporation and delivered to the defendant as trustee for authentication by it; that the delivery shall be accompanied by a request, signed by an appropriate officer of the corporation, stating the amount, date, and denomination of bonds to be issued, and demanding authentication of the bonds requested to be issued. It further provides that the trustee shall thereupon, without further action by the corporation, authenticate the bonds and deliver them back to the corporation, "provided, however, there shall be delivered to and pledged with the Trustee" certain named collateral. The collateral to be pledged is as follows: "(a) Cash or current funds, and/or (b) Trade acceptances or notes of dealers guaranteed by the Motor Guaranty Corporation, or notes of purchasers in part payment for motor vehicles, or other first lien mortgages, such purchasers' notes being endorsed by dealers and guaranteed by the Motor Guaranty Corporation." It also provides: "The aggregate principal amount of cash and/or of securities delivered and pledged under subsection (b) shall always be at least equal to 110% of the amount of the Bonds to be issued hereunder in respect thereto." It further provides: "Upon receipt of cash and/or notes, and/or first lien mortgages, all as provided and described in this article, the Trustee shall be fully protected and is authorized without further inquiry, to authenticate and deliver the Bonds specified in such requests and shall in no way be responsible to see to the application of the proceeds of any such Bond."

The indenture further provides that the trustee may require from time to time that the corporation furnish a certificate or certificates of the president or a vice president, attested by the secretary or assistant secretary, under the corporate seal, setting forth all or any information "concerning names and addresses of makers, acceptors, and other pertinent data regarding such collateral and/or first lien mortgages, such lists, descriptions and tabulations of collateral delivered or to be delivered to the Trustee." It contains this: "Such certificate or certificates shall be conclusive evidence to the Trustee of all statements therein contained and full warrant and protection to it for any and all action taken on the faith thereof under the terms of this indenture."

During the year 1922, the Motor Guaranty Corporation delivered to the defendant, for its certification as trustee, bonds of an aggregate par value in excess of $110,000. The defendant executed the requested certificates and returned the bonds to the corporation, which issued them to various persons upon payment of value therefor. Among these bonds were the bonds now owned by the plaintiff. In January, 1923, the corporation defaulted in the payment of interest and the defendant resigned as trustee. The fact then appeared that the corporation had, during the course of the year 1922, deposited with the trustee, as collateral for the bonds certified by it, the notes of various persons or corporations expressing an aggregate par value in excess of $130,000, all of which, with the exception of one note for $300, were in fact utterly valueless. With the same exception, none of the notes given were for the purchase of an automobile; none were made by an automobile dealer, or, for that matter, by a dealer in goods, wares, and merchandise of any description. The makers comprised a lawyer, a bond salesman, a ticket agent, a mining corporation, and a construction company. The maker of two notes, aggregating $75,000, had no occupation, business, or other visible means of support, although judgments in excess of $900,000 were outstanding against him. None of the securities held by the trustee defendant, at the time the bonds now owned by the plaintiff were issued, with the exception noted, were the notes or acceptances of dealers or automobile purchasers. Subsequently to January, 1923, all the assets of the Motor Guaranty Corporation were sold for the sum of $143.30.

We agree that the defendant cannot be held as the guarantor of the sufficiency or legality of the securities pledged with it, or for negligence in not ascertaining that the securities were worthless. Tschetinian v. City Trust Co. of New York, 186 N.Y. 432, 79 N.E. 401; Green v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 223 App.Div. 12, 227 N.Y.S. 252, affirmed 248 N.Y. 627, 162 N.E. 552; Byers v. Union Trust Co., 175 Pa. 318, 34 A. 629; Jones on Corporate Bonds & Mortgages, § 287a. "The purpose of the certification was not to insure the sufficiency of the security. It was to prevent an over issue." Ainsa v. Mercantile Trust Co. of San Francisco, 174 Cal. 504, 512, 163 P. 898, 901. If the defendant, without investigation, chose to lend its name to the swindling operations of a bogus finance corporation, by acting as its trustee and certifying its bonds, provided it certified with authority and without actual knowledge of the fraud intended, it was well within its legal rights. The question before us for decision is this: May the defendant be held in damages if, without authority, it certified the bonds now owned by the plaintiff, thereby inducing the plaintiff and his assignors to advance moneys upon the faith of securities which were worthless?

It is clear that the defendant signed the certificates without authority. As we have seen, it was authorized to certify, "provided, however, there shall be delivered to and pledged with the Trustee" certain securities. The securities enumerated were the acceptances or notes of dealers or automobile buyers. No such securities were ever delivered to the defendant. If the defendant had requested and obtained a statement from the appropriate officers of the corporation, certifying to the "pertinent data regarding such collateral" possessed by them, its authority, without further investigation, to execute the certificates could not have been questioned. However, it requested and received no such statement. Its authority therefore remained conditional upon the fact that the notes of dealers had been precedently deposited with it. No such securities having been deposited, it had no authority to execute the certificates. * * *

In Conover v. Guarantee Trust Co., 88 N.J.Eq. 450, 102 A. 844, the opinion was expressed that the right of the takers of the bonds to recover damages from the trustee, on account of its unauthorized certification, rested upon a breach of the duty owed by the trustee to the takers as cestui que trustent. A similar view was expressed in Rhinelander v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co., 172 N.Y. 519, 65 N.E. 499, where the court said of the acceptance by the trustee of its trust position: "In executing that acceptance the defendant created the relation of trustee and cestuis que trustent between it and the future bondholders." Notwithstanding these expressions, it is obvious that a trustee, in wrongly certifying bonds to prospective takers, in order that they may become cestui que trust, cannot, at that moment and before the relationship is established, have violated a trust duty owed to them. Manifestly this is true: "There is no trust or other relation between a trustee and a stranger about to deal with a cestui que trust." Lindley, L. J., in Low v. Bouverie, L. R. [1891] 3 Ch. 82, 99. In Mullen v. Eastern Trust & Banking Co., 108 Me. 498, 81 A. 948, the court held that an unauthorized certificate executed by a trustee was a false representation that the bond was properly issued, rendering the trustee liable upon a cause of action in deceit. The fact that the representation was innocently made was not material, said the court, since the trustee, by its certificate, made an assertion of fact which, according to information which was or should have been within its own knowledge, was not true. In the case before us, however, it is clear that the plaintiff may not recover damages for a false representation, as in an action for deceit. In the first place, no such cause of action is alleged. In the second place, there is no proof that the trustee, in issuing its certificates, intended to defraud the plaintiff or his assignors. "Intentional fraud, as distinguished from a mere breach of duty or the omission to use due care is an essential factor in an action for deceit." Kountze v. Kennedy, 147 N.Y. 124, 129, 41 N.E. 414, 29 L.R.A. 360, 49 Am.St.Rep. 651; Reno v. Bull, 226 N.Y. 546, 124 N.E. 144.

That there may be liability for damages resulting from the negligent utterance of words is now the settled doctrine in this jurisdiction. Glanzer v. Shepard, 233 N.Y. 236, 242, 135 N.E. 275, 277, 23 A.L.R. 1425; International Products Co. v. Erie R. R. Co., 244 N.Y. 331, 155 N.E. 662. * * *

The defendant here like the defendant in Glanzer v. Shepard, supra, occupied an independent position, and issued its certificates at the behest of a third person. We may say with Judge Cardozo that the certificates were made "with the very end and aim of shaping the conduct of another." Like the utterer of the statement in the assumed case in Lord Herschell's exception, it was the "special province" of the defendant "to know a particular fact"; it imparted information, by its certificates, to persons "desirous of ascertaining the fact for the purpose of determining" their course accordingly. Within the requirements laid down by Judge Andrews, the defendant knew that the certificates were desired for a serious purpose by persons who intended to rely and act thereupon. They were issued for the very purpose of establishing a relationship of trustee and cestui que trust between the defendant and the persons who might rely thereon. It must be remembered that this is not the case of a buyer and seller to whose transactions the principle of caveat emptor might apply. It is a case where the creator of a trust, accepted by the defendant, in a solemn instrument signed by both, named the defendant as trustee, for the special purpose, among others, that it might certify bonds to prospective investors, to the very end that the takers of the bonds might receive definite assurance that the bonds were issued pursuant to the terms of the indenture. It seems clear, therefore, that, within the authorities cited, the defendant, in so far as its certificates constituted misrepresentations of fact, innocently though negligently made, became liable to the takers of the bonds, who invested their moneys upon the faith of the certificates.

The certificates were not to be issued, as we have seen, unless acceptances and notes of dealers and automobile buyers, in excess of bonds to be issued, had been deposited with the defendant as security therefor. Necessarily, therefore, the certificates constituted representations that the deposits had been made. Clearly, if the defendant, as trustee, had issued the certificates when no securities whatever had been deposited with it, liability for the damage done would have arisen. Equally must this follow where, as in this case, the securities deposited were not the securities specified in the trust indenture from which alone the defendant derived its power to certify. In not ascertaining that the securities deposited were not securities of the character named in the indenture, the defendant was guilty of negligence. In certifying the bonds, as issued pursuant to the terms of the indenture, it was guilty of negligently making a misrepresentation of fact. The plaintiff and certain assignors were induced by the certificates to invest in the worthless bonds. If the certificates had not been executed, the bonds could not have been issued and no loss would have accrued. Therefore the false certificates were the proximate cause of the losses sustained. Conover v. Guarantee Trust Co., supra; Mullen v. Eastern Trust & Banking Co., supra; Rhinelander v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., supra.

The provisions of the trust indenture in certain instances exempting the defendant from liability for its acts or omissions as trustee, do not, in this instance, apply. Conover v. Guarantee Trust Co., supra; Mullen v. Eastern Trust & Banking Co. supra; Rhinelander v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., supra. In Conover v. Guarantee Trust Co., supra, the vice chancellor said: "It accordingly seems impossible to construe an immunity clause as intended to exempt a trustee from liability for transcending his powers as clearly defined by the trust agreement; his engagement is to exercise the powers and only the powers conferred upon him, and the appropriate office and purpose of an immunity clause forming a part of a trust agreement which specifically and clearly defines the trustee's powers appears to be to limit his responsibility in matters of judgment and discretion committed to him in the execution of those defined powers."

The record indicates that the plaintiff and many of his assignors took their bonds in reliance upon the certificates and in ignorance of the character of the securities deposited. The plaintiff is entitled to recover damages on account of the investments thus induced, on the basis of the consideration paid therefor plus interest, less the value of the bonds acquired, if any. Reno v. Bull, supra. The record leaves it in doubt whether certain other assignors were not fully aware of the character of the securities deposited and of the shady nature of the financial transactions in which the Motor Guaranty Corporation was engaged, and therefore whether or not they in good faith relied upon the certificates in making their investments. For the determination of these questions a new trial is necessary.

The judgment of the Appellate Division and that of the Trial Term should be reversed and a new trial granted with costs to abide the event.

Judgment reversed, etc.[8]

HAZZARD and others v. THE CHASE NATIONAL BANK OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

Supreme Court of New York, 1936. 159 Misc. 57, 287 N.Y.S. 541.

[Action by bondholders to compel corporate trustee to replace valuable collateral securities, or, in lieu thereof, to pay damages to plaintiff.]

ROSENMAN, Justice. The defendant bank, by succession to the Equitable Trust Company of New York, became the trustee of an indenture of trust executed January 31, 1928, as of January 1, 1928. The indenture was executed by National Electric Power Company, and covered an issue of $10,000,000 of its debentures. There were deposited with the trustee, at the time of the execution of the trust indenture, as security for the debentures provided for thereunder, 85,000 shares of the common stock of New England Public Service Company, 155,989 shares of the common stock of Penn Central Light & Power Company, 29,993 shares of the common stock of Michigan Electric Power Company, and 44,986 shares of the common stock of Ohio Electric Power Company.

The trust indenture permitted substitution by the obligor of other securities for the securities originally deposited, under certain conditions to be hereinafter discussed. On December 18, 1931, the obligor made an application to the defendant as trustee to permit the substitution of 276,522 shares of class A common stock of National Public Service Corporation, and 444,868 shares of class B common stock of National Public Service Corporation for the aforesaid stock of Penn Central Light & Power Company, Michigan Electric Power Company and Ohio Electric Power Company. On December 21, 1931, the defendant bank granted the application; and on that date delivered to the obligor the shares of Penn Central Light & Power Company, Michigan Electric Power Company, and Ohio Electric Power Company, which it held, and received in place thereof the aforesaid shares of class A and class B common stock of the National Public Service Corporation.

These plaintiffs are some of the owners and holders of the debentures of National Electric Power Company which were covered by the trust indenture. They complain of this substitution. They allege that the defendant bank was guilty of bad faith and gross negligence in permitting it. In the month of July, 1932, National Public Service Corporation went into bankruptcy, so that the substituted stock became concededly worthless. On the other hand, the stock which the defendant permitted the obligor to withdraw is still concededly of substantial value. The obligor of the debentures, National Electric Power Company also became bankrupt; so that the plaintiffs can look only to the security under the indenture for payment of their bonds. The plaintiffs by this action seek to compel the trustee to replace the valuable securities surrendered, or, in lieu thereof, to pay the damages caused to the holders of the $10,000,000 of bonds as a result of this substitution.

The prospectus on which these debentures were sold states that they are secured by the deposit of the enumerated stocks "under and subject to the provisions of the indenture." The debentures themselves refer to the indenture for "a description of the property pledged" and "the nature and extent of the security." Although these plaintiffs did not examine the trust indenture, and although it is a matter of common knowledge that purchasers of debentures of this type secured by a trust mortgage seldom, if ever, examine the terms of the trust indenture, it is well settled that debenture holders are legally bound by the terms of the indenture.[3] Benton v. Safe Deposit Bank of Pottsville, 255 N.Y. 260, 174 N.E. 648. Its terms must therefore be considered. * * *

The company was given the right to withdraw any securities under the trust indenture and to substitute therefor other securities, providing only that the earnings applicable to paying the interest under the indenture from all of the securities remaining on deposit with the trustee after the substitution, for a period of twelve consecutive calendar months within the fifteen calendar months immediately preceding the application for substitution, shall have been at least twice the interest requirements for a period of one year. In view of the fact that the interest requirements for one year of the $10,000,000 of debentures was $500,000, it was necessary to present an earnings certificate of the securities remaining on deposit after the substitution, showing earnings of at least $1,000,000 for any one year within the preceding fifteen calendar months prior to December 18, 1931.

The form and content of the earnings certificate referred to in the above clause is prescribed in article I, § 4, of the indenture. The actual substitution of securities was handled by Mr. Buckley, a trust officer of the defendant. The draft of the application, together with the earnings certificate, was submitted to him on December 18th. After checking these papers with the terms of the indenture, he sent them over to the counsel for the bank for such correction as the counsel might deem to be necessary. Counsel made a few unimportant verbal corrections, had a conference with counsel for the obligor on December 21st, and on that day the application was approved in final form by counsel. On the same day, the securities were substituted. The trust officer testified as to his own ignorance of the affairs of National Public Service Corporation and National Electric Power Company. He did not know that the latter was a debtor of the bank or that the officers of the Insull system were debtors. He stated that the substitution was handled by him alone, supervised only as to legal details by counsel for the bank. He testified that, so far as he knew, no other officer of the bank was concerned with the substitution or had any thing to do with it.

Although the plaintiffs have urged that it is highly improbable that a transaction of so large an amount could have been handled exclusively by a subordinate officer in the trust department, receiving a salary of $7,200, without some direction or order from a superior officer, nevertheless there is no evidence on which the court can make an inference of fact that the substitution was ordered or directed by any superior officer in the bank.

Article 15 of the trust indenture specifies the terms and conditions under which the trustee accepts the trust.

Section 5 of such article reads as follows: "Section 5. The Trustee may execute any of the trusts or powers hereof and perform any duty hereunder, either itself or by or through its attorneys, agents or employees, and it shall not be answerable or accountable for any act, default, neglect, or misconduct of any such attorneys, agents or employees, if reasonable care has been exercised in the appointment and retention thereof, nor shall the Trustee be otherwise answerable or accountable under any circumstances whatsoever, except for its own gross negligence or bad faith."

Sections 9 and 10 of the indenture read in part as follows:

"Section 9. The Trustee shall be protected in acting upon any notice, resolution, request, consent, order, certificate, report, opinion, bond, or other paper or document believed by it to be genuine and to have been signed or presented by the proper party or parties. The Trustee may consult with counsel and the opinion of such counsel shall be full and complete authorization and protection in respect of any action taken or suffered by it hereunder in good faith and in accordance with the opinion of such counsel and such action so taken or suffered shall be conclusive and binding upon the Company and on all holders of bonds issued under this Indenture. * * *

"Section 10. Upon any application * * * for the execution of any release, or upon any other application to the Trustee hereunder, the resolutions, certificates, statements, opinions, reports and orders required by any of the provisions of this Indenture to be delivered to the Trustee as a condition of the granting of such application may be received by the Trustee as conclusive evidence of any fact or matter therein set forth and shall be full warrant, authority and protection to the Trustee in acting on the faith thereof, not only in respect of the facts but also in respect of the opinions therein set forth; and before granting any such application the Trustee shall not be bound to make any further investigation into the matters stated in any such resolution, certificate, statement, opinion, report or order, * * *; but it may in its discretion make any such independent inquiry or investigation as it may see fit. If the Trustee shall determine * * * to make such further inquiry, it shall be entitled to examine the books and records of the Company, either itself or by agent or attorney; and unless satisfied, with or without such examination, of the truth and accuracy of the matters stated in such resolutions, certificate, statement, opinion, report or order, it shall be under no obligation to grant the application. * * * The reasonable expense of every such examination shall be paid by the Company. * * * "

The obligor, National Electric Power Company, was one of the major holding companies near the top of the so-called Insull System, and dominated the Insull empire in the eastern part of the United States. It owned practically all of the shares of stock of the National Public Service Corporation. Above it was the Middle West Utilities Company which in turn was controlled by two other companies, viz., Corporation Securities Company of Chicago and Insull Utilities Investments, Inc., which were in turn controlled by the Insull family. The National Public Service Corporation was likewise a holding company, and did not itself operate any utilities. It had its own senior issue of stock and its own funded indebtedness and separate creditors. Below the National Public Service Corporation there were a veritable maze of subholding companies and sub-subholding and operating companies. The Ohio Electric Power Company, the Penn Central Light & Power Company, and the Michigan Electric Power Company were all operating companies, and the stock of each of them, before the substitution, was held by the National Electric Power Company directly. The management and directorship of the various holding companies were the same; so that in effect, the Insulls dominated the entire system, transferring and shifting loans, collateral, debits, and credits from one company to another virtually at will.

The defendant, while acting as trustee for these bondholders, was also a large creditor of the obligor, in fact its largest single creditor. It had loaned considerable sums of money from time to time to the National Electric Power Company without collateral. This loan was increased to $6,000,000 on June 19, 1931, and at about that time the defendant received collateral therefor. It is obvious that the defendant, as a creditor of the obligor, occupied a position inconsistent with its role as a trustee under the indenture. In addition, the principal officers of the obligor and of the other companies of the system were heavily indebted to the defendant upon obligations which were past due on the date of the substitution, and some of which were under-collateralized and uncollectible. For example, on that date Martin Insull who was the vice chairman and executive director of National Electric Power Company, owed the defendant $4,250,000. Ziegler, the vice president, and Reid, the president of National Electric Power Company, both of whom were directors, were similarly indebted to the Chase National Bank in large amounts. The total of loans to the Insull group was $12,520,000. The collateral for all of these loans were securities of some part of the so-called Insull System. Corporation Securities Company, the ultimate stockholder of the obligor, owed the defendant $500,000 which it could not pay. The ramifications of various holding companies subholding companies, sub-subholding companies, involved in this system need not be here described in detail. The records of the bank indicate that the bank itself considered the loans to the various companies and corporate officers in the Insull System, all in the general category of Insull loans.

For its services as trustee under the indenture, the bank received an annual fee of $1,100 or $1,200.

The Chase National Bank is a very large banking and trust institution, divided into many distinct departments. It has some forty or fifty vice presidents. Its trust department is apparently operated as a separate unit of the bank. The business of this department was confined to trust matters, and is carried on at 11 Broad street in New York City. The banking department is located at 18 Pine street in New York City.

Mr. Makepeace was a vice president of the defendant, connected exclusively with its banking department and not with its trust department. He was not conversant with the affairs of the trust department, and his duties had nothing to do with the trust department. His duties, so far as the bank is concerned, were confined to supervision of the mercantile branch of the banking department and to the making of loans at the head office.

Makepeace was at the same time a director of the National Electric Power Company and a director of the National Public Service Corporation. He was also a member of the executive committee of National Public Service Corporation. He had been a member of these boards during all the time he had been an officer of the Equitable Trust Company, the original trustee, and of the defendant Chase National Bank, the substituted trustee.

The evidence is in conflict as to whether or not Makepeace's service on the boards of the National Electric Power Company and National Public Service Corporation was in the capacity of an agent of the bank or not. Although it does not appear that he was specifically requested to go on these boards by the defendant, I find as a fact that he purported to represent the defendant's interests where it was necessary or advisable to do so while on these boards. The inference from the evidence is that the defendant considered Makepeace to a great extent the liaison between the National Electric Power Company and the National Public Service Corporation, on the one hand, and the defendant on the other. To the degree that it was necessary, and as occasion required, Makepeace was the guardian of the bank's interests as a creditor of the two companies. * * *

With respect to the first contention of the plaintiffs, I find that the plaintiffs have not sustained the burden of proving that the trustee sought to obtain profit for itself at the expense of its debenture holders by its action in allowing the substitution, or that it was actuated in any way by bad faith. * * *

Have the plaintiffs' contentions of gross negligence on the part of the defendant been sustained, in spite of the various exculpatory clauses with which this indenture fairly bristles?

It is clear that if it were not for the terms of the indenture, the defendant could not escape the conclusion that it was negligent towards its bondholders. If the relationship between this so-called trustee and these plaintiffs were the ordinary common law fiduciary relationship, and if the trust instrument did not exempt the defendant from every duty of making reasonable inquiry, the acts of the trustee would be a distinct violation of the well-recognized obligations arising from such relationship. It is elementary that a trustee owes to its fiduciary at least the duty of exercising the same care and prudence that a reasonable man would exercise with respect to his own property. Without going into all of the details of the evidence, the conclusion is irresistible that, apart from the general and specific exculpatory clauses, the defendant was guilty of lack of reasonable care in accepting these substituted securities without further investigation, with all of the knowledge which is attributable to it through its vice president Makepeace, and through its other officers and investment files. The fact that the substituted securities were removed so many times from the actual earnings of the operating companies, whereas the withdrawn securities were those of operating companies themselves; the fact that the debentures of National Public Service Corporation were themselves selling as low as 36, or a little over one-third of par; the fact that the country was then in the midst of a financial debacle; the precipitous decline in utility earnings; the fact that so many of the assets carried on the balance sheets would have no value on liquidation; the decline in the bank balances of these corporations; the fact that the bank's investment and credit files showed that the common stock of National Public Service Corporation was a highly speculative investment, and, indeed that the gold debentures of such corporation "occupy a speculative position and must be regarded as undesirable for conservative investment purposes"; the execution by the defendant of the so-called "stand-still" agreement of December 16, 1931, which extended the loans of Corporation Securities Company; the knowledge of the close connection and interdependence financially between said Corporation Securities Company and the other holding companies of the Insull System; the fact that the cash position of National Public Service Corporation was so low that it had to borrow money on the lives of its officers; the more precipitous decline in the value of the securities of holding companies as compared with those of operating companies; the inconsistent position of the bank as a creditor of the National Electric Power Company—the total of all of these, and other facts in evidence, it can fairly be concluded, would have deterred a reasonably careful person from giving up the securities of the three operating companies for those of more doubtful value of the holding company, if he were managing his own property, or if he were a common-law trustee not protected by the clauses of this indenture.

With this trust indenture and the exculpatory clauses thereof, however, a different picture is presented. Similar exculpatory clauses have been upheld time and again as valid and not contrary to the public policy of this state. Benton v. Safe Deposit Bank of Pottsville, 255 N.Y. 260, 174 N.E. 648; Green v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 223 App.Div. 12, 227 N.Y.S. 252, affirmed 248 N.Y. 627, 162 N.E. 552; Hunsberger v. Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, 164 App.Div. 740, 150 N.Y.S. 190, affirmed 218 N.Y. 742, 113 N.E. 1058; Greene v. Continental Bank & Trust Co. of New York, 267 N.Y. 519, 196 N.E. 559. In the Benton case, the duty of the trustee was held to be strictly measured and limited by the agreements contained in the indenture. The court referred to the slight financial remuneration which the trustee bank received in the transaction, and came to the conclusion that "the bank was merely prudent and cautious in limiting its liability and defining its duties."

The defendant here not only generally restricted its liability to gross negligence and bad faith, but practically in every way and at every turn, specifically limited and prescribed its duties, obligations and responsibilities. For example, section 9 of article 15, above quoted, protected the defendant in acting upon any certificate or other paper or document believed by it to be genuine. The same section gave it protection in respect of any action taken by it pursuant to the opinion of counsel. The succeeding section provided that certificates accompanying applications for release of securities "may be received by the trustee as conclusive evidence of any fact or matter therein set forth * * * not only in respect of the facts, but also in respect of the opinions therein set forth." The same section relieved the trustee in specific terms from any duty "to make any further investigation into the matters stated in any such resolution, certificate, etc."

The defendant in the case at bar is protected by the trust agreement from any liability in relying, as he did, upon the certificates furnished. As pointed out in 42 Harvard Law Review, 198, at page 215, in discussing the ordinary clauses in trust agreements for substitution of security, "such releases and exchanges are usually regulated by reports and certificates of officers, appraisers, and the like, and, generallly speaking, afford full protection to the trustee who acts thereon in good faith even though loss be occasioned by the release."

Of course, a trustee's power to release or substitute collateral can arise only from the terms of the indenture itself. Apart from the authority contained therein, a trustee concededly has no right to release or substitute any collateral. Colorado & S. R. Co. v. Blair, 214 N.Y. 497, 108 N.E. 840, Ann.Cas.1916D, 1177; Conover v. Guarantee Trust Co., 88 N.J.Eq. 450, 102 A. 844, affirmed 89 N.J.Eq. 584, 106 A. 890. This trust indenture clearly permitted the obligor to substitute collateral upon certain specified terms and conditions.

Can there be implied here, in spite of these exculpatory clauses, a common-law trust relationship, so that the usual legal consequences thereof will attach independently of the provisions of the trust indenture? The courts of some states have made such implication, and have held the trustee to a fiduciary's duty in spite of the various verbal devices used to free it from such responsibility. Marshall & Ilsley Bank v. Guaranty Investment Co., 213 Wis. 415, 422, 423, 250 N.W. 862; State v. Comer, 176 Wash. 257, 263, 264, 28 P.2d 1027; 33 Columbia Law Rev. 97, 98, note 3. See 42 Harvard Law Review 198, 244. The courts of other states have taken the opposite position. See 33 Columbia Law Review, 97, 98, and cases cited in note 4 thereof.

Irrespective of holdings or tendencies in other jurisdictions, it is now the well-settled doctrine of this state that so long as the trustee does not step beyond the provisions of the indenture itself, its liability is measured, not by the ordinary relationship of trustee and cestui, but by the expressed agreement between the trustee and the obligor of the trust mortgage. Where the terms of the indenture are clear, no obligations or duties in conflict with them will be implied. * * *

Therefore the rule of trustee and cestui is not the one to be applied here, either by agreement or implication. The question is, therefore, whether gross negligence as hereinabove defined has been committed under the terms of the indenture.

I am constrained to conclude that the defendant was not guilty of that kind of gross negligence, in view of the fact that everything which it did was specifically permitted, and that everything which it failed to do was specifically excused, by the express provisions of the trust indenture itself. Although the defendant was negligent, as judged by the standards of care imposed upon a common-law trustee, it cannot be said that under the language of the indenture it was guilty of willful passivity or of reckless disregard of the rights of the debenture holders when, in fact, it complied with every detail of its contractual duty.

Nor can it be said that Makepeace's knowledge, imputed to the defendant, brands its conduct as grossly negligent as herein defined. A consideration of the facts before him does not lead to the conclusion that the substitution was permitted with willful or reckless disregard of the rights of the bondholders, when the various permissive and exculpatory provisions of the indenture are borne in mind.

The facts of this case show, perhaps as clearly as can be imagined, how utterly unjust to the investing public is the modern trust indenture. Prospective investors are unquestionably induced to purchase debentures, to a great extent, by the name and prestige of the trustee, which are capitalized by the obligor seeking financing in order to sell its securities. It is safe to assume that many investors in these debentures of National Electric Power Company were led to purchase them, in large measure, by the fact that the Chase National Bank, or its predecessor, with all of its power and prestige in the financial community, was named as trustee. While it is true that our courts have, unrealistically, held purchasers to a knowledge of the terms of the indenture, the fact cannot be avoided that seldom, if ever, is the indenture read by such purchasers. It is, indeed, doubtful whether they understand that they should read it, or whether reading it would lead to comprehension of its significance. Reliance is placed almost completely upon the belief that the experience, power, financial acumen and integrity of the trustee will serve as a protection. Nor does it appear that repeated warnings by the courts will cause more persons to read indentures in the future than in the past. The untrained investor unquestionably depends upon the great financial institution named as trustee to supply the skill and the watchfulness and the prudence and the experience which he himself lacks. The cruel fact is that not only is the trustee not required to exercise that greater skill and watchfulness and prudence and skill which it has, but it is even absolved from exercising merely the ordinary care which a single individual should exercise as to his own affairs.

Billions of dollars have been invested on the strength of indentures such as the one involved in this case. This defendant alone, at the time of the substitution, was acting as trustee under 850 similar indentures, totaling about $5,000,000,000.

In such indentures the use of the word "trustee" is clearly a misnomer. The corporate trustee has very little in common with the ordinary trustee, as we generally understand the fiduciary relationship. The ordinary trustee is supposed to represent the interests of the beneficiary alone. The courts impose upon him an undivided loyalty to the cestui que trust. So strict is the rule of undivided loyalty to the beneficiary that the mere fact that a trustee has an interest inconsistent with the interest of his cestui, casts upon him the burdens of explanation and justification. Munson v. Syracuse, G. & C. R. Co., 103 N. Y. 58, 8 N.E. 355; Globe Woolen Co. v. Utica Gas & Electric Co., 244 N. Y. 483, 121 N.E. 378. The trustee under a corporate indenture, on the other hand, has his rights and duties defined, not by the fiduciary relationship, but exclusively by the terms of the agreement. His status is more that of a stakeholder than one of a trustee. Indeed, in the earlier indentures the documents were rather in the form of escrow agreements, and no duties were assigned to the trustee. See 33 Columbia Law Review, 97, 99. Far from refraining from occupying inconsistent positions, corporate trustees have affirmatively and deliberately assumed them to an increasing degree. Corporate trustees have come to act as promoters, underwriters, bankers, financial advisers, bondholders, and creditors of companies whose debenture holders they have been selected to protect. 42 Harvard Law Review, 198, 226.

It is becoming increasingly clear that these indentures, though legally permissible, have all the potentialities of fraud upon innocent investors. A recent study by the Legislature of the state of New York has revealed how widespread has been the damage caused to investors by such indentures, even in the restricted field of real estate, and how impossible it has been to secure relief in the courts. See Report of Legislative Investigating Committee to Investigate Bondholders' Committees, etc. (Legislative Document No. 66, 1936, page 18 et seq.)

This indenture was particularly vicious. It permitted the substitution of practically all the collateral, on the bare statement of officers of the obligor as to earnings. It made unnecessary any check-up by an impartial agency. It rendered unnecessary any consideration on the part of the so-called trustee to the comparative value and soundness of the substituted collateral. It placed in the hands of the obligor the power to wipe out completely the security behind its debentures. No check or restraint of any appreciable force was provided. The clauses permitting substitution are so astutely tucked away that the average layman would have the greatest difficulty in discovering them. Not only the average layman, but seasoned financial experts like those who publish Moody's Manual apparently overlooked the power of substitution, for until after the collapse of the system, Moody's Manual, in describing these bonds and the security behind them, never mentioned the power or possibility of substitution of collateral.

The defendant contends, as do financial institutions generally, that the fees usually received for acting as "trustees" under these indentures are not adequate if the duties of an ordinary fiduciary are to be assumed. That may be true. Conversely the fee of $1,100 per year in this case was grotesquely exorbitant for the negligible services performed and responsibility undertaken by the defenant. The defendant did not earn its fee either in work or in risk. It would be far better for the bondholders to pay a much larger compensation to the trustee, and be able to insist upon the usual vigilance of a fiduciary. The trustee need not become an insurer any more than, for example, a testamentary trustee. But the trustee should be made to live up to the responsibilty which nearly every purchaser assumes it has, and which it represents to the public as having undertaken, in a sense, by the very advertisement of the designation "trustee."

Such change can come in this state only through action by the Legislature. Trustees have accepted duties under these indentures, slight as they are, relying upon judicial precedents absolving them from exercising ordinary care, and permitting them to insert practically unlimited exculpatory clauses. The rules which have been laid down by the courts can obviously not be altered now by the courts in justice to trust agreements which have been made in reliance upon them. The entire system, however, should be changed by legislation so as to provide more adequate compensation to the trustee, imposition of a duty of active vigilance akin to that placed upon ordinary fiduciaries. Legislation to such end, applicable only to real estate trust mortgages however, is now pending before the Legislature. Ass.Intro.No.1880 Print No. 2779 by Mr. Streit. Particularly, the right of release or substitution of collateral should be carefully circumscribed. If the trustee itself is not required to assume any duty of vigilance with respect thereto, certificates should be required of disinterested appraisal experts, not only as to earnings but as to value, and, indeed, as to every other item which banking experts consider important in measuring the desirability of collateral.

I am reluctantly constrained to conclude that the defendant has successfully exempted itself from liability in this sad picture of high finance. For the inexcusable terms of the indenture, the trustee cannot be held accountable. It performed in full the negligible duty which was imposed upon it by the indenture. It did nothing more; but, having done that, it is absolved under the law.[4] * * *

Duties and Responsibility of the Trustee—Duties Prior to Default.

(a) The identure to be qualified may provide that, prior to default (as such term is defined in such indenture)—

(1) the indenture trustee shall not be liable except for the performance of such duties as are specifically set out in such indenture; and

(2) the indenture trustee may conclusively rely, as to the truth of the statements and the correctness of the opinions expressed therein, in the absence of bad faith on the part of such trustee, upon certificates or opinions conforming to the requirements of the indenture; but such indenture shall contain provisions requiring the indenture trustee to examine the evidence furnished to it pursuant to section 77nnn to determine whether or not such evidence conforms to the requirements of the indenture.

Notice of defaults.

(b) The indenture to be qualified shall contain provisions requiring the indenture trustee to give the indenture security holders, in the manner and to the extent provided in subsection (c) of section 77mmm, notice of all defaults known to the trustee, within ninety days after the occurrence thereof: Provided, That such indenture may provide that, except in the case of default in the payment of the principal of or interest on any indenture security, or in the payment of any sinking or purchase fund installment, the trustee shall be protected in withholding such notice if and so long as the board of directors, the executive committee, or a trust committee of directors and/or responsible officers, of the trustee in good faith determine that the withholding of such notice is in the interests of the indenture security holders.

Duties of the trustee in case of default.

(c) The indenture to be qualified shall contain provisions requiring the indenture trustee to exercise in case of default (as such term is defined in such indenture) such of the rights and powers vested in it by such indenture, and to use the same degree of care and skill in their exercise, as a prudent man would exercise or use under the circumstances in the conduct of his own affairs.

(d) The indenture to be qualified shall not contain any provisions relieving the indenture trustee from liability for its own negligent action, its own negligent failure to act, or its own willful misconduct, except that—

(1) such indenture may contain the provisions authorized by paragraphs (1) and (2) of subsection (a) of this section;

(2) such indenture may contain provisions protecting the indenture trustee from liability for any error of judgment made in good faith by a responsible officer or officers of such trustee, unless it shall be proved that such trustee was negligent in ascertaining the pertinent facts; and

(3) such indenture may contain provisions protecting the indenture trustee with respect to any action taken or omitted to be taken by it in good faith in accordance with the direction of the holders of not less than a majority in principal amount of the indenture securities at the time outstanding (determined as provided in subsection (a) of section 77ppp) relating to the time, method, and place of conducting any proceeding for any remedy available to such trustee, or exercising any trust or power conferred upon such trustee, under such indenture.

B. THE BONDHOLDERS

1. RIGHTS IN MANAGEMENT

BONDHOLDERS' RIGHTS IN MANAGEMENT

The position commonly assumed by the Bar is that prior to default or insolvency of the corporation, a bondholder or creditor has no right to equitable relief against the wrongful acts of the management. It is said that the bondholder is not a stockholder; is not a participant in the enterprise; and if he had any rights in management, has relinquished them in return for specific remedies by way of action at law or foreclosure of security in case of default.

Economically, it is not easy to see the reason why a distinction should be drawn between a bondholder and a preferred stockholder. However, there is an economic distinction between a long term creditor and a creditor such as a commercial banker, who grants short term credit. He is supposed to grant such credit on the strength of a good current ratio—that is on the strength of the fact that the current assets of the corporation are so much greater than its current liabilities that his note will be paid in any event, even though the management is inefficient and perhaps dishonest, or at least not working to the best interests of the participants.

But the holder of a long-term bond, like the preferred shareholder, will have his interest paid only if the corporation is well managed—that is, he must look primarily to the good faith and efficiency of the management rather than to the property. On foreclosure, the bondholder rarely, if ever, comes out whole. A foreclosure does not normally result in payment of a bond, but in its refinancing by the issue to the bondholder of another, and usually less desirable form of security. Consequently, unless the business is well managed he stands to lose quite as much as the preferred shareholder.

Both he and the preferred shareholder have a less vivid interest in the management; since the common stockholder or the holder of an unlimited participation has an interest, not merely in a minimum amount of return, but in getting the maximum amount of return possible in the way of corporate profits. The bondholder and the preferred shareholder normally are interested wholly in having the management good enough to secure a corporate profit sufficient to take care of their interest or preferred dividend requirements; and requirements for a sinking fund, if any; and to keep the property in good enough shape so that at maturity of the bond issue the debt can be refinanced or paid.

Broadly speaking, the rule of law might be stated as follows:

(1) Managements are under no fiduciary duties to bondholders so long as the corporation is not in default, but

(a) there is a remedy in equity to prevent waste or damage to the security mortgaged or pledged; and

(b) possibly, there may be an interest in preserving from waste or depreciation the margin of assets of the corporation over and above the bond issue. This last is extremely problematic.

(2) As soon as the corporation becomes insolvent—or possibly when insolvency is imminent, the management falls under a fiduciary duty to protect the creditors from threatened or further loss and, possibly also, to see that they are paid ratably.

This last rule, if it exists, is hazy in the extreme, though it is vigorously applied in a number of instances. It is sometimes said that when a concern is insolvent, its directors must manage its assets as a trust fund for the "benefit of creditors."

This, of course, summarizes a result; the statement cannot be said fairly to express the theory. Probably a better theory is that as soon as a corporation becomes insolvent, all creditors become joint adventures, i. e., since they cannot get paid according to the tenor of their claim, they must work together in order to secure either a ratable distribution or a continuance of the business which may ultimately pay them out. This last theory has never been passed on in the courts.[1]

WHITMORE v. INTERNATIONAL FRUIT & SUGAR CO.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1913. 214 Mass. 525, 102 N.E. 59.

HAMMOND, J. The demurrers were overruled by a judge of the Superior Court, and the case is before us upon a report made by him under R.L. c. 159, § 27. If the order overruling the demurrers was erroneous, the bill is to be dismissed with costs, unless further amendment shall be allowed. If the order was right, the defendants are to answer over.

We adopt as a sufficiently full and accurate summary of the bill the one given by the judge of the Superior Court in his "memorandum of decision," which is in the following language:

"The bill as amended, in substance alleges:

"1. The entire property, 'for the most part barren or covered with woods,' of the International Fruit & Sugar Company, hereinafter called the Fruit Company, is included in a mortgage to the International Trust Company, hereinafter called the trustee, and does not exceed in value $50,000. There have been issued bonds secured by said mortgage to the par value of $400,000, of which amount bonds to the par value of $250,000 are still the property of the Fruit Company, but bonds to a par value in excess of $75,000 have been transferred to certain of the defendants as trustees of the Cuban-American Trust, of which amount bonds to a par value in excess of $40,000 are still in the possession of the persons named as trustees, either individually or as such trustees, and 'a large number' of the bonds have been sold by the Fruit Company to bona fide purchasers through false and fraudulent misrepresentations, set forth in detail, some of which were clearly statements as to existing facts.

"2. The individual defendants caused the Fruit Company to be organized as a fraudulent scheme for the purpose of transferring to it the property included in the mortgage at a grossly excessive price, and of selling said bonds and the stock of the corporation by means of false and fraudulent representations, all as set forth in paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 of the amended bill. Recitals of subsequent action are made in said paragraphs. It seems that at the most these allegations and the recitals referred to are either preliminary to the main part of the bill or matters of inducement and not sufficient for the granting of relief.

"3. The plaintiffs, relying on said representations and believing them to be true, purchased for a valuable consideration, and still own, certain of the bonds.

"4. The individual defendants controlling the Fruit Company have caused it to transfer to themselves, individually or as trustees of the Cuban-American Trust, the bonds in excess of the par value of $75,000 as hereinbefore referred to without adequate consideration, and these transfers are alleged to be a fraud on the bona fide holders. These allegations are vague. But the individual defendants stand in a confidential or trust relation to the corporation. See paragraph 1 of the bill. These bonds in excess of $40,000 in par value are still in the possession of the defendants who are trustees of the Cuban-American Trust, individually or as such trustees.

"5. The individual defendants, as officers of the Fruit Company, have misappropriated money and property of that company and have fraudulently and for their own profit caused unfair and inequitable contracts to be entered into between it and three of their number as trustees for said Cuban-American Trust for the sale of the bonds of the company, which must be construed as including the bonds of the par value of $250,000 still owned by the Fruit Company, and it is alleged that said unfair and inequitable contracts have been secured by means of false and fraudulent representations. Many of these allegations are also somewhat indefinite.

"6. The Company is alleged to be insolvent, and on July 1, 1911, defaulted on the payment of the interest due on some of its bonds, and that default still continues as to some bonds including the bonds owned by the plaintiff Cadwell. The trustee has notice of said default and has been requested by the plaintiffs to commence proceedings for the foreclosure of the mortgage, but refuses so to do. The provisions of the mortgage as to foreclosure are set forth in paragraphs 11 and 12 of the amended bill.

"7. The individual defendants fraudulently plan to cause the Fruit Company to transfer five thousand acres of its lands, including its only valuable and income-producing property, without fair or adequate consideration, which if done by this insolvent corporation will seriously impair the security of its bonds. The trustee, it is alleged, intends to release this land from the mortgage, although it knows of the default on the interest of the bonds, without payment of the amount required by the mortgage.

"8. The mortgaged property is not sufficient to pay in full the bonds now in the hands of bona fide bondholders for value.

"To summarize in part: An insolvent corporation has issued mortgage bonds, a part of which have been sold by means of fraud. It still holds part of the bonds. The mortgaged property is not sufficient to pay the bonds already sold. There has been a default in interest on the [a] part of the bonds, which default still continues. The individual defendants, the officers of said corporation, are improvidently at least endeavoring to sell bonds which will increase the amount of the bonded indebtedness and decrease the security for the bonds already sold. Notwithstanding its insolvency, the corporation, acting through the individual defendants, seek to sell the most valuable part of its property and to wrongfully take said part out from the security of the mortgage. The trustee declines to proceed for the protection of the bondholders."

The relief prayed for is substantially the foreclosure of the mortgage with appropriate proceedings to prevent the impairment of the value of the security of the bondholders either by fraudulent issue of additional bonds or by an improvident and unwarrantable sale of the land covered by the mortgage. There can be no doubt that at least to prevent such impairment the bill is maintainable whether the principal be due or not, or whether the coupons be paid or unpaid.

The bill is not multifarious. All the defendants were materially concerned, some in one way, some in another, with the matter of which the plaintiff complains, and it matters not that to a certain extent the particular acts of one are distinct from the particular acts of others, all tending to the same general result injurious to the plaintiff. See Parker v. Simpson, 180 Mass. 334, 341, 62 N.E. 401; Davis v. New England Railway Publishing Co., 203 Mass. 470, 89 N.E. 565, 25 L.R.A., N.S., 1024, 133 Am.St.Rep. 318.

The demurrers therefore could not have been sustained as a whole, and hence were rightly overruled; and that would be so even if they were sustainable as to some of the grounds alleged.

It follows that by the terms of the report the defendants are to "answer over"; and it is

So ordered.

HOYT v. E. I. DU PONT DE NEMOURS POWDER CO.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1917. 88 N.J.Eq. 196, 102 A. 666.

BACKES, V. C. This bill is to restrain the use of corporate assets to retire capital stock, in impairment of the rights of bondholders. Round figures and approximate sums will be used to explain the controversy. The defendant the New Jersy Du Pont Company was a holding company until 1906, when it began manufacturing explosives and allied products. In that year it made a 4½ per cent. 30-year gold bond issue of $16,000,000, secured by a trust deed, imposing

"a charge in favor of the trustee upon all its present and future property, including all its lands, plants, factories, machinery, goods, patent rights, trade-marks, processes, improvements, and all other property, both real and personal of every name and nature whatsoever and wherever situated, and present and future net income, and earning profits for the benefit of said bonds."

Since then and particularly during the present world war, huge sums of money have been made out of military powder, and from a holding company of $37,500,000 of possessions, it had grown to a corporation of over $200,000,000 of assets, when in 1915 the management decided to reorganize. The Delaware Du Pont Company was formed with an authorized capital of $240,000,000, and bought the Jersey company's property and business for $120,000,000; the price being paid by $1,500,000 cash, $59,500,000 debenture[2] shares, and $59,000,000 common stock of the Delaware company. The Jersey company used the cash to take up mortgage liens approximating that sum, and divided the $59,000,000 common stock among the holders of its $29,500,000 of common stock—a 200 per cent. dividend. The $59,500,000 debenture shares were calculated to retire all of the Jersey company's liabilities, consisting of the bond issue (then outstanding) $14,000,000, preferred stock $16,000,000, common stock $29,500,000. All but $1,000,000 of the bonds, and $300,000 of the preferred stock, have been retired, and there remains in the treasury $31,000,000 of the debenture shares and cash. Halted in the scheme to dissolve, the Jersey company now proposed to use $26,000,000 of the debenture shares to retire that amount of the $29,500,000 of its common stock, and proceedings, according to the statute, are under way to decrease the common stock to $3,500,000. Accomplished, this would leave $5,000,000 in debenture shares and cash to secure the unredeemed bonds and preferred stock. The complainants, owners of $40,000 of the bonds, object, contending that the debenture shares are, as after-acquired property, subject to the lien of the bonded indebtedness, and that the intended use would be a dissipation of their security, to which the Jersey company in substance replies that the security will be equal to what it was when the bonds were issued, that it is ample that the complainants ought to be contented—an appeal to the complacent, but not an answer to the issue tendered.

It is debatable whether the Jersey company had the right to sell its assets in bulk and retire from business, in view of the covenant contained in the trust deed that "it will at all times do all things necessary to preserve its corporate existence, and will actively conduct and carry on the business for which it was incorporated," notwithstanding the provisions of its charter and a clause in the trust deed that "until default as hereinafter defined, the powder company shall at all times have control of all of its property, and the right to use, sell, or otherwise deal with and in the same as it may see fit, and may dispose of all profits and income thereof, including income of the securities held by the trustee in the shape of dividends or otherwise." This question, however, is not raised and under the frame of the bill the exchange by the Jersey company of one class of property for the other is affirmed and the substitution of securities assented to. It is also not in dispute that upon the conversion, the lien of the trust deed upon the newly acquired property was subject to the right reserved to declare dividends, and the distribution of all the surplus by the 200 per cent. dividend to the common stockholders is not challenged. Nor is the use of the securities, to redeem pro tanto the bond issue, seriously criticized, as it well might be, but what the complainants protest against is the further abstraction of securities from the fund created and pledged to secure their debt and their absorption by stockholders, in liquidation of a subordinate liability—an effort which finds no support in principle or authority, and so inherently wrong as to require only a recital to manifest its illegality. Ikelheimer v. Cons. Tobacco Co., N.J., 59 A. 363; Fidelity Trust Co. v. Hoboken & Manhattan R. R. Co., 71 N.J.Eq. 14, 63 A. 273; Watt v. Hestonville, M. & F. P. R. R. Co., 1 Brew., Pa., 418.

Acknowledging that the scheme to reach $26,000,000 of $29,500,000 of assets, by converting it into surplus through a reduction of the par value of the Jersey company's 350,000 shares of common stock from $100 to $10, thus decreasing its authorized capital from $35,000,000 to $3,500,000, ignores the bondholders' lien upon the entire capital, the defendant argues with much earnestness that inasmuch as the ratio of assets to bonds at the time they were issued was 2½ to 1, and that the remnants under the proposed plan will leave the ratio of $5 of security to every dollar of bond, plus the lien of the trust deed upon the property transferred, the complainants will suffer no injury and have no cause for complaint. This falsely assumes the power to convert capital into surplus for stock dividend purposes, and the right of the debtor to dictate what of his securities the creditor may retain and what of them may be confiscated. But if the Jersey company's assurance that the bonds will be paid at maturity and the interest in the meantime, and that the security is adequate, even giltedge, be accepted, as facts, it is still clear that the bondholders will be injuriously imposed upon and their property impaired. Industrial securities, unlike investment in ordinary bond and mortgage on land, have a legitimate speculative value depending on the success or failure of the enterprise and reflected by daily quotations on the Exchange. No better illustration can be had than the rise in market value from $85 to $102, of these very bonds, the moment the reorganization was announced and it became known that back of the bonds were $200,000,000 instead of $37,-500,000. And that such an event was probable and contemplated by the New Jersey company is evinced by the stipulation in the trust deed that at any time before maturity the bonds were redeemable at $110. Of this prospect, obviously the bondholders cannot be deprived. But, aside from the speculative feature, it is the province of the bondholders to retain all that has been pledged to secure their debt, and until they are paid the debtor has no choice. Who can tell what the Delaware company's debenture shares will be worth henceforth and until maturity in 1936? Surely the complainant bondholders are not obliged to take the risk.

The provision in the trust deed requiring a demand by 25 per cent. in value of the bondholders to move the trustee to action restricts collection or foreclosure proceedings, but is not a limitation upon the inherent rights of bondholders to protect their interests. firmed 65 N.J.Eq. 764, 55 A. 1133; Reinhardt v. Interstate Telephone Co., 71 N.J.Eq. 70, 63 A. 1097.

An injunction will issue restraining the distribution of the assets to the stockholders. With the proposed reduction of capital stock, the secondary purpose of which is to reduce corporation taxes, the complainants have no concern, and the ad interim restraint in this respect will be dissolved. The complainants are entitled to costs.

FLEMING v. FAIRMONT & MANNINGTON RAILROAD CO.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, 1913.

Error to Circuit Court, Marion County.

Action by A. S. Fleming against the Fairmont & Mannington Railroad Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error.

LYNCH, J. The plaintiff brought his action before a justice and recovered judgment on overdue coupons detached from defendant's bonds, secured by mortgage on all its property then owned and thereafter acquired by it. On appeal the intermediate court dismissed the action; and upon further appeal the circuit court affirmed the latter judgment. Hence this writ of error.

It is agreed that, before action, the coupons were due, and, although properly presented for payment, were unpaid. The plaintiff was therefore entitled to judgment and execution thereon, unless inhibited by some provision of the mortgage securing the bonds and coupons. The defendant cites sections 1 and 2 of article 5 of the mortgage as authority denying plaintiff's right to recover on the coupons.

But from these sections no intention appears, expressly or by implication, to preclude plaintiff from relief by the form of action adopted by him. To have this effect, the restriction must be clear and reasonably free from doubt. "The common-law right to sue upon a bond is not affected by the remedies provided in the mortgage given simultaneously and for the better securing of the bond unless the provisions of the mortgage exclude this right in express terms or by necessary implication." For "the right to sue upon a written obligation admitted to be valid is of too high a character to be taken away by implication, especially if drawn from an instrument other than that which is given in direct and positive acknowledgment of the debt." Manning v. Railroad Co., C.C., 29 F. 838; Nute v. Insurance Co., 72 Mass. 174, 181, 6 Gray 174, 181; Kimber v. Gunnell, 126 F. 137, 61 C.C.A. 203; Jones on Corp. Bonds, § 340.

The purport of the whole article relied upon by defendant is to define the rights, duties, and remedies of the trustee and bondholders, should the mortgagor default in the payment of the bonds or interest. It provides what course each shall pursue, for enforcement of the lien, when such default occurs. It provides: First, that, should the mortgagor refuse or fail after demand to perform any of the covenants and stipulations in the mortgage or the bonds secured thereby, the trustee shall, upon the request of the holders of one-third in amount of the bonds and adequate security against costs, expenses, and liabilities, enter upon the mortgaged property, manage and operate it, collect the receipts, and apply the income, after deducting current expenses and costs, to the principal and interest of the bonds as the same become due; or, second, upon like default, request, and security, he shall sell the property and make application of the proceeds in the manner stated; or, third, upon like default, request, and security, he shall proceed to protect and enforce the rights of the bondholders under the mortgage by suits in law or equity. The instrument fully states the manner in which the trustee shall perform the duties so prescribed and then concludes immediately thereafter with the general statement: "It being understood, and it is hereby expressly declared, that the rights of entry and sale hereinbefore granted are intended as cumulative remedies allowed by law, and that the same shall not be deemed in any manner whatever to deprive the trustee or the beneficiaries under this trust of any legal or equitable remedy, by judicial proceedings, consistent with the provisions of these presents, according to the true intent and meaning thereof."

The sole and manifest purpose of these provisions is to secure the subject-matter of the lien against illegal invasion, the effect of which would be its impairment as ample security for payment of the mortgagor's bonded indebtedness; and, in order to remove any possible excuse for misunderstanding of its terms and to afford reasonable assurance of the proper interpretation, the concluding clause in express terms declares the absence of any intent to deprive the bondholders of any existing legal or equitable remedies not inconsistent with the purposes, the subservance of which the section in its entirety comprehends. * * *

The termination of plaintiff's action in a judgment, even when followed by execution, cannot "affect, disturb, or prejudice" the lien of the mortgage. The property therein embraced is immune from levy. It cannot be disturbed. Nor can the operation of defendant's railroad be impeded as a result of any judgment obtained in this action, or any proceeding thereafter to enforce payment of the judgment, except in the manner permitted by the mortgage. 1 Elliott on Railroads, §§ 486, 509; 3 Cook on Corp., 6th Ed., §§ 770, 772; 5 Thomp. on Corp., 1st Ed., § 6124; Jones on Corp. Bonds, § 340; Hospital v. Library Co., 189 Pa. 269, 42 A. 183; Com. v. Railroad Co., 122 Pa. 306, 15 A. 448, 1 L.R.A. 225; Trust Co. v. Steel Co., 33 Misc. 484, 68 N.Y.S. 915; Kimber v. Gunnell, 126 F. 137, 61 C.C.A. 203. The creditor does not thereby acquire a lien on defendant's property prior to the mortgage. When suing at law upon an overdue coupon and proceeding against the railroad company, the bondholder, as shown by the authorities cited, stands upon the same plane as any other creditor; and execution on a judgment in his favor can be levied only on property actually owned by the company and not upon that which has been conveyed to trustees by a mortgage or deed of trust duly executed and recorded. When it becomes necessary for him to reach the property held by the trustee, he must proceed against him not for his own benefit but as a bondholder and on behalf of all the bondholders as a class. What may be realized by such proceeding belongs to the whole class and must be distributed among its members pro rata. 5 Thomp. on Corp., 1st Ed., § 6124; Com. v. Railroad Co., supra. Nevertheless, nothing otherwise prohibiting, he is entitled to judgment and execution thereon. If property belonging to the defendant other than that already bound by the lien of the mortgage is available for levy under execution, he may levy upon it, but not otherwise. Carr v. Le Fevre, 27 Pa. 413; Railroad Co. v. Johnson, 54 Pa. 127; Com. v. Railroad Co., supra; Bradley v. Railroad Co., 36 Pa. 141; Trust Co. v. Steel Co., supra; Thomp. on Corp., 1st Ed., §§ 6124, 6125; Jones on Corp. Bonds, § 340. The fact that a prospective judgment against a defendant in an action at law will be worthless is no defense to the action. * * *

NEW ORLEANS PACIFIC RAILWAY CO. et al. v. PARKER et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1891.
143 U.S. 42, 12 S.Ct. 364, 36 L.Ed. 66.

[Plaintiff, Parker, brought a bill in equity to foreclose a mortgage given by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge & Vicksburg Railroad Company in 1870. The mortgage provided that it covered all property "which is now owned or which shall hereafter be acquired by the said company and which shall be appurtenant to or necessary or used for the operation of said main line of railroad or any of said branches." The mortgage provided that the bondholders might institute foreclosure proceedings.

In 1871, certain lands were granted to the railroad by Congress. The railroad built its line over other lands, and by Act of Congress, the withdrawal of the land grant was ordered.

In 1881, the railroad transferred all its right, title and interest in these lands to the New Orleans, Pacific Railway Company, who received patents therefor in 1885 as assignee. In 1883 and 1884, the Pacific Co. mortgaged these lands to secure certain bonds which plaintiff alleges are subsequent to and subordinate to the Baton Rouge mortgage securing payment of the bonds in suit.

Plaintiff claimed the amount of matured coupons on two bonds, and filed suit for himself and all those holding similar bonds. Hamlin, another bondholder under the same mortgage, intervened as plaintiff. Defendants, the Baton Rouge Co., the Pacific Co., and others interposed a demurrer which was overruled. They then filed an answer alleging that Baton Rouge Co.'s charter did not authorize a mortgage on the land grant, nor did the mortgage embrace it, and that legal title thereto remained in the United States until the patents were granted to the Pacific Co. Defendants also filed a cross-bill for a decree adjudging that the land grant was not embraced by said mortgage.

Decrees were rendered for plaintiffs, Parker and Hamlin for their claims; the mortgage was held a valid lien on the lands, which were ordered sold; and defendants' cross-bill was dismissed. Defendants appeal.]

MR. JUSTICE BROWN delivered the opinion of the court: * * *

The decrees in this case were also fatally defective in ordering all the lands assumed to be covered by this mortgage to be sold, free from all liens, mortgages and incumbrances, to satisfy a claim of $2,400 in one case and $6,000 in another, without making provision for other bondholders, subsequent mortgagees or other creditors of the road. Assuming for the purposes of this case that, under the peculiar terms of this mortgage, these bondholders had the right to file this bill without calling upon the trustee to act—a point upon which we express no opinion—they had no right to a decree for their exclusive benefit. If a single bondholder has any right at all to institute proceedings, he is bound to act for all standing in a similar position, and not only to permit other bondholders to intervene, but to see that their rights are protected in the final decree. Upon this principle it was held by this court, in Pennock v. Coe, 64 U.S. 117, 23 How. 117, 16 L.Ed. 436, that a bondholder cannot, by getting a judgment at law, be permitted to sell a portion of the property devoted to the common security, as this would disturb the pro rata distribution among the bondholders to which they are equitably entitled. "These bondholders," said Mr. Justice Nelson, "have a common interest in this security, and are all equally entitled to the benefit of it; and in case of a deficiency of the fund to satisfy the whole of the debt, in equity, a distribution is made among the holders pro rata * * * To permit, therefore, one of the bondholders under the second mortgage to proceed at law in the collection of his debt upon execution would not only disturb the pro rata distribution in case of a deficiency, and give him an inequitable preference over his associates, but also have the effect to prejudice the superior quality of the bondholders under the first mortgage, which possesses the prior lien." The decrees of the court below must be reversed and the case remanded with instructions to dismiss the bills of Parker and Hamlin, and for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.[4]

SEIBERT v. MINNEAPOLIS & ST. LOUIS RY. CO. et al. (GRIGGS, Intervener).

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1893.
52 Minn. 148, 53 N.W. 1134, 20 L.R.A. 535, 38 Am.St.Rep. 530.

Appeal by intervener, F. H. Griggs, from an order sustaining the demurrer of defendants, Central Trust Company of New York, Fidelity Insurance Trust & Safe-Deposit Company and Farmers' Loan & Trust Company.

[The Minneapolis & St. Louis Railway Co. mortgaged its railroad to the Central Trust Co. as trustee to secure certain bonds. Plaintiff, Seibert, was substituted trustee, and brought this action to foreclose the mortgage.

There were several prior mortgages on the railroad to secure other bonds. Griggs, owner of some of these bonds, intervened, asking that these prior mortgages also be foreclosed. He alleged that there was a provision in the mortgage that: "In case default shall be made in the payment of any of said coupons, or semi-annual interest upon any of the aforesaid bonds * * * and in case such default shall continue for * * * four months after the said coupons shall have become due and payable, then and thereupon the principal of all the bonds secured hereby shall become immediately due and payable, * * *."

Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., trustee of these bonds, demurred to Griggs' complaint. The demurrer was sustained, and Griggs appeals. (The other facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.)]

VANDERBURGH, J. This suit is brought to foreclose a certain mortgage executed by defendant railway company to the Central Trust Company, which has been superseded by the appointment of the plaintiff as trustee in its place. The defendants Farmers' Loan & Trust Company and Central Trust Company are named as trustees in other mortgages executed by the railway company. * * *

Intervener avers that all of his said described coupons from the bonds in this division referred to have been presented for payment at the agency of the said Minneapolis & St. Louis Railway Company in the city of New York, and the payment of the interest therein specified has been demanded, and payment was refused; and all the said coupons have also been presented for payment to the acting treasurer of said Minneapolis & St. Louis Railway Company, at the city of Minneapolis, Minn.; and the payment of the interest specified was demanded, and payment was refused, and default has been made in the payment of all the described coupons from said bonds. It also alleged that, excepting as to the several coupons aforesaid which became due and payable on the 1st day of December, 1891, such default as to the payment of all said coupons has continued for the period of more than four months from the several dates when they severally became due and payable; wherefore intervener avers that the principal of all the bonds secured by said mortgage or deed of trust in the division referred to has become due and payable, and all the bonds secured by the said mortgage are now due and payable; that by article 9 of said mortgage it is provided

"That it shall be the duty of the trustee, upon proper indemnification against costs and expenses, to execute the power of entry or the power of sale by said mortgage granted, or both, to take appropriate proceedings in equity or at law to enforce the rights of the bondholders, in case of any default made by the mortgagee, upon requisition in writing as thereinafter specified, viz.:

"First. If the default be as to either the interest or the principal of any of the bonds aforesaid, such requisition upon the said trustee shall be by holders of not less than twenty-five per centum of the said bonds then outstanding; and upon such requisition and indemnification it shall be the duty of the trustee to enforce the rights of the bondholders under these presents by entry, sale, or legal proceedings, as it, being advised by counsel learned in the law, shall deem most expedient for the interest of all the holders of the said bonds.

"Second. But it is expressly understood that such duty of the trustee shall be at all times subject to the power hereby declared of a majority in interest of the holders of the said bonds by requisition in writing, signed by such majority, to instruct the said trustee to waive such default: provided, however, that no action of the bondholders in waiving such default shall extend or be taken to affect any subsequent default, or to impair the results arising therefrom.

"And it is hereby further expressly agreed and made binding upon each and every holder of bonds secured hereby that no proceedings at law or in equity shall be taken by any bondholder to foreclose the equity of redemption under this instrument, or to procure a sale of the property covered thereby, independently of the party of the second part, trustee, or its successors in said trust, except after a requisition shall have been made to the said trustee in manner and form as hereinbefore provided, and also until after a refusal of the said trustee to comply with such requisition according to the provisions herein made in respect thereto."

Intervener submits and claims "that the said provisions of article 9 of said last-described mortgage are void, in so far as they attempted to deprive the holder of any of the bonds which may have become due by default in payment of the interest coupons, or the holders of any of the past-due coupons, from enforcing the remedy whereby he might have his lien established upon the mortgaged property without the requisition of the holders of not less than 25 per centum of the said bonds then outstanding; that said provisions are in fact an attempt to oust the jurisdiction of any court to entertain a complaint by, or give relief to, the holders of less than 25 per centum of the outstanding bonds."

The principal question involved in this appeal, therefore, is whether the provisions of article 9, above quoted, restraining proceedings for foreclosure on the part of individual bondholders until after the requisition made upon the trustees by a certain proportion of the bondholders as therein provided, and a refusal by him to comply therewith, is valid and obligatory upon the individual bondholders as respects the enforcement of the security.

We are unable to see why the bondholders, subject to reasonable limitations, may not be bound by stipulations in the mortgage of this character, waiving a default, and providing, subject to the conditions named, for the foreclosure by the trustee exclusively. The interests of the bondholders as a class and the nature of the security are to be considered. "They are agreements which the bondholders are at liberty to make, and there is nothing illegal or contrary to public policy in them." Chicago, D. & V. Railroad Co. v. Fosdick, 106 U.S. 77, 1 S.Ct. 10, 27 L.Ed. 47. Each bondholder enters into contract relations with each and all of his cobondholders. His right to appropriate the security in satisfaction of his bond in such lawful manner as he may choose is modified not only by the express provisions of the mortgage, but by the peculiar nature of the security. Gates v. Railroad Co., 53 Conn. 346, 5 A. 695; Shaw v. Little Rock & Fort Smith Railroad Co., 100 U.S. 612, 25 L.Ed. 757; Canada Southern Railroad Co. v. Gebhard, 109 U.S. 527, 534–537, 3 S.Ct. 363, 27 L.Ed. 1020; Guilford v. Railroad Co., 48 Minn. 560, 51 N.W. 658, 31 Am.St.Rep. 694. The legislature would have had an undoubted right to have incorporated, in the enabling statute authorizing the execution of the mortgage and the issuance of the bonds secured thereby, a provision requiring the mortgage to contain similar stipulations. Howell v. Western Railroad Co., 94 U.S. 463, 466, 24 L.Ed. 254.

It is clear, then, that it would be competent for the bondholders themselves to agree to them. They are to be treated as stricti juris, but nevertheless are to be reasonably construed in view of the nature of the mortgage, which is the common security for all the bondholders, and the purposes to be subserved in making them. There is no doubt that the parties could lawfully provide in the same instrument for a reasonable extension of the time for the commencement of foreclosure proceedings, to be determined at the option of a majority of the bondholders. Nute v. Hamilton Mutual Insurance Co., 6 Gray, Mass., 174. But the waiver of the default provided for in this instance amounts substantially to the same thing. So the mortgage might have been so drawn as to permit foreclosure proceedings to be instituted only after default in the payment of the principal debt or some part of it. The stipulation for the waiver of the default in the payment of interest is in principle no different.

Again, the trustee, as mortgagee, representing the interests of all the bondholders as beneficiaries, is the proper party to institute foreclosure proceedings, but, if he unreasonably neglects or refuses to discharge his duty in the premises, doubtless any bondholder may bring an action to enforce the security for the common benefit. Chicago, D. & V. Railroad Co. v. Fosdick, 106 U.S. 68, 1 S.Ct. 10, 27 L.Ed. 47. Why may not the mortgage in the common interest stipulate the conditions under which this right may be exercised by the bondholders, and, in order to avoid the risk of rash or arbitrary proceedings which might result in great injury to the security, provide that no such proceedings should be instituted by an individual bondholder except upon the refusal of the trustee to obey the requisition of a reasonable number of the bondholders? It is not the intention or effect of such conditions or stipulations to divest the bondholders of their right to judicial remedies, or to oust the courts of their jurisdiction; it is merely the imposition of certain conditions upon themselves in respect to the exercise of that right. And this distinction is well recognized by the courts. Gasser v. Sun Fire Office, 42 Minn. 315, 44 N.W. 252, and cases; Guilford v. Railroad Co., 48 Minn. 560, 51 N.W. 658. The provisions of this mortgage are not, we think, unreasonable or invalid. * * *

Circuit Court of the United States, N.D. Virginia, 1909. 170 F. 463.

[Plaintiff bondholders of the Merchants Coal Company brought suit for an injunction to restrain defendants, former employees of the corporation, from interfering with the company's mining activities, its officers and employees, from picketing and from preventing others from entering the companies' service, in pursuance of a strike on defendants' part against a wage reduction. A temporary injunction was granted. Defendants interposed a demurrer to the bill, alleging in substance, that plaintiffs are not proper parties to seek this injunction. The demurrer was argued and submitted.]

DAYTON, DISTRICT JUDGE. * * * The demurrer admitting the allegations of the bill to be true justify me in giving them construction liberal to the interests of the complainants without in any manner, in case the demurrer is overruled, prejudicing judgment upon final hearing when the evidence shall disclose to what extent these allegations are sustained by the facts. * * *

The second objection, that bondholders secured by a trust deed cannot maintain suit without alleging the refusal of the trustees to institute the same, is not tenable. * * *

A trust mortgage generally by its own express terms is a tripartite agreement between creditors, debtor, and trustees whereby the creditors as a class loan their money upon certain stipulated terms and conditions to the debtor, who secures these loans upon like terms and conditions by a lien upon designated property. To properly secure this lien, and further to create an agent for both creditors and debtor to secure performance of the mutual terms and conditions agreed upon, inter partes, the property is conveyed to a trustee with express powers to perform these conditions. Under such circumstances it has been

The Trust Indenture Act, [sec. 316, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77ppp] permits the inclusion in the indenture of a clause authorizing a majority of the bondholders to exercise any duties conferred on the trustee; to waive any past default; or to permit not less than 75% of the bondholders to postpone interest payment for not more than three years from its due date. However, a clause must be included in the indenture, providing that the right of any individual bondholder to receive payment of interest or principal shall not be injured by any provision of the indenture.

See, Israels and Kramer, The Significance of the Income Clause in a Corporate Mortgage, 1930, 30 Col.L.Rev. 488, 498 et seq.; Lester, The Effect of Corporate Mortgage Provisions Conditioning Right of Trustee to Act on Default, 1932, 4 Rocky Mt. well held that individual bondholding creditors thus secured must, before bringing suit themselves, request the trustee to sue touching all matters relating to the obligations inter partes created by the terms of the trust itself, such as the demand for accounting from the trust debtor or the demand for a foreclosure and sale. The reason in such cases is clear; the creditors are by the terms of the trust created a class with equal rights, and the trustee is created an agent for them as such. In many cases it would be distinctly against the interests of the other creditors to allow one or more of their number to institute proceedings for selfish reasons against the property, involving its management and calculated to destroy its credit or value. Such are the cases cited by Judge Ross. But in a case like this, when the bondholding creditor is not seeking to interfere with but to maintain the trust obligations and the trust subject from interference and destruction from outside sources, over which neither bondholder, debtor, nor trustee have any control, I can perceive neither any power, or at least obligation, on the part of the trustee, limited by the terms of his trust, himself to sue without direction from the bondholders or to prevent the bondholders from suing. * * *

Directions and Waivers by Bondholders; Prohibition of Impairment of Holder's Right to Payment

(a) The indenture to be qualified may contain provisions—

(1) authorizing the holders of not less than a majority in principal amount of the indenture securities at the time outstanding (A) to direct the time, method, and place of conducting any proceeding for any remedy available to such trustee, or exercising any trust or power conferred upon such trustee, under such indenture, or (B) on behalf of the holders of all such indenture securities, to consent to the waiver of any past default and its consequences; or

(2) authorizing the holders of not less than 75 per centum in principal amount of the indenture securities at the time outstanding to consent on behalf of the holders of all such indenture securities to the postponement of any interest payment for a period not exceeding three years from its due date.

For the purposes of this subsection and paragraph (3) of subsection (d) of section 77ooo, in determining whether the holders of the required principal amount of indenture securities have concurred in any such direction or consent, indenture securities owned by any obligor upon the indenture securities, or by any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by or under direct or indirect common control with any such obligor, shall be disregarded except that for the purposes of determining whether the indenture trustee shall be protected in relying on any such direction or consent, only indenture securities which such trustee knows are so owned shall be so disregarded.

(b) The indenture to be qualified shall provide that, notwithstanding any other provision thereof, the right of any holder of any indenture security to receive payment of the principal of and interest on such indenture security, on or after the respective due dates expressed in such indenture security, or to institute suit for the enforcement of any such payment on or after such respective dates, shall not be impaired or affected without the consent of such holder, except as to a postponement of an interest payment consented to as provided in paragraph (2) of subsection (a), and except that such indenture may contain provisions limiting or denying the right of any such holder to institute any such suit, if and to the extent that the institution or prosecution thereof or the entry of judgment therein would, under applicable law, result in the surrender, impairment, waiver, or loss of the lien of such indenture upon any property subject to such lien. 3. RESPONSIBILITIES TO EACH OTHER

HACKETTSTOWN NATIONAL BANK v. D. G. YUENGLING BREWING CO.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1896. 74 F. 110.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

This was an action at law by the Hackettstown National Bank of Hackettstown, New Jersey, against the D. G. Yuengling Brewing Co., upon certain bonds issued by that corporation. The circuit court directed a verdict for defendant, and to review the judgment entered thereon, plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

WALLACE, CIRCUIT JUDGE. Error is assigned of the ruling of the trial judge in directing the jury to find a verdict for the defendant.

The action was brought to recover the principal and interest of certain second mortgage bonds owned by the plaintiff, part of an issue of $1,000,000, created by the defendant, and secured by a trust deed upon all its real and personal property. The bonds bear date December 31, 1893, and are payable, the principal July 1, 1908, and the interest semi-annually on the 1st days of January and July in each year, subject to conditions indorsed upon the bonds, of which the following are material:

"(4) The principal moneys hereby secured shall become due and payable forthwith * * * if the company makes default for a period of three calendar months in the payment of any interest hereby secured thereby, and the bearer or registered holder hereof, as the case may be, before the interest so in arrear is paid, by notice in writing to the company, calls in the principal moneys hereby secured."

"(11) Subject to the conditions of the trust deed hereinafter mentioned, the holders of three-fourths in the value of the outstanding bonds of this series may sanction any agreement of the company for any modification or alteration of the rights of the bondholders of this series as a class, including the release of any property charged thereby, and any postponement of the time for the payment of any moneys secured thereby, and any increase or reduction of the rate of interest; and an agreement so sanctioned shall be binding upon all bondholders of this series, and notice of any action thus taken shall be given to each bondholder, and each bondholder shall be bound thereupon to produce his bond to the company, and to permit a note of such modification to be placed thereon."

The mortgage provides that the security shall be enforceable, if, after default shall have been made in the payment of the principal of the bonds, and continued for six months or in payment of interest, and continued for three months, the holders of a majority of the bonds shall, by notice to the trustee, elect and declare the principal and interest payable. It also contains provisions for meetings of the bondholders, to be called at the request of the company, the trustee, or by holders of one-third of the amount of outstanding bonds; provides that such meetings shall have power, by extraordinary resolution, "to sanction any modification or compromise of the rights of the bondholders against the company or against its property, whether such rights shall arise under the bonds or trust deed, or otherwise," and provides that such extraordinary resolution may be passed by the vote of holders of a majority of the outstanding bonds.

Evidence was introduced upon the trial tending to establish the following facts: Default was made in the payment of the interest coupons maturing January 1, 1894, and again in the payment of the interest coupons maturing July 1, 1894, and no part of the interest on these coupons was ever paid. After such default had continued for three months, the plaintiff, by notice in writing to the company, demanded the payment of the principal of the bonds as well as the interest. Shortly after the maturing of the second coupons, and when it was supposed that they would not be paid, and that by reason of the continued default the principal sum of the bonds might be declared payable by the bondholders or the trustee, David G. Yuengling, who was the principal stockholder of the corporation, entered into an agreement with John F. Betz, which had for its object the purchase of a sufficient number of the bonds to enable Betz, in conjunction with Yuengling, and some of his relatives and friends, who were likewise bondholders, to control three-fourths in value of the outstanding bonds of the series. The agreement provided that Betz should purchase a sufficient amount to control proceedings in foreclosure; that, if any of the coupons maturing subsequently to January 1, 1895, should be in default, Yuengling would personally pay such coupons on all of the bonds purchased by Betz; that Betz should hold all bonds purchased by him subject to the right of Yuengling, at any time before their maturity, to demand and receive an absolute transfer thereof, together with all unpaid interest coupons, upon the repayment of all moneys advanced by Betz, with interest at 6 per cent.; and that Betz would not transfer or dispose of any of the bonds thus to be purchased in any other manner until the option above mentioned should have expired. Pursuant to this agreement, Betz commenced and continued to purchase bonds until in December, 1894, he had acquired them to the amount of $594,600. December 1, 1894, Betz, with the holders of other bonds, which, with his, were of the amount of $728,100, executed an instrument which, in substance, after reciting the inability of the company to pay its coupons, and that it would be for the best interests of the company and its bondholders to postpone the time of payment of all coupons attached to the bonds, whether past due or to become due on or before July 1, 1896, evidenced their request and consent that the company and the trustee in the deed of trust execute an agreement providing for postponing until January 1, 1900, the time for the payment of all coupons attached to the bonds of the series, whether past due or to become due and payable on or before July 1, 1896. This agreement is signed by Mr. Betz for $594,600 of the bonds, by Yuengling for $18,800, by the estate of Yuengling's father for $10,000, and by the wife of Yuengling for $70,700. Thereafter an agreement such as was authorized by the consent was executed between the company and the trustee. December 29, 1894, a majority of bondholders composed of the same persons who executed the consent, at a meeting called pursuant to the provisions of the trust deed, voted an extraordinary resolution suspending the fourth condition of the bonds until January 1, 1900. No evidence was introduced tending to show that there had been any material change in the circumstances of the company since the creation of the bonds, or that the ultimate security of the bondholders would be promoted by waiving the default in the payment of interest and deferring the enforcement of the security. There was no consultation with the minority stockholders prior to the execution of the consent. The ruling of the trial judge proceeded upon the theory that the consent of the holders of three-fourths in value of the outstanding bonds operated to extend the time of payment of the interest and principal of the bonds, and he refused to submit to the jury the question whether the consent was made bona fide by the bondholders who were parties thereto.

We cannot doubt that a consent to postpone the payment of the demands of the minority bondholders, made collusively by majority bondholders for the purpose of defeating the remedy of the minority, and not in the exercise of an honest discretion in the general interest, is not a consent within the meaning of the eleventh condition; or that a vote at a meeting of bondholders, sanctioning a modification of the rights of the bondholders, passed by a corrupt majority for the purpose of effectuating such a collusive consent, is not within the power contemplated by the provision in the trust deed.

Community of interest, whether in the case of partners or security holders, creates mutual obligation, and imposes upon all persons occupying that position the duty of acting in the utmost good faith towards the interests of their associates. Upon this principle it was declared in Jackson v. Ludeling, 21 Wall. 617, 22 L.Ed. 492, that a holder of certain bonds, part of a series secured by a corporate mortgage, had no right to employ them as an instrument by which he could make an illegitimate profit out of the mortgaged property at the expense of the other bondholders. The court used this language:

"When two or more persons have a common interest in a security, equity will not allow one to appropriate it exclusively to himself, or to impair its worth to others. Community of interest involves mutual obligation. Admitting, then, that Gordon had a right to make use of the mortgage to enforce the payment of the bonds which he held, he had no right so to use it as to obtain an advantage for himself over the other bondholders. He had no right to employ it as an instrument by which he might become the owner of the property mortgaged at the lowest possible price at which it could be obtained, leaving the bonds held by his associate holders unpaid. His duty, if he used it at all, was to make it productive of the most that could be obtained for all who were interested in it; and if he sought to make a profit at the expense of those whose rights in it were the same as his own, he was unfaithful to the relation he assumed, and was guilty of fraud."

The law would not tolerate any agreement made in advance by such associates intended to permit the relaxation of a duty which is enjoined by good morals and the highest expediency, and every presumption is against the supposition that contracting parties intend a compact which the law condemns. Agreements between bondholders lodging in the majority in interest the power of control over the common fund contemplate that those having the largest interest in its conservation will be the most zealous. They are intended to minimize the power of a factious minority to thwart the general good. But every delegation of power implies that it will be honestly exercised. In discussing a reorganization agreement, by the terms of which the bondholders covenanted that a majority of the holders of the outstanding bonds might purchase the mortgaged premises at foreclosure, and that the new company should be organized upon such terms and in such manner as the majority holders should direct, the supreme court said:

"The agreement, though unusual, was a reasonable one. While it prevented a small minority of the bondholders from forcing unreasonable and inequitable concessions from the majority, it did not empower that majority to crush out the rights of the minority or to put them at any disadvantage. It authorized only such arrangements as would inure equally to the benefit alike of the majority and the minority." Sage v. Central Railroad Co. of Iowa, 99 U.S. 334, 25 L.Ed. 394.

Powers in trust deeds, conferred on a majority of bondholders, to bind the minority, have been the subject of consideration in several cases in the English courts, and were given full effect. In these cases the power was contained in a provision, similar to that in the present trust deed, by which the bondholders at a meeting, by extraordinary resolution, were authorized to sanction any modification or compromise of the rights of the bondholders against the company or its property. It was assumed by the court in all of these cases that the power was only called into existence when required by the exigencies of the situation, and when exercised must be exercised in good faith. Mercantile Investment & General Trust Co. v. International Co. of Mexico [1893] 1 Ch. 484, note; Mercantile Investment & General Trust Co. v. River Plate Co. [1894] 1 Ch. 596; Follit v. Eddystone Granite Quarries [1892] 3 Ch. 75; Sneath v. Gold Co. [1893] 1 Ch. 477.

Applying these conclusions to the facts of the present case, it must be held that, if the consent was made and the resolution passed by the majority of bondholders, not in the common interest of all, but in the interest of Yuengling, with a view of enabling him, by deferring for five years the payment of interest, to compel the minority bondholders to sell their bonds on such terms as he might dictate, it was a corrupt and unwarranted exercise of the power of the majority.

The fact that Betz purchased the bonds in the interest of the principal stockholder of the company, and for the purpose of controlling the rights of the minority bondholders, is important only as it serves to throw light upon the bona fides of the consent and vote. He had a right to make the purchase, and, having acquired title to the bonds, succeeded to all the rights of an ordinary bondholder. Yuengling himself might have purchased them, and by doing so would have acquired the same rights. Any purchaser of the bonds was entitled to use them for the purpose of effectuating an honest consent to postpone payments due. But no purchaser could acquire any right to employ them as instruments in a conspiracy to defraud the minority bondholders.

We think the evidence upon the trial presented a question of fact for the determination of the jury, and that the trial judge erred in taking from their consideration the question of the bona fides of the consent and vote.

In conclusion it is proper to say that, inasmuch as all the property of the company is included in the trust deed securing the bonds, the plaintiff's remedy by an action at law would seem to be of little value. He would not be permitted to enforce any lien by execution to the embarrassment of the other bondholders. Pennock v. Coe, 23 How. 117, 16 L.Ed. 436; Fish v. Paper Co., 29 N.J.Eq. 16; Railroad Co. v. Woelpper, 64 Pa.St. 366; Bowen v. Railroad Co., L.R. 3 Eq. 541. The judgment is reversed.[7]

C. THE PROPERTY

NOTE

The problems which arise in considering the property covered or to be covered by a corporate mortgage are indeed manifold. They can, however, be grouped into a few helpful categories. The most important problems are those involving identification (i. e. description), time (i. e., after-acquired property), interest (i. e. lessee, conditional vendee, etc.) and quality (i. e., real estate, tangible personalty or choses in action).

Most corporate mortgages do not attempt to convey specific items of real or personal property owned by the mortgagor. Rather do they mortgage all of the assets of the corporation then or thereafter owned, whether real or personal, tangible or intangible. * * *

* * * In view of the size of the average corporation that issues a corporate mortgage, in view of the variegated types of property owned by such a corporation and subjected to the mortgage, in view of the generality of the words of description, and in view of the manner in which attack has been made, the questions presented have been legion. * * * [Some of those questions are:] What is the effect of the property to be covered being real estate or personal property? Is it real estate because attached to land or personal property even though attached to land? Does intention to remove property affect its characteristics? Is all of the property mortgaged or merely all of the property used in the pursuit of the corporate business, that is to say, all that property which goes to make the corporation a going concern? Is the property of such a character as to be capable of being mortgaged? May non-existent, "not presently contemplated" or future-acquired property be presently mortgaged? What are the rights of third persons in and to the mortgaged property? McClelland and Fisher, The Law of Corporate Mortgage Bond Issues, Callaghan and Company, 1937, p. 237.

1. AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY CLAUSE

GUARANTY TRUST CO. OF NEW YORK v. NEW YORK & QUEENS COUNTY RY. CO. et al.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1930. 253 N.Y. 190, 170 N.E. 887.

[Appeal from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the second judicial department, modifying and affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff entered upon a decision of the court on trial at Special Term.]

CARDOZO, C. J. The action is one for the foreclosure of a mortgage given in 1892 by the Steinway Railway Company to a trustee for bondholders.

The mortgagor owned and operated a street railroad in Long Island City, and the subject-matter of the mortgage was the road so owned and operated, its rolling stock and equipment, and any after-acquired property necessary or convenient for use in connection therewith.

The defendant New York & Queens County Railway Company was incorporated in 1896 to acquire by merger the Steinway line as well as other lines in neighboring communities, i. e., in Newtown, Flushing, and College Point.

Having purchased the entire capital stock of the Steinway Railway Company, it filed a certificate of merger under section 58 of the Stock Corporation Law then in force (Laws 1896, c. 932; Consol.Laws, c. 59), with the result that it became the owner of the franchise and property of the corporation so merged. It did not, however, either by covenant or by statute, assume the obligations or liabilities of the merged corporation, nor was it answerable therefor. Irvine v. New York Edison Co., 207 N.Y. 425, 101 N.E. 358, Ann.Cas.1914C, 441; Syracuse Lighting Co. v. Maryland Cas. Co., 226 N.Y. 25, 122 N.E. 723.

The shares of the Newtown Railway Company which operated a line in Newtown, the shares of the Riker Avenue & Sanford's Point Company, and the shares of the Flushing & College Point Company, as well as the property and franchises of the Long Island & Newtown Railroad Company, were acquired at or about the same time.

The New York & Queens County Railway thereupon executed its first consolidated mortgage to a trustee, subject to the underlying mortgages on the constituent lines, the new mortgage covering the property then owned by the mortgagor or thereafter to be acquired.

The present controversy is one between the trustee of the Steinway mortgage on the one side, and on the other side the maker and the trustee of the consolidated mortgage, the former contending that certain after-acquired properties are subject to the lien of the Steinway mortgage, and the others that they are free from that lien and subject only to the lien of the consolidated mortgage. The chief properties so acquired are the Purvis Street substation, the Woodside car barns and contiguous tracks, the Borden Avenue office building, and rolling stock, tools, supplies, and miscellaneous equipment. * * *

A mortgage of property to be acquired in the future is not a present lien at law. Rochester Distilling Co. v. Rasey, 142 N.Y. 570, 37 N.E. 632, 40 Am.St.Rep. 635. It is, however, equivalent to a covenant to give a lien, and as such, when the property comes into existence, may be specifically enforced in equity. Kribbs v. Alford, 120 N.Y. 519, 24 N.E. 811. In the absence of intervening equities forbidding such a use, the property, when acquired, is deemed to feed the mortgage, as if in existence at the beginning. Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H.L.Cas. 191; Zartman v. First Nat. Bank of Waterloo, 189 N.Y. 267, 82 N.E. 127, 12 L.R.A.,N.S., 1083. There is need to distinguish, however, between the enforcement of the covenant in respect of property thereafter acquired by the mortgagor itself, and property thereafter acquired by a successor or a purchaser. Property thereafter acquired by the mortgagor itself will be subject to the mortgage, if within the description of the covenant, however, alien it may be in quality or function to the property presently subjected to the lien. People's Trust Co. v. Schenck, 195 N.Y. 398, 88 N.E. 647, 133 Am.St.Rep. 807; Ithaca Trust Co. v. Ithaca Traction Corp., 248 N.Y. 322, 162 N.E. 93. It is otherwise in respect of purchasers, and even at times successors. To spread the lien of the mortgage to property acquired by these, there must be an independent ground of duty. This may have its origin in a statute or in a covenant of assumption or in the principles of estoppel or accession, or in some other kindred equity. Trust Co. of America v. City of Rhinelander, Wis., C.C., 182 F. 64, 69; Metropolitan Trust Co. of City of New York v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co., C.C.A., 253 F. 868, certiorari denied 248 U.S. 586, 39 S.Ct. 184, 63 L.Ed. 434. In the case at hand the covenant as to acquisitions is sweeping in its terms, embracing anything "necessary or convenient" for the operation of the road. By its terms also it is to apply to such property when acquired by the mortgagor's "successors" as well as by the mortgagor itself. The problem to be solved is the effect to be given to a covenant so phrased in its application to a railroad succeeding through merger to the franchise of another.

At the outset there is need to consider the meaning of the term "successors." A covenant by a corporation for itself and "its successors" is like a covenant by a natural person for himself, "his executors and administrators." It adds nothing of substance, for it is the expression of an obligation that if not stated would be implied. Matter of Buccini v. Paterno Const. Co., 253 N.Y. 256, 170 N.E. 910;

Kernochan v. Murray, 111 N.Y. 306, 308, 18 N.E. 868, 2 L.R.A. 183, 7 Am.St.Rep. 744; Chancellor v. Bell, 45 N.J.Eq. 538, 541, 17 A. 684; Overseers of Poor of City of Boston v. Sears, 22 Pick., Mass., 122, 126; Cumberland Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Aramingo M. E. Church, 13 Phila., Pa., 171, 172; 8 Halsbury Laws of England, pp. 371, 372. In like manner, a covenant by a corporation extending the lien of a mortgage to property thereafter acquired by its "successors" is not an attempt to impose the continuing burden of the covenant in respect of future acquisitions upon a new corporation that is merely a purchaser. It is directed to future acquisitions by those successor corporations that preserve or continue the corporate persona (Mississippi Valley Trust Co. v. Southern Trust Co., C.C.A., 261 F. 765), much as the heir in the Roman law continued the persona of the ancestor (Holmes, The Common Law, p. 343), and in our own system the executor continues for the most part as universal successor the persona of a testator (Holmes, The Common Law, pp. 344, 345, 350; Holmes, Executors, 9 Harv.L. Rev. 42; Collected Legal Papers, pp. 141, 143; Holdsworth, History of English Law, vol. 3, pp. 573, 583). How far the covenant is effective even then as to land or other property subsequently acquired must depend upon the statutes that regulate dissolution or succession.

At the present time in New York a possessor corporation, i. e., one which merges another through the purchase of its shares of stock, "shall be deemed to have assumed all the liabilities and obligations of the merged corporation and shall be, liable in the same manner as if it had itself incurred such liabilities and obligations." Stock Corporation Law, § 85, subd. 2. The same assumption of obligations and liabilities results where there has been a consolidation of two or more corporations as distinguished from a merger. Sections 86, 90. But in 1896, at the time of the absorption of the Steinway line, the consequences flowing from merger were sharply differentiated from those flowing from consolidation. The subject was fully considered in Irvine v. New York Edison Co., supra. The merged corporation was not dissolved, but continued to exist in so far as its existence was necessary for the protection of its creditors. Its property was subject at their pursuit to execution or sequestration in appropriate proceedings, equitable or legal. On the other hand, the new or possessor corporation was not charged with any duty to the creditors except to the extent of holding the property thus acquired in subjection to their claims. It did not gather unto itself and thereafter embody and continue an existing corporate life. It was not bound by the covenants of the merged corporation, nor did it assume them as its own. It was not in the proper sense of the term a successor, but rather an assignee or a purchaser. All this was settled law. If in the case at hand the mortgagor's covenant is enforceable against the merging corporation in respect of property acquired after the merger, it must be by force of some principle of estoppel or of accession, or some other kindred equity. It cannot be by force of any duty of assumption, contractual or statutory.

An attempt is made to relate the obligation to the principle of estoppel. * * *

* * * What has been written is no denial that the new owner will be charged if the circumstances of the transaction are sufficient to bind him by an estoppel (that is, an estoppel by deed, for there is clearly none in pais), just as he may be bound in other circumstances by a covenant of assumption. Foley and Pogue After-Acquired Property under Conflicting Corporate Indentures, 13 Minn.L.Rev. 94, 95. What is meant is merely this: That the acceptance of a deed subject to such a mortgage of record does not avail without more to give rise to the estoppel, for the mortgage to that extent is invalid and inoperative. The buyer takes the land cum onere in the sense that he must carry out the covenant as to after-acquired property in so far as it was already specifically enforceable against the seller by force of acquisitions prior to the purchase. He does not take it cum onere in the sense that he must carry out the covenant in respect of acquisitions, not within the principle of accession, made thereafter by himself. The distinction is clearly marked in Ithaca Trust Co. v. Ithaca Traction Corp., supra, where a separate power house acquired by a reorganized corporation was held to be free from the lien of an underlying mortgage, though power contracts previously acquired were part of the security. If Citizens' Savings & Trust Co. v. Cincinnati & Dayton Traction Co., 106 Ohio St. 577, 140 N.E. 380, may seem to involve a holding to the contrary, we are to remember that under the statutes of Ohio governing the consolidation of corporations (Ohio General Code, § 9038), "debts, liabilities, and duties of either company, thenceforth shall attach to the new company, and be enforced against it to the same extent as if such debts, liabilities, and duties had been contracted by it." 106 Ohio St. at page 597, 140 N.E. 380, 386, and cf. Foley and Pogue, 13 Minn.L.Rev. 81, 91. The case, therefore, was one of assumption of the mortgage and its covenants by virtue of a statutory duty (cf. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Missouri Pac. Co., 115 U.S. 587, 594, 595, 6 S.Ct. 194, 29 L.Ed. 499), and not a case of such assumption through the operation of estoppel. True indeed it is that even where the duty has a statutory origin, improvements and extensions must be segregated to the lines to which they are appropriately related, since only thus can conflict be avoided between after-acquired property clauses in underlying mortgages of equal generality; accretions must still be marshaled according to their nature. On the other hand, the range of extension in such circumstances, is spread beyond the limits that confine it when there is no duty of assumption, either contractual or statutory.

If estoppel is inadequate to enlarge the subject-matter of the mortgage, there is yet to be considered whether enlargement can be accomplished by force of the principle of accession. Accession as a source of title is quite distinct from the operation of a covenant for after-acquired property. 13 Minn.L.Rev. at pages 93, 94. Even in the absence of such a covenant the lien of a mortgage upon a railroad will extend to accretions such as fixtures that are physically united with the subject-matter of the mortgage, and to accretions that may be classified as appurtenances, where the bond of union is organic rather than corporeal. Not only that, but the nature of railroad property will cause the principle of accession to be liberally applied, so that things not strictly fixtures, and interests not strictly incorporeal hereditaments, may be brought within the principle as if they were fixtures or appurtenances under a narrow definition. This at least will be assumed, though the assumption has been questioned. 13 Minn.L.Rev. 93, 94. * * *

The principle of accession, however liberally interpreted, cannot bring within the mortgage the power house and the barn. We put aside for the moment the extension of the mortgage to rolling stock, supplies, and miscellaneous equipment. The power house and the barn are built upon land not owned by the merged corporations or any of them at the time of the merger. What is even more important, they serve the uses, not only of the Steinway line, but of all the other lines that have been operated since the merger by the merging corporation. Each road has been subject from the beginning to its own independent mortgage with after-acquired property clauses substantially the same. In these circumstances there is no more reason for holding the new buildings to be accessions to one road than for holding them accessions to the others. If accessions to one, they must have been accessions to all, and this in uncertain proportions, fluctuating from year to year with the extent and nature of the use. Title by accession imports something more, however, than an executory right to acquire a lien or interest in the future through the judgment of a court of equity. It imports a lien or interest presently valid alike in equity and at law. If the use of the power house and the barn for the benefit of the merged lines gives any interest at all to the underlying mortgagees, it is at most a right to compel the creation of a lien in equitable proportions as an incident to the jurisdiction to enforce the specific performance of a covenant. The reasons have already been stated why the covenant is unenforceable against an assignee or a purchaser as to later acquisitions. If those reasons are valid and the property is not subject to an equitable mortgage through the operation of the covenant, the gap cannot be bridged and the difficulty avoided by rejecting the covenant in form and enforcing it under a new name, either accession or something else. What is involved is more fundamental than adherence to a ritual.

Since neither estoppel nor accession will extend the underlying lien to the power house or barn, it remains to be considered whether there is to be discovered some other equity whereby the extension can be justified. We are told that such an equity exists in the necessity of providing the underlying mortgagees with a substituted security as compensation for what was lost when the barn and the power house were abandoned or dismantled. Withhold this security, it is said, and through the action of the merging corporation the subject-matter of the mortgage will have become a mere shell, a railway without power to move cars, without cars to be moved, and without barns in which to store cars. Granting, though provisionally only, that these consequences, if real, would supply the foundation of an equity, the assumption of their existence has its origin in a misconception of the facts. The Steinway mortgage was either a lien on the new power house and the new barn at the time of their construction, or it was never a lien at all. If it was not a lien at that time, then the lien of the new consolidated mortgage attached eo instanti for the benefit of the consolidated mortgage bondholders, and the plaintiff, to prevail, must be able to show that the lien thus attaching has been divested or subordinated. But plainly there was no impairment of the security of the underlying Steinway mortgage, no reduction of the Steinway line to the state of an empty shell, when the lands for the new barn and the new power house were acquired by the merging corporation and the new buildings were erected. The land for the new barn was acquired in 1896, and the work of construction completed a short time thereafter. The old barn was not destroyed, and upon a sale of the Steinway line at that time under a judgment of foreclosure it would have gone to the purchaser along with the line itself. Indeed, it will go even now, for the tools, and the tools only, have been taken from the shops, which were already out of date. The new power house was acquired and put in operation in 1908, but for nearly a year thereafter the machinery in the old power house was oiled and kept in good condition, with the result that a buyer at a foreclosure sale at that time would have become the owner of the line intact, equipped for present use. The old power house is still there, but the machinery has been sold as junk, and the proceeds, about $14,000, have been allocated to the reduction of the Steinway lien. In the meantime, however, before the machinery was scrapped, the lien of the consolidated mortgage had attached to the new improvements, there being nothing in the purchase of the land or the construction of the buildings that made it necessary to destroy or remove any part of the security. Very likely the trustee for the Steinway bondholders might have enjoined the merging corporation from wasting the security by the later removal of any part of the old equipment. No such injunction was sought, not improbably for the reason that the bondholders had more to gain from economy of operation by a consolidated company and the application of the income to the payment of interest on the bonds than from the preservation of tools and machinery in the contingency at some distant time of a sale under foreclosure. At all events, the line was not a shell when the newly-acquired property came under the lien of the consolidated deed of trust. During a substantial period thereafter, it was maintained, not only with its own power house and barn, but with equipment and machinery properly kept up. For any loss that has been suffered through the removal at a later time of this equipment and machinery, the plaintiff had its remedy, equitable or legal. Even now it does not show the relation between the value of the equipment and machinery and the value of the land and buildings, part of the old line. The failure of the Steinway bondholders or of the plaintiff as their spokesman to take advantage of remedies, preventive or reparative, did not divest a lien in favor of the consolidated bondholders attaching in the interval.

What has been written as to the lien upon the power house and the barn supplies the answer to the question as to the liens upon the rolling stock, supplies, and miscellaneous equipment. In respect of the liens upon the rolling stock, the appeal is by the plaintiff, the trustee for the Steinway bondholders; in respect of the tools, supplies, and miscellaneous equipment, the appeal is by the Bankers' Trust Company, the trustee for the bondholders under the consolidated mortgage. The cars in use by the merged lines at the date of the merger are no longer in existence. The cars now in existence were bought by merging corporation, and with the exception of nineteen cars which were subjected to the Steinway lien were never allocated to any special line, but were used indiscriminately for all. In the absence of a covenant, the merging corporation did not subject the new cars thus indiscriminately used to the underlying liens. New York Security & Trust Co. v. Louisville & St. L. & Consol. R. Co., supra, at page 398, of 102 F.; Mississippi Valley Trust Co. v. Southern Trust Co., supra [C. C.A., 261 F. 765]; Metropolitan Trust Co. of City of New York v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co., supra, at page 878 of 253 F.; Hinchman v. Point Defiance Ry. Co., 14 Wash. 349, 44 P. 867; United States v. New Orleans & O. R. Co., 12 Wall. 362, 20 L.Ed. 434. The situation might be different if they had been allocated specifically or even chiefly to the use of a particular road. Commercial Trust Co. v. Chattanooga Ry. & L. Co., supra [D.C., 281 F. 856]. There is no need to dwell upon the difference, for the defendant trust company does not appeal from the segregation to the plaintiff of the cars appropriated to its use by the act of the receivers.

On the other hand, the application of the same principle that excludes the cars generally forbids the subjection of the tools, supplies, and miscellaneous equipment to the lien of the underlying mortgages, and requires a modification of the judgment, on the appeal of the Bankers' Trust Company, by declaring them to be subject to the prior and superior lien of the consolidated mortgage.

The property 7 and 9 Borden avenue was correctly held to be within the coverage of the Steinway mortgage, since title thereto was taken in the name of the Steinway company, without reservation or condition.

The land, the buildings, and the equipment, the subject of this controversy, were paid for with moneys supplied by the consolidated mortgage bondholders. Without the aid of those moneys the unified operation of the lines would have been impossible, and the underlying bondholders would have lost the benefit of economies and facilities incidental to the merger. As a consequence of the merger, or at least as its sequel, foreclosure has been warded off for upwards of twenty-five years, and an income has been earned from which interest has been paid on the underlying obligations.

From the viewpoint of economics, the furtherance of business interests, there have thus arisen equities in favor of the consolidated bondholders that may not be ignored altogether in determining their equities from the viewpoint of the law. To the extent that improvements, though made upon newly-acquired lands through the use of the new loan, have been charged with a lien, declared with reasonable clarity, in favor of underlying mortgage bondholders, the courts will give effect, through the remedy of specific performance, to the ensuing equitable right. On the other hand, the advantages incidental to merger and consolidation would be discouraged, and new loans would be precarious, if less than reasonable clarity were exacted as a condition of subordination and extension.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be modified by declaring the tools, supplies, and miscellaneous equipment to be subject to a prior lien in favor of the trustee under the consolidated mortgage, and as modified affirmed without costs to either party.

Judgment accordingly.[1]

NOTE

(A) It seems clear that nowadays a corporation has the general power to mortgage after-acquired property, a power which need not be asserted in its charter. Quasi public corporations have had this power granted without question; in fact, the right to mortgage after-acquired property has sometimes been stated to be confined only to such class of corporations. However, there seems to be no logical reason for this distinction and the power to mortgage such property has been generally extended to business corporations. Of course, to cover after-acquired property, the mortgage should contain words of futurity or language showing clearly the intention to impose a lien upon such property. * * *

The form of description commonly used in corporate mortgages refers to after-acquired property in quite general terms. Rather than construing these clauses in the broad sense used by the draftsman, the courts have imposed several limitations upon them. The first of such limitations is that only that type of property which is mentioned in the other descriptive phrases in the mortgage will be considered as included. * * *

* * * Hence, most corporate mortgages describe in minutest detail all of the various types of property that may be subsequently owned by the corporate mortgagor. While it is generally true that a mortgage is read as a whole in determining what property is covered thereby, a mortgage of property by general description, when no particular property is referred to, will neither confer any title to, nor create any lien upon, similar property acquired thereafter. Conversely, where a mortgage fails to describe certain property then owned by the mortgagor, an after-acquired property clause will not be construed to create a lien on such property. * * *

The case of Morrill v. Noyes has suggested two other rules which are of particular help in considering the problem of after-acquired property: 'The contract must relate to some particular property described therein, which, though not in existence, must be reasonably certain of coming into existence, so that the minds of the parties may be in agreement as to what it is to be. * * * Second, the mortgagor must have a present actual interest in it or concerning it. There must be something in praesenti of which the thing in futuro is to be the product or with which it is to be connected as necessary for its use or as expedient to it constituting a tangible, existing basis for the contract.' For example, it has been held that the words, 'intending hereby to include all its present real and personal estate and franchises, now owned or hereafter to be acquired, without any exception or reservation,' in a railroad mortgage are too indefinite to cover after-acquired property not otherwise described. Similarly, the words 'all other machinery, plants, tools and equipment which the company may hereafter acquire' do not bring under a mortgage a tract of land used for the business of the corporation but located miles distant from its factory. * * *

See, also, Foley and Pogue, After-Acquired Property under Conflicting Corporate Mortgage Indentures, 1929, 13 Minn.L.Rev. 81; Hamilton, Future Property Clauses in Corporate Mortgages, 1930, 4 Temple L.Q. 131; Goodbar, Conflicting Corporate Mortgage Indentures and After-Acquired Property, 1932, 12 B.U.L.Rev. 648; Klooster, Mortgages of After-Acquired Railroad Property, 1933, 27 Ill.L.Rev. 781; Developments in the Law—Corporations—1931, 1932, 45 Harv.L.Rev. 1374, 1403; Notes, Effect of After-Acquired Clause on Property Later Acquired under Charter Amendment, 1936, 49 Harv.L.Rev. 947; 1932, 41 Yale L.J. 466; 1941, 39 Mich.L.Rev. 503.

The converse of the above limitation is also true, i. e., that property which the mortgagor has no power to accept at the time a mortgage is executed is not included in the lien of an after-acquired property is not in contemplation or not in existence at the date of the mortgage is no reason why the property, when acquired, should not pass under such mortgage. * * *

A further limitation imposed upon the after-acquired property clause is that the property acquired must be necessary or proper for the business of the mortgagor as of the time the mortgage was executed, or must be usable in replacing such property. * * *

* * * Such limitation is not burdensome, for, in most cases, the purchasers of a bond issue, aware that the value of a corporate property to a large extent depends upon its use as a going concern, require only that the mortgage shall cover such after-acquired property as is used in connection with or for the purposes of the business. McClelland and Fisher, The Law of Corporate Mortgage Bond Issues, Callaghan and Company, 1937, pp. 317-324.

(B) A mortgage intended to cover after-acquired property can only attach itself to such property in the condition in which it comes into the mortgagor's hands. If that property is already subject to mortgages or other liens, the general mortgage does not displace them, although they may be junior to it in point of time. It only attaches to such interest as the mortgagor acquires; and if he purchase property and give a mortgage for the purchase money, the deed which he receives and the mortgage which he gives are regarded as one transaction, and no general lien impending over him, whether in the shape of a general mortgage, or judgment, or recognizance, can displace such mortgage for purchase money. And in such cases a failure to register the mortgage for purchase money makes no difference. It does not come within the reason of the registry laws. These laws are intended for the protection of the subsequent, not prior, purchasers and creditors. United States v. New Orleans Railroad, 12 Wall. 362, 365, 20 L.Ed. 434, 1871. See, also, 1941, 39 Mich.L.Rev. 503.

(C) An after-acquired property clause in a mortgage prevents a corporation from doing any future financing except with junior mortgages. In order to circumvent such a clause, the following devices have been used: (1) purchase money mortgage; (2) organizing a subsidiary to take title to later acquired property; (3) consolidation. A suggestion is made that "the court may distinguish the effect (of a broad after-acquired property clause) upon acquisitions made by virtue of corporate powers existing at the date of the mortgage from its operation upon property acquired under subsequent charter amendments. As to the latter, a security interest may be denied even against a subsequent general creditor, while at the same time it will be recognized as to the former on principles of specific performance." VIII, esp. 163–174 (same appears Subsidiary Corporations and Credit Manipulation, 1928, 41 Harv.L.Rev. 874); Dewing, The Financial Policy of Corporations, 4th Ed., 1941, Vol. I, 202–203; Montgomery, Financial Handbook, 2d Ed., 1933, 435; Blair, The Allocation of After-Acquired Mortgaged Property Among Rival Claimants, 1926, 40 Harv.L.Rev. 222; Notes, 1924, 24 Col.L.Rev. 523; 1935, 7 Rocky Mt.L.Rev. 264.

2. INCOME CLAUSE

Almost all trust indentures mortgaging physical property convey the described property "together with the rents, issues, tolls, revenues, income and profits thereof." This is generally coupled with a defeasance clause permitting the mortgagor until default to operate the business, collect the income and apply it to current expenses. Obviously, this is a form of mortgage of after-acquired property, because the income is not in being at the date of the mortgage. Whether or not the granting clause contains this language, such an indenture will invariably provide that upon the happening of a default the trustee may enter upon the mortgaged property, operate it and take the net income for the benefit of the bondholders. As a practical matter, the trustee exercises its right to enter by applying to the court for the appointment of a receiver in foreclosure. Some indentures therefore provide in addition that in any suit to foreclose, the trustee shall be entitled to the appointment of a receiver as a matter of right. Most jurisdictions will enforce this clause specifically: e. g. N. Y. Gen. Corp. Law, § 150; Guaranty Trust Co. v. Feldman, 247 Mich. 524, 226 N.W. 233 (1929). A few jurisdictions however hold that the clause purporting to confer the privilege of appointing a receiver as a contractual right is void as against public policy; thereby the mortgagor is permitted to retain possession until the period of the equity of redemption has expired: e. g. Teal v. Walker, 111 U.S. 242, 4 S.Ct. 420 (1884).

The interesting feature about the mortgage of income is that, despite the broad language of the granting clause of the mortgage, the courts generally will not enforce the right of the trustee to get income which accrued prior to the date of the appointment of a receiver in foreclosure or, in a bankruptcy case where foreclosure is enjoined, prior to the entry of an order "impounding" the income for the benefit of the bondholders. This rule applies even though the foreclosure receiver, when he goes into possession, may find considerable cash in the bank, the obvious source of which was income of the mortgaged property. Nor is there any distinction in applying the rule as to income earned prior to default (American Bridge Co. v. Heidelbach, 94 U.S. 798 (1876)) and income earned between the date of default and the date of the appointment of a receiver (Galveston R. R. v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall., 459 (U.S.1870) 93 U.S. 352 (1876)). Thus a receiver appointed on a general creditors' bill would hold the income for the benefit of general creditors. When a junior mortgagee intervenes and has the receivership extended to his foreclosure suit, he is entitled to the income. From the date of intervention by the senior mortgagee, the receiver is accountable to him: Sullivan v. Rosson, 223 N.Y. 217, 119 N.E. 405 (1918).

The modern corporate indenture is drawn in recognition of these rules, despite the fact that Chapter X of the Bankruptcy Act has made foreclosure an outmoded remedy. The indenture trustee will at the earliest practicable moment seek an order of the Bankruptcy Court directing that the bankruptcy trustee operate the mortgaged property for account of the indenture trustee and the bondholders, to the end that should reorganization fail, the bondholders' security will not be impaired in the interim. Suppose, however, that the operation has been conducted at a deficit. Under the old cases the mortgagee was not chargeable with that deficit if he had not sought the appointment of a foreclosure receiver (MacGregor v. Johnson-Cowdin-Emmerich, 31 F.2d 270 (C.C.A.2d, 1929)). This point has not been decided under the bankruptcy statutes. See generally, Israels & Kramer, The Significance of the Income Clause in a Corporate Mortgage (1930) 30 Col.Law Rev. 489.

3. NEGATIVE PLEDGE CLAUSE

INDENTURE JUNE 1, 1938, THE MOUNTAIN STATES TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY AND THE CHASE NATIONAL BANK OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK (AS TRUSTEE), ART. 2.

SECTION 4. Except in the case of purchase-money mortgages and liens, if the Telephone Company shall at any time mortgage, pledge or otherwise subject to any lien the whole or any part of any property or assets now owned or hereafter acquired by it, it will secure the debentures outstanding hereunder ratably with the indebtedness or obligations secured by such mortgage, pledge or lien; provided, however, in case of a consolidation or merger of the Telephone Company with or into any other corporation which shall execute an instrument with the Trustee as provided in Section 2 of Article Nine, or a sale or conveyance of the property of the Telephone Company as an entirety or substantially as an entirety to any such corporation, this covenant shall not apply to any property or assets of such successor corporation, except (a) physical property, franchises and securities acquired from the Telephone Company, (b) improvements and additions to, and renewals and replacements of, any physical property so acquired, (c) franchises in substitution for, or renewal of, any franchises so acquired, and (d) securities issued in substitution or exchange for securities so acquired; and provided, further, that this covenant shall not apply to the making of any deposit or pledge with any governmental agency at any time required by law in order to qualify the Telephone Company to conduct its business or any part thereof or in order to entitle it to maintain self insurance or to obtain the benefits of any law relating to workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance, old age pensions or other social security, or with any court, board, or commission as security incident to the proper conduct of any proceeding before such court, board or commission. Subject to the provisions of Section 6 of this Article, nothing herein contained shall prevent a subsidiary of the Telephone Company from mortgaging, pledging or subjecting to any lien property or assets whether or not acquired by such subsidiary from the Telephone Company.

SECTION 5. If, upon any consolidation or merger of the Telephone Company with or into any other corporation, or upon any sale or conveyance of the property of the Telephone Company as an entirety or substantially as an entirety to any other corporation, any of the property or assets of the Telephone Company would thereupon become subject to any mortgage, pledge or lien, the Telephone Company, prior to such consolidation, merger, sale or conveyance will secure the debentures outstanding hereunder by a direct lien on all such property or assets of the Telephone Company, prior to all liens other than any theretofore existing thereon.

SECTION 6. For the purposes of this Section 6, the word "securities" means stock, bonds, debentures, notes, and all other indebtedness (whether or not evidenced by any bond, debenture, note or other written instrument) arising from borrowing or otherwise, except indebtedness (other than that arising from borrowing) incurred in the ordinary course of business; and the term "wholly-owned telephone corporation" means an operating telephone company of which the Telephone Company owns all the outstanding securities which such corporation may have issued, incurred, assumed or guaranteed, excepting only securities held by the trustee of any pension fund established by such corporation, and shares necessary to qualify its directors.

The Telephone Company covenants:

(a) that it will not sell or otherwise dispose of all or substantially all of its telephone plant in one or more states, except to a wholly-owned telephone corporation;

(b) that it will not sell or otherwise dispose of any securities issued, incurred, assumed or guaranteed by any wholly-owned telephone corporation, except to such corporation itself, or to qualify its directors;

(c) that no wholly-owned telephone corporation will sell or otherwise dispose of all or substantially all of its telephone plant in one or more states, except to the Telephone Company;

(d) that no wholly-owned telephone corporation will issue, incur, sell or otherwise dispose of any of its own securities, except to the Telephone Company, or to the trustee of any pension fund established by such wholly-owned telephone corporation, or to qualify its directors; and

(e) that no wholly-owned telephone corporation will assume or guarantee any securities of any other person or corporation, except securities held by the Telephone Company;—

if, in any such case, immediately thereafter, the principal amount of all outstanding bonds, debentures, notes, and other indebtedness (whether of not evidenced by any bond, debenture, note or other written instrument) arising from borrowing or otherwise, except indebtedness (other than that arising from borrowing) incurred in the ordinary course of business, issued, incurred, assumed or guaranteed by the Telephone Company would exceed an amount equal to 35% of the amount of the telephone Company's gross investment in telephone plant of all wholly-owned telephone corporations then existing, all as shown by the accounts of the Telephone Company and of such corporations. The aforesaid provisions shall not restrict the amount of bonds, debentures, notes or other indebtedness which may be issued, incurred, assumed or guaranteed by the Telephone Company.

PART V

MANAGEMENT AND OPERATION

MANAGEMENT

Corporation laws and corporate charters contemplate the creation of a clearly defined management group. This comprises the Board of Directors, which in turn selects the senior officers, and gives to these officers general or limited power. The stockholders may lay down ground rules by adopting By-Laws determining the number of directors, the method by which they shall act, and the powers which may be conferred on the officers. The persons who accept office under this arrangement assume the responsibilities of management by the very fact of their holding office.

It has been common to refer to this group as the "titular management", the individuals who have the power and the right to manage by election on choice.

Yet others may and frequently do "manage" corporations. Thus a single stockholder (perhaps a parent of a subsidiary corporation, or one individual owning enough stock to control the annual elections) can dictate who shall be the directors and officers; can choose men responsible to his will; and can, if he desires, direct their actions as managers. This is not his right; but it is his power. In consequence, though not titulary managers, such persons may become managers in fact; and, as will be seen, the law recognizes the existence of a "dominant" stockholder.

Conceivably other persons may likewise put themselves in a position to dominate management—for instance, a creditors' committee; possibly the licensor of a patent; conceivably even a political boss or racketeer. Any of these may acquire power to dictate management acts and policies; and may factually use it. Do they also become "managers", or subject to the rules restricting and effecting those holding management responsibilities?

Finally, certain limited powers are reserved to stockholders acting as stockholders—for instance, the right to dissolve the corporation. This is, in a sense, an act of management—one of the few which stockholders as such may perform by vote. In these instances, is a majority of shareholders affected by the limitations thrown around "management"? Or may they coldly take the position that, since they own the stock, they may vote it for any reason, including a bad one, irrespective of the effect their vote may have on other shareholders?

The law of titular management responsibility is well developed. The application of that law to non-titular management, that is to persons who have acquired the power to manage, and who have used that power, is relatively new, and develops with each succeeding fact-situation.

NOTE

(A) In the relatively small individual proprietorship, the owner-manager is clearly the business leader. He is the one whose decisions determine directly the course of his firm's operations, and his active leadership and the risk-taking inherent in owning a business were the two standard elements traditionally attributed by economists to the entrepreneur. In the large corporation, however, these two elements have to be separated. Positive leadership is not generally performed by those who, through ownership, risk their property and receive profits. The situation is made even more complex by the fact that the leadership elements have become diffused among a hierarchy of salaried executives, directors, stockholders, and sometimes one or more outside groups.

Business leadership must be exercised in an economic system characterized by large corporate units as well as in a system in which small-scale business predominates. The fact that the legal owners (that is, holders of stock) have to a very large degree been eliminated from active leadership does not in any way obviate the necessity for the performance of the leadership function. In fact, the need for the function becomes greater the larger enterprises become. It is true, however, that when we attempt to apply the concept of business leadership to the large corporation, we encounter serious complications, and a concept that seemed clear-cut becomes vague and difficult of application. The chief problem arises from the fact that authority and responsibility in the large firm are divided among different men, and in a number of different ways.

In the large corporation, the following groups may participate, in varying ways, in business leadership:

1. Stockholders, who are nominally responsible for selecting directors, but who in practice may have no influence either in choosing them or in making any other important business decisions.

2. Various outside groups—bondholders, bankers, and so on—whose power may be great enough to give them a voice in selecting directors or otherwise influencing those responsible for decision-making.

3. The board of directors, which may be entirely passive, may select executives but otherwise make no decisions and exercise no real veto power, or may regularly share with executives in making important decisions.

4. The top executives, who are chiefly responsible for the formulation of the more important decisions, the choice of subordinates, and the creation and maintenance of an adequate organization.

5. Minor executives, who administer the broad policies laid down at the top and, as a part of such administration, formulate decisions of a scope narrower than those handed down to them by the top executives.

Thus the function of business leadership becomes divided through a process of vertical division that we call "delegation." The process is further complicated by the horizontal division which takes place. On the same plane of authority the making of decisions may be shared by two or more persons, acting either as a group or in their individual capacities. For example, whatever decisions are made by the board of directors are likely to be made by two or more men, though not necessarily by the board as a whole. Further, though one executive may be formally the chief operating officer, major policies may actually be formulated jointly by himself and one or more other executives of prominence in the company. Similarly, many operating policies in large concerns are formulated today by committees rather than by single individuals. This horizontal division occurs again when policy formation is specialized at a given level of authority. Thus the president may make the important operating decisions; a committee of the board or the chairman of the finance committee may have control over major financial decisions. Neither can be considered subordinate to the other, though the board may view the financial decisions as being of greater importance than those affecting production or sales. At a lower level of authority we have "vice presidents in charge of" anything from production to public relations.

This complicated situation has been the despair of those economists who have considered at all the problem of leadership in the large corporation. There is no general agreement as to how the function of business leadership should be defined or as to who performs this function in the large corporation. We shall not concern ourselves with the problem of which words should be applied to which concepts. The indisputable fact is that business is still being led and controlled and that the co-ordination of production toward desired ends is still taking place. If business leadership has disappeared as a single unified function, we must nevertheless discover how the necessary business decisions are made in this complex situation.

Our key to handling this problem will be to find out who in fact make the various decisions and policies which we include in the leadership function. We shall consider the men actually making these decisions as exercising some part of business leadership—regardless of whether higher up in the hierarchy of nominal authority there is some one else who could hire or fire this person or could make these decisions himself if he so chose. Business leadership consists, then, at least in part, of actually making certain broad decisions which determine the general nature of the firm's activities. R. A. Gordon, Business Leadership in the Large Corporation, (1945) 46–49.

(B) Let us take a hypothetical and over-simplified example in order to make more precise what is meant by "management" and to separate this off from other ideas which are often grouped with it. We will let our example be an imaginary automobile company. In connection with the ownership, control, and management situation in relation to this company, we may distinguish the following four groups:

1. Certain individuals—the operating executives, production managers, plant superintendents, and their associates—have charge of the actual technical process of producing. It is their job to organize the materials, tools, machines, plant facilities, equipment, and labor in such a way as to turn out the automobiles. These are the individuals whom I call "the managers."

It should be observed that the area of production which any group of them manages is most variable. It may be a single small factory or mine or a single department within a factory. Or it may be a large number of factories, mines, railroads, and so on, as in the case of the chief managers of the great United States corporations. In theory the area could be extended to cover an entire interrelated branch of industry (automobiles, mines, utilities, railroads, whatever it might be) or most, or even all, of the entire mechanism of production. In practice in the United States at present, however, there do not exist managers in this sense for whole branches of industry (with possibly one or two exceptions), much less for a major portion or all of industry as a whole. The organization and co-ordination of industry as a whole is carried on through the instrumentality of "the market," without deliberate and explicit management exercised by specific managers, or indeed, by anyone else.

2. Certain individuals (among whom, in the United States at present, would ordinarily be found the highest ranked and best paid of the company officials) have the functions of guiding the company toward a profit; of selling the automobiles at a price and in the most suitable numbers for yielding a profit; of bargaining over prices paid for raw materials and labor; of arranging the terms of the financing of the company; and so on. These functions are often also called those of "management" and those who fulfill them, "managers." However, there is clearly no necessary connection between them and the first type of function. From the point of view of the technical process of production, a car would be neither worse nor better because of what it sold for (it could be given away and still be the same car, technically speaking) or what the materials which went into it cost; nor, so far as technical problems go, does the difference between bank loans at 4% or 5% show up in the power of the motor, or a change in dividend rate alter the strength of the frame.

In order to distinguish this group from the first, I shall call the individuals who make it up "finance-executives" or simply "executives," reserving the terms "management" and "managers" for the first group only.

3. Certain individuals (among whom in the United States at present would be many of the directors of the company and more particularly the bankers and big financiers who actually appoint the directors) have problems different from either of the first types. Their direct concern is not, or need not be, either the technical process of production or even the profit of the particular company. Through holding companies, interlocking directorates, banks, and other devices, they are interested in the financial aspects not merely of this automobile company but of many other companies and many market operations. They may wish to unite this company with others, in order perhaps to sell a stock or bond issue to the public, independently of the effect of the merger on the technical process of production or on the profits of our original company. They may want, for tax or speculative or other reasons, to lower the profit of this company, and could do so, by, for example, raising prices charged by supply companies which they also were interested in. They may want to put some competitors out of business or influence politics or inflate prices; and any of such aims might be altogether independent of the requirements of production or profit in the particular automobile company. Any number of variants is possible. I shall call this third group the "finance-capitalists."

4. Finally there are certain individuals (a comparatively large number as a rule in the United States at present) who own in their names stock certificates in the automobile company and who are formally and legally the "owners" of our company. In fact, however, the great bulk of them, comprising in sum the legal "owners" of the substantial majority of the stock of the company, have an entirely passive relation to the company. The only right they possess with reference to the company is to receive, as against those who do not have stock certificates registered in their names, money in the form of dividends when on occasion dividends are declared by the directors.

This four-fold separation into "managers," "executives," "finance-capitalists," and "stockholders" is, in reality, a separation of function of four of the types of relation in which it is possible to stand toward a certain section of the instruments of production. It is theoretically possible, therefore, that one and the same individual, or one and the same group of individuals, should perform all four of these functions, should stand in all four of these relations to the instruments of production in question (in our hypothetical case, the tangible assets of the automobile company). That is, one and the same individual (Henry Ford, as of some years ago, was a late and favorite example) or group of individuals could manage the production of the company, direct its policy so as to make a profit, integrate its activities in relation to banks and to other companies (if such were in question), and be the sole stockholder of the company. Not only is such an identity possible: until comparatively recently, it was normally the case.

Today, however, it is seldom the case, especially in the more important sections of industry. The four functions are much more sharply differentiated than in the past; and they are, as a rule, performed by different sets of persons. It is not always so, of course; but it tends to become more and more so. Even where there is overlapping, where the same individual performs several of these functions, his activities in pursuit of each are easily separable.

Two further facts about these groups may be noted: In most large corporations, which together are decisive in the economy, the bulk of the stockholders, holding in their names the majority of the shares of stock, have, as everyone knows, the passive relation to the company which has been referred to. With only the rarest exceptions, they exercise no real control over the company except for the minor element of control involved in their preferential sharing (as against non-stockholders) in the profits, or rather the declared dividends, of the company. But the third group in our list (the finance-capitalists) are also, some of them at any rate, stockholders. Together they usually do not own in the legal sense a majority of the shares, but they ordinarily own a substantial block of the shares, and have at their disposal liquid funds and other resources whereby they can, when need arises, obtain from the small stockholders enough "proxies" on stock shares to be able to vote a majority.

Thus this third group is in a legal position of ownership toward the company and the instruments of production included among the company's assets: if not with the unambiguous title of an earlier capitalist, who in his own name owned all, or a majority of, the shares of a company, at least to a sufficient degree to preserve the meaning of the legal relationship.

Sometimes the executives of Group 2 are also included in Group 4 and have substantial legal interests of ownership in the company (that is, have registered in their own or their families' names substantial blocks of the company's stock). But this is very seldom the case with the managers proper, with the members of Group 1; these ordinarily have no legal ownership interest in the company, or at most a very small interest: that is, they are not usually large stockholders in the company.

Second, there is a complete difference among these groups with respect to the technical role of their respective functions in relation to the process of production. The process of production is technically and literally impossible unless someone is carrying out the functions of management, of Group 1—not necessarily the same individuals who carry them out today, but, at any rate, someone.

Some of the finance-executive functions comprised in Group 2 are also technically necessary to the process of production, though not necessarily in the same sense as today: that is, not necessarily (from a technical point of view) for the sake of profit as understood by capitalism. There must be some regulation of the quality, kinds, numbers, and distribution of products apart from the theoretic abilities of the instruments of production to turn products out. This regulation would not have to be achieved, however, as it is through the finance-executives, in terms of capitalist profits for the company. It could be done in subordination to some political or social or psychological aim—war or a higher standard of mass living or prestige and glory or the maintenance of some particular power relationship. In fact, with profit in the capitalist sense eliminated, the technically necessary functions of the finance-executives of Group 2 become part of the management functions of Group 1, if management is extended over all or most of industry. Management could, that is to say, absorb all of the technically necessary functions of the non-managing executives.

But, still from a strictly technical viewpoint, the remaining functions—the "profit-making" functions—of Group 2 and all the functions of Groups 3 and 4—finance-capitalist and stockholder—are altogether unnecessary (whether or not desirable from some other point of view) to the process of production. So far as the technical process of production goes, there need not be finance-capitalists or stockholders, and the executives of Group 2, stripped of many of their present functions, can be merged in the management Group 1.[1]

Not only is this development conceivable: it has already been almost entirely achieved in Russia, is approached more and more nearly in Germany, and has gone a considerable distance in all other nations. In the United States, as everywhere, it is precisely the situation to be found throughout state enterprise.

This development is a decisive phase of the managerial revolution. * * *

The so-called "separation of ownership and control," paralleling the growth of the great public corporations of modern times, has, of course, been a widely recognized phenomenon. A decade ago it was the principal subject of the widely read book, The Modern Corporation and Private Property, by Berle and Means. In this book, the authors showed that the economy of the United States was dominated by the two hundred largest nonbanking corporations (they did not discuss the relations of these to financial houses); and, second, that the majority of these corporations were no longer, in practice, controlled by their nominal legal owners (that is, stockholders holding in their names a majority of the shares of stock).

They divided these corporations according to "types of control." In a few, control was exercised by a single individual (more often, single family) who was legal owner of all or a majority of the stock; in others, by individuals or groups which owned not a majority but a substantial percentage of the stock. Most, however (in 1929, 65% of these 200 corporations with 80% of the total assets), they decided were what they called, significantly enough, "management controlled." By "management-controlled," as they explained, they meant that the management (executives) of these companies, though owning only minor percentages of the shares of their corporations, were in actuality self-perpetuating, in control of the policies and the boards of directors of the companies and able to manipulate at will, through proxies, majority votes of the nominal owners, the shareholders. The American Telephone and Telegraph Corporation is the classic example of "management-control."

Though briefly, Berle and Means also took up the extremely important point that in the nature of the case there were sources of frequent conflict between the interests of the "control group" (most often, the management) and the legal owners. This is apparent enough to anyone who recalls the economic events of the past generation. Many books have been written about the difficulties of the run-of-the-mine common stockholders, often as a result of the policies of the "control group" of "their own" company. Wealth, power, and even other possible interests (such as maximum industrial efficiency) of the control group quite naturally do not often coincide with maximum dividends and security for the common stockholders.

The analysis by Berle and Means is most suggestive and indirectly a powerful confirmation of the theory of the managerial revolution, but as it stands it is not carried far enough for our purposes. In their concept of "management-control" they do not distinguish between management in the sense of actual direction of the process of production (the sense of our Group 1 and the only sense in which we refer to "management") and management in terms of profit, selling, financing, and so on (our Group 2, the finance-executives). Indeed, their use of "management," as is usually the case, is closer to the latter than the former, which results really from the fact that in most big corporations today the chief and best-known officials are of the second or executive, not of the first or manager, type. Moreover, Berle and Means do not include any study of the way in which their supposedly self-perpetuating and autonomous managements are in actuality often controlled by big banks or groups of financiers (our Group 3).

One result of such a refinement and amplification of the Berle and Means analysis would be to show that the sources of possible and actual conflict among the groups are far more numerous and more acute than they indicate. Among these sources, three should be stressed:

1. It is a historical law, with no apparent exceptions so far known, that all social or economic groups of any size strive to improve their relative position with respect to power and privilege in society. This law certainly applies to the four groups into which we have divided those who stand in some sort of relation of ownership, management, or control toward the instruments of production. Each of these groups seeks to improve its position of power and privilege. But, in practice, an improvement in the position of one of them is not only not necessarily an improvement for the others; often it means a worsening of the position of one or all of the others.

In periods of great prosperity and expansion, this is not very irritating, since all four can advance relatively as against the rest of society; but, as we have already seen, such periods have ended for capitalism. In conditions which are now normal, an increase in income for the managers or even the executives of Group 2 means so much the less for Group 3 (the financiers) and Group 4 (the stockholders.)

Even more apparently, the relations of control over the operations of the instruments of production raise conflicts, since the sort of operation most favorable to one group (expanding or contracting production, for example) very often is not that most favorable to another. And, in general, there is a source of permanent conflict: the managers proper receive far less reward (money) than the executives and especially the finance-capitalists, who get by far the greatest benefits. From the point of view of the manager group, especially as economic conditions progressively decay, the reward allotted to the finance-capitalists seems inordinate and unjustified, all the more so because, as the managers see it more and more clearly, the finance-capitalists are not performing any function necessary to the process of production.

2. All four of these groups, to one or another degree, are powerful and privileged as against the great masses of the population, who have no interest or ownership, management, or control in the instruments of production and no special preferential treatment in the distribution of their products. Consequently, the masses have a tendency to strive for a greater share of power and privilege as against all four of these groups. The result of this situation might be expected to be a merging of the conflicts among the four groups and a common front against the pressure of the masses. This has indeed been often the case. Nevertheless, the conflicts among the groups are real and cannot be eliminated even in the face of a common danger. In fact, the presence of the common danger is itself a source of new conflicts. This follows because the groups, from the very status they occupy and functions they fulfill, favor different methods of meeting the danger and of maintaining privilege as against the masses. The differences become sharpened under the crisis conditions of contemporary capitalism. This can be made clear by a single example:

The position, role, and function of the managers are in no way dependent upon the maintenance of capitalist property and economic relations (even if many of the managers themselves think so); they depend upon the technical nature of the process of modern production. Consequently the preservation of the capitalist relations is not an absolutely decisive question for the managers. The position, role, and function of the most privileged of all the groups, the finance-capitalists, are, however, entirely bound up with capitalist property and economic relations, and their preservation is decisive for even the continued existence of this group. This holds in general and cannot help affecting the situation with respect to more specific problems.

For instance, from the point of view of the technical position of the managers, the problem of unemployment is perfectly easy to solve: if the technical co-ordination and integration of industry were extended, unemployment could be wiped out in a month. Moreover, the managers, or many of them, are aware that unless mass unemployment is wiped out, all privileges, including their own, will be wiped out, either through national defeat by a nation which has wiped it out or by internal chaos. But mass unemployment cannot be eliminated without invading and finally abolishing capitalist property and economic relations. The position of the managers thus forces them toward solutions which would have such an effect.

But the finance-capitalists (and even the executives, for that matter) are differently situated. Their position, depending on the capitalist relations, thereby depends also on the continuance of mass unemployment; they cannot entertain any solution that has a chance of eliminating unemployment without involving at the same time their own elimination. (If they think they can, they are simply mistaken, as they are beginning to find out in Germany and will before long find out elsewhere.)

3. A third source of conflict is found in what we might call "occupational bias," a point to which we shall return later. The different things which these different groups do promote in their respective members different attitudes, habits of thought, ideals, ways and methods of solving problems. To put it crudely: the managers tend to think of solving social and political problems as they co-ordinate and organize the actual process of production; the nonmanagerial executives think of society as a price-governed profit-making animal; the finance-capitalists think of problems in terms of what happens in banks and stock exchanges and security flotations; the little stockholders think of the economy as a mysterious god who, if placated properly, will hand out free gifts to the deserving. Burnham, The Managerial Revolution, (1941) 82–92.

On the periphery of the "management" are groups whose status is in question. Thus in Packard Motor Car Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 330 U.S. 485, 67 S.Ct. 789 (1947) the issue was whether foremen in a plant were "employees" having the right of organization and collective bargaining. The Company contended that foremen were a part of management, and therefore employers. A majority of the Court held that they were employees.

PACKARD MOTOR CAR COMPANY v. NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1947. 330 U.S. 485, 67 S.Ct. 789.

Petition by the National Labor Relations Board to enforce an order issued against the Packard Motor Car Company, wherein the Foreman's League for Education and Association and another intervened. To review a judgment decreeing enforcement of the order, 6 Cir., 157 F.2d 80, the Packard Motor Car Company brings certiorari.

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE and MR. JUSTICE BURTON concur, dissenting.

First. Over thirty years ago Mr. Justice Brandeis, while still a private citizen, saw the need for narrowing the gap between management and labor, for allowing labor greater participation in policy decisions, for developing an industrial system in which cooperation rather than coercion was the dominant characteristic. In his view, these were measures of therapeutic value in dealing with problems of industrial unrest or inefficiency.

The present decision may be a step in that direction. It at least tends to obliterate the line between management and labor. It lends the sanctions of federal law to unionization at all levels of the industrial hierarchy. It tends to emphasize that the basic opposing forces in industry are not management and labor but the operating group on the one hand and the stockholder and bondholder group on the other. The industrial problem as so defined comes down to a contest over a fair division of the gross receipts of industry between these two groups. The struggle for control or power between management and labor becomes secondary to a growing unity in their common demands on ownership. * * *

If foremen were to be included as employees under the Act, special problems would be raised—important problems relating to the unit in which the foremen might be represented. Foremen are also under the Act as employers. That dual status creates serious problems. An act of a foreman, if attributed to the management, constitutes an unfair labor practice; the same act may be part of the foreman's activity as an employee. In that event the employer can only interfere at his peril. The complications of dealing with the problems of supervisory employees strongly suggest that if Congress had planned to include them in its project, it would have made some special provision for them. * * *

A. MANAGEMENT IN FORMATION; PROMOTERS

1. FIDUCIARY DUTY OF PROMOTERS

HAYWARD v. LEESON.

SAME v. HOPEWELL.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, Suffolk, 1900.
176 Mass. 310, 57 N.E. 656, 49 L.R.A. 725.

Two bills in equity filed in the Superior Court, by the receiver of the East Tennessee Land Company, to recover alleged secret profits made by the defendants as promoters of the corporation. The cases were heard together.

LORING, J. * * * Stripped of the surroundings which tend to obscure its real nature, the transaction in which the defendants took part was this: Gates and his four associates, and the defendants and their nine associates, believing that a tract of some 225,000 to 300,000 acres of land in Tennessee had natural resources which could be developed at a great profit, agreed to join themselves together to secure options on the land, and then organized a corporation which was to buy the options of them at a profit. This profit, after paying all actual expenses incurred in procuring the options and organizing the corporation, was to be divided equally between Gates and his associates, operating under the name of the Phœnix Land Company, and the defendants and their associates, operating as the Syndicate of Ten. In this joint adventure Gates and his associates contributed their information as to the land, and the defendants and their associates contributed the money ($15,000 to $30,000) to be advanced for the expenses of the enterprise, until the corporation to be organized was organized and was in funds, when these advances were to be repaid by

it. It was stated in the agreement providing for this joint adventure that the profit which they would secure from the corporation for the transfer of these options would be some $700,000; the cost of the lands being estimated to be $900,000, including $100,000 for expenses, and the value of the lands to the corporation being stated to be $1,500,-000. If the $100,000 of expenses included in the $900,000 were repaid to them, the difference between the two (that is to say, the net profit to the promoters of the corporation) would be $700,000. It was also agreed that "at least five-sixths of its net profits shall be taken by each of these two contracting parties in the stock of the new corporation."

The only particulars in which the promoters departed from this plan, in carrying it into effect, were that they organized the corporation when only one-third of the options contemplated had been secured, and that they then issued to themselves $700,000 of paid-up stock of the corporation, as the net profits which they were to make in the transaction. Nominally, this $700,000 of paid-up stock was issued in payment for options then owned by the Phœnix Land Company, on which it had paid $6,000, and the agreement of that company to secure further options, during a period of six months, at the expense of the new corporation. Really, this $700,000 of paid-up stock was issued to the promoters as remuneration for their services as promoters, or, as it is termed in the report of the superior court, for the net profits which it was arranged in the agreement between the Phœnix Land Company and the Syndicate of Ten should be divided equally between the two. The twenty-first finding of the superior court is explicit on this point. It is, so far as material here, as follows: "The sum named, $700,000, was not arrived at by any appraisal or attempted appraisal or valuation of any property, options, or contracts, or title bonds, etc., which the Phœnix Land Company had. * * * Said large sum was named as a consideration that it might be enough to include the 'profits' mentioned or contemplated in said paper marked 'No. 31,' and especially in clause 3 of the Plan More in Detail; and the shares received by all the said syndicate members and some others on July 3d were then really understood to be the profits or 'net profits' mentioned in the ninth clause of said paper marked 'No. 31,' and in the third and sixth clauses of the Plan More in Detail, annexed thereto, which by that agreement were to be divided between the ten syndicate members and the Phœnix Land Company; and this, also, was known to all the then stockholders of the East Tennessee Land Company, to wit, the thirteen directors of the East Tennessee Land Company and the officers of the Phœnix Land Company." The paper referred to in the report as paper marked "No. 31," and the Plan More in Detail, annexed thereto, make up the agreement between Gates and his associates and the defendants and their associates, which was finally completed on May 6, 1889.

The defendants rely in this connection upon two of the findings set forth in the report, namely, (1) that the vote authorizing the contract of June 11 was passed "and the contract executed by which the East Tennessee Land Company agreed to pay said $700,000 for the lands, options, contracts, and title bonds of the Phœnix Land Company, with and upon the theory and belief——under advice of competent counsel practicing in Tennessee to that effect——that it would satisfy the laws of Tennessee, both as to the payment in of the capital of said corporation, and would, by orders of the Phœnix Land Company, be a proper way and method of settling for the shares of stock which each of the defendants and others subscribed for and got;" and (2), "I do not find that the defendants, or either of them, in signing the paper marked 'No. 31,' or in signing the subscription for stock on June 6th, and in becoming directors of the East Tennessee Land Company on June 10th, and in voting for the making of the contract with the Phœnix Land Company, and in taking, each, 250 shares of stock, intended any actual fraud, or intended to defraud or cheat either the corporation or the future stockholders or creditors of the East Tennessee Land Company. They did not anticipate the failure or insolvency of the company. Whatever those who originated the project expected, these defendants, when they became parties to it, believed (and, I think, not without some reason, with proper management) that it would succeed, and result in building up a prosperous town or city at Harriman." And the defendants contend that the stock issued to them was lawfully issued for interests in land and for services rendered or to be rendered; that under these findings there was no fraudulent overvaluation in the issuing of the $700,000 of shares of stock; that the issue of this stock was voted for by the defendants and others as stockholders, and that stockholders are under no fiduciary relation to anybody, and can do as they will with their own; and, moreover, that it was consented to by all the stockholders and incorporators of the East Tennessee Land Company, and consequently cannot now be made the basis of any complaint by the corporation or anybody else.

But this argument omits from the case the fact that the defendants, together with their associates in the Syndicate of Ten, and Gates, with his associates in the Phœnix Land Company, were promoters of the East Tennessee Land Company, and that these suits are instituted to charge them with secret profits made by them as such promoters, and not on the ground that the stock subscribed for by them has not been paid for under the laws of Tennessee. Whether it was or was not properly issued as paid-up stock, so far as a compliance with Tennessee statutes is concerned, is not material, and we express no opinion upon that point. See McKay's Case, 2 Ch.Div. 1, 6, 8. Moreover, it is not sought in these suits to charge the defendants because they voted, as stockholders, to issue the $700,000 of stock, but it is sought to charge each defendant because he, with others, was a promoter of the East Tennessee Land Company; because, as a promoter, he stood in a fiduciary relation to the future shareholders of that corporation, and by reason thereof he could not receive any remuneration for his services as a promoter of that corporation without making a full disclosure thereof, and obtaining the consent of these shareholders thereto. [Citing cases.]

If the fullest effect is given to the finding of the court that the defendants intended no actual fraud in taking 250 shares each, and did not intend to defraud or cheat either the corporation or the future stockholders or creditors of the East Tennessee Land Company, all that the finding means is that the defendants honestly believed that the natural resources of the lands in question were so great that shares amounting to $700,000, par value, would be a fair remuneration to be paid to them and their associates for their services as promoters. But even if they did so believe, and their belief was honest, and there was a foundation for that honest belief, they none the less were guilty of a fraud. It is a fraud for promoters to undertake to decide for the future stockholders in the corporation to be organized that one-third of the whole capital stock of that corporation is a fair remuneration for their services as promoters, to issue one-third of the capital stock to themselves as such remuneration, and then to invite the public to subscribe to the stock of the corporation, without disclosing that fact to the subscribers, and without getting their consent to the payment of that remuneration.

The defendants say that they did disclose the fact to the East Tennessee Land Company, and that they did get the consent of the East Tennessee Land Company to the payment of this $700,000 of stock to them for their remuneration as promoters; and that is not only enough, but it is final. It is true that the vote authorizing the issue of this stock to them, as the profits which they were to have out of the organization of the company, was voted unanimously by all the incorporators of the East Tennessee Land Company, and all who were then subscribers to its capital stock; that is, by all the persons who then had any interest in that corporation. That is to say, it is true that the fact that the promoters were to receive $700,000 of paid-up capital stock as remuneration for their services was disclosed and consented to by all the persons who then had any interest in the corporation. But it is also true that at that time no person except the promoters had any interest in the corporation, barring one Mason, in whose name some of the options were subsequently taken, and who was plainly a mere nominee of the promoters, and that at that time no capital stock of the corporation had been issued to the public. Payment to promoters of remuneration for their services is not made valid by a vote passed by the corporation, when the corporation is in the sole control of the promoters, before the capital has been issued to the public. Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, 5 Ch.Div. 73; Erlanger v. Phosphate Co., 3 App.Cas. 1218; In re Olympia [1898] 2 Ch.Div. 153; In re British Seamless Paper-Box Co., 17 Ch.Div. 467, 471, 472. The persons to whom the promoters owe the duty which they owe by reason of their fiduciary relation are the persons who put their money into the enterprise at the invitation of the promoters; that is to say, the future stockholders. It is to the future stockholders that the promoters must make the disclosure of the remuneration which is or is to be paid to them, and it is the consent of the future stockholders that must be obtained to make that payment valid; and if the promoters undertake to make to themselves remuneration for their services as promoters without making a full disclosure of the fact to the future stockholders, their principals, and getting their consent, they are guilty of a fraud. Promoters can make the necessary disclosure of the remuneration they stipulate for, by including in the prospectus a full statement thereof. If such a statement is not made therein, they cannot honestly take any remuneration for promoters' services unless it is voted by the stockholders after all the stock has been taken by the public. * * *

* * * Upon substituting the East Tennessee Land Company as plaintiff in place of John K. Hayward, the causes are to stand for hearing as to what the net profits are, which the defendants have respectively received, or as to what the damages are, which the plaintiff has suffered, as the plaintiff shall elect to proceed for the property or its proceeds on the one hand, or for damages on the other hand.

OLD DOMINION COPPER MINING & SMELTING CO. v. BIGELOW.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, Suffolk, 1905.
188 Mass. 315, 74 N.E. 653, 108 Am.St.Rep. 479.

Bill in equity, filed October 7, 1902.

The following statement of the case is taken from the opinion of the court:

This cause came on to be heard on two demurrers. The defendant filed a demurrer to the whole bill, and what purported to be a demurrer to so much of the bill "as seeks to have the sale of certain parcels of real estate conveyed to the plaintiff by Leonard Lewisohn rescinded, and to have the defendant ordered to return to the plaintiff the consideration paid by the plaintiff for said conveyance." On the plaintiff's stipulating that, in case the demurrers or either of them should be sustained on the merits, the bill, or so much thereof as the demurrers apply to, should be dismissed, the cause was reserved for the consideration of the full court.

The case stated in the bill, so far as material here, is, in effect and in substance, as follows: The defendant and one Lewisohn, at some time prior to March, 1895, formed the plan of buying the property of the Old Dominion Copper Company, of the city of Baltimore (hereinafter spoken of as the "Baltimore Company"), and four certain mining claims and a mill site standing in the name of one Keyser (hereinafter spoken of as the "real estate here in question"), with a view to reselling them at a profit to a corporation to be organized by them for that purpose. Their scheme was first to buy all the stock of the Baltimore Company. Having got control of that company through their ownership of all of its capital stock, they were to organize a new company, and before the stock of the new company was issued, and while it was entirely in their control as the organizers of it, they were to sell to it the property of the Baltimore Company and the real estate here in question for a specified number of shares of the new company, the balance of shares in the capital stock of the new company being sold to the public to provide working capital and to build additions. All this was done. The plaintiff was the new corporation. The defendant and Lewisohn got the money with which to buy all shares in the capital stock of the Baltimore Company from a syndicate (hereinafter called the "Dominion Syndicate") which they organized for the purpose, and to which they agreed to pay two dollars for every dollar paid into the syndicate treasury in case the scheme was a success, with a privilege given to the syndicate members of taking shares at par in the new corporation in place of money. Five-sevenths of the stock of the Baltimore Company were bought of the executors of one Simpson for a sum not more than $613,137.39, and the other two-sevenths, together with the real estate here in question, of one Keyser, and "other persons to the plaintiff unknown," for a sum not exceeding $175,182.11; and thereupon the real estate here in question was conveyed to Lewisohn. These transactions were carried through on July 8, 1895. On the same 8th day of July, 1895, the plaintiff corporation was organized by seven persons employed by the defendant and Lewisohn for the purpose, apparently with a capital stock of $1,000, divided into 40 shares of $25 each, which were issued to the incorporators, but were in fact paid for by the defendant and Lewisohn. On July 9, 1895, the incorporators met, chose themselves directors, and increased the authorized capital stock to $3,750,000, composed of 150,000 shares of $25 each. At a meeting of the directors held on July 11, 1895, pursuant to instructions from the defendant, five directors resigned, and the defendant and Lewisohn, together with three members of the Dominion Syndicate, were appointed in their places. Thereupon the defendant and Lewisohn took their seats on the board. The other three new directors were not present. After these changes in the directorate, the directors present at the meeting were the defendant, Lewisohn, one Evarts, "the attorney employed by said defendant and said Leonard Lewisohn to attend to the incorporation of the plaintiff corporation and to carry out their said plan and conspiracy," and one Buffum, a person "selected" and "employed" by the defendant and Lewisohn "to act as director and assist them in carrying out said plan and conspiracy." Thereupon the defendant, through said Evarts, presented to the board an offer to sell to the plaintiff corporation the property of the Baltimore Company for 100,000 shares in its capital stock, and Lewisohn offered to sell to the plaintiff corporation the real estate here in question for 30,000 shares in its capital stock. These offers were accepted, and the stock was in fact subsequently issued in accordance therewith. Of the 30,000 shares issued for the real estate here in question, the defendant received 16,410 and Lewisohn 13,590. Of the 100,000 shares issued for the property of the Baltimore Company, 80,000 were issued to the syndicate, and the other 20,000 were issued to the defendant and Lewisohn for their expenses and services. Of this 20,000, the defendant received 10,940 and Lewisohn 9,060. It is alleged that at this time the fair market value of the shares in the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation was par, and "continued for a long time thereafter to be of such or greater value."

[2] The corporation was substituted as plaintiff; defendant attempted unsuccessfully to interpose the defense of the statute of limitations, East Tennessee Land Co. v. Leeson, Same v. Hopewell, 178 Mass. 206, 59 N.E. 639, 1901. Defendants then appealed from the affirmance of the master's report awarding damages to plaintiff. This decree was aff'd, 183 Mass. 37, 66 N.E. 427, 1903; appeal from this order aff'd, 185 Mass. 4, 69 N.E. 351, 1904.

The bill goes on to allege that no disclosure was made of the profit made by the issue of the 30,000 shares for the real estate here in question to the persons who subscribed for the 20,000 shares issued for working capital, or to the members of the syndicate to which the 80,000 shares were issued (except to the defendant and Lewisohn, members thereof). It is alleged also that from July 11, 1895, to July 4, 1902, the plaintiff corporation was in effect in the control of the defendant and Lewisohn. Thereafter investigations were begun which resulted in the filing of this bill on October 7, 1902. It is alleged, further, that Lewisohn died March 5, 1902, and at the time of his death was a resident and citizen of the city of New York; that the executors of his will are also residents and citizens of the city of New York; that no executors or legal representatives have been appointed or are within this commonwealth; that there is no property within the commonwealth belonging to said estate; and that it is impossible to get service within this commonwealth on the executors of the will of Lewisohn. It is also alleged that the real estate here in question, at the time of the sale to the plaintiff, was "of substantially no value, to wit, of a value not exceeding five thousand ($5,000) dollars, and * * * [was] * * * known by said Lewisohn and by the defendant, when" they acquired the same, and when they offered to sell the same to the plaintiff, "to be of substantially no value"; and that said "property has since said conveyance remained undeveloped, and is now in substantially the same condition that it was in at the time of the conveyance" to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff alleges that it "desires to rescind the sale" of said real estate, "and has offered to convey" it "to the defendant, or to such person as he may request, upon receiving from said defendant" said 30,000 shares, "or, if and in so far as said shares have been disposed of, upon the defendant's duly accounting therefor; but said defendant refused to make any such restitution or accounting." After alleging a continued readiness to convey, the bill concludes with a prayer that the court will declare the sale of the mining claims and of the mill site rescinded, and will direct the defendant to return the 30,000 shares, or, if and in so far as said shares are no longer in his control, to account to the plaintiff therefor, or, in the alternative, in case it is held that the sale is not rescinded and that the plaintiff is not entitled to rescind that sale, for damages. There is also a prayer for general relief.

It was stated at the bar that another bill had been brought for relief in respect of the issue of the 100,000 shares, and that the only relief here sought was in respect of the 30,000 shares issued in payment for the real estate here in question.

The result of these transactions was that, for the property for which the defendant and Lewisohn had paid not more than $788,319.50, the plaintiff corporation issued 130,000 shares of its capital stock, having a market value of at least $3,250,000—a profit of at least $2,460,000. Of these 130,000 shares, 80,000 (which were worth at least $2,000,000) went to the syndicate, 20,000 (worth at least $500,000) went to the defendant and Lewisohn for services and expenses, 30,000 (worth at least $750,000) went to the defendant and Lewisohn for the real estate here in question, and the balance, 20,000, to the public (apparently with the exception of the original 40 shares issued to the incorporators and paid for by the defendant and Lewisohn).

LORING, J. (After the foregoing statement of the case). The only question now before us is whether the plaintiff is entitled to any relief on these facts. If it is, it is not necessary to determine what the relief is to which it is entitled. An attempt has been made to force a decision on the nature of the relief at this time by demurring "to so much of said bill as seeks to have the sale of certain parcels of real estate conveyed to the plaintiff by Leonard Lewisohn rescinded, and to have the defendant ordered to return to the plaintiff the consideration paid by the plaintiff for said conveyance." But there is no part of the bill which seeks rescission. This demurrer is not a demurrer to a part of the bill; it is to the whole bill so far as it seeks rescission. This so-called "demurrer to a part" is in fact an assignment of causes of demurrer to the whole bill, and will be so treated.

The defendant has contended that on the facts stated in the bill no case is made out for relief in respect of the 30,000 shares issued for the four mining claims and the mill site.

It will be useful to get a clear conception of what is and what is not alleged in the bill, and of the rights of the parties in such a transaction as that here set forth.

It was settled by the recent case of Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 310, 57 N.E. 656, 49 L.R.A. 725, that a promoter of a corporation stands in a fiduciary relation to the corporation of which he is a promoter.

It is clear that on the facts stated the defendant was a promoter of the plaintiff corporation.

It is not alleged here that the defendant made any misrepresentations as to the price paid by himself and Lewisohn for the property resold to the plaintiff at an advance, as was the case in Gluckstein v. Barnes [1900] A.C. 240; s.c. below, sub nomine In re Olympia Limited [1898] 2 Ch. 153; Hichens v. Congreve, 4 Sim. 420. Where one standing in a fiduciary relation makes such a misrepresentation, it may well be that the purchaser can keep the property and force the vendor to make good the representation, and pay to him, the purchaser, the difference between what was in fact paid by the vendor and what he represented that he paid for it.

Further, the defendant is not liable here on the ground that the plaintiff corporation is entitled to the benefit of the original purchase of the real estate here in question, as a beneficiary is entitled where a person standing to him in a fiduciary capacity buys for himself and resells to him, the beneficiary, at a profit, when he ought originally to have bought for the beneficiary. In such a case the purchaser can keep the property and charge the defendant with the difference in price. Parker v. Nickerson, 137 Mass. 487, 497.

When the defendant and Lewisohn bought this real estate, they were under no obligation to make the purchase of it for the plaintiff corporation, which was not then in existence. Having bought the property at that time and paid for it with what, as between them and the plaintiff corporation, was their own money, they could have kept it or resold it to the plaintiff corporation or to anybody else, as they saw fit. The fact that the property was bought with a view to reselling it to a corporation to be organized for the purpose, and that that purpose was ultimately carried into effect, does not give to the corporation subsequently organized in execution of the original purpose a right to the benefit of the purchase. That was considered in New Sombrero Co. v. Erlanger, 5 Ch.D. 73, 118, 119, and at still greater length in that case on appeal, Erlanger v. New Sombrero Co., 3 App. Cas.1218, by Lord Hatherley at page 1242, Lord O'Hagan at page 1255, and Lord Blackburn at pages 1267 and 1268. It is enough to say that we agree with what is there said. For a case where no relief was given because it was not made out that this company was entitled to the benefit of the original purchase, see Ladywell Mining Co. v. Brookes, 35 Ch.D. 400.

The situation, then, was this: The defendant and Lewisohn were, so far as this case goes, the absolute owners of the four mining claims and the mill site. We say the absolute owners so far as this case is concerned, because the rights of the Dominion Syndicate in this real estate, if any, are not here in question, and therefore, so far as this case is concerned, their rights may be disregarded. Being the absolute owners of it, the defendant and Lewisohn could do with that property as they pleased—let it lie idle, work it, or sell it, as they thought best; and, if they determined to sell it, they could sell it to any one they chose. If they chose to sell it to a stranger, they could make the sale at arm's length, ask any price they pleased and were under no legal obligation to state what it had cost them. On the other hand, if they elected to make a sale of it to one standing to them in a fiduciary relation, they were under an obligation to make a full disclosure to the beneficiary of all facts known to them material to the property and the purchase, or see to it that the fiduciary had adequate independent advice. That is an obligation resting upon every fiduciary who makes a sale of his own property to his beneficiary, no matter whether it is a case of trustee and cestui que trust, guardian and ward, solicitor and client, or promoter of a corporation and the corporation itself.

There is no pretense that in the transaction in question the plaintiff corporation was represented by an independent board.

The defendant has sought in the first place to distinguish the case at bar from Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 310, 57 N.E. 656, 49 L.R.A. 725, on the ground that in the prospectus in that case there was the false statement that the capital stock represented actual value, without inflation, while a substantial part of it had been issued to the defendants and their associates for nominal services. But that fact was not spoken of in the opinion as the ground of the decision. The opinion went on the broad ground mentioned above. This false representation was spoken of in connection with a contention on the part of those defendants that they were not liable because of a finding made by the superior court that the defendants did not conceal the transaction from the knowledge of future stockholders. The case of New Sombrero Co. v. Erlanger, 5 Ch.D. 73; s.c. on appeal, Erlanger v. New Sombero Co., 3 App.Cas. 1218—is on all fours with the case at bar in this respect. In that case there was no misrepresentation.

In the second place, the defendant contends that the corporation cannot complain because the facts were known to the four directors who took part in the purchase, and to the holders of all shares of capital stock of the corporation outstanding when the contract of purchase here in question was made, and that purchase was acquiesced in by them. They contend that this result follows because one buying shares from a shareholder who acquiesces is bound by the acquiescence of his vendor. The four directors present at the directors' meeting when the real estate in question was sold by the defendant and Lewisohn to the plaintiff corporation for 30,000 shares were the defendant and Lewisohn, their attorney, and one Buffum, "a person selected by them and employed by them to act as director and assist them in carrying out said plan and conspiracy." On the allegations of the bill, the defendant and Lewisohn are to be treated as the owners of all the shares then outstanding, and therefore the transaction is to be taken to have been known to and acquiesced in by all the then stockholders.

It is proper to pause here and see just what this contention means. When this contract was made on July 11, 1895, the authorized capital stock had just been increased from 40 shares to 150,000 shares of $25 each; that is to say, from $1,000 to $3,750,000. Of the authorized capital stock only 40 shares, or $1,000, had then been issued. As we have said, these 40 shares are to be treated on the allegations of the bill as the property of the defendant and Lewisohn. The scheme of the defendant and Lewisohn as to this capital stock of $3,750,000, divided into 150,000 shares, was to issue 80,000 shares (or $2,000,000) to the syndicate, or sell them to the public for cash to provide $2,000,000 to be paid to the syndicate; 20,000 shares (or $500,000) to themselves for their services and expenses as promoters; 20,000 shares (or $500,000) to the public for cash for working capital; and the balance, 30,000 shares (or $750,000), to themselves for the real estate here in question. And this scheme was carried out; and, in carrying it out, no disclosure was made to the persons who took the syndicate's 80,000 shares (except those of the 80,000 issued to the defendant and Lewisohn as members of the syndicate), nor to those who took the 20,000 shares sold to the public for cash for working capital. Of the 80,000 issued for the syndicate, it is alleged that the defendant received 4,000. It is not alleged that any of this 80,000 were issued to Lewisohn. The contention is that, inasmuch as the defendant and Lewisohn owned all the 40 shares of the corporation, amounting to $1,000, outstanding when the sale here in question was made by them to the corporation, the corporation is barred from complaining that a full disclosure of the material facts was not made by them to it. * * *

The case submitted to us for decision here by the defendant's demurrer to this bill is a case where (disregarding the 40 shares subscribed for to organize the corporation) the whole capital stock was 150,000 shares, of which 54,000 shares were to be issued to the promoters for services and for the sale of the land here in question, and the remaining 96,000 were to be issued to persons to whom the facts of this sale were not disclosed.

The question arises whether in such a case the rule enforced in Hayward v. Leeson, 176 Mass. 310, 57 N.E. 656, 49 L.R.A. 725, applies.

In Hayward v. Leeson it was held by this court that a corporation was not barred in the recovery of secret profits made by promoters by the fact that the promoters owned all the stock of the corporation when the agreement was made to pay them the profits recovered in that case. The secret profits agreed upon paid and recovered in that case were paid up shares of capital stock of the par value of $750,000 for services as promoters out of a capital of $3,000,000, the rest of which was subscribed to and paid for by the public in cash. To the cases cited in Hayward v. Lesson on this point, 176 Mass., at page 320, 57 N.E. 660, 49 L.R.A. 725, should be added Gluckstein v. Barnes [1900] A.C. 240, the decision of the House of Lords on appeal from In re Olympia, Limited [1898] 2 Ch. 153, made after the opinion in Hayward v. Leeson was written.

The question which we have to decide here is whether the difference in the way in which this transaction was carried through leads to the opposite result. If in the case at bar the 96,000 shares not issued to the promoters had been offered to the public for cash to be used in buying the property of the old Baltimore Company and for working capital, and had been taken by them, the case at bar would have come directly within the decision in Hayward v. Leeson.

We see no reason why the rule enforced in Hayward v. Leeson does not apply to the case stated in the bill now before us.

The defendant has insisted that the corporation is barred in this case because, if it (the corporation) is allowed to recover in such a suit, the purchasers of the 54,000 shares issued to the defendant and Lewisohn would get their share of the sum recovered, and to that extent the purchaser of these shares would not be bound by the acquiescence of their vendors. That is true. That was true in Hayward v. Leeson. In that case the purchasers of the 750,000 shares would have got their share of the sums recovered by the receiver in behalf of the corporation if there was any left after the debts were paid. The argument is an old one, and was disposed of by Lord Justice James in New Sombrero Co. v. Erlanger, 5 Ch.D. 73, 115, 116. A corporation is not precluded from recovering for a fraud on it (the corporation) because the party committing the fraud is a stockholder.

Again, the corportaion is not barred because, when the agreement was made, it acquiesced in the trade, and it was then, from a legal point of view, fully born. That was equally true in Hayward v. Leeson and the cases cited in that case. The answer to the suggestion is that from a business point of view the agreement was not made to bind the corporation with a capital of $1,000, which was the corporation then in fact in existence, but to bind the corporation with a capital of $3,750,000. It was to that corporation, with a capital of $3,750,000, that a full disclosure ought to have been made, and to that corporation no disclosure was ever made.

In the case stated in this bill the defendant was a promoter of the plaintiff corporation; being a promoter, he stood in a fiduciary relation to it; on selling to the plaintiff the real estate here in question he was bound to disclose all facts known to him material in the sale, since it was not independently represented; the price at which the property had been recently bought with a view to reselling it to the plaintiff corporation was at any rate a material fact which he was bound to disclose; the knowledge of the defendant and Lewisohn was not a disclosure to the plaintiff, although they owned all the stock of the plaintiff corporation outstanding at the time the sale was made; and, although 56,000 out of 150,000 shares of the capital stock ultimately issued was issued to them, the defendant violated the duty which he owed the plaintiff in not disclosing that fact; and for this reason the contract here in question was not binding on the plaintiff.

On the facts stated, the property sold having remained unchanged, the contract came to an end on the plaintiff's electing to rescind and tendering a reconveyance of it back to the defendant. * * *

The so-called demurrer as to part of the bill shall stand as an assignment of a cause of a demurrer; demurrer overruled.[3]

OLD DOMINION COPPER MINING & SMELTING COMPANY v. LEWISOHN et al.

Supreme Court of the United States 1908. 210 U.S. 206, 28 S.Ct. 634, 52 L.Ed. 1025.

Certiorari to the United State Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a decree of the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York, sustaining a demurrer to, and dismissing a bill brought by a corporation to rescind a sale of property to it by its promoters.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity brought by the petitioner to rescind a sale to it of certain mining rights and land by the defendants' testator, or, in the alternative, to recover damages for the sale. The bill was demurred to and the demurrer was sustained. 136 F. 915. Then the bill was amended and again demurred to, and again the demurrer was sustained, and the bill was dismissed. This decree was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals. 79 C.C.A. 534, 148 F. 1020. The ground of the petitioner's case is that Lewisohn, the deceased, and one Bigelow, as promoters, informed the petitioner that they might sell certain properties to it at a profit; that they made their sale while they owned all the stock issued, but in contemplation of a large further issue to the public without disclosure of their profit, and that such an issue in fact was made. The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts has held the plaintiff entitled to recover from Bigelow upon a substantially similar bill. 188 Mass. 315, 108 Am.St.Rep. 479, 74 N.E. 653.

The facts alleged are as follows: The property embraced in the plan was the mining property of the Old Dominion Copper Company of Baltimore, and also the mining rights and land now in question, the latter being held by one Keyser, for the benefit of himself and of the executors of one Simpson, who, with Keyser, owned the stock of the Baltimore company. Bigelow and Lewisohn, in May, and June, 1895, obtained options from Simpson's executors and Keyser for the purchase of the stock and the property now in question. They also formed a syndicate to carry out their plan, with the agreement that the money subscribed by the members should be used for the purchase and the sale to a new corporation, at a large advance, and that the members, in the proportion of their subscriptions, should receive in cash or in stock of the new corporation the profit made by the sale. On May 28, 1895, Bigelow paid Simpson's executors for their stock on behalf of the syndicate, in cash and notes of himself and Lewisohn, and in June Keyser was paid in the same way.

On July 8, 1895, Bigelow and Lewisohn started the plaintiff corporation, the seven members being their nominees and tools. The next day the stock of the company was increased to 150,000 shares of $25 each, officers were elected, and the corporation became duly organized. July 11, pursuant to instructions, some of the officers resigned, and Bigelow and Lewisohn and three other absent members of the syndicate came in. Thereupon an offer was received from the Baltimore company, the stock of which had been bought, as stated, by Bigelow and Lewisohn, to sell substantially all its property for 100,000 shares of the plaintiff company. The offer was accepted, and then Lewisohn offered to sell the real estate now in question, obtained from Keyser, for 30,000 shares, to be issued to Bigelow and himself. This also was accepted and possession of all the mining property was delivered the next day. The sales "were consummated" by delivery of deeds, and afterwards, on July 18, to raise working capital, it was voted to offer the remaining 20,000 shares to the public at par, and they were taken by subscribers who did not know of the profit made by Bigelow and Lewisohn and the syndicate. On September 18 the 100,000 and 30,000 shares were issued, and it was voted to issue the 20,000 when paid for. The bill alleges that the property of the Baltimore company was not worth more than $1,000,000, the sum paid for its stock, and the property here concerned not over $5,000, as Bigelow and Lewisohn knew. The market value of the petitioner's stock was not less than par, so that the price paid was $2,500,000, it is said, for the Baltimore company's property, and $750,000 for that here concerned. Whether this view of the price paid is correct, it is unnecessary to decide.

Of the stock in the petitioner, received by Bigelow and Lewisohn of their Baltimore corporation 40,000 shares went to the syndicate as profit, and the members had their choice of receiving a like additional number of shares or the repayment of their original subscription. As pretty nearly all took the stock, the syndicate received about 80,000 shares. The remaining 20,000 of the stock paid to the Baltimore company, Bigelow and Lewisohn divided, the plaintiff believes, without the knowledge of the syndicate. The 30,000 shares received for the property now in question they also divided. Thus the plans of Bigelow and Lewisohn were carried out.

The argument for the petitioner is that all would admit that the promoters (assuming the English phrase to be well applied) stood in a fiduciary relation to it, if, when the transaction took place, there were members who were not informed of the profits made and who did not acquiesce, and that the same obligation of good faith extends down to the time of the later subscriptions, which it was the promoters' plan to obtain. It is an argument that has commanded the assent of at least one court, and is stated at length in the decision. But the courts do not agree. There is no authority binding upon us and in point. The general observations in Dickerman v. Northern Trust Co., 176 U.S. 181, 44 L.Ed. 423, 20 S.Ct. 311, were obiter, and do not dispose of the case. Without spending time upon the many dicta that were quoted to us, we shall endeavor to weigh the considerations on one side and the other afresh.

The difficulty that meets the petitioner at the outset is that it has assented to the transaction with the full knowledge of the facts. It is said, to be sure, that on September 18, when the shares were issued to the sellers, there were already subscribers to the 20,000 shares that the public took. But this does not appear from the bill, unless it should be inferred from the ambiguous statement that on that day it was voted to issue those shares "to persons who had subscribed therefor," upon receiving payment, and that the shares "were thereafter duly issued to said persons," etc. The words "had subscribed" may refer to the time of issue and be equivalent to "should have subscribed," or may refer to an already past event. But that hardly matters. The contract had been made and the property delivered on July 11 and 12, when Bigelow, Lewisohn, and some other members of the syndicate held all the outstanding stock, and it is alleged in terms that the sales were consummated before the vote of July 18, to offer stock to the public, had been passed.

At the time of the sale to the plaintiff, then, there was no wrong done to anyone. Bigelow, Lewisohn, and their syndicate were on both sides of the bargain, and they might issue to themselves as much stock in their corporation as they liked in exchange for their conveyance of their land. Salomon v. A. Salomon & Co. [1897] A.C. 22; Blum v. Whitney, 185 N.Y. 232, 77 N.E. 1159; Tompkins v. Sperry, 96 Md. 560, 54 A. 254. If there was a wrong, it was when the innocent public subscribed. But what one would expect to find, if a wrong happened then, would not be that the sale became a breach of duty to the corporation nunc pro tunc, but that the invitation to the public without disclosure, when acted upon, became a fraud upon the subscribers from an equitable point of view, accompanied by what they might treat as damage. For it is only by virtue of the innocent subscribers' position and the promoter's invitation that the corporation has any pretense for a standing in court. If the promoters, after starting their scheme, had sold their stock before any subscriptions were taken, and then the purchasers of their stock, with notice, had invited the public to come in, and it did, we do not see how the company could maintain this suit. If it could not then, we do not see how it can now.

But it is said that from a business point of view, the agreement was not made merely to bind the corporation, as it then was, with only 40 shares issued, but to bind the corporation when it should have a capital of $3,750,000; and the implication is that practically this was a new and different corporation. Of course, legally speaking, a corporation does not change its identity by adding a cubit to its stature. The nominal capital of the corporation was the same when the contract was made and after the public had subscribed. Therefore, what must be meant is, as we have said, that the corporation got a new right from the fact that new men, who did not know what it had done, had put in their money and had become members. It is assumed in argument that the new members had no ground for a suit in their own names, but it is assumed also that their position changed that of the corporation, and thus that the indirect effect of their acts was greater than the direct; that facts that gave them no claim gave one to the corporation because of them, notwithstanding its assent. We shall not consider whether the new members had a personal claim of any kind, and therefore we deal with the case without prejudice to that question, and without taking advantage of what we understand the petitioner to concede.

But, if we are to leave technical law on one side, and approach the case from what is supposed to be a business point of view, there are new matters to be taken into account. If the corporation recovers, all the stockholders, guilty as well as innocent, get the benefit. It is answered that the corporation is not precluded from recovering for a fraud upon it, because the party committing the fraud is a stockholder. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Bigelow, 188 Mass. 315, 327, 108 Am.St.Rep. 479, 74 N.E. 653. If there had been innocent members at the time of the sale, the fact that there were also guilty ones would not prevent a recovery, and even might not be a sufficient reason for requiring all the guilty members to be joined as defendants in order to avoid a manifest injustice. Stockton v. Anderson, 40 N.J.Eq. 486, 4 A. 642. The same principle is thought to apply when innocent members are brought in later under a scheme. But it is obvious that this answer falls back upon the technical diversity between the corporation and its members, which the business point of view is supposed to transcend, as it must, in order to avoid the objection that the corporation has assented to the sale with full notice of the facts. It is mainly on this diversity that the answer to the objection of injustice is based in New Sombrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, L.R. 5 Ch.Div. 73, 114, 122.

Let us look at the business aspect alone. The syndicate was a party to the scheme to make a profit out of the corporation. Whether or not there was a subordinate fraud committed by Bigelow and Lewisohn on the agreement with them, as the petitioner believes, is immaterial to the corporation. The issue of the stock was apparent, we presume, on the books, so that it is difficult to suppose that at least some members of the syndicate, representing an adverse interest, did not know what was done. But all the members were engaged in the plan of buying for less and selling to the corporation for more, and were subject to whatever equity the corporation has against Bigelow and the estate of Lewisohn. There was some argument to the contrary, but this seems to us the fair meaning of the bill. Bigelow and Lewisohn, it is true, divided the stock received for the real estate now in question. But that was a matter between them and the syndicate. The real estate was bought from Keyser by the syndicate, along with his stock in the Baltimore company, and was sold by the syndicate to the petitioner, along with the Baltimore company's property, as part of the scheme. The syndicate was paid for it, whoever received the stock. And this means that 2/15 of the stock of the corporation, the 20,000 shares sold to the public, are to be allowed to use the name of the corporation to assert rights against Lewisohn's estate that will inure to the benefit of 13/15 of the stock that are totally without claim. It seems to us that the practical objection is as strong as that arising if we adhere to the law.

Let us take the business point of view for a monent longer. To the lay mind it would make little or no difference whether the 20,000 shares sold to the public were sold on an original subscription to the articles of incorporation or were issued under the scheme to some of the syndicate and sold by them. Yet it is admitted, in accordance with the decisions, that in the latter case, the innocent purchasers would have no claim against anyone. If we are to seek what is called substantial justice, in disregard of even peremptory rules of law, it would seem desirable to get a rule that would cover both of the almost equally possible cases of what is deemed a wrong. It might be said that if the stock really was taken as a preliminary to selling to the public, the subscribers would show a certain confidence in the enterprise, and give at least that security for good faith. But the syndicate believed in the enterprise, notwithstanding all the profits that they made it pay. They preferred to take stock at par rather than cash. Moreover, it would have been possible to issue the whole stock in payment for the property purchased, with an understanding as to 20,000 shares.

Of course, it is competent for legislators, but not, we think, for judges, except by a quasi legislative declaration, to establish that a corporation shall not be bound by its assent in a transaction of this kind, when the parties contemplate an invitation to the public to come in and join as original subscribers for any portion of the shares. It may be said that the corporation cannot be bound until the contemplated adverse interest is represented, or it may be said that promoters cannot strip themselves of the character of trustees until that moment. But it seems to us a strictly legislative determination. It is difficult, without inventing new and qualifying established doctrines, to go behind the fact that the corporation remains one and the same after once it really exists. When, as here, after it really exists, it consents, we at least shall require stronger equities than are shown by this bill to allow it to renew its claim at a later date because its internal constitution has changed.

To sum up: In our opinion, on the one hand, the plaintiff cannot recover without departing from the fundamental conception embodied in the law that created it,—the conception that a corporation remains unchanged and unaffected in its identity by changes in its members. Donnell v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co., 208 U.S. 267, 273, ante, 288, 28 S.Ct. 288; Salomon v. A. Salomon & Co. [1897] A.C. 22, 30. On the other hand, if we should undertake to look through fiction to facts, it appears to us that substantial justice would not be accomplished, but rather a great injustice done, if the corporation were allowed to disregard its previous assent in order to charge a single member with the whole results of a transaction to which 13/15 of its stock were parties, for the benefit of the guilty, if there was guilt in anyone, and the innocent alike. We decide only what is necessary. We express no opinion as to whether the defendant properly is called a promoter, or whether the plaintiff has not been guilty of laches, or whether a remedy can be had for a part of a single transaction in the form in which it is sought, or whether there was any personal claim on the part of the innocent subscribers, or as to any other question than that which we have discussed.

The English case chiefly relied upon, Erlanger v. Now Sombrero Phosphate Co., L.R. 3 App.Cas. 1218, affirming L.R. 5 Ch.Div. 73, seems to us far from establishing a different doctrine for that jurisdiction. There, to be sure, a syndicate had made an agreement to sell, at a profit, to a company to be got up by the sellers. But the company, at the first stage, was made up mainly of outsiders, some of them instruments of the sellers, but innocent instruments, and, according to Lord Cairns, the contract was provisional on the shares being taken and the company formed. (P. 1239.) There never was a moment when the company had assented with knowledge of the facts. The shares, with perhaps one exception, all were taken by subscribers ignorant of the facts (L.R. 5 Ch.Div. 113), and the contract seems to have reached forward to the moment when they subscribed. As it is put in 2 Morawetz, Priv.Corp. 2d ed. § 292, there was really no company till the shares were issued. Here, 13/15 of the stock had been taken by the syndicate, the corporation was in full life, and had assented to the sale with knowledge of the facts before an outsider joined. There, most of the syndicate were strangers to the corporation, yet all were joined as defendants. (P. 1222.) Here, the members of the syndicate, although members of the corporation, are not joined, and it is sought to throw the burden of their act upon a single one. Gluckstein v. Barnes [1900] A.C. 240, certainly is no stronger for the plaintiff, and in Yeiser v. United States Board & Paper Co., 52 L.R.A. 724, 46 C.C.A. 567, 107 Fed. 340, another case that was relied upon, the transaction equally was carried through after innocent subscribers had paid for stock.

NOTE

(A) A corporation may recover secret profits made by some of its promoters and cause the stock issued to them for their services to be surrendered for cancellation, where there were innocent and deceived promoter-subscribers, at the time the property was taken over by the corporation. Davis v. Las Ovas Company, 227 U.S. 80, 33 S.Ct. 197, 57 L.Ed. 426, 1913.

(B) Secret profits are frequently made by the disposal of stock which the promoter receives in exchange for property sold to the corporation at an excessive valuation and without full disclosure to the interested parties. Now, what if this stock for some reason be invalid or void?" Note, 1923, 23 Col.L.Rev. 476, 477.

(C) There has been a radical difference of opinion as to the promoter's liability to a suit brought by the corporation if his transfer was made when the corporation is composed of the promoters or of shareholders entirely conversant with the transaction. The Supreme Court has refused to permit recovery by the corporation even where the fraudulent intention of bringing in new shareholders existed, provided full disclosure was made to all members of the corporation at the time of the transaction. On the same transaction, however, the Massachusetts court held one of the promoters concerned liable to suit by the corporation to recover secret profits. There is no conflict, however, if any existing shareholders or subscribers are kept in ignorance of the profit or prospective profit and disclosure is made only to the promotion group in control.

In Davis v. Las Ovas Co., Inc., it was held by the Supreme Court that there is a right of action in the corporation itself against promoters guilty of fraud, if there are at the time any innocent shareholders or subscribers who are ignorant of the scheme to make a secret profit. "The standing of the corporation results from the fact that there were innocent and deceived members of the corporation when the property was taken over by it." Recovery by the corporation is not defeated by the fact that it will inure to the benefit of the guilty as well as the innocent members. This decision, and the more recent McCandless case, have greatly weakened the authority of the Lewisohn case. The reductio ad absurdum of that famous case is seen in an Arizona decision, that a single deceived shareholder, although he may have sold his shares subsequent to the transaction, is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of a corporate right of action. These requirements have also been satisfied by the existence of "equitable shareholders," where the outside deceived parties have merely subscribed or agreed to take shares from the corporation. The deceived subscribers are regarded as real parties in interest. It is said that to the extent that they were injured, "it was an injury to the corporation as representing their collective or corporate interests."

The fallacy underlying Justice Holmes' opinion in the Lewisohn case seems to lie in the assumption that the sole duty of the promoter is toward the few insiders who may for the moment constitute the company, and that disclosure to them of a purchase at an exorbitant price in money or shares will suffice to bind the corporation, when the whole point of the scheme is that the profit shall be obtained from the money to be derived from incoming investors on a fraudulent set-up. * * *

It was held by the United States Supreme Court, as we have seen, in Old Dominion Copper Mining & Smelting Co. v. Lewisohn, that no right of action arises in favor of the corporation on these facts. This view has been followed by some state courts. The doctrine of Justice Holmes was briefly that as the only existing shareholders, the promoter and his associates, assented to their own profit with full knowledge of the scheme at the time of the transaction, no wrong was then done to anyone, and the rights of the corporation are not increased when innocent subscribers subsequently are induced to come in. The wrong, if any, is personal to the individuals for fraud in the sale of shares to them. But this is practically a denial of justice. The small shareholder is barred by expenses of litigation, from asserting his individual wrong. The Massachusetts court and a majority of other state courts have recognized a right of action in the corporation for the benefit of all in such cases. Ballantine, Corporations (Callaghan & Co., 1946) 835–838.

(D) Under the New York General Corporation Law § 61,[5] a stockholder, in order to bring suit on behalf of a corporation, must show that "at the time of the transaction of which he complains" he was a stockholder or that his stock thereafter devolved upon him by operation of law. Does this section, in effect, abrogate the application of the Massachusetts rule in New York?

McCANDLESS v. FURLAUD.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1935. 296 U.S. 140, 56 S.Ct. 41, 80 L.Ed. 121.

Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review a decree reversing a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York in favor of complainant in a suit by the receiver of an insolvent corporation to compel its promoters and their confederates to restore illicit gains.

[Maxime Furlaud was president and principal stockholder of Furlaud & Co., Inc., an investment banking corporation now dissolved. Kingston Corporation was a subsidiary of Furlaud & Co., owned and controlled by the same interests. Byron Co. and Chaucer Co. were closely related corporations.

Furlaud, through an agent, procured options to purchase gas lands in Western Pennsylvania for $2,572,989. The lands were fraudulently appraised at $7,000,000, and were actually worth about $2,700,000.

The Duquesne Gas Corporation (hereinafter referred to as Duquesne) was organized by the promoters' syndicate to purchase and operate the gas fields, with an authorized capital of 1,000 shares of no-par common stock, the entire issue being taken by Furlaud at 50¢ a share.

The promoters then advertised for subscriptions to bonds and notes to be issued by the corporation, representing in the circular that the issue was to finance the acquisition of land appraised at $7,000,000, and to provide cash for its development. The public issue was to consist of $4,000,000 of 6% mortgage bonds, to be sold at 97½% and $1,000,000 of 6½% mortgage notes to be sold at 98%.

The directors of Duquesne authorized a capital stock increase of 1,250,000 shares, of which Furlaud subscribed for 139,000 at 50¢ per share; Furlaud & Co. thus holding 140,000 shares of the entire stock issue.

Duquesne agreed to take over the gas fields from Kingston Co., the option holder, for $3,015,000 cash; $1,300,000 par value bonds, and 535,000 shares of no-par stock. Furlaud & Co. was to take the entire issue of mortgage notes at 88% and $2,700,000 of the mortgage bonds at 90%. The entire issue of mortgage bonds was thus divided between Furlaud & Co. and its subsidiary.

The promoters then sold the notes and bonds to the public, at a large profit to themselves.

As a result of the entire transaction, Duquesne had land worth about $2,500,000 and a working capital of $365,000. It had received $3,379,000, but had paid out $3,015,000 at once to the promoters for the gas fields. Its liabilities were stock, notes, and bonds; the bonds and notes being liens for $5,000,000, more than $2,000,000 above the cost of all its assets and working capital.

In two years, the company was in receivership. The receiver instituted this suit to recover the promoters' profits. The District Judge held the promoters liable for profits derived from the sale of the bonds and notes.[6] The judgment was reversed on appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals.[7] The case now comes to the Supreme Court on writ of certiorari.]

MR. JUSTICE CARDOZO delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * Promoters of a corporation stand in a fiduciary relation to it to this extent at least, that they will be chargeable as trustees if they deal with it unconscionably or oppressively or in violation of a statute, unless the liability for such misconduct has been effectually released. Dickerman v. Northern Trust Co., 176 U.S. 181, 203, 204, 20 S.Ct. 311, 44 L.Ed. 423; Brewster v. Hatch, 122 N.Y. 349, 362, 25 N.E. 505, 19 Am.St.Rep. 498; Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phospate Co., 3 A.C. 1218; affirming 5 Ch.Div. 73; Gluckstein v. Barnes, [1900] A.C. 240; Yeiser v. United States Board & Paper Co., C.C.A., 107 F. 340, 344, 52 L.R.A. 724. To what extent the approval of all the shareholders will relieve them of that burden is a question not susceptible of answer without considering the nature of the wrong and the interests affected. To some extent their position is akin to that of directors, though the limits of their duty are less definite and certain. Even for erring directors, however, there may at times be absolution if all the shareholders are satisfied. Holmes, Booth & Haydens v. Willard, 125 N.Y. 75, 25 N.E. 1083, 11 L.R.A. 170. The interests affected by approval will shape the power to approve.

Old Dominion Copper Mining & Smelting Co. v. Lewisohn was a case where promoters made a sale to a corporation in return for shares of stock; the par value of the shares being greatly in excess of the cost to the sellers of the property conveyed. The existence of this profit was known to the shareholders, for the shares belonging to the promoters were all that had then been issued. There was no evidence that the effect of the transaction was to make the company insolvent or to work a fraud upon its creditors or to divert the assets to forbidden uses or to violate a statute. "At the time of the sale to the plaintiff * * * there was no wrong done to any one." Id., 210 U.S. 206, at page 212, 28 S.Ct. 634, 636, 52 L.Ed. 1025. The grantors and their syndicate "were on both sides of the bargain, and they might issue to themselves as much stock in their corporation as they liked in exchange for their conveyance of their land." Id., 210 U.S. 206, at page 212, 28 S.Ct. 634, 636, 52 L.Ed. 1025. Far from planning to defraud, they "believed in the enterprise" and "preferred to take stock at par rather than cash." Id., 210 U.S. 206, at page 215, 28 S.Ct. 634, 637, 52 L.Ed. 1025. They had paid for the mines with their own money, and there were no creditors to be affected by anything they did. In such circumstances the ruling was that incoming shareholders, subscribing for new shares, were in the plight of those ahead of them and could have no better case. Davis v. Las Ovas Co., 227 U.S. 80, 33 S.Ct. 197, 57 L.Ed., 426, declined to extend the ruling to a case where the approval was by less than all the shareholders and without disclosure of the facts to others.

Old Dominion Copper Mining & Smelting Co. v. Lewisohn does not rule the case at hand. The effect of the promoters' conduct here was to saddle the company with liens beyond the value of its assets, mortgaged and unmortgaged. Through the diversion of the proceeds of the subscriptions to the use of Furlaud and confederates, the company became crippled and, indeed, insolvent at the outset of its business life. True, the findings of the District Court do not state in so many words that the company in its beginnings was insolvent as well as crippled. They do state, however, that the appraisals were grossly and fraudulently and wantonly excessive. Cost in and of itself, though far from conclusive, is still evidence of value (Parmenter v. Fitzpatrick, 135 N.Y. 190, 199, 31 N.E. 1032), especially where there is no market value in the strict or proper sense (Sinclair Refining Co. v. Jenkins Petroleum Process Co., 289 U.S. 689, 697, 53 S.Ct. 736, 77 L.Ed. 1449, 88 A.L.R. 496). In this case a witness for the complainant places a valuation upon the property in substantial correspondence with the cost. There is no opposing evidence in behalf of the defendants, and so the District Judge points out. In that state of the record, the promoters had the burden of answering and repelling the inculpatory evidence by proof that they had been true to their fiduciary duties and that their conduct had been fair and just. Geddes v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., 254 U.S. 590, 599, 41 S.Ct. 209, 65 L.Ed. 425; In re Smith, 95 N.Y. 516, 522; Allen v. La Vaud, 213 N.Y. 322, 326, 107 N.E. 570. The public had been invited to invest in the securities on the representation that the proceeds would be used for the purchase of the lands and for cash capital necessary or useful for the business. In fact, about three-fifths of the money was applied to the designated uses, the rest being kept for the use of the promoters. If this could be done without cutting down the value of the assets below the mortgage debt, the act would be so near to magic as to call for explanation from promoters not professing to be magicians. No word of explanation was offered at the trial or is now suggested in the briefs. In those conditions, only one legitimate inference was open to the trier of the facts, and this he must be taken to have drawn. The appraisals having been shown to be fraudulent, the one legitimate inference to be drawn from the defendants' silence was that the value of the lands was not greater than the cost, at least in any large amount. If that be so, the company was made insolvent at the outset when the proceeds of the subscriptions were devoted to the use of the promoters.

No consent of shareholders could make such conduct lawful when challenged by the receiver as the representative of creditors. If the shareholders and the directors had combined with the promoters to despoil the corporation and defeat the remedies of creditors by a gift of half the assets, the gift could have been annulled either by the creditors directly or in their behalf by a receiver. Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U.S. 467, 489, 490, 24 L.Ed. 779; Atlantic Trust Co. v. Chapman, 208 U.S. 360, 371, 28 S.Ct. 406, 52 L.Ed. 528, 13 Ann.Cas. 1155; Hamor v. Taylor-Rice Engineering Co., C.C., 84 F. 392, 399; American Can Co. v. Erie Preserving Co., C.C., 171 F. 540, 542; Sweet v. Lang, D.C., 14 F.2d 758, 760; Gillet v. Moody, 3 N.Y. 479; Pittsburg Carbon Co. v. McMillin, 119 N.Y. 46, 53, 23 N.E. 530, 7 L.R.A. 46. The distinction between such a situation and the present is one solely of degree. This is not a case where at the time of issuing the securities the shareholders and the promoters were the only ones concerned. Here at the moment of the conveyance the interests of bondholders and noteholders were put in jeopardy by a division of the proceeds that would make their mortgage worthless. The promoters could not receive for themselves or deliver to subscribers the bonds and notes of the company secured by deed of trust until title had been acquired to the lands covered by the deed. On the other hand, they could not pay the purchase price and acquire title to the lands without the proceeds of subscriptions, the contributions of the public. All this was known to the shareholders and known to the directors, for the promoters were the shareholders and the directors men of straw. In its effect upon subscribers the transaction was the same as if the proceeds of the bonds and notes had been paid into the treasury of the company and then paid out to the directors for the use of their confederates. It was not within the power of the shareholders to legalize this waste to the detriment of others. It would not have been within their power to bring that result to pass, though shareholders and promoters had been different persons, acting at arm's length. Still more clearly it was not within their power when shareholders and promoters were in substance the same persons. Cf. California-Calaveras Mining Co. v. Walls, 170 Cal. 285, 299, 149 P. 595; Pittsburgh Mining Co. v. Spooner, 74 Wis. 307, 42 N.W. 259, 17 Am.St.Rep. 149. Consent in such conditions, so far as it gives approval to conduct in fraud of the rights of others, is a word and nothing more. It is not in concord with realities. There is no occasion to consider whether the corporation itself at the instance of new shareholders would be permitted to disaffirm the fraud and maintain a suit in equity for appropriate relief. We put that question by. Enough that the receiver has the requisite capacity. A court of equity has taken hold of the assets of this company, intangible assets as well as tangible, for administration as a trust in accordance with equitable principles. Hollins v. Brierfield Coal & Iron Co., 150 U.S. 371, 380, 14 S.Ct. 127, 37 L.Ed. 1113. Included in those assets are moneys fraudulently diverted to the prejudice of creditors. Cf. McClure v. Law, 161 N.Y. 78, 55 N.E. 388, 76 Am.St.Rep. 262; Bosworth v. Allen, 168 N.Y. 157, 166, 61 N.E. 163, 55 L.R.A. 751, 85 Am.St.Rep.

667. There is power at the instance of the receiver to bring them back into the trust.

These considerations without more would separate Old Dominion Copper Mining & Smelting Co. v. Lewisohn from the case before us now. Other aspects of the present case accentuate the division. What was done by the promoters here was in the teeth of a prohibition of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, the state where the corporation was formed and where its business was to be done. The Constitution of Pennsylvania provides (article 16, § 7): "No corporation shall issue stocks or bonds except for money, labor done, or money or property actually received; and all fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness shall be void." See, also, Act April 17, 1876, P.L. 30, 32, § 4; Purdon's Penna. Stats., title 15, § 131, 15 P.S.Pa. § 131. The prohibition is not escaped through the receipt of some property or money if the amount or value is inadequate. Big Spring Electric Co. v. Kitzmiller, 268 Pa. 34, 38, 110 A. 783; Commonwealth v. Reading Traction Co., 204 Pa. 151, 53 A. 755; In re Wyoming Valley Ice Co., D.C., 153 F. 787, 793, affirmed sub nom. Wiegand v. Albert Lewis Lumber & Mfg. Co., C.C. A., 158 F. 608, 610. True, the securities are valid in the hands of innocent purchasers, whatever the consideration (Guarantee Title & Trust Co. v. Dilworth Coal Co., 235 Pa. 594, 84 A. 516), but the liability of the directors or other fiduciaries who have put them into circulation is not thereby released. There are decisions in Pennsylvania that the Constitution is not self-executing. Grange National Bank v. Collman, 306 Pa. 200, 159 A. 26. That holding is irrelevant as to corporations such as this one, for there exists as to them an "implementing" statute (Purdon's Penna. Stats., supra), without restriction as to the form of remedy. Precedents exist for a suit at the instance of incoming shareholders, though the corporation was solvent and there was no injury to creditors. Spangler Brewing Co. v. McHenry, 242 Pa. 522, at page 530, 89 A. 665. Precedents exist in cases of insolvency for a suit by a trustee as the representative of creditors, and this though they became such after the securities were issued. Bingaman v. Commonwealth Trust Co., 15 F.2d 119, D.C.M.D.Pa., and cases there collected. Cf. Coleman v. Tepel, 230 F. 63, 70 C.C.A. 3, affirming, D. C., 229 F. 300; In re Wyoming Valley Ice Co., supra; Krebs v. Oberrender, 274 Pa. 154, 118 A. 19; Finletter v. Acetylene Light, Heat & Power Co., 215 Pa. 86, 64 A. 429. Nowhere is it held that delinquent fiduciaries who have nullified the statute may keep the profits for themselves when creditors will be injured unless the profits are returned. At times and for certain purposes the consent of shareholders may give validity to acts that would otherwise be voidable, if the only interests affected are those of the shareholders consenting. It can never be operative to the prejudice of others where consent is in derogation of the public policy of the state or the prohibition of a statute. Central Transportation Co. v. Pullman's Palace-Car Co., 139 U. S. 24, 59, 60, 11 S.Ct. 478, 35 L.Ed. 55; Kent v. Quicksilver Mining Co., 78 N.Y. 159, 185, 186, 187; Sheldon Hat Blocking Co. v. Eickemeyer Hat Blocking Mach. Co., 90 N.Y. 607, 613; Mann v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. [H.L.] 68 L.T.,N.S., 96; Society of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, 2 Beav. 560, 568. This case is plainly within the scope of that exception. There was here a statutory prohibition, rooted in public policy. Gearhart v. Standard Steel Car Co., 223 Pa. 385, 389, 72 A. 699. The shareholders were not at liberty, at all events to the prejudice of creditors or other shareholders, present or prospective, to set that policy at naught. If the effect of what they did was to put illicit profits in the pockets of trustees, their consent will not avail to block pursuit and reclamation.

We have assumed in all this that the corporation was insolvent at the beginning of its business life. The assumption is well founded for reasons already stated, yet we do not need to go so far. Even though the company was not literally insolvent, the result would be the same. There would be a wrong to bondholders and noteholders if assets were depleted to the very brink of insolvency after fraudulent misrepresentations to the effect that there was an ample margin of security. What was taken out of the company in such circumstances would be taken subject to a trust and would so continue until the security thus depleted had paid the debt in full. The defendants do not assert that it is adequate for that today. Confusion of thought is inevitable unless the position of the wrongdoers as trustees is steadily kept in mind. What is here is something more than a tort of fraudulent representations to be redressed by the recovery of damages at the suit of the defrauded creditors. What is here is a tort growing out of the fraudulent depletion of the assets by men chargeable as trustees if they have failed to act with honor. There are important differences, moreover, between an overissue of stock, which may leave the assets unimpaired, and a withdrawal of cash, which puts the enterprise in peril. Cf. Arnold v. Searing, 78 N.J.Eq. 146, 162, 78 A. 762; Id., 73 N.J.Eq. 262, 265, 266, 67 A. 831; Eureka Mining, Smelting & Power Co. v. Lively, 59 Wash. 550, 110 P. 425. The duty of reclaiming assets so diverted and holding the wrongdoers to their duty as trustees is one that rests on the receiver. It is not within the power of wrongdoers and shareholders by any compact between themselves to make the duty less.

In considering the effect of Old Dominion Copper Mining & Smelting Co. v. Lewisohn, we have spoken until now of the bonds and notes only. It is necessary at this point to say something about the stock. Of the total issue, 535,000 shares went to Kingston as a bonus. The only pretense of value was a conveyance of the gas fields covered by the options, which were worth, as we have seen, no more than Kingston paid for them. In return for the conveyance of these lands, Kingston received $3,015,000 in cash, or more than the actual value of anything conveyed. It also received bonds of the par value of $1,300,000; and last of all the stock. Plainly the stock was a bonus and nothing else.

Furlaud and Kingston, having made themselves parties to a scheme whereby Duquesne was to be despoiled and its creditors were to be defrauded, became accountable, we think, for everything that came to them as a result of the conspiracy in excess of the consideration furnished on their side. They were not trustees as to the bonds and notes, and lawful owners of the shares, but trustees as to all; the transaction being a unit, infected with a common vice. Everything of profit arising out of the abused relation must now be yielded up. Even after this is done, reparation will be incomplete. Restitution of the profits will not make up, without more, for the inadequacy of the overvalued land to return to the lienors their principal and interest. In such circumstances the shares, like the bonds and notes, must contribute what they can. The certificates, were they on hand, might be turned into the treasury of the company for sale, if they still had any value. The shares having been sold to others and the certificates being no longer subject to the mandate of the court, the trust that attached to them has been transferred to the proceeds, which, when paid to the receiver, will be used like other assets in reduction of the debts.

We are not unmindful of the contention that the sale by Kingston was at the rate of 50 cents a share (which for 85,000 shares would amount to $42,500), and that the sale for $850,000 was made by two other corporations, the Byron and the Chaucer. In view of the initial fraud, the burden was on Kingston and Furlaud to show that Byron and Chaucer were purchasers in due course, and not agents and confederates wearing the cloak of purchasers. King v. Doane, 139 U.S. 166, 173, 11 S.Ct. 465, 35 L.Ed. 84; Canajoharie National Bank v. Diefendorf, 123 N.Y. 191, 204, 205, 25 N.E. 402, 10 L.R.A. 676; Seymour v. McKinstry, 106 N.Y. 230, 240, 12 N.E. 348, 14 N.E. 94. We think that Byron and Chaucer were subject to an equal burden. Many suspicious circumstances point to guilty knowledge and justify a holding that the burden has not been borne. * * *

We find it immaterial that the defendants or some of them may be liable to creditors in common-law actions to recover damages for false representations as to the value of the assets. That is not the basis of the suit before us now. Moreover, the question is not here whether restitution of illicit profits as the outcome of this suit may be proved to mitigate the damages in actions by other plaintiffs, if any such there are. As we have striven to make clear, the receiver does not claim to have succeeded to the rights of bondholders or noteholders to recover damages for deceit. The wrong that is here redressed is the unlawful depletion of the assets whereby the company was made insolvent and the creditors were defrauded of their lawful rights and remedies.

The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals reversing the decree of the District Court and dismissing the bill of complaint is reversed.

The decree of the District Court is modified by increasing the recovery against the defendants Maxime H. Furlaud and the Kingston Corporation in the sum of $850,000, with interest from June 6, 1930, when the shares of stock were sold, and by the award of judgment against the Byron Corporation in the sum of $425,000, with interest from June 6, 1930, and against the Chaucer Corporation for the same amount.

There will be a further modification by the allowance to the defendants Furlaud and the Kingston Corporation of so much of the sum of $300,000 as may be found on an accounting to have been disbursed for expenses that are chargeable in equity to the Duquesne Corporation, unless the amount of such allowance is fixed by agreement, approved by the court to which the receiver is accountable, in which event the judgment against those defendants shall be reduced accordingly.

The decree of the District Court as thus modified is affirmed.

It is so ordered.

MR. JUSTICE ROBERTS, dissenting.

I think that the decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals should be affirmed. I concur in the view that the promoters of Duquesne Gas Corporation took an unconscionable profit which they reaped at the expense of a credulous and avid purchasing public. This fact, however much it may invite animadversion, ought not to induce the courts to disregard settled principles in an effort to deprive the respondents of the fruits of their scheme.

An examination of the pleadings and the facts found leads me to the conclusion that the receiver of the corporation is without standing to recover from the promoters.

The bill recites in somewhat different sequence the facts which are set out in the opinion of the court. It does not state that the properties were not worth the amount in bonds, stocks, and cash which the Duquesne Corporation paid for them. It fails to allege any fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the respondents to purchasers of bonds or stock of the corporation. The allegation is made that Furlaud & Co., Inc., was, in the sale of the securities, a house of issue, meaning, of course, that it purchased the securities and resold them for its own account. Although the facts pleaded demonstrate that for some time after the organization of the Duquesne Corporation, and the issuance of its bonds and stock, Furlaud & Co., Inc., by itself and its subsidiaries, was the owner of every share of stock and every bond issued and outstanding, the bill asseverates, first, that the profit obtained on the sales of securities was a secret profit for which Furlaud and associates are accountable to the receiver, and, secondly, that they stood in a fiduciary relation to Duquesne and "caused all the proceeds of the sale of the bonds and notes in excess of $2,937,989, plus legitimate expenses, to be diverted from the Duquesne Corporation for whose use and benefit the proceeds of the sale of said bonds and notes were intended and defendants Furlaud and Reuter fraudulently misappropriated said moneys to their own use." The last assertion is the nearest approach to an allegation of agency or trust for or on behalf of the corporation. The prayer is for an accounting by the defendants of the moneys received by them, apparently on the theory that such moneys were received as agents for the corporation. On its face the pleading is self-contradictory. If what the defendants took constituted promoters' profits, the bill discloses that these were not secret profits taken to the disadvantage of innocent stockholders who had been brought into the corporation. Furlaud & Co. and the other defendants were on both sides of the transaction, and cannot be said to have deceived themselves as stockholders and bondholders and, upon familiar principles, those who took title to stock or bonds through them cannot assert rights higher than theirs. If, on the other hand, Furland & Co. was a house of issue, dealing on its own account, it cannot have been an agent of Duquesne for the sale of bonds and stock.

The District Court denied a motion to make the pleading more specific and certain, and the cause went to trial on the bill and answers. The proofs disclosed in detail the mechanics of the transaction whereby the promoters, at an expenditure of something in excess of $3,000,000, acquired $4,000,000 par value of first mortgage bonds, $1,000,000 of secured notes, and 675,000 shares of no-par common stock. Evidence was offered to prove that, at the date of the transfer, the property acquired was worth not to exceed $2,700,000. The defendants objected to this evidence on the ground that it was unsupported by any allegation in the bill. The court, nevertheless, received the proof and relied upon it for certain conclusions. There was also evidence that in the bond circulars issued by the defendants as a house of issue, and by a syndicate of bankers formed by the defendants to sell the securities to the public, these statements were made: That the properties had been appraised at something over $7,000,000 and that the bonds and notes were issued by the corporation "in connection with the acquisition of properties and to provide cash for developments, extensions and other corporate purposes." The proofs conclusively show, and it is not disputed, that Furlaud & Co., upon its individual credit and that of its subsidiary, the Kingston Corporation, obtained the funds with which to make settlement for the bonds, notes, and stock with the Duquesne Corporation and reimbursed themselves for these loans out of moneys paid by brokers in the purchase of the securities.

It is quite true that Furlaud & Co., Inc. had, prior to receipt of the bonds, notes, and stock, arranged for the sale of the bulk of the bonds to brokerage houses when, if, and as issued. This, however, is not an uncommon method of dealing, and in itself is insignificant so far as the fairness or unfairness of the transaction goes.

In its final analysis the situation comes, as the District Court indicated, to this: That Furlaud & Co., Inc. advanced the purchase money for the gas properties, contributed $364,500 to Duquesne as working capital and in return received the securities. The court added that, if without the circuity here resorted to, Furlaud & Co., Inc. had thus bought the securities direct at an inordinately low price, they could have done with them as they pleased. It held that they could not do with them as they pleased because of the method of settlement with the corporation to which they resorted. There is no specific finding by the District Court of fraud or misrepresentation on the part of Furlaud & Co., Inc., in the sale of the bonds. What is said is that the circulars misrepresented the facts. There is no finding that any present bondholder relied on any misrepresentation. Although it is insisted that Duquesne was insolvent from the moment of the settlement with Furlaud & Co., Inc. there is no finding to that effect. The District Court held that the promoters stood in a fiduciary relation to the corporation. It made no finding that the purchasers of bonds and notes were induced to purchase by misrepresentation; made no finding of loss or damage to such purchasers; made no finding that the purchasers understood Furlaud & Co., Inc. were acting as agents for Duquesne in the sale of its securities, but reached the conclusion, without any evidence to support it, that those who purchased bonds and notes from the promoters understood that the money which they paid in the purchase of the securties was to go in solido into the treasury of Duquesne. A moment's reflection will show that this could not have been the case. The very circulars which were issued and on which the bonds were sold showed that they were not being sold for par and that commissions were being paid for their sale. It is quite evident from the circulars that these commissions were not being paid by Duquesne but by the brokers who were selling the bonds as principals.

Upon principle, and upon authority, the corporation had no cause of action in the circumstances against the promoters and the receiver's rights could rise no higher. * * *

The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals should be affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS, MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND, and MR. JUSTICE BUTLER concur in this opinion.[8]

Does Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 58 S.Ct. 817, 1938. Affect the federal rule?

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, 1940. 136 Me. 454, 12 A.2d 592.

THAXTER, JUSTICE. This is a bill in equity brought by five preferred stockholders of the Utah Power & Light Company, a Maine corporation, for an accounting by the Electric Power & Light Corporation, another Maine corporation, of certain alleged secret promoters' profits claimed to be held by the Electric Power & Light Corporation which it had received in part from its predecessor in title, the Utah Securities Corporation, a Virginia corporation, one of the original promoters in the organization of the Utah Power & Light Company, and in part in direct payments. Other relief such as cancellation of the common stock of Utah Power & Light Company, claimed to have been issued without consideration, or the payment for it is asked for. The plaintiffs bring the bill on behalf of themselves and of any stockholders who may wish to join and on behalf of the defendant, the Utah Power & Light Company.

The defendants demurred both generally and specially. These demurrers were sustained and a decree was entered dismissing the bill as to both defendants with costs. From such decree the plaintiffs have appealed. * * *

But there is another more fundamental reason why the plaintiffs cannot prevail. They are preferred stockholders and do not hold both preferred and common stock as was the case in Mason v. Carrothers, supra. Under the facts set forth in the bill it is impossible to see how they have been damaged by the acts complained of. At the time when preferred stock was offered to the public there was outstanding

$5,726,312.51 indebtedness of the corporation, and it had issued preferred stock of a par value of $3,000,000. Against this it had property which the bill concedes cost the promoters $14,146,740.51. There was therefore an equity represented by junior securities of $5,420,428.11. What did it matter to the plaintiffs whether that equity was represented by one share, or by 310,000, or by more than that? There might possibly have been an effect on voting control but the bill does not allege concealment from the plaintiffs of the amount of stock outstanding, but only of the want of consideration received for it. As a matter of fact if junior stock was issued, if for any consideration at all, the plaintiffs were benefited rather than harmed; for the protection back of their own investment was increased by the value of such property irrespective of the amount of securities issued against it.

There is nothing in this bill to show that the shares of stock issued to these promoters in any way impaired the security of the plaintiffs' stock or any preference to which it was entitled. The preferred stockholders so far as the bill indicates had no interest in the share of the corporate assets of those holding securities junior to theirs, nor in the earnings which might accrue over and above the amount necessary to satisfy the dividends on the preferred stock. The preferred stockholder was given no bonus of common stock as in the case of Mason v. Carrothers, supra. A plaintiff, who can show no injury to himself by reason of the facts of which he complains, surely has no standing in court. For a discussion of the rights of preferred stockholders in this situation see an article by A. A. Berle, Jr., 42 Harv.L.Rev. 748, 759–762. * * *

The plaintiffs do suggest in their brief that they have suffered an injury in that the cushion of protection behind their investment was not what it was represented to be. They do not claim any direct misrepresentation. But they suggest that they had a right to assume that the 300,000 shares of common stock and the 78,370 of second preferred represented $37,837,000 of assets. Assuming it all to be true they nowhere allege that their stock is worth any less than they paid for it. But beyond this counsel cite no case holding that a preferred stockholder has any absolute right to compel common stockholders to pay in full for the common stock issued to them, nor is any such case not based on a statute likely to be found. * * *

Appeal dismissed.

Decree dismissing the bill with costs affirmed.

BALL v. BREED, ELLIOTT & HARRISON.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1923. 294 F. 227.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Suit in equity by Wilbur L. Ball, receiver of the Haytian American Corporation, against Breed, Elliott & Harrison. From a decree dismissing the complaint, and an order denying its motion to amend the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Decree affirmed, and appeal from an order denying the motion for leave to amend dismissed.

[Defendant, another bank, and one Tippenhauer made certain secret agreements in the process of promoting the Haytian-American Corporation. The banks were to make a profit of $1,100,000 and Tippenhauer was to receive all the common stock, 60,000 shares to be issued. The bankers were also to have the exclusive right to buy 55,000 shares of preferred stock at par. After the agreements were executed, a syndicate was formed at the bankers' instigation. The bankers were to be its managers, and were to sell the preferred and some common stock when, as and if issued to the syndicate for $5,225,000. The company was organized; the bankers as individuals subscribed for the 55,000 preferred shares and appropriate entries were made on the corporate books. This suit was brought on the theory that the promoters' profits were made without the knowledge or consent of the corporation.]

MAYER, CIRCUIT JUDGE. * * * The ultimate fact upon which decision must rest is that the alleged secret profit was a matter of contract between Tippenhauer and the bankers, and as these owned all the preferred and all of the common and all of the founders' stock which was either subscribed for or intended to be issued, there were no persons having any rights to receive stock from the corporation. Thus there were no innocent stockholders. In other words, there was no fraud upon the corporation. * * * It is nowhere alleged as a fact, nor can it be inferred, that there were any innocent stockholders at the time of the transaction complained of. If, then, there was a fraud, it was not against the corporation, and a cause of action, if any, is personal to the purchasers of the stock. The fraud, if any, is what has been called a subsidiary fraud not affecting the corporation. Allowing to the complaint the most favorable inference, all that can be said is, as concisely stated by the District Court, that:

"These transactions between the defendants and the subscribers to their syndicate had nothing to do with the formation of the corporation, the syndicate subscribers only agreed with the syndicate managers to take what the managers get for them, and they got it through the managers."

Appellant puts forward the theory that, because of the dealings with the syndicate and the dealings of the members of the syndicate with the public prior to incorporation, therefore both the public and the syndicate members were equitable stockholders at the time of the transactions complained of. This theory is characterized by ingenuity rather than by substance, and in our view does not invite discussion.

In view of the conclusions stated, supra, we deem it unnecessary to discuss some other points which have been raised by the parties.

Decree affirmed, with costs, and appeal from order denying motion for leave to amend dismissed.[9]

The Securities Act of 1933, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77a and Form S-1, Item 5, Form S-2, Item 9 require full disclosure in the registration statement and prospectus of promoters' names, addresses, amounts received for services, etc. See, McGowan, Legal Controls of Corporate Promoters' Profits, 1937, 25 Geo.L.J. 269; Note, 1940, 28 Geo.L.J. 535.

B. MANAGEMENT IN OPERATION

1. FORMAL REQUISITES OF CORPORATE ACTION

NEW YORK GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

§ 27. Directors; qualifications; powers of majority. The business of a corporation shall be managed by its board of directors, all of whom shall be of full age and at least one of whom shall be a citizen of the United States and a resident of this state. Unless otherwise provided a majority of the board at a meeting duly assembled shall be necessary to constitute a quorum for the transaction of business and the act of a majority of the directors present at such a meeting shall be the act of the board. The by-laws may fix the number of directors necessary to constitute a quorum at a number less than a majority of the board, but not less than one-third of its number.

Subject to the by-laws, if any, adopted by the members of the corporation, the board may make necessary by-laws. If any by-law regulating an impending election of directors is adopted or amended or repealed by the board, there shall be set forth in the notice of the next meeting of the members of the corporation for the election of directors the by-law so adopted or amended or repealed, together with a concise statement of the changes made.

§ 28. Acts of directors. Whenever, under the provisions of any corporate law a corporation is authorized to take any action by its directors, action may be taken by the directors, regularly convened as a board, and acting by a majority of a quorum, except when otherwise expressly required by law or the by-laws and any such action shall be executed in behalf of the corporation by such officers as shall be designated by the board. Any business may be transacted by the board at a meeting at which every member of the board is present, though held without notice.

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 55. Directors, election of. The directors of every stock corporation shall be chosen at the time and place fixed by the by-laws of the corporation by a plurality of the votes at such election, provided that, except as to a special election as provided for in the general corporation law, the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law, or the by-laws, may fix the number of shares, not exceeding a majority, necessary to constitute a quorum. When cumulative voting is authorized by the certificate of incorporation or by any certificate filed pursuant to law, any provision regarding a quorum must be contained in such certificate. Each director shall be a stockholder unless otherwise provided in the certificate of incorporation, or in a by-law adopted by a stockholders' meeting. At least one-fourth in number of the directors of every stock corporation shall be elected annually. Notice of the time and place of holding any election of directors shall be given as prescribed in section forty-five. Vacancies in the board of directors shall be filled in the manner prescribed in the by-laws.

If the number of directors provided for in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law be indefinite, the number of directors to be chosen within the maximum and minimum limits shall be determined in the manner prescribed by the by-laws.

If, pursuant to section thirty-five or the by-laws, the number of directors be increased, the additional directors may be elected by a majority of the directors in office at the time of the increase, or, if not so elected prior to the next annual meeting of the stockholders, or if the by-laws so provide, they shall be elected by vote of the stockholders. If the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law provides that the directors be divided into two or more classes, whose terms of office shall respectively expire at different times, the additional directors shall be divided among such classes as nearly as practicable in proportion to the respective numbers of such directors constituting each class prior to such increase.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 9. Board of Directors; Qualifications; Powers; Classes; Committees of Directors:—The business of every corporation organized under the provisions of this Chapter shall be managed by a Board of Directors, except as hereinafter or in its Certificate of Incorporation otherwise provided. The number of directors which shall constitute the whole board shall be such as from time to time shall be fixed by, or in the manner provided in, the by-laws, but in no case shall the number be less than three. Directors need not be stockholders unless so required by the Certificate of Incorporation or the by-laws. The Directors shall hold office until their successors are respectively elected and qualified, and a majority of them shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, unless the by-laws shall provide that a different number shall constitute a quorum, which in no case shall be less than one-third of the total number of directors nor less than two directors. The Board of Directors may, by resolution or resolutions, passed by a majority of the whole board, designate one or more committees, each committee to consist of two or more of the directors of the corporation, which to the extent provided in said resolution or resolutions or in the by-laws of the corporation, shall have and may exercise the powers of the Board of Directors in the management of the business and affairs of the corporation, and may have power to authorize the seal of the corporation to be affixed to all papers which may require it. Such committee or committees shall have such name or names as may be stated in the by-laws of the corporation or as may be determined from time to time by resolution adopted by the Board of Directors. The directors of any corporation organized as aforesaid may, by the Certificate of Incorporation or any amendment thereto, or by a vote of the stockholders, be divided into one, two or three classes: the term of office of those of the first class to expire at the annual meeting next ensuing; of the second class one year thereafter; of the third class two years thereafter, and at each annual election held after such classification and election, directors shall be chosen for a full term, as the case may be, to succeed those whose terms expire. But the provisions of this Section shall not apply to corporations not for profit, for which it is desired to have no capital stock; and the business of every such corporation organized under the provisions of this Chapter shall be managed as provided in its Certificate of Incorporation. A Director of any corporation organized under the provisions of this Chapter, or a member of any Committee designated by the Board of Directors pursuant to authority conferred by this Chapter, shall in the performance of his duties be fully protected in relying in good faith upon the books of account or reports made to the corporation by any of its officials, or by an independent certified public accountant, or by an appraiser selected with reasonable care by the Board of Directors or by any such Committee, or in relying in good faith upon other records of the corporation.

Sec. 81. Waiver of Notices:—Whenever any notice whatever is required to be given under the provisions of this Chapter, or under the provisions of the certificate of incorporation or by-laws of any corporation organized under the provisions of this Chapter, a waiver thereof in writing, signed by the person or persons entitled to said notice, whether before or after the time stated therein, shall be deemed equivalent thereto. Whenever the vote of stockholders at a meeting thereof is required or permitted to be taken in connection with any corporate action, by any Section of this Chapter, the meeting and vote of stockholders may be dispensed with, if all of the stockholders who would have been entitled to vote upon the action if such meeting were held, shall consent in writing to such corporate action being taken, provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter or modify the provisions of Section 65 of this Chapter. In the event that the action which is consented to is such as would have required the filing of a certificate under any of the other sections of this Chapter, if such action had been voted upon by the stockholders at a meeting thereof, the certificate filed under such other section shall state that written consent has been given hereunder, in lieu of stating that the stockholders have voted upon the corporate action in question, if such last mentioned statement is required thereby.

(a) Directors Meetings

NOTE

The procedure by which Directors act is well settled by statute, charter provisions, By-Laws and decided cases. Every Director must have prescribed notice

(the courts excusing failure to give notice under exceptional circumstances where the notice would obviously be futile). The Directors must meet at least annually and have full opportunity for discussion and exchange of ideas; a quorum must be present. Where Directors meet without notice, the meeting is valid if all are present. The Directors may waive notice. Where charter or statutes permit, functions of the Board of Directors may be carried on by an Executive Committee.

But the human tendency to cut corners or to be slipshod is unvarying; and businessmen frequently have crowded days, conflicting engagements and an aversion to meeting and talking where their action is formal or the conclusion foregone. In consequence, the lawyer in practice not infrequently finds that the Board of Directors, commonly without bad intention, violates its rules of procedure in a number of ways. Of those, the most frequent are:

(a) Desire of a Director to assign someone else in his place to "represent him" at a meeting. This is plainly invalid: the Director as an individual was elected to the Board; he cannot pass on this function to any one else;

(b) The desire of Directors not to bother with meeting, but having made up their minds on action and exchanged ideas informally, either with each other or through a senior officer of the corporation, to have the Secretary write up a set of Minutes as though the meeting had been held; along with a waiver of notice of the meeting which the Directors sign. This makes a clear but, unhappily, a false record: waiver of notice by all Directors, the Minutes of a meeting which in fact never took place, authorizing action which nevertheless has general assent;

(c) The tendency to have a meeting on the spur of the moment because a number of Directors are handy and it is known that the absent Directors would agree to the proposed action. A waiver of notice of the meeting is then drawn, and signed by those present, and is sent to and signed by the absentees, who are recorded as absent. The record is then complete in all respects and accurate as far as it goes. All Directors did waive notice; the Directors stated to be present at the meeting were present; the action taken was taken; and the unstated fact is that the absentee Directors were not notified of the meeting in advance, though their subsequent signature on the waiver of notice is ample evidence that they consented to the proceedings after the fact;

Query: Whether the waiver of notice of such meeting cures the defect of the meeting?

(d) A modern tendency in certain large corporations, where Directors reside in different cities and centers, to hold meeings by telephone, establishing a joint circuit on which each can hear all the others. The meeting is then regularly conducted as though all were present in the same room. The records, complete with notice, waiver of notice, and minutes, are then written up and an accurate account of what did happen—except for the fact that the Directors were not physically in the same place.

Query: Can this be interpreted as a meeting?

In most corporations a large proportion of the business transacted is formal or is non-controversial. Where this is the fact, there is no reasonable probability that the action taken at meetings of this kind will be attacked; and indeed where the principal desire is to secure a consensus of assent on policy, formal action may not be necessary. Yet, when the action taken calls for technical formal perfection (for instance, authorizing a mortgage on property or the like) or when there is a real division of opinion (or there might be a real division of opinion if all the facts were amply developed through discussion), the danger of attack is far greater. Naturally, if the reason for disregarding the formalities is designed to prevent some Directors from knowing about, or expressing their opinion on, a course of action, violation of the established procedural rules becomes directly fraudulent.

The purpose of procedural rules is to assure: first, that every person entitled to participate in a decision shall have opportunity to do so; second, that action shall be considered action; third, to assure that the judgment of all Directors shall be brought to the attention and consideration of all other Directors so that a joint result may be reached. In purely formal non-controversial action, probably a certain amount of corner-cutting is inevitable and Directors are always impatient with mere ceremonial action. When, however, there is the slightest difference of opinion on any problem of real importance, observation of the ceremony makes all the difference between true corporate action and a half-done, badly done, or perhaps unethical or even objectionable procedure. It does not follow that every violation of ceremonial procedure establishes a grievance requiring remedy; but failure to observe the ceremony unquestionably leaves all of the parties concerned in it in a weak legal position should anything done or omitted become the subject of attack.

being all of the Directors of the Corporation.

Mr. ——— acted as Chairman of the meeting and Mr. ——— acted as Secretary of the meeting.

The Secretary of the meeting presented the following written Waiver of Notice of the meeting, duly signed by all of the Directors of the Company.

THE ——— COMPANY

WAIVER OF NOTICE OF SPECIAL MEETING OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

The undersigned, constituting all of the Directors of The ——— Company, a New Jersey corporation, hereby waive all notice of the time, place and purposes of a Special Meeting of the Board of Directors of said Company, and of the business to be transacted thereat, and designate the 16th day of April, 19——, at 3:00 o'clock in the afternoon as the time and the offices of ———as the place of said meeting; the purposes of said meeting being to elect officers, to authorize the submission to the stockholders of a proposal to authorize the Board of Directors, in its discretion, to accelerate the amortization of the total payments to the insurers on account of past service benefits under the Employees' Retirement Plan and to transact all such other business as may be deemed necessary, proper or advisable in connection with the foregoing matters or otherwise.

Dated: ———, 19——.

The Secretary of the meeting advised that at the Annual Meeting of Stockholders held earlier on the same day, all of the Directors of the Company previously in office had been reelected and, accordingly, it was in order for the meeting to proceed to the election of officers.

On motion duly made and seconded, the following persons were appointed to the offices set before their respective names, to hold office until the next annual election of officers by the Board of Directors and until another is chosen and qualified in his stead, by the unanimous vote of all the Directors:

President ———
Vice President ———
Secretary ———
Treasurer ———

The Chairman then presented to the meeting a report by the management with respect to the Employees' Retirement Plan of the Company and particularly with reference to the payments made by the Company to the insurers for the purchase of deferred annuities with respect to prior services. He stated that the said Plan had previously been approved by the stockholders and that in the Proxy Statement submitted at the time their approval was requested it was stated that the Company intended to make specified annual payments for this purpose over a period of approximately twenty years, that to date such payments had been made in approximately such amount and if they are continued at that rate it is estimated that the past service provisions of the Plan will have been fully amortized within twenty years. The management now believes that at times it might be advantageous to the company to increase the amount of one or more such payments and thereby accelerate the amortization, without in any way adversely affecting the aggregate amount to be paid.

General discussion followed, after which, on motion duly made and seconded, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the vote of all Directors present:

Resolved, that this Board of Directors hereby formulates and declares advisable action by the stockholders concerning the Employees' Retirement Plan heretofore approved by the stockholders whereby the Board of Directors will be authorized in its discretion from time to time to accelerate the amortization of the total payments to the insurers on account of past service benefits under the Employees' Retirement Plan without in any way increasing the aggregate total amount of the payments heretofore authorized to be made for such purposes, and further

Resolved, that a meeting of the stockholders be, and the same hereby is, called to take action upon such proposal with respect to the Employees' Retirement Plan, which meeting shall also be the annual meeting of the stockholders to be held on ———.

There being no further business to come before the meeting, on motion duly made and seconded the meeting then adjourned.

BALDWIN AND THE STATE NATIONAL BANK OF MINNEAPOLIS v. CANFIELD

Supreme Court of Minnesota, 1879. 26 Minn. 43, 1 N.W. 261.

Appeal from an order of the district court, County of Hennepin, denying defendant's motion for new trial.

Berry, J. * * *

Fourth.—Said deed was not the act and deed of said association, and did not convey to Canfield the legal title of the real estate purporting to be conveyed thereby. * * *

The fourth conclusion is called in question by the counsel for defendant Canfield, but we have no doubt of its correctness. As we have already seen, the court below finds that by its articles of incorporation the government of the Minneapolis Agricultural and Mechanical Association, and the management of its affairs was vested in the board of directors.

The legal effect of this was to invest the directors with such government and management as a board, and not otherwise. This is in accordance with the general rule that the governing body of a corporation, as such, are agents of the corporation only as a board and not individually. Hence, it follows that they have no authority to act, save when assembled at a board meeting. The separate action, individually, of the persons comprising such governing body, is not the action of the constituted body of men clothed with the corporate powers. [Citing cases.] * * *

In Vermont, a somewhat different rule is allowed, as in the Bank of Middleburg v. R. & W. R. Co. 30 Vt. 159. In that case, and perhaps others in that state, it is held that directors may bind their corporation by acting separately, if this is their usual practice in transacting the corporate business. But we think the general rule before mentioned is the more rational one, and it is supported by the great weight of authority. From the application of this rule to the facts of this case, it follows that the fourth conclusion of law, viz., that the deed purporting to be made by the association was not the act and deed of such association, and therefore did not convey the title to the premises in question to Canfield, is correct. The directors took no action as a board with reference to the sale of the premises or the execution of any deed thereof. So far as in any way binding the corporation is concerned, their action in executing the deed was a nullity.

They could not bind it by their separate and individual action. Hence, it follows that the so-called deed is not only ineffectual as a conveyance of real property, but equally so as a contract to convey. * * *

Order affirmed.

BAYER et al. v. BERAN et al.[a]

Supreme Court of New York, 1944. 49 N.Y.S.2d 2.

SHIENTAG, JUSTICE. * * * It is urged that the expenditures were illegal because the radio advertising program was not taken up at any formal meeting of the board of directors, and no resolution approving it was adopted by the board or by the executive committee. The general rule is that directors acting separately and not collectively as a board cannot bind the corporation. There are two reasons for this: first, that collective procedure is necessary in order that action may be deliberately taken after an opportunity for discussion and an interchange of views; and second, that directors are the agents of the stockholders and are given by law no power to act except as a board. Gerald v. Empire Square Realty Co., 195 App.Div. 244, 187 N.Y.S. 306; Knapp v. Rochester Dog Protective Ass'n, 235 App.Div. 436, 257 N.Y. S. 356. Liability may not, however, be imposed on directors because they failed to approve the radio program by resolution at a board meeting.

It is desirable to follow the regular procedure, prescribed by law, which is something more than what has at times, thoughtlessly been termed red tape. Long experience has demonstrated the necessity for doing this in order to safeguard the interests of all concerned, particularly where, as here, the company has over 1,375,000 shares outstanding in the hands of the public, of which about 10% are held by the officers and directors.

But the failure to observe the formal requirements is by no means fatal. Young v. United States Mortgage & Trust Co., 214 N.Y. 279, 284, 285, 108 N.E. 418, 420; Catholic F. M. Society of America v. Oussani, 215 N.Y. 1, 7, 109 N.E. 80, 82, Ann.Cas.1917A, 479; Gorrill v. Greenless, 104 Kan. 693, 180 P. 798; 2 Fletcher, Cyc. Corp. § 394. The directorate of this company is composed largely of its executive officers. It is a close, working directorate. Its members are in daily association with one another and their full time is devoted to the business of the company with which they have been connected for many years. In this respect it differs from the boards of many corporations of comparable size, where the directorate is made up of men of varied interests who meet only at stated, and somewhat infrequent, intervals.

The same informal practice followed in this transaction had been the customary procedure of the directors in acting on corporate projects of equal and greater magnitude. All of the members of the executive committee were available for daily consultation and they discussed and approved the plan for radio advertising. While a greater degree of formality should undoubtedly be exercised in the future, it is only just and proper to point out that these directors, with all their loose procedure, have done very well for the corporation. Under their administration the company has thrived and prospered. Its assets increased from $44,500,000 in 1935 to upwards of $103,000,000 in 1942. Its net profits, after taxes, doubled during that period, rising from $4,000,000 in 1935 to $8,000,000 in 1942; its net sales rose from $27,000,000 to upwards of $86,000,000; and its dividend disbursements to stockholders exceeded $29,500,000.

The expenditures for radio advertising, although made without resolution at a formal meeting of the board, were approved and authorized by the members individually, and may in no sense be considered to have been ultra vires. The resolution adopted by the board on July 6, 1943, with all of the directors present, except two who were resident in England, while expressly ratifying only the renewal of the broadcasting contract, may be deemed a ratification of all prior action taken in connection with the radio advertising. When this resolution was adopted, the Celanese Hour had been on the air to the knowledge of all the directors for eighteen months. Moreover, acceptance and retention of the benefits of the radio advertising, with full knowledge thereof, was as complete a ratification as would have resulted from any formal all-inclusive resolution. Young v. United States Mortgage & Trust Co., 214 N.Y. 279, 285, 108 N.E. 418, 420; Bussing v. Lowell Film Prod., Inc., 233 App.Div. 493, 494, 253 N.Y.S. 719, 720, 721, affirmed 259 N.Y. 593, 182 N.E. 194. * * *

CHASE et al. v. TUTTLE et al.

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, 1888. 55 Conn. 455, 12 A. 874.

LOOMIS, J. This is an action of replevin, brought by the trustee of Brown & Bros., an insolvent corporation, for certain goods that were on the 4th of January, 1886, attached by the defendant, as a deputy-sheriff, on the suit of the National Shoe & Leather Bank of New York against the corporation. On the evening of the same day an assignment for the benefit of all the creditors of the corporation was made, pursuant to a vote of a majority of its directors, as is claimed, which was lodged on file in the probate court, and subsequently accepted, approved, and recorded by that court; and the plaintiffs were appointed and qualified as trustees. The sole defense against this action is that the assignment was invalid and of no effect. The claimed illegality of the assignment is based upon three objections only: (1) That two of the five directors, being out of the state at the time, did not receive any notice of the meeting; (2) that, of the three persons who acted as directors in the matter in question, one, namely Henry R. Coit, was not legally a director, though chosen as such, because he was not a stockholder of Brown & Bros.; (3) that the notices of the meeting sent to the directors did not specify the object of the meeting, as required by statute.

1. We do not think the assignment invalid for want of actual notice to the two directors who were at the time absent from the state.

Notice was sent by telegram to them, as to the others, at their address in this state; but one being in the territory of Montana, and the other in South Carolina, they failed to receive the notices. Under these circumstances, it would seem unreasonable to hold that a majority of the whole number, being present, could not do a legal act binding the corporation. The exigency demanded immediate action to save the property and to save expense. It is easy to see how disastrous might be the consequences were we to adopt the principle contended for by the defendants. The situation of the absent directors might be much more remote and inaccessible than in the present case, requiring many months, or even years, to reach them by actual notice. Must the corporation remain paralyzed all this time, without ability to protect itself? But the suggestion was made, in the argument in behalf of the defendants, that it might be treated as a case of vacancy, which the remaining directors could fill, pursuant to the act of 1880, (Sess. Laws 1880, p. 561, § 7.) If, however, the office was vacant as to the two absent directors, then surely the remaining directors could lawfully represent the corporation; for there is no general law or principle requiring vacancies in the board of directors to be filled before the remaining directors can act in the business of the corporation: provided, of course, the number left is sufficient to constitute a legal quorum. Under our General Statutes, p. 279, § 12, "a majority of the directors of any corporation, convened according to the by-laws, shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business." In order, probably, to avoid a doubt that might arise whether a general assignment was such business as was contemplated under the above statute, the legislature, by the act of 1885, (Sess. Laws 1885, p. 493,) provided that the assignment of any corporation may be made by the directors in legal meeting called for such purpose. This, however, was not intended to change the rule as to a quorum under the preceding statute. There can be no doubt that a majority of the directors could make a valid assignment. * * *

3. The only remaining objection is that the meeting of the directors for the making of the assignment was illegal for defects in the notice. The only by-law or rule adopted, relative to the matter, prescribed simply that "meetings of directors may be held as often, at such place, and in such manner, as they may from time to time determine." No formality whatever is prescribed; and if all the directors happened to be together, and agreed to hold a meeting immediately for a particular object within their jurisdiction, we do not see how their action could be impeached on that ground. As the want of actual notice to the two directors who were absent from the state, at places so remote that they could not be reached, has been excused in this case, all the directors capable of acting under the circumstances were present. But it is said that the statute which empowers directors to make an assignment requires that "the meeting be called for such purpose;" and, in this connection, the defendants rely on the finding which says that there was no evidence that the telegram contained any notification as to the purpose of the proposed meeting. It will be observed that this is not a finding that the purpose was not specified, but only that the contents of the telegram had not been proved by either party; but, under the circumstances we are about to mention, the burden of showing that the object was not specified was on the defendants. The record of this meeting is annexed as part of the finding, and it says: "At a special meeting of the directors of Brown & Bros., called for the purpose of making an assignment of its estate in insolvency for the benefit of all the creditors, pursuant to the statutes," etc. Upon this record, until the contrary is found, it must be presumed that the purpose was specified in the call. This principle is sustained by the case of Sargent v. Webster, 13 Metc. 504, where the validity of an assignment by a corporation for the benefit of creditors was sought to be impeached for want of notice to all the directors. Chief Justice Shaw disposed of the objections as follows: "Another objection of the same kind is that it does not appear that notice of the meeting was given to all the directors. But the contrary does not appear; and it would be hazardous to decide that every vote passed by an aggregate body is void, if it do not appear by the record that all were notified. We believe it not usual in corporate records to state how the members were notified. The presumption, omnia rite acta, covers multitudes of defects in such cases, and throws the burden on those who would deny the regularity of a meeting, for want of due notice, to establish it by proof." Our own court, in Lane v. Brainerd, 30 Conn. 565, applied the same principle both to directors' and to stockholders' meetings. The mere record of the meeting in the former case was presumptive proof that all the directors had been duly notified; and in the latter case the mere record of the organization of a corporation was presumptive evidence of a fact which was an indispensable condition precedent to its lawful organization.

We advise judgment for the plaintiffs.

BELLE ISLE CORPORATION v. MacBEAN et al.[3]

Court of Chancery of Delaware, 1946. 49 A.2d 5.

SEITZ, VICE-CHANCELLOR. * * * the complainant corporation contends that no quorum was present at the June 3, 1944 directors' meeting when the issuance of the stock in question was allegedly authorized as partial compensation for MacBean's past services to the corporation. The defendant MacBean on the contrary contends that a quorum was present under conditions hereinafter discussed.

The following by-laws of the corporation were admittedly part of the written corporate by-laws at the date of the meeting held June 3, 1944:

"[Article II] Section 5. Number and Quorum:—The number of directors shall be Ten. A majority of the directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. Directors need not be stockholders.

* * * * * * * * * * *

"[Article V] Section 3. Increase of Number of Directors:—The number of directors of the corporation shall be fixed by the By-laws and shall not be altered except at a stockholders meeting by a vote of the stockholders owning 75% of the shares entitled to vote thereon. In case of any increase in the number of directors the additional directors may be elected by the directors, or by the stockholders at an annual or special meeting by a plurality vote."

Article II, Section 5 had been amended by a resolution of the stockholders adopted June 7, 1939, whereby the number of directors was increased from seven to ten. All parties concede that this increase was made in 1939 in order to provide for representation to the so-called Ware-Wasson group when it performed a certain agreement involving the corporation's stock. The so-called Ware-Wasson agreement expired June 30, 1940 without ever being carried out so that this group never was represented on the board of directors.

No meeting of the stockholders or of the board of directors of complainant corporation was held between June 30, 1940 (when the Ware-Wasson agreement expired) and June 3, 1944, the date on which the directors allegedly authorized the issuance of the 75,000 shares here involved. The importance of this time interval will appear.

It is conceded by the defendants at the meeting of June 3, 1944 there were present only the following four directors: MacBean, Huppuch, Irish and Corcoran. And it is undisputed that at no time during the period with which we are here concerned was any formal amendment to the by-laws ever adopted changing the number of directors from the ten provided for by Article II, Section 5.

It necessarily follows that if the by-law provision calling for ten directors was operative at the meeting of June 3, 1944, then a quorum of directors under Delaware law as applied to the charter and by-laws of the corporation would be six directors. This is so because it was held in Bruch v. National Guarantee Credit Corporation, 13 Del. Ch. 180, 184, 116 A. 738, 740, that "The rule is that the number necessary to constitute a quorum, under a by-law such as appears in this case, is a majority of the entire board notwithstanding there may be vacancies in the board at the time." The pertinent by-law provision of the corporation involved in the Bruch case was in substance identical with the complainant corporation's by-law governing quorum requirements, and, as a consequence, the quoted principle is operative.

As stated, only four directors were present at the June 3, 1944 meeting and one of these was the defendant MacBean. Passing complainant's contention that defendant MacBean, being interested in the transaction, could not be counted for quorum purposes, it is clear that even including MacBean for quorum purposes there was no quorum present at the June 3 meeting unless, as defendant contends, "by Established Practice to the Contrary Acquiesced in by the Stockholders", the quoted by-law (Article II, Section 5) was amended so as to provide for only seven directors.

The defendant MacBean's case turns then, at this time, exclusively on whether or not the corporation's by-law had been amended by custom so that at the June 3, 1944 meeting it had a board of seven directors rather than ten. Of course, if defendant MacBean is correct then, assuming MacBean could be counted, there was a quorum present at the June 3, 1944 meeting.

It is true, as defendant states, that in the case of In re Ivey & Ellington, Inc., Del.Ch., 42 A.2d 508, this court recognized the principle of amendment of corporate by-laws by a course of conduct inconsistant therewith. Clearly, however, one who contends that a written by-law has been amended by custom inconsistent therewith has the burden of establishing the existence of such a custom. Upon the undisputed facts, the defendant MacBean has failed to meet this burden, and it is not apparent that facts which would vary such a conclusion will be available to the defendant at the final hearing.

Almost dispositive of the defendant's contention as to the amendment by custom is the undisputed fact that there was no meeting either of the stockholders or directors between June 30, 1940 and June 3, 1944. The June 30, 1940 date of course represents the expiration date of the Ware-Wasson agreement, and clearly the by-law provision as to directors would not have been changed prior to that date, because the by-law provision was amended to increase the number of directors from seven to ten in order to effectuate in part the Ware-Wasson agreement. From June 30, 1940 to the directors' meeting date of June 3, 1944—when the issuance of the stock in question was allegedly authorized—no stockholders' meetings or directors' meetings were held. I cannot conceive how total stockholder and director inaction can form the basis for a custom inconsistent with a written by-law provision.

Obviously, if there was no meeting during the period mentioned, then defendant's assertion that directors owning the majority of the stock participated in directors' meetings, and thereby amended the by-law, can have no force, even if we assume that less than total stock representation may be sufficient. This is necessarily so because the directors' meetings where such stock was represented were held after the meeting of June 3, 1944, when the issuance of the stock in question was allegedly authorized. Defendant does not contend that the amendment by custom took place subsequent to the June 3, 1944 meeting. Moreover, the defendant MacBean's own actions at a meeting held March 28, 1945 reveal that he did not then consider that the by-laws had theretofore been amended by custom so as to provide for only seven directors. This is so because MacBean at that meeting "advised the meeting that three Directors should be elected to fill the present vacancies in the Board." Since there were admittedly seven directors in office in March of 1945, it is clear that the defendant MacBean assumed the written by-law providing for ten directors was still in effect.

Much reliance is placed by the defendant on the case of In re Ivey & Ellington, Inc., supra, but beyond recognizing the principle that a by-law may be amended by a custom inconsistent therewith, it gives little solace to the defendant. In the first place, the acts relied upon in the Ivey & Ellington case were necessarily inconsistent with the written by-law, because more directors were elected than were provided for by the by-laws, while here fewer directors were elected than were called for in the written by-law. Moreover, in the Ivey & Ellington case, the inconsistent acts, i. e., attending directors' meetings were participated in by directors who owned all the corporate stock which possessed the right to amend the by-laws. As stated, such was not the case here. Even when confronted with such inconsistent acts, the Chancellor refused to conclude that the written by-law had been amended by custom to the contrary. While the Ivey & Ellington case recognized that the question of whether or not a by-law has been amended by custom inconsistent therewith is largely one of fact, nevertheless, it is apparent from undisputed facts here that the burden of showing such a custom has not been met.

I conclude, therefore, that at the June 3, 1944 meeting no quorum of the directors was present because a majority of the 10 directors required under the by-laws was not present. As a consequence, the resolution authorizing the issuance of the 75,000 shares of the complainant's stock to the defendant MacBean was in the language of this court in Mecleary v. John S. Mecleary, Inc., et al., 13 Del.Ch. 329, 332, 119 A. 557, 559, "illegal, because there was no quorum of the board present at the meeting authorized to transact business for the corporation." * * *

BENINTENDI et al v. KENTON HOTEL, INCORPORATED et al.

DESMOND, JUDGE. * * * The by-law numbered 3 [That no action should be taken by the directors except by unanimous vote of all of them] in our list above makes it impossible for the directors to act on any matter except by unanimous vote of all of them. Such a by-law, like the others already discussed herein, is, almost as a matter of law, unworkable and unenforceable for the reason given by the Court of King's Bench in Hascard v. Somany, 1 Freeman 504, in 1693: "primâ facie in all acts done by a corporation, the major number must bind the lesser, or else differences could never be determined." The directors of a corporation are a select body, chosen by the stockholders. By section 27 of the General Corporation Law, the board as such is given the power of management of the corporation. At common law only a majority thereof were needed for a quorum and a majority of that quorum could transact business. Ex parte Willcocks, 7 Cow. 402, 17 Am.Dec, 525. Section 27 modifies that common-law rule only to the extent of permitting a corporation to enact a by-law fixing "the number of directors necessary to constitute a quorum at a number less than a majority of the board, but not less than one-third of its number." Every corporation is thus given the privilege of enacting a by-law fixing its own quorum requirement at any fraction not less than one-third, nor more than a majority, of its directors. But the very idea of a "quorum" is that, when that required number of persons goes into session as a body, the votes of a majority thereof are sufficient for binding action. See for example, Harroun v. Brush Electric Light Co., 152 N.Y. 212, 46 N.E. 291, 38 L.R.A. 615, as to a quorum of the Appellate Division. Thus, while by-law No. 3 is not in explicit terms forbidden by section 27, supra, it seems to flout the plain purpose of the Legislature in passing that statute. We have not overlooked Section 28 of the General Corporation Law, the first sentence of which is as follows: "Whenever, under the provisions of any corporate law a corporation is authorized to take any action by its directors, action may be taken by the directors, regularly convened as a board, and acting by a majority of a quorum, except when otherwise expressly required by law or the by-laws and any such action shall be executed in behalf of the corporation by such officers as shall be designated by the board." Reading together Sections 27 and 28 and examining their legislative history (see L.1890, Ch. 563; L.1892, Ch. 687; L.1904, Ch. 737), we conclude that there never was a legislative intent so to change the common-law rule as to quorums as to authorize a by-law like the one under scrutiny in this paragraph. A by-law requiring for every action of the board not only a unanimous vote of a quorum of the directors, but of all the directors, sets up a scheme of management utterly inconsistent with Section 27 and 28. * * *

JOURDAN v. LONG ISLAND RAILWAY COMPANY

Court of Appeals, New York, 1889. 115 N.Y. 380, 22 N.E. 153.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, second department.

Action by James Jourdan, receiver of the Brooklyn, Flatbush & Coney Island Railway Company, against the Long Island Railroad Company. Judgment was rendered by circuit court on a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and was affirmed by general term. Defendant appeals.

DANFORTH, J. This action was begun in November, 1884, to recover damages from the Long Island Railroad Company for breach of a written contract, purporting to have been made on the 31st day of May, 1879, between the Brooklyn, Flatbush & Coney Island Railway Company, of the first part, Thomas R. Sharp, as receiver of the property, etc., of the Long Island Railroad Company, of the second part, the Long Island Railroad Company, of the third part, and the Atlantic Avenue Railroad Company of Brooklyn, of the fourth part. It was by its terms to continue for a period of five years from its date. The Brooklyn, Flatbush & Coney Island Railroad Company and the Long Island Railroad Company were severally the owners and operators of railways; and, so far as is material to any question calling for our discussion, the terms of the contract were such that the first-named company was required to extend and maintain its track at its own expense, but in a manner satisfactory to the other company, from its then terminus at Bedford Station, so that it should connect with the tracks of the Long Island Railroad Company on Atlantic avenue, and thus form continuous lines of double-track railroad between the depots of that company at Flatbush avenue and East New York, and the depot of the Brooklyn, Flatbush & Coney Island Railway Company at Brighton Beach, on Coney Island, and, as it pleased run trains over the lines so made continuous between Flatbush avenue and Brighton Beach. The Long Island Railroad Company, and Sharp, its receiver, agreed to furnish it with "all necessary depot facilities for its trains and passengers" at Flatbush avenue, and through its agents sell the tickets at that place; and the party of the first part agreed to pay to the Long Island Railroad Company in compensation "for the use of its tracks, the sale of its tickets and for depot facilities, twenty per cent. of all moneys earned by it for the transportation of passengers between Flatbush avenue and any and all points on the line of the party of the first part south of Bedford Station." * * *

The questions at issue concern only the plaintiff, who represents the party of the first part in the agreement, and the defendant, the Long Island Railroad Company. The alleged breach consisted, in substance, of the failure of the defendant's receiver and its own subsequent refusal, to run the trains of the Long Island Railroad Company over a certain portion of the plaintiff's road, as provided by the contract, and their omission to furnish depot facilities, as also therein provided. Issue was taken upon these allegations and a trial had. At the close of the evidence the defendant's counsel moved the trial judge to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to show a contract between the plaintiff and defendant. The motion was denied, and the case submitted to the jury upon both issues. Their verdict was for the plaintiff, and it has been approved both by the trial judge in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, and by the general term in affirming the order and the judgment entered upon the verdict.

The defendant's contention is that the contract was not binding upon it. It was, as is conceded, executed in the name of the corporation by its president and secretary. It was sealed with its corporate seal, affixed by its proper officers. It was therefore presumptively valid, and was binding upon the corporation until evidence to the contrary should be produced. If the seal was obtained fraudulently, or the officers acted without authority, either in executing the contract in their official character or in affixing the seal, it lay with the defendant to establish those facts. The evidence adduced for that purpose was from the secretary. He testified that the contract was drafted in pursuance of negotiations between the two companies and the draft was in "his office." An emergency arose, which called for its completion, and he, after consulting with Sharp, the president, with him signed, sealed, and delivered it. "I expected," he says, "to get a ratification." Both of these officers were also directors, and the witness says, "I intended to call the board's attention to it, but forgot it." The court committed no error in refusing to dismiss the complaint, or in refusing to charge the jury that the contract was not binding upon the company. Sharp, the president, was not examined upon that point, and whether the officers of the company did in fact exceed their authority, might have been, under the evidence, a question for the jury. No request was made to submit it. There was, however, abundant and conclusive evidence that the contract was adopted and ratified by the defendant in its corporate capacity. It was, as the secretary and counsel of the defendant testified, drafted in pursuance of negotiations had between the parties. It was acted upon by the defendant in the management of its business. For one year the defendant complied with its terms, and received for the entire period the benefit of a faithful performance on the part of the other contracting party. It necessarily affected the running of plaintiff's trains and the management of the business for which it was incorporated. As summarized by the learned counsel for the appellant, "it gave rights to another corporation [the plaintiff] to use the tracks and depots of the Long Island Railroad Company, and provided for a division of earnings;" and it is impossible to suppose that these things were suffered or enjoyed without full corporate knowledge of the contract obligations by which they were provided for. Moreover, the defendant received a pecuniary benefit under the contract, upon the assumption that the contract was valid. If they intended to disavow it, it was their duty to be active in so doing and not remain willfully passive, in order to profit by an omission or mistake on the part of their own officers, and which they might have prevented. The appellant argues that the object of the parties might have been attained by two contracts as well as by one, and therefore the defendant is at liberty to adopt so much as makes for its benefit, and reject the rest. It may be that two separate contracts could have been framed in such manner as to meet the views of the parties, and in that case one might have been rejected at the party's risk, and the other performed; but only one was prepared, and that recites that, "in consideration of the mutual covenants and agreements" therein "contained," the parties have agreed and do agree as therein expressed. The provisions are reciprocal. One party can not say, "I have got all I bargained for," and, without liability, repudiate the mutual obligation which enabled it to do so, and formed the consideration of the bargain. One promise was the consideration for the other, and together they constituted a binding agreement. If in fact the formal execution of the contract was unauthorized, it is plain the agreement was one the company had power to make, one which they intended to make, supposed they had made, and which with knowledge, or full means of knowledge, of its terms, they acquiesced in, and ratified, by acting under it so long as it was profitable, and refusing to do so only when it seemed otherwise, but receiving the benefit of it at all times. It is now argued that the question of ratification should have been passed upon by the jury. It is a sufficient answer that no request was made to have it submitted to them; but it may be further said that upon that point the evidence was all one way, and conclusive in the highest degree. We find no legal merit in either of these points.

The other questions raised by the appellant have been examined. So far as they require particular observation, the remarks of the general term are sufficient. We find none which requires other discussion. Upon the assumption that the contract bound the defendant, the plaintiff's way was clear, and his right to a recovery certain. The reasonableness of the amount actually given to him is not for us to determine. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed. All concur.

JOSEPH GREENSPON'S SONS IRON & STEEL COMPANY v. PECOS VALLEY GAS COMPANY

Superior Court of Delaware, 1931. 4 W.W.Harr. 567, 156 A. 350.

Action by Joseph Greenspon's Sons Iron & Steel Company against the Pecos Valley Gas Company.

Instructions to the jury.

RODNEY, J., charging the Jury. This is an action by Joseph Greenspon's Sons Iron and Steel Company, a corporation of the State of Missouri, the plaintiff, against the Pecos Valley Gas Company, a corporation of the State of Delaware, the defendant, to recover a sum of money which the plaintiff claims is due it by reason of the alleged breach of a contract.

The plaintiff claims that the defendant, on the 7th day of January, 1929, agreed to buy from it 45 miles of 6⅝" gas pipe at the sum of 61 cents a foot. The pipe was not delivered. * * *

A corporation is an artificial being created by law and acting under the authority of law for designated purposes. Being artificial and the mere creature of the law, it can only act by its officers and agents. Its officers are its agents or rather the agents of those who compose the corporation and many of the principles of law applicable to the relationship of principal and agent apply to the question of powers of a corporate officer. The precise question here involved is whether a corporation is bound by the contract or writing of the President alone where it involves a contract for 45 miles of pipe at 61 cents a foot involving the expenditure of $144,936.00, without express authority from the Board of Directors. * * *

The powers of a President of a corporation, i. e., the powers over its business and property, are, of course, merely the powers of an agent, for a corporation can speak in no other manner. The control over the company's business and property is vested in the Board of Directors, but subject to this control certain powers are delegated by implication to certain officers. Corporations have assumed and acquired such a position in the business world that the office of President carries with it certain implied powers of an agency. He is usually either expressly or by implied consent made the chief executive officer, without special authority or explicitly delegated power he may perform all acts of an ordinary nature which by usage or necessity are incidents to his office and by virtue of his office he may enter into a contract and bind his corporation in matters arising from and concerning the usual course of the corporation's business. These are the implied powers of the President of a corporation and they inhere in him by virtue of the position itself. Beyond these powers—beyond the carrying out of the usual and proper functions of the corporation necessary for the proper and convenient management of the business of the corporation, the President remains as any other Director of the company, and other and further powers must be specifically conferred.

The plaintiff contends that the action of the President in ordering the pipe was an ordinary and usual duty and within the powers impliedly placed by the law in a President who is also managing executive of a corporation. Whether or not this is true in any given case depends upon all the facts of the case, including the character of the goods ordered, the amount thereof in relation to the size and condition of the company, the nature of the company, its purposes and aims, and upon many other facts and circumstances. Whether or not a specific action of a President is within his usual duties is, therefore, a question of fact for the determination of the jury.

The powers of a President of a corporation in excess of those hereinbefore suggested, that is, in excess of power over the ordinary and usual business of the corporation, must be specifically given, and the following are the usual sources of this grant of power:

1. Some provision of statutory law;
2. Corporate charter;
3. Some by-law of the company;
4. Resolution of the Board of Directors.

I am referred to no appropriate statute, charter provision or Resolution of the Board of Directors conferring additional power on the President. Section 12 of the By-laws has been admitted into evidence covering the powers of the President. It provides as follows:

"The President shall be the chief executive officer of the company; he shall preside at all meetings of the directors; he shall have general and active management of the business of the company; he shall see that all orders and resolutions of the Board are carried into effect; he shall execute all contracts and agreements authorized by the Board; he shall keep in safe custody the seal of the company and when authorized by the Board affix the seal to any instrument requiring the same and the seal when so affixed shall be attested by the signature of the Secretary or the Treasurer.

"He shall sign all certificates of stock and checks for the payment of money.

"He shall have general supervision and direction of all other officers of the company and shall see that their duties are properly performed.

"He shall submit a report of the operations of the company for the fiscal year to the Directors at their first regular meeting in each year and to the stockholders at their annual meeting and from time to time shall report to the Directors all matters within his knowledge which the interests of the company may require to be brought to their notice.

"He shall be ex officio a member of all standing committees and shall have the general powers and duties of supervision and management usually vested in the office of the President of a corporation."

This you will consider in the solution of the present question.

A fifth and perhaps the most usual source of the grant of the unusual or extraordinary powers of a President arises by implication of law from a course of conduct on the part of both the President and the corporation showing that he had been in the habit of acting in similar matters on behalf of the company and that the company had authorized him so to act and had recognized, approved and ratified his former and similar actions.

As said in Stokes v. New Jersey Pottery Co., 46 N.J.L. 242:

"There are cases in which the powers of an officer of a corporation, and his authority to act for the company, are enlarged beyond those powers which are inherent in his office. But those are cases in which the agency of the officer has arisen from the assent of the directors, presumed from their consent and acquiescence in permitting the officer to assume the direction and control of the business of the company. * * * Thus, when, in the usual course of the business of a corporation, an officer has been allowed in his official capacity to manage its affairs, his authority to represent the corporation may be implied from the manner in which he has been permitted by the directors to transact its business. * * * These are simply instances of the application of the principle that usual employment is evidence of the powers of an agent, and a responsibility will be laid upon the principal for the acts of his agent within the apparent authority so conferred upon the agent—a doctrine which has come to be applied to corporations in many respects as well as to individuals, and with the same qualifications and limitations. * * * In such cases, the authority of the officer does not depend so much on his title, or on the theoretical nature of his office, as on the duties he is in the habit of performing." * * *

Summarizing and in conclusion I say to you that if you should find from the evidence that the contract of January 7, 1929, was a plain unconditional contract to be effective without further or other approval, and that the President, Albert T. Woods, who signed the same, was either acting in the usual scope of his duties or had been in the habit and custom, with the knowledge and approval of the Board of Directors, of so acting alone on behalf of the company, or that the action of the President was afterwards ratified and approved, and should further find that all the agreements of the parties with regard to the financing of the company have been duly and regularly complied with, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff.

If, however, you should find from the evidence that the agreement of January 7, 1929, was conditional upon the obtaining the signature of Mr. Burkett, and was so understood by the parties, and that such consent was never obtained, and shall find that such contract was not afterwards ratified or confirmed, then your verdict must be for the defendant.

Your verdict must also be for the defendant if you should find that Albert T. Woods had no right or power to bind the corporation by the contract and had not theretofore so acted alone for the corporation; or that the conditions of the contract with relation to financing the corporation have never been complied with, within the agreement and understanding of the parties.

If your verdict should be for the plaintiff, it should be for such sum as you shall find from the evidence that the plaintiff has been damaged by the alleged breach of the defendant, not exceeding the amount claimed by the plaintiff.

The measure of this damage would be the difference between the contract price, that is, the price the plaintiff was to have received for the pipe and the market price at which the plaintiff could have obtained the pipe. This difference would represent the amount of his prospective profit.

If your verdict should be for the defendant, it should simply be, verdict for the defendant.

(1). EXPRESS AUTHORITY

JACOBUS v. JAMESTOWN MANTEL COMPANY.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1914. 211 N.Y. 154, 105 N.E. 210.

Action by Warren Jacobus against the Jamestown Mantel Company. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (149 App.Div. 356, 134 N.Y.Supp 418), affirming a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

CHASE, J. This action is brought on a promissory note, of which the following is a copy: "2,500.00. New York, Oct. 8, 1909. Six months after date we promise to pay to the order of ourselves, Two thousand five hundred & 00/000 dollars at Newton Trust Co., Newton, N. J., value received. Jamestown Mantel Co. Geo. M. Turner, Treas." Said note was indorsed "Jamestown Mantel Co., Geo. M. Turner, Treas.," and it was thereafter delivered to and discounted by the Newton Trust Company, the assignor of the plaintiff. It is the last one of a series of like notes, the original of which was given in August, 1907. At the times herein mentioned the trust company had an investment committee consisting of Hough, its president, Searing, its vice president, and George, a director. Searing and George were partners doing business in New York City. In August, 1907, Searing was the president of the Delaware & Eastern Railroad Company. One Welch, an attorney at law, had done business as such for said railroad company and for Searing individually. Welch asserted that the railroad company and Searing owed him considerable money for services; he told Searing that he needed money for his immediate use, and Searing said to him that the company was not in a position to pay him at that time, but that if he would borrow a note from somebody for a short time, he, Searing, would have it discounted at one of his trust companies. Welch went to Turner and told him that he wanted to borrow a note of the Jamestown Mantel Company for $2,500 to have it discounted, and that if he, Turner, would furnish him with such a note he would take care of it when it was due. Turner in the name of the mantel company, and in the form shown, made and indorsed a note for $2,500, and gave it to Welch. Welch delivered it to Searing, who sent it to the trust company, and received in return for it a draft of $2,425, being the amount of the note less the discount thereon. Searing retained the proceeds of the draft and told Welch that his trust companies were not in funds to discount the note. Before the note became due, however, Searing told Welch that the note had been actually discounted, and that he had used the money. It was thereafter renewed from time to time until the note now in suit became due, when further renewals were refused by the mantel company, and it also refused to pay the note. The defendant was in no way directly or indirectly interested in the transaction. The note was given in its name wholly without authority. If Searing was acting for and on behalf of the trust company, it is of course chargeable with his knowledge that the note was borrowed for discount to accommodate Welch and Searing, and the defendant is not liable thereon. If he was not acting for and on behalf of the trust company, then he was acting independently of it, and the trust company is in no way chargeable with his knowledge or information.

The first question for consideration on this appeal is whether the knowledge of Searing, under the circumstances disclosed, is attributable to the trust company. We think not. * * *

The defendant is a domestic manufacturing corporation. A corporation is an artificial entity, having only such powers as are given to it by law, and such implied powers as are necessary to the exercise of the powers expressly given to it. The defendant was organized to "manufacture wood mantels, interior finish, bank, office and bar fixtures and generally to carry on any manufacturing business which can conveniently be carried on in conjunction with any of the matters aforesaid." The treasurer of the defendant corporation had no express authority by its by-laws or otherwise to sign or indorse a promissory note. The president of the trust company had never had a transaction with the defendant corporation, and did not know its treasurer. He does not remember that Searing said anything to him whatever at the time the note was sent to him for discount. It was taken by him on behalf of the trust company without inquiry either as to the responsibility of the corporation or as to the authority of its treasurer to make a promissory note even in the usual course of its business. It affirmatively appears, as we have seen, that the treasurer had no express authority to make a promissory note, and that the note as made was not made in the regular transaction of the business of the corporation, but wholly as an accommodation to a friend of such treasurer.

A manufacturing corporation has no power to make or indorse notes for the accommodation of others. National Park Bank of N. Y. v. Ger. Am. M. W. & S. Co., 116 N.Y. 281, 22 N.E. 567, 5 L.R.A. 673; Fox v. Rural Home Co., 90 Hun, 365, 35 N.Y.S. 896, affirmed, on opinion below, 157 N.Y. 684, 51 N.E. 1090. One who deals with the officers or agents of a corporation is bound to know their powers and the extent of their authority. Alexander v. Cauldwell, 83 N.Y. 480. Notwithstanding the general rule stated, a corporation is bound if it makes or indorses commercial paper for the accommodation of another in respect to a bona fide holder who discounts it before maturity on the faith of its being business paper. Mechanics' Banking Association v. N. Y. & S. White Lead Co., 35 N.Y. 505. The decision in the White Lead Co. Case, supra, and other similar decisions are based upon the assumption that the officers making or indorsing a promissory note had authority from the corporation to make and indorse such notes in the ordinary course of its business. Such decisions do not apply to a case where the officers purporting to act for a corporation do not have authority to sign commercial paper in the ordinary course of its business. A treasurer of a manufacturing corporation has no power to make promissory notes in its name unless such power is expressly given to such officer by the by-laws of the corporation or by resolution of its board of directors. [Citing cases.] * * * No presumption existed that the defendant's treasurer had power to make or indorse business paper. It was necessary, therefore, for the plaintiff to show that the treasurer had authority to execute promissory notes in the name of the corporation in the ordinary course of its business, or that the defendant was estopped from denying such authority.

It is urged that there is some evidence that the treasurer of the defendant had on one or more occasions signed a promissory note in its name in the regular course of defendant's business, and that such note or notes had thereafter been paid by the corporation. It does not appear that said treasurer had ever signed such a note prior to the execution of the note which was given in August, 1907. Whether he had done so or not is of little importance for the purpose of creating an estoppel against the defendant because it affirmatively appears that the trust company did not know of any of the acts claimed to have been done by the defendant's treasurer in its name. * * *

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

(2) IMPLIED AND APPARENT AUTHORITY

SHERMAN and another v. FITCH

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1867. 98 Mass. 59.

For some time prior to January 19, 1865, the respondent had been, and then was, selling agent of the corporation, which owed him about eighteen thousand dollars, to secure the payment of which by the corporation, George R. Sampson, who was president and a director, and was also manager of the manufacturing department, executed and delivered to him the instrument in question. At that date there were four directors (who were the principal stockholders): Sampson; his son; a nephew; and one Tappan, who was in Europe. That was the full number of the board required by the by-laws, which also provided that "the board of directors shall manage and control the business, property and affairs of the corporation." The records of the corporation contained no express vote of either directors or stockholders authorizing the execution and delivery to the respondent of a mortgage on the corporate property; but the execution and delivery of the instrument was known to all the directors except Tappan, at the time thereof, "and was approved by them, provided their neglect to make any objection to the same can be construed as an approval." "Neither the corporation nor its directors ever repudiated said alleged mortgage," and on February 13, 1866, the stockholders voted "that all contracts, agreements, and other acts, of the president and directors of the corporation, be and the same are hereby ratified and confirmed." The instrument was recorded with the city clerk of Boston, June 10, 1865. On April 10, 1866, a warrant under the insolvent laws was issued against the corporation, and its property was assigned to the complainants on April 24.

WELLS, J. The question submitted to us is whether the instrument of which a copy is annexed to the plaintiff's bill is a valid mortgage of its property by the "Northampton Street Sugar Refinery." The instrument itself is incapable of any other construction than as the mortgage of the corporation. It names the corporation as the party making it; describes the machinery as upon the premises, and in the use and ownership of the corporation; provides for payment by the corporation, and continued possession of the property until default. It is, upon its face, the contract of the corporation, and cannot be made the contract of Sampson by any form of signature whatever. Kingman v. Kelsie, 3 Cush. 339. Jefts v. York, 4 Cush. 371.

The signature "Geo. R. Sampson, President of the Northampton Street Sugar Refinery," is consistent with this construction, and, in form, is a good execution by the corporation of a simple contract. * * *

The remaining consideration relates to the authority of Sampson to execute the mortgage in behalf of the corporation. It is not necessary that the authority should be given by a formal vote. Such an act by the president and general manager of the business of the corporation, with the knowledge and concurrence of the directors, or with their subsequent and long continued acquiescence, may properly be regarded as the act of the corporation. Authority in the agent of a corporation may be inferred from the conduct of its officers, or from their knowledge and neglect to make objection, as well as in the case of individuals. Emerson v. Providence Hat Manufacturing Co. 12 Mass. 237. Melledge v. Boston Iron Co. 5 Cush. 158. Lester v. Webb, 1 Allen, 34. The absence of one of the directors in Europe could not deprive the corporation of the capacity to act and bind itself by the acts of the officers in actual charge of its affairs.

If the validity of the mortgage were to depend entirely upon subsequent ratification, such ratification would be effective notwithstanding the recording of the mortgage. No new record would be necessary. The ratification relates back.

The validity of the mortgage as affected by the insolvent laws is not submitted to us by the case reserved; and, as no provision is made for the ultimate disposition of the case, it must stand for further hearing upon the questions of fact raised by the answer.

MOSELL REALTY CORPORATION v. SCHOFIELD

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, 1945. 183 Va. 782, 33 S.E.2d 774.

Action by Dora Schofield, trading as Schofield & Herman, against the Mosell Realty Corporation to recover for services as a broker in procuring a purchaser for defendant's real estate. To review a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error.

Reversed and final judgment entered for defendant.

EGGLESTON, JUSTICE. Dora Schofield, trading as Schofield & Herman, a licensed real estate broker, has recovered a verdict and judgment against Mosell Realty Corporation for services as a broker in procuring purchaser for the corporation's real estate. We are asked to reverse the judgment on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict and the judgment. The main contention is that the president of the corporation, with whom the contract sued upon was alleged to have been made, lacked the necessary authority to enter into it.

In view of the jury's verdict, the facts may be stated thus:

Mosell Realty Corporation is a close corporation. The capital stock is distributed equally among Sol Kaplan, L. H. Goldman, and Leon Banks, who are its only directors. Kaplan is the president, Goldman the vice-president, and Banks the secretary and treasurer.

The corporation owns a valuable piece of property located at the southeastern corner of Colonial avenue and Thirteenth street, in the city of Norfolk, on which are located a moving picture theatre and four stores. This is the only property the corporation owns or has ever owned. All of the buildings are occupied by tenants and the leases were arranged through Banks, who is engaged in the real estate rental business in Norfolk and who attends to the collection of the rents and the matters incidental thereto. Kaplan likewise lives in Norfolk, while Goldman lives at Durham, North Carolina. * * *

On June 28, 1943, Herman obtained from one D. Galanides a written offer to buy the property at the sum of $51,000. The offer was accompanied by a deposit of $500. Herman presented the offer and check to Kaplan who examined and approved them but requested that Herman hold them, saying that he (Kaplan) was leaving for New York that afternoon. Kaplan further said that upon his return "I will accept the offer." Herman called upon Kaplan upon the latter's return from New York. In the meantime Herman had obtained a written offer from Harry Kramer, accompanied by a deposit of $500, to purchase the property at $52,500. Herman presented both the Galanides and Kramer offers to Kaplan who refused to accept either, because he said that on his trip to New York he "happened to see Goldman" who informed him (Kaplan) that he (Goldman) was not willing to sell the property.

Kaplan denied having made this statement to Herman as to the interview between him (Kaplan) and Goldman in New York. He testified that no such interview took place. Goldman likewise testified that there was no such interview or conversation, and that the first intimation he had about the negotiations for the sale of the property was contained in a letter to him from Banks after the present suit had been brought. Indeed, Goldman said, the subject of the sale of the property at any price had never been discussed by Kaplan, Banks and himself, who constituted the board of directors and were the holders of all of the capital stock of the corporation.

Banks, the secretary and treasurer of the corporation, testified that the corporation had authorized no one to sell the property.

While counsel for both parties indicated at the trial that they desired to offer in evidence the minute books of the corporation, so far as the record shows they were not produced. Apparently the corporation held only the formal annual meetings of its board of directors. Goldman admitted that he received notice of such meetings, but the record is silent as to whether he attended them.

Although the record discloses no formal resolution of the board of directors or stockholders authorizing Kaplan, its president, to sell this property, which, as has been said, was the corporation's principal asset, or to enter into the brokerage contract to effect such a sale, the defendant in error contends that such authority is sustainable on two theories;

First, Kaplan, as president of the corporation, had the implied or inherent authority to enter into the contract sued on; and, second, the directors of the corporation clothed him with the apparent authority to enter into the contract sued on, and hence they and the corporation are estopped to deny the lack of actual authority therefor. In our opinion, neither of these contentions can be sustained.

It is well settled that the inherent or implied authority of a corporate president is limited to acts within the ordinary course of its business and does not extend to extraordinary and unusual transactions such as the sale and purchase of real estate. * * *

In Sterling v. Trust Company of Norfolk, 149 Va. 867, 141 S.E. 856, this court held that the secretary and treasurer of a corporation engaged in the automobile and garage business did not have the authority to bind the corporation for the purchase of an expensive piece of real estate for the purpose of enlarging its business, even though such officer held approximately fifty per cent. of the capital stock of the corporation, was one of its three stockholders, and one of its four directors. We there pointed out (149 Va. at pages 877, 878, 141 S.E. at pages 858, 859) that such authority was lodged in the board of directors of the corporation.

The same principles apply to the sale of a corporation's real estate. If a corporate president is without implied authority, by virtue of his office, to sell a part of the real estate of the corporation, a fortiori he is without implied power to negotiate a sale of the real estate which, as here, constitutes the corporation's principal asset. Fletcher Cyclopedia Corporations, Perm. Ed., Vol. 2, § 606, pp. 515, 516.

Neither do we think that the verdict and judgment here can be sustained under the principle that the corporation clothed its president with apparent authority to enter into the contract sued on and for that reason is estopped to deny that it actually authorized him to do so.

True it is that, "A corporation is subject, to the same extent as a natural person, to the general principle that one who holds out another, or allows him to appear as having authority to act, as his agent with respect to his business generally, or with respect to a particular matter, cannot, as against persons dealing with him in good faith, deny that his apparent authority is real." Fletcher Cyclopedia Corporations, Perm. Ed., Vol. 2, § 449, p. 257. Sterling v. Trust Company of Norfolk, supra, 149 Va. at pages 879, 880, 141 S.E. 856; Bardach Iron & Steel Co. v. Charleston Port Terminals, 143 Va. 656, 673, 129 S.E. 687.

But as it is aptly said in Restatement of the Law, Agency, Vol. 1, § 52, p. 131, "Unless otherwise agreed, authority to act in the principal's business does not include authority to sell the principal's interests in land, unless the business entrusted to the agent includes the selling of land."

And, continuing, the author says (Vol. 1, § 52, p. 132): "Ordinarily, an authority to conduct a business, no matter how general, does not include authority to sell things necessary for the operation of the business as it is ordinarily conducted. Thus, where the premises upon which a business is conducted are owned by the principal, it is inferred that a manager of the business has no authority to sell them or any portion of them." See, also, Mechem on Agency, 2d Ed., § 802, p. 576; 2 Am.Jur., Agency, § 140, p. 112.

Let us examine the evidence here in the light of these principles. This corporation owns a single piece of real estate which is the only property it has ever owned. It is not engaged in the business of buying and selling real estate.[25] Its only business is that of leasing the property and such matters as are incidental thereto. This business the corporation entrusted to Banks as its rental agent. Whether the directors, by formal action, authorized this agency we do not know. But even if it did not do so, the board clothed the rental agent with the apparent authority to execute the necessary leases and to do such things as were incidental thereto.

We may assume that Kaplan cooperated with Banks to such an extent that each had the apparent authority to negotiate and execute the leases and to carry out the necessary details, and that Goldman acquiesced there. If so, leasing the property and attending to the matters incidental thereto were the limit of Kaplan's and Banks' authority. The fact that they had the apparent authority, or even the actual authority, to lease the property did not carry with it the implied authority to sell. * * *

It is true that under the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff below the jury had the right to infer that two of the directors of the corporation (Kaplan and Banks) had acquiesced in the contract here sued on. But there is no such evidence as to Goldman, the third director. According to Kaplan's statement, as related by Herman, when Kaplan mentioned the subject of a proposed sale to Goldman, in New York, Goldman immediately expressed his unwillingness to sell the property and thus repudiated the transaction. And yet the effect of the judgment below is to hold Goldman's interest in the corporation liable for one-third of the recovery.

But aside from this, the fact that Kaplan and Banks owned a majority of the stock of the corporation, and constituted a majority of its board of directors, gave them no authority to bind the corporation in any such informal manner.

It is elementary that the authority of the directors is conferred upon them as a board, and they can bind the corporation only by acting together as an official body. A majority of them, in their individual names, cannot act for the board itself and bind the corporation. * * *

As this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Holt, said in Starring v. Kemp, supra, 167 Va. at page 435, 188 S.E. at page 177, "The directors of a corporation must act in their corporate capacity, as a board in orderly procedure, and not as individuals; * * *."

Nor did the fact that Kaplan and Banks own two-thirds of the capital stock of the corporation, in the absence of statute, vest in them the authority to bind the corporation outside of a formal stockholders'

25 The defendant in error prints as an appendix to her brief the charter of the corporation which lists "the purposes for which it is formed," among others, "to buy, sell, * * * and generally deal in improved or unimproved real properties * * *."

Aside from the fact that the charter was not offered in evidence and hence is not a part of the record, the fact that the corporation was chartered for these purposes is, of course, no evidence that it actually engaged in such business.

meeting. * * *

Since the evidence before us shows that Kaplan, the president of the corporation, lacked the necessary authority to enter into the contract sued on, it follows that the judgment complained of must be reversed and a final judgment entered for the defendant corporation.

SCHWARTZ v. UNITED MERCHANTS & MANUFACTURERS INCORPORATED.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1934. 72 F.2d 256.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Action by Joseph Schwartz against the United Merchants & Manufacturers, Inc., for breach of contract. From a judgment dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

L. HAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE. The action was for breach by the defendant a corporation, of a contract between itself and the plaintiff. The defendant held a majority of the shares of two other companies, the Ashland Corporation and the United Rayon Mills and apparently controlled their affairs; they were textile mills, the defendant was a holding company. The plaintiff had been made the selling agent of the Ashland Corporation, discharging his duties through a company called the Cayuga Silk Corporation which he had organized with one, Holden. The defendant's president, Loring, and its vice-president, Jewett, thought it would be advantageous to substitute another contract in place of this, and long negotiations went on between them and their lawyer, Alexander, on the one hand, and the plaintiff and his lawyer, Frankel, on the other. Various drafts of a proposed contract were submitted and amended, but finally a form was agreed upon which the plaintiff signed and caused to be transmitted to Loring. As the case comes up, we may assume arguendo that Loring also signed it, and told the plaintiff that he could pick it up at any time when he called at Loring's office. A draft of it was in evidence, and as the case turns upon it, we must state it with a little detail. The parties agreed to form a company with a capital of $5,000 of which the plaintiff is to contribute $2,250 and the defendant $2,750; this company is to issue 100 non-par shares, of which the defendant is to receive 55 (Class A), and the plaintiff 45 (Class B); each class to elect two directors. The defendant "agrees and warrants that it will cause the Ashland Corporation to enter into an agreement" by which the new corporation shall become for two years the exclusive selling agent for the Ashland company and for that part of the product of the Rayon Mill which is sold exclusively by the Ashland company. Commissions are fixed on the sales, and the new corporation's operating expenses are in any case to be guaranteed by the Ashland company. In addition the Ashland company is to pay a graduated percentage of the joint profits of itself and the Rayon company; 25% of the first $100,000, 30% of the next $50,000, 35% of the second $50,000, and 40% of all profits above $200,000. The defendant warrants that such an agreement has been approved by the directors of the Ashland company, and that its president is authorized to make such a contract. The defendant agrees to vote its A shares in the new company to give the plaintiff a salary of $20,000 for two years, and to elect him president; it guarantees the performance of this contract of employment; the new company is to take over a lease of one of the plaintiff's companies and its fixtures at their book value. The defendant repudiated the transaction, insisting that it had not made any contract, and the plaintiff sued. He alleged that Loring's admissions to him established the execution and delivery; that, as president, Loring had prima facie authority to make such a contract; and that if there were no written contract, there was an equivalent oral one. The defendant denied each of these positions and in addition alleged that the contract if ever made, had been rescinded. At the close of the plaintiff's case the judge dismissed the complaint and this appeal followed.

There is no evidence of any sort that the directors of the defendant had ever heard of Loring's and Jewett's negotiations with the plaintiff; certainly none that they knew that he meant to close anything like the written draft upon which the plaintiff relies. Such a contract was by no means matter of course in any business, even assuming that the employment of an exclusive selling agent for a textile mill is a routine affair; itself a hardy assumption, for which there is not the least evidence in the record. Indeed this was not even a contract by a mill to employ its own exclusive selling agent; the defendant, by virtue of its holdings in two subsidiaries proposed to impose a selling agent upon them. It is true that the contract recites that the directors of the Ashland company have already so resolved, and this is an admission against the defendant, if we suppose the contract to have been signed and delivered; but nothing of the sort appears as to the Rayon Mill. The exceptional character of this contract did not however stop there; for the defendant reserved more than half the profits of the agency to itself. Though a majority shareholder in the new company it was to contribute nothing to the services, so far as appears, but a trifling capital and a guarantee of the salary to the real selling agent, the plaintiff. For this it might get more than fifteen per cent. of the earnings of the subsidiaries. We need not hold that this made it inevitably unlawful without the assent of the subsidiaries' minority stockholders; but certainly it was not a customary or usual transaction, even if the employment of an exclusive selling agent is such, or the employment of a selling agent for a subsidiary.

The law as to the prima facie authority of a president or other general officer of a corporation is not very clear. Unquestionably there has been a tendency of late to imply greater authority and to throw upon the corporation the duty of showing that in fact the directors have not authorized the particular powers exercised. The Court of Appeals of New York has indeed twice said without limitation that a president presumptively has any powers which the directors have authority to give him or could ratify, Patterson v. Robinson, 116 N.Y.

193, 200, 22 N.E. 372; Hastings v. Brooklyn Life Ins. Co., 138 N.Y. 473, 479, 34 N.E. 289; though the decisions cited do not support so far reaching a doctrine. In Oakes v. Cattaraugus Water Co., 143 N.Y. 430, 436, 38 N.E. 461, 26 L.R.A. 541, it appeared that the president had full charge of the business and the case really does not stand for the rule. In Watkins Salt Co. v. Mulkey (C.C.A.) 225 F. 739, our decision was to the contrary; but in Hotel Woodward v. Ford Motor Co. (C.C.A.) 258 F. 322, we accepted the presumption without limitation, though it appears from the later report of the same case (C.C.A.) 271 F. 625, that it was unnecessary to the decision. How far it was part of our ruling in Ransome Concrete Machinery Co. v. Moody (C.C.A.) 282 F. 29, is not clear. In the last three cases we were professing to follow New York law, and the Court of Appeals has more recently twice expressly decided that there were limitations on the doctrine. Heaman v. Rowell Co., 261 N.Y. 229, 185 N.E. 83; Powers v. Schlicht H. L. & P. Co., 23 App.Div. 380, 48 N.Y.S. 237, affirmed on opinion below, 165 N.Y. 662, 59 N.E. 1129. How far a similar ruling was involved in Bankers' Trust Co. v. International R. Co., 207 App.Div. 579, 202 N.Y.S. 561; Id., 239 N.Y. 619, 147 N.E. 220, and in Large v. Wire Wheel Corp., 223 App.Div. 134, 227 N.Y.S. 449; Id., 250 N.Y. 531, 166 N.E. 312, it is impossible to say, for the Court of Appeals did not write; but at least the opinions below assumed that not all contracts which the directors may authorize are presumptively within the president's authority. In Hardin v. Morgan Lithograph Co., 247 N.Y. 332, 338, 339, 160 N.E. 338, 390, although Hastings v. B. L. Ins. Co., supra, 138 N.Y. 473, 34 N.E. 289, was quoted, the presumption was limited to "such ordinary contracts as custom and the necessities of business would justify or require." The contract there at bar was not an unusual one; nor was that before the court in Twyeffort v. Unexcelled Mfg. Co., Ltd., 263 N.Y. 6, 188 N.E. 138, where the intimation was not justified that Pound, J., had intended in Hardin v. Morgan Lithograph Co., supra, 247 N.Y. 332, 160 N.E. 388, to adopt the unlimited form. The citation of Peck v. Dexter S. P. & P. Co., 164 N.Y. 127, 58 N.E. 6, in Hardin v. Morgan Lithograph Co., supra, shows that the president's authority does not in this regard differ from that of any other officer.

We conclude therefore that there is no absolute rule in New York that any contract which the president of a company may make, however out of the ordinary, throws upon the company the duty of showing that he was unauthorized. It is true that whatever powers are usual in the business may be assumed to have been granted; but the presumption stops there, as much in the case of a president as of any other officer, though, naturally in degree they may greatly differ. If so, it seems to us apparent that if any contract needed the express authority of the directors it was this. Not only did it commit the subsidiaries to an exclusive selling agent of the holding company's choosing for two years, a thing most vital to their welfare; but on its face it was a violation of the defendant's obligation to the minority shareholders of those companies, whose earnings were to be diverted to the defendant upon an insufficient consideration. Hyams v. Calumet & Hecla Mining Co., 221 F. 529, 537 (C.C.A. 6); Wheeler v. Abilene Nat. Bank, 159 F. 391, 393–395, 16 L.R.A.,N.S., 892, 14 Ann.Cas.

917 (C.C.A. 8); Heim v. Jobes, 14 F.2d 29, 35 (C.C.A. 8). Surely it would be a curious doctrine which assumed without evidence that a president might bind his corporation to such a questionable undertaking, which might involve it in litigation, if indeed it was valid at all. No desire to free plaintiffs from being obliged to fish in their enemies' water ought so far to fly in the face of probability; nothing could justify such a procedure except the express shifting of the duty of going forward upon the party holding the negative.

Judgment affirmed.

District Court of Appeal of California, 1933. 129 Cal.App. 93, 18 P.2d 393.

Action by Wilburn Smith and others against California Thorn Cordage, Inc., and others, wherein defendant John C. Thorn filed a cross-complaint. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed with directions.

TUTTLE, JUSTICE. * * * The undisputed facts show that defendant corporation was organized in 1924, for the purpose of manufacturing rope and twine. Defendant Thorn was one of the organizers and promoters of the company, and always took an active and dominant part in its management and affairs. Promotion stock in the amount of 1,632 shares was issued to Thorn, and, under the rules of the state corporation commissioner, were deposited in escrow with National City Bank of Los Angeles. Thorn parted with no monetary consideration when he acquired the stock, it being issued in consideration of services rendered the corporation. On and prior to December 2, 1926, one William Diller was a creditor of said corporation, having loaned to it large sums of money, secured by mortgages upon the real and personal property. These claims were assigned to plaintiff Cassidy, who had filed suit to foreclose said mortgages. During said time plaintiff Smith was a large creditor of the company, and his loans were all overdue and unpaid. Diller and Smith were the largest stockholders so far as actual cash purchases of stock were concerned.

On December 2, 1926, Diller, Smith, and Thorn executed an agreement concerning the affairs of the corporation. This agreement was merged into a second agreement, dated December 16, 1926. It recites that certain differences had arisen between the parties who were stockholders and directors of the corporation, in respect to its financial affairs and management. It is agreed that a finance committee be formed, composed of Diller, Smith, and Lyday, their appointment to be ratified by the directors, and that the by-laws be amended to give said committee the powers necessary to carry into effect the agreement. This committee is empowered to take complete charge and control of the finances of the corporation; to raise funds for the development of the corporation, either by sale of its capital stock or a bond issue, and to become guarantors upon its notes. Diller agreed, when the directors had ratified the contract, to dismiss all actions brought by him against the corporation. Thorn agreed to resign as general manager and accept a position as director of sales and production. * * * It is provided that, when all the obligations of the company have been discharged, the committee shall "automatically cease to exist and its powers shall thereafter be exercised by the board of directors of said corporation." * * *

The first question to be decided is the legality of the contract of December 16th. The trial court concluded that it was "contrary to public policy, is illegal, null and void." No serious contrary contention is made by appellants. Section 305 of the Civil Code read, when the contract was executed, as follows:

"The corporate powers, business, and property of all corporations formed under this title, must be exercised, conducted, and controlled by a board of not less than three directors, to be elected from among the holders of stock."

A casual reading of the contract at once discloses that it is a bald attempt to usurp the powers and duties of the directors. For instance, the "finance committee" is given "complete charge" of the finances of the corporation; and they are empowered to raise funds by sale of stock or a bond issue, and when the indebtedness of the company has been discharged, they shall cease to function, and their powers "shall thereafter be exercised by the Board of Directors." Agreements of this character have been consistently condemned and held void by our courts, upon the ground that they are contrary to public policy. Manson v. Curtis, 223 N.Y. 313, 119 N.E. 559, Ann.Cas.1918E, 247; Jackson v. Hooper, 76 N.J.Eq. 592, 75 A. 568, 27 L.R.A.,N.S., 659, 664; Farmers' Gin Co. v. Kasch (Tex.Civ.App.) 277 S.W. 746; Haldeman v. Haldeman, 176 Ky. 635, 197 S.W. 376; Teich v. Kaufman, 174 Ill. App. 306. The prerogatives and functions of the directors of a stock corporation are definitely fixed and established by our Civil Code. Section 305 et seq. The effect of this contract would be to withdraw from the directors of the corporation that control and direction of its corporate affairs, business, and management which is vested in them by law and place such control and direction in the hands of three stockholders. Such contracts are clearly illegal and unenforceable in law and in equity. * * *

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to dismiss the action.

SHERMAN & ELLIS INCORPORATED v. INDIANA MUTUAL CASUALTY COMPANY et al.[26]

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Seventh Circuit, 1930. 41 F.2d 588.

Suit by Sherman & Ellis, Inc., against the Indiana Mutual Casualty Company and another. From an adverse decree, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

26 Cert. den. 282 U.S. 893, 51 S.Ct. 107 (1930).

EVANS, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This appeal is from a decree allowing appellant but a small part of its asserted claim against the Indiana Mutual Casualty Company, here called the Casualty Company. The rejected items are predicated upon the latter company's breach of its contract as well as for moneys advanced by appellant in carrying out said contract. * * *

The casualty company, an Indiana corporation, was organized to take over the business of an unincorporated association engaged largely in writing policies covering risks created by the Indiana Workmen's Compensation Law. It early ratified the agreement here involved with appellant (an Illinois corporation that transacted a large business in casualty insurance), by which agreement the management of the casualty company was conferred upon appellant for a period of twenty years. The compensation for the services thus rendered was agreed upon and specifically stated in the agreement. The casualty company terminated its contract after some difficulties had arisen between appellant and the Indiana state department and after an unsuccessful attempt had been made by the state to have a receiver appointed for the casualty company. This siut to enforce specific performance of the contract and to recover damages followed.

The agreement betweeen appellant and the casualty company provided:

"That for and during a period of twenty years from the date hereof, it will supply without compensation other than the payments specified in Article II, Paragraph First, hereof, the underwriting and executive management for the Mutual Company in the person of its President, Frank H. Ellis, or such other of its officers as it may from time to time designate, who shall be competent to perform the services of chief executive head and underwriting manager of the Mutual Company, to the end that the same competent management which the Indiana Manufacturers Reciprocal Association has enjoyed in the past may continue uninterrupted for the benefit of the Mutual Company policyholders.

" * * * That for and during said twenty-year period it will cause to be elected as its underwriting manager, who shall have general supervision and charge of the underwriting affairs of the corporation, such person who shall be an officer of the Management Company as the Management Company shall from time to time by a writing signed by not less than a majority of its Board of Directors designate, provided that if any court of final jurisdiction shall hold that the management shall prove grossly incompetent or inefficient, then this contract shall become null and void."

"The Mutual Company covenants and agrees:

"First: That for and during the said twenty year period it shall set aside for and pay to the Management Company as and when collected by it, ten (10) per cent of the net earned premium collected from all policyholders during said period. This covenant is based upon the assurance of the Management Company that the total Management expense, inclusive of said ten per cent payments to it, but less claim expense as the same has been heretofore calculated under the said power of attorney attached hereto as 'Exhibit A' and less expense of directors shall not exceed thirty (30) per cent of the said net premiums so collected and if said Management expense during any yearly accounting period shall exceed such latter percentage, the amounts payable to the Management Company for any such period shall be abated by the amount of such excess management cost."

Appellees argue that this agreement is void as against public policy, and therefore its breach created no liability on the part of appellees.

The statutes applicable are sections 9091–9114, Burns' 1926 Statutes.

The by-laws of the casualty company among other things read:

"All officers shall be elected at the annual meeting of the Board of Directors upon the affirmative vote of a majority of the total number of directors.

"The Board of Directors shall have the general control and management of the business of the corporation. Subject to the limitations expressed in Article IX, they shall have the power to make and amend by-laws and make all regulations and take all action necessary or desirable for the proper transaction and conduct of the business and affairs of the corporation. They may appoint an executive committee composed of three or more members of the Board of Directors and delegate to such Committee such of their own powers as they may from time to time deem expedient or proper.

"These by-laws may be amended by the Board of Directors at any regular or special meeting by a two-thirds vote of the entire number of directors but no such amendment shall be effective to impair the rights of any third parties under a theretofore existing contract entered into with the corporation and which was authorized by the provisions of the by-laws as in force at the time of the execution of such contract."

The line of demarcation between cases which recognize the right of officers of a corporation to delegate certain managerial duties to a stranger and cases which deny such authority is not entirely clear or easy to follow. That corporations may, at least for a limited period, delegate to a stranger certain duties usually performed by the officers, is clear. [Citing cases.]

On the other hand, it is equally well settled that there are duties, the performance of which may not be indefinitely delegated to outsiders. [Citing cases.]

The case of Jones v. Williams, 139 Mo. 1, 39 S.W. 486, 40 S.W. 353, 37 L.R.A. 682, 61 Am.St.Rep. 436, is as strong as any that appellant has cited, and illustrates, perhaps as well as any, the extent to which the courts have gone in upholding such delegations of authority. Here the Board of Directors gave an outsider the position of editor and manager of a large daily paper for a period of five years, during which time said outsider was to determine the editorial policy of the paper. But the facts in that case fall short of those presented in the instant suit. The period of control there fixed was five years. Here it is twenty years. There a large part of the board's official duties was undelegated. Here nothing of importance was left for the board of directors but the unimportant, the ministerial duties.

It is true the statutes of most of the states authorizing the organization of corporations are of general application and are easily complied with. Yet we cannot believe that the requirements therein found or the official duties therein prescribed are mere formalities or only directory in character. This is particularly true of insurance companies upon whose conservative management and financial responsibility a multitude of policy holders are dependent. The grant of corporate power by a state is upon the hypothesis that these powers shall be exercised by the corporation's officers, annually elected, by the stockholders and not by the officers of another corporation. Anglo American Land, etc., Co. v. Lombard, supra.

Reverting to the language of this agreement for a moment, it appears "that for and during the period of twenty years from the date hereof it" (appellant) "will supply * * * the underwriting and executive management * * * in the person of its president, Frank H. Ellis, or such other officer as it may from time to time designate," and that "during said twenty-year period" the casualty company shall elect the officer furnished by appellant for its underwriting manager who "shall have general supervision and charge of the underwriting affairs of the corporation."

Such an agreement negatives the thought that appellant was merely the soliciting agent of the casualty company. It contemplated the substitution of appellant for the officers of the casualty company. What was the casualty company's business? To write casualty insurance and adjust the losses growing out of such insurance. If there existed a conflict of opinion between the board and appellant, whose voice under this contract would control? Obviously, appellant's. The length of time during which the agreement was to operate likewise indicated that not only managerial powers were delegated, but the entire policy of the casualty company business was to be fixed and determined by appellant. No other conclusion can be drawn from this agreement and the evidence than that the casualty company was to be merely an instrumentality through which appellant was to conduct a casualty insurance business in the state of Indiana. The agreement which accomplished this result transcends the spirit and theory upon which corporate franchises are based, and is void. * * * As thus modified, the decree is affirmed. The costs in this court will be borne equally.

(d) De Facto Directors and Officers.

PEOPLE'S MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY v. WESTCOTT and another.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1860. 14 Gray 440.

ACTION OF CONTRACT by a mutual fire insurance company, established by Sts. 1847, c. 18, and 1848, c. 312, to recover an assessment or call laid, under the circumstances stated in the opinion, upon a premium note signed by the defendants. Among the by-laws of the company in force in 1854 were these:

"ART. 1. There shall be an annual meeting of this company on the third Monday of January. Seven members shall constitute a quorum.

"ART. 2. Special meetings of this company shall be called whenever the directors may deem it necessary. Notice of all meetings of the company shall be given in two or more newspapers printed in Boston.

"ART. 3. The powers of this company shall be vested in twelve or more directors, who shall elect the necessary officers, fix their compensation and superintend the concerns of the company. Five directors shall constitute a quorum."

HOAR, J. It is evident that the plaintiffs cannot maintain this action, unless the assessment or call made by the vote of September 13th 1854 was lawfully made, and created a valid obligation according to the contract of the defendants.

Previously to June 12th 1854, the by-laws of the company provided that "the powers of the company should be vested in twelve or more directors," and that five directors should constitute a quorum. At the regular annual meeting of the company, held on the 16th of January 1854, twelve persons were chosen directors for the ensuing year, and held their offices on the 12th of June following. On the 12th of June a special meeting of the company was held, in pursuance of a notice duly published, "for the purpose of making alterations in the by-laws, and for the transaction of such business as may come before them." At the meeting thus held, the by-laws were altered by making four directors a quorum instead of five, and seven additional directors were chosen. Four of the seven directors then chosen were the only directors who were present at the directors' meeting held on the 13th of September 1854, by which the assessment was made which is the foundation of this action.

It has been argued for the defendants that these were not directors of the company; that their action in the premises was not authorized by law; and that the claim made upon the defendants, by virtue of it, cannot be supported. The St. of 1854, c. 453, § 15, provides that "every mutual insurance company shall annually elect, by ballot, not less than seven directors," who "shall manage and conduct the business thereof." A similar provision was made in the Rev. Sts. c. 37, § 25; and by § 27, authority was given to fill vacancies by a special election.

The officers thus chosen are chosen for the year succeeding the annual meeting; and the point is certainly deserving grave consideration whether the power of the corporation to choose them is not exhausted, when, at an annual meeting, a number of directors, not less than the number required by law have been elected. If the number to be chosen is not fixed by the by-laws, then the determination and choice of a particular number at the annual meeting might be regarded as having the effect to fix it for the ensuing year; and there is no express authority given by statute to choose directors at any other time, unless to fill a vacancy.

But a decisive objection to the choice of these new directors is, that in the call for the meeting at which they were chosen there was no intimation of any purpose to make such an election. The only specific subject of action named was the alteration of the by-laws. There was no by-law limiting the number of directors, and no new by-law was adopted respecting the number to be chosen, or altering the time of holding the annual meeting. A measure of such importance to the members of the company, which might transfer the whole corporate power to new hands, could not fairly be embraced in the phrase "for the transaction of such business as may come before them."

It is urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that these were directors de facto, actually holding and exercising the office at the time the assessment was made, and that it is not open to the defendants to object collaterally to the legality of their election. But we think the doctrine of the validity of acts done colore officii, although well established by the authorities cited, is not applicable to this case. In Baird v. Bank of Washington, 11 S. & R. 411, which is the case most relied on, a director of the bank was chosen at a meeting at which less than a quorum were present; and it was held, that his acts as an agent and officer of the bank were valid, as between the bank and third persons. But these defendants are not to be regarded as third persons in their relation to the insurance company. They are not debtors absolutely to the corporation. By the terms of their contract, their liability can only be created by an assessment or call made by the directors, officers in whose selection they are entitled to a voice. The directors referred to in their contract were the twelve who were chosen at the annual meeting, and who held the office on the 13th of September 1854. No vote to increase the number had been passed at any meeting held for such a purpose. They were not bound to recognize as directors persons who were never lawfully chosen, and who were usurping the functions of an office already filled.

Judgment for the defendants.

2. MANAGEMENT RESPONSIBILITY TO THE CORPORATION

NOTE

STANDARDS OF MANAGEMENT CONDUCT

The area of corporate management is likely to be a field of great legal, and possibly political, activity in the coming generation.

The early experience of corporate management arose out of the small corporation. A few people contributed capital; Directors and officers conducted an enterprise with these assets; they were accountable for themselves to the stockholder or others. The conventional standards of management conduct arose from this and they are repeated in these materials. They are primarily the standards imposed on men accountable for other people's property: the duty of reasonable care, the duty of loyalty and fidelity. They do not greatly vary from the standards mentioned in the Parable of the Talents in the New Testament (Matthew: 25:14).

Yet, as the corporation grows in size, the simple fiduciary standards applied to men dealing with property of others become complicated; and they widen. No longer is a Board of Directors acting for and representative of a single group of shareholders. The shareholders themselves may be completely disinterested. The preferred stockholders are interested principally in security and continuity of return; the common stockholder is interested in large profits and is prepared to take great risks. Even among common stockholders there may be large interests with different ideas and different financial desires; and Directors are commonly chosen to represent large individual or concentrated holdings. For instance, on the Board of the New York Central Railroad Company, there are Directors representing the remaining holdings of the Vanderbilt family; and others representing the now larger holdings of New York Central stock by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, and its affiliates. The financial interests in the C. & O. may call for a different type of development of the New York Central Railroad than the plans which would appeal to the individual common stockholder. Directors are clearly not representative of all stockholders; in practice, it is humanly impossible for them to disregard the point of view of the particular stockholders responsible for their election.

As the corporation grows, it becomes not merely the business investment of private individuals, but a factor—possibly a decisive factor—in the life of a community, or a region, or possibly even of the entire country. The stockholders look to it for dividends. But thousands of people may also look to it for steady employment; millions of people for goods or services convenient or perhaps essential to their daily lives. In the aggregate, relatively few business concerns play an extremely large part in the economic condition of the country. As concentration of the industrial function grows, and as power is increasingly exercised by a few hundred or less Boards of Directors and similar officials, the management stewardship transcends the simiplicities of pure property accountability.

Enlightened management recognizes this. Indeed, if they failed to do so, the forces of public opinion, easily translatable into political action, would compel them to do so. For example, in a labor controversy, they must consider whether a policy of profitably exploiting labor (yielding greater dividends to their stockholders) would be sound or even permissible if indulged against the plain community need to raise the standard of living of the corporation employees. They may have to consider the propriety of securing additional high profits when the interest of the community (as for instance, in wartime) is plainly to keep prices down to avoid inflationary moves. And so on through the whole gamut of social and economic arguments. The simple arithmetic of property and profits may not yield the sole answer to the management problem. In retrospect, the famous case of Dodge vs. Ford (supra, p. 391) where the strict logic of property was applied, seems not as clear to us as it did to a Michigan court in 1912.

There is little doubt that courts are quite aware of this problem. Yet, so far as formal rules are concerned, the ancient statement of the Michigan court is still classic, and no adequate statement of the newer responsibilities has been formulated. The courts have to act in a twilight zone of their own creation. This is covered by the "presumption" that any action taken by Directors is taken "for the best interest of the corporation"—unless the contrary is proved.

This presumption undoubtedly arises from the desire of courts not to substitute their business judgment for the business judgment of management. It began largely as a rule of protection for courts. As its scope expands, however, the presumption can be indulged to cover actions of management which go beyond pure property arithmetic. Probably additional language indicating that the action may be in the "long-range" interests of the corporation (and therefore within the range of the presumption in favor of the management) can bolster (or perhaps conceal) the willingness of courts consciously to extend the flexibility of management action.

This has distinct advantages; also distinct disadvantages. Liberated somewhat from the narrow arithmetic of property, managements now become the economic supply-line of the country, with recognized responsibility to its labor, consumers and the public. That same latitude, however, could be exercised detrimentally or inequitably against stockholders, labor, the consuming public, or the economic interests of the community. Defining the standards of modern management conduct in a large corporation is one of the major problems of the corporate field.

It is appropriate to add that in most of the other great industrial countries of the world, such standards were never defined, and the new responsibilities were thought to have been disregarded by corporate managements. One result was a movement toward socialism which has left the United States alone among the great nations of the world to continue the pure capitalist system.

BAYER et al. v. BERAN et al.[27]

Supreme Court of New York, 1944. 49 N.Y.S.2d 2.

Derivative stockholders' suits by Seymour Bayer and another, suing on their own behalf as stockholders of Celanese Corporation of America and on behalf of all other stockholders of Celanese Corporation of America, similarly situated, against C. F. Beran.

Complaint dismissed.

SHIENTAG, JUSTICE. These derivative stockholders' suits present for review two transactions upon which plaintiffs seek to charge the individual defendants, who are directors, with liability in favor of the corporate defendant, the Celanese Corporation of America. There are two causes of action alleging breach of fiduciary duty by the directors, one in connection with a program of radio advertising embarked upon by the corporation towards the end of 1941, and the other relating to certain payments of $30,000 a year made to Henri Dreyfus, one of its vice-presidents and a director, pursuant to a contract of employment entered into with him by the corporation. Before taking up the specific transactions complained of, I shall consider generally certain pertinent rules to be applied in determining the liability of directors of a business corporation such as is here involved.

Despite abuses that have developed in connection with the derivative stockholders' suit, abuses which should be dealt with promptly and effectively, it must be remembered that such an action is, at present, the only civil remedy that stockholders have for breach of fiduciary duty on the part of those entrusted with the management and direction of their corporations. We cannot therefore allow the prevailing mood of justifiable dissatisfaction with some of the temporary incidents of such suits to cause us to lose sight of certain deep-rooted, traditional concepts of the obligations of directors to their corporation and its stockholders.

Directors of a business corporation are not trustees and are not held to strict accountability as such. Nevertheless, their obligations are analogous to those of trustees. Directors are agents; they are fiduciaries. The fiduciary has two paramount obligations: responsibility and loyalty. Those obligations apply with equal force to the humblest agent or broker and to the director of a great and powerful corporation. They lie at the very foundation of our whole system of free private enterprise and are as fresh and significant today as when they were formulated decades ago. The responsibility—that is, the care and the diligence—required of an agent or of a fiduciary, is proportioned to the occasion. It is a concept that has, and necessarily so, a wide penumbra of meaning—a concept, however, which becomes sharpened in its practical application to the given facts of a situation.

The concept of loyalty, of constant, unqualified fidelity, has a definite and precise meaning. The fiduciary must subordinate his individual and private interests to his duty to the corporation whenever the two conflict. Winter v. Anderson, 242 App.Div. 430, 275 N.Y.S. 373. In an address delivered in 1934, Mr. Justice, now Chief Justice, Stone declared that the fiduciary principle of undivided loyalty was, in effect, "the precept as old as Holy Writ, that 'a man cannot serve two masters'. More than a century ago equity gave a hospitable reception to that principle and the common law was not slow to follow in giving it recognition. No thinking man can believe that an economy built upon a business foundation can long endure without loyalty to that principle". He went on to say that "The separation of ownership from management, the development of the corporate structure so as to vest in small groups control of resources of great numbers of small and uninformed investors, make imperative a fresh and active devotion to that principle if the modern world of business is to perform its proper function". Stone, The Public Influence of the Bar, 48 Harvard Law Review 1, 8.

A director is not an insurer. On the one hand, he is not called upon to use an extraordinary degree of care and prudence; and on the other hand it is established by the cases that it is not enough for a director to be honest, that fraud is not the orbit of his liability. The director may not act as a dummy or a figurehead. He is called upon to use care, to exercise judgment, the decree of care, the kind of judgment that one would give in similar situations to the conduct of his own affairs. Wangrow v. Wangrow, 211 App.Div. 552, 556, 207 N.Y. S. 132; 4 Fletcher Cyc. Corporations § 1035 et seq.; Hun v. Cary, 82 N.Y. 65, 37 Am.Rep. 546; Hanna v. Lyon, 179 N.Y. 107, 71 N.E. 778; Briggs v. Spaulding, 141 U.S. 132, 11 S.Ct. 924, 35 L.Ed. 662; General Rubber Co. v. Benedict, 164 App.Div. 332, 337, 149 N.Y.S. 880, 883, affirmed 215 N.Y. 18, 109 N.E. 96, L.R.A.1915F, 617.

The director of a business corporation is given a wide latitude of action. The law does not seek to deprive him of initiative and daring and vision. Business has its adventures, its bold adventures; and those who in good faith, and in the interests of the corporation they serve, embark upon them, are not to be penalized if failure, rather than success, results from their efforts. The law will not permit a course of conduct by directors, which would be applauded if it succeeded, to be condemned with a riot of adjectives simply because it failed. Directors of a commercial corporation may take chances, the same kind of chances that a man would take in his own business. Because they are given this wide latitude, the law will not hold directors liable for honest errors, for mistakes of judgment. The law will not interfere with the internal affairs of a corporation so long as it is managed by its directors pursuant to a free, honest exercise of judgment uninfluenced by personal, or by any considerations other than the welfare of the corporation.

To encourage freedom of action on the part of directors, or to put it another way, to discourage interference with the exercise of their free and independent judgment, there has grown up what is known as the "business judgment rule". Gamble v. Queens County Water

Co., 123 N.Y. 91, 99, 25 N.E. 201, 202, 9 L.R.A. 527; Weinberger v. Quinn, 264 App.Div. 405, 408, 35 N.Y.S.2d 567, 570; Everett v. Phillips, 288 N.Y. 227, 232, 43 N.E.2d 18, 19; Kalmanash v. Smith, 291 N.Y. 142, 155, 51 N.E.2d 681, 687. "Questions of policy of management, expediency of contracts or action, adequacy of consideration, lawful appropriation of corporate funds to advance corporate interests, are left solely to their honest and unselfish decision, for their powers therein are without limitation and free from restraint, and the exercise of them for the common and general interests of the corporation may not be questioned, although the results show that what they did was unwise or inexpedient." Pollitz v. Wabash R. Co., 207 N.Y. 113, 124, 100 N.E. 721, 724. Indeed, although the concept of "responsibility" is firmly fixed in the law, it is only in a most unusual and extraordinary case that directors are held liable for negligence in the absence of fraud, or improper motive, or personal interest.

The "business judgment rule", however, yields to the rule of undivided loyalty. This great rule of law is designed "to avoid the possibility of fraud and to avoid the temptation of self-interest." Conway, J., in Matter of Ryan's Will, 291 N.Y. 376, 406, 52 N.E.2d 909, 923. It is "designed to obliterate all divided loyalties which may creep into a fiduciary relation * * *." Thacher, J., in City Bank Farmers Trust Co. v. Cannon, 291 N.Y. 125, 132, 51 N.E.2d 674, 676. "Included within its scope is every situation in which a trustee chooses to deal with another in such close relation with the trustee that possible advantage to such other person might influence, consciously or unconsciously, the judgment of the trustee * * *." Lehman, Ch. J., in Albright v. Jefferson County National Bank, 292 N.Y. 31, 39, 53 N.E.2d 753, 756. The dealings of a director with the corporation for which he is the fiduciary are therefore viewed "with jealousy by the courts." Globe Woolen Co. v. Utica Gas & Electric Co., 224 N.Y. 483, 121 N.E. 378, 380. Such personal transactions of directors with their corporations, such transactions as may tend to produce a conflict between self-interest and fiduciary obligation, are, when challenged, examined with the most scrupulous care, and if there is any evidence of improvidence or oppression, any indication of unfairness or undue advantage, the transactions will be voided. Sage v. Culver, 147 N.Y. 241, 247, 41 N.E. 513, 514. See also Everett v. Phillips, 288 N.Y. 227, 43 N.E.2d 18; Gerdes v. Reynolds, 281 N.Y. 180, 22 N.E.2d 331. "Their dealings with the corporation are subjected to rigorous scrutiny and where any of their contracts or engagements with the corporation are challenged the burden is on the director not only to prove the good faith of the transaction but also to show its inherent fairness from the viewpoint of the corporation and those interested therein." Pepper v. Litton, 308 U.S. 295, 306, 60 S.Ct. 238, 245, 84 L.Ed 281.

While there is a high moral purpose implicit in this transcendent fiduciary principle of undivided loyalty, it has back of it a profound understanding of human nature and of its frailties. It actually accomplishes a practical, beneficent purpose. It tends to prevent a clouded conception of fidelity that blurs the vision. It preserves the free exercise of judgment uncontaminated by the dross of divided allegiance or self-interest. It prevents the operation of an influence that may be indirect but that is all the more potent for that reason. The law has set its face firmly against undermining "the rule of undivided loyalty by the 'disintegrating erosion' of particular exceptions." Meinhard v. Salmon, 249 N.Y. 458, 464, 164 N.E. 545, 546, 62 A.L.R. 1.

The first, or "advertising", cause of action charges the directors with negligence, waste and improvidence in embarking the corporation upon a radio advertising program beginning in 1942 and costing about $1,000,000 a year. It is further charged that they were negligent in selecting the type of program and in renewing the radio contract for 1943. More serious than these allegations is the charge that the directors were motivated by a noncorporate purpose in causing the radio program to be undertaken and in expending large sums of money therefor. It is claimed that this radio advertising was for the benefit of Miss Jean Tennyson, one of the singers on the program, who in private life is Mrs. Camille Dreyfus, the wife of the president of the company and one of its directors; that it was undertaken to "further, foster and subsidize her career"; to "furnish a vehicle" for her talents.

Eliminating for the moment the part played by Miss Tennyson in the radio advertising campaign, it is clear that the character of the advertising, the amount to be expended therefor, and the manner in which it should be used, are all matters of business judgment and rest peculiarly within the discretion of the board of directors. Under the authorities previously cited, it is not, generally speaking, the function of a court of equity to review these matters or even to consider them. Had the wife of the president of the company not been involved, the advertising cause of action could have been disposed of summarily. Her connection with the program, however, makes it necessary to go into the facts in some detail.

Before 1942 the company had not resorted to radio advertising. While it had never maintained a fixed advertising budget, the company had, through its advertising department, spent substantial sums of money for advertising purposes. In 1941, for example, the advertising expense was $683,000, as against net sales for that year of $62,277,000 and net profits (before taxes) of $13,972,000. The advertising was at all times directed towards the creation of a consumer preference which would compel or induce the various trade elements linking the corporation to the consumer to label the corporation's products so that the consumer would know he was buying the material he wanted. The company had always claimed that its products, which it had called or labeled "Celanese", were different from rayon, chemically and physically; that its products had qualities, special and unique, which made them superior to rayon. The company had never called or designated its products as rayon.

As far back as ten years ago, a radio program was considered, but it did not seem attractive. In 1937, the Federal Trade Commission promulgated a rule, the effect of which was to require all celanese products to be designated and labeled rayon. The name "Celanese" could no longer be used alone. The products had to be called or labeled "rayon" or "celanese rayon". This gave the directors much concern. As one of them expressed it, "When we were compelled to put our product under the same umbrella with rayon rather than being left outside as a separate product, a thermo-plastic such as nylon is, we believed we were being treated in an unfair manner and that it was up to us, however, to do the best we could to circumvent the situation in which we found ourselves. * * * All manner of things were considered but there seemed only one thing we could do. We could either multiply our current advertising and our method of advertising in the same mediums we had been using, or we could go into radio".

The directors, in considering the matter informally, but not collectively as a board, decided towards the end of 1941 to resort to the radio and to have the company go on the air with a dignified program of fine music, the kind of program which they felt would be in keeping with what they believed to be the beauty and superior quality of their products. The radio program was not adopted on the spur of the moment or at the whim of the directors. They acted after studies reported to them, made by the advertising department, beginning in 1939. A radio consultant was employed to advise as to time and station. An advertising agency of national repute was engaged to take charge of the formulation and production of the program. It was decided to expend about $1,000,000 a year, but the commitments were to be subject to cancellation every thirteen weeks, so that the maximum obligation of the company would be not more than $250,000.

So far, there is nothing on which to base any claim of breach of fiduciary duty. Some care, diligence, and prudence were exercised by these directors before they committed the company to the radio program. It was for the directors to determine whether they would resort to radio advertising; it was for them to conclude how much to spend; it was for them to decide the kind of program they would use. It would be an unwarranted act of interference for any court to attempt to substitute its judgment on these points for that of the directors, honestly arrived at. The expenditure was not reckless or unconscionable. Indeed, it bore a fair relationship to the total amount of net sales and to the earnings of the company. The fact that the company had offers of more business than it could handle did not, in law, preclude advertising. Many corporations not now doing any business in their products because of emergency conditions advertise those products extensively in order to preserve the good will, the public interest, during the war period. The fact that the company's product may not now be identifiable did not bar advertising calculated to induce consumer demand for such identification. That a program of classical and semiclassical music was selected, rather than a variety program, or a news commentator program, furnishes no ground for legal complaint. True, variety programs have a wider popular appeal than do musicals, but it would be a very sad thing if the former were the only kind of radio programs to be used. Some of the largest industrial concerns in the country have recognized this and have maintained fine musical programs on the radio for many years.

Now we have to take up an unfortunate incident, one which cannot be viewed with the complacency displayed by some of the directors of the company. This is not a closely held family corporation. The Doctors Dreyfus and their families own about 135,000 shares of common stock, the other directors about 10,000 shares out of a total outstanding issue of 1,376,500 shares. Some of these other directors were originally employed by Dr. Camille Dreyfus, the president of the company. His wife, to whom he has been married for about twelve years, is known professionally as Miss Jean Tennyson and is a singer of wide experience.

Dr. Dreyfus, as was natural, consulted his wife about the proposed radio program; he also asked the advertising agency, that had been retained, to confer with her about it. She suggested the names of the artists, all stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and the name of the conductor, prominent in his field. She also offered her own services as a paid artist. All of her suggestions as to personnel were adopted by the advertising agency. While the record shows Miss Tennyson to be a competent singer, there is nothing to indicate that she was indispensable or essential to the success of the program. She received $500 an evening. It would be far-fetched to suggest that the directors caused the company to incur large expenditures for radio advertising to enable the president's wife to make $24,000 in 1942 and $20,500 in 1943.

Of course it is not improper to appoint relatives of officers or directors to responsible positions in a company. But where a close relative of the chief executive officer of a corporation, and one of its dominant directors, takes a position closely associated with a new and expensive field of activity, the motives of the directors are likely to be questioned. The board would be placed in a position where selfish, personal interests might be in conflict with the duty it owed to the corporation. That being so, the entire transaction, if challenged in the courts, must be subjected to the most rigorous scrutiny to determine whether the action of the directors was intended or calculated "to subserve some outside purpose, regardless of the consequences to the company, and in a manner inconsistent with its interests." Gamble v. Queens County Water Co., 123 N.Y. 91, 99, 25 N.E. 201, 202, 9 L.R.A. 527; Pollitz v. Wabash R. Co., 207 N.Y. 113, 124, 100 N.E. 721, 723.

After such careful scrutiny I have concluded that, up to the present, there has been no breach of fiduciary duty on the part of the directors. The president undoubtedly knew that his wife might be one of the paid artists on the program. The other directors did not know this until they had approved the campaign of radio advertising and the general type of radio program. The evidence fails to show that the program was designed to foster or subsidize "the career of Miss Tennyson as an artist" or to "furnish a vehicle for her talents". That her participation in the program may have enhanced her prestige as a singer is no ground for subjecting the directors to liability, as long as the advertising served a legitimate and a useful corporate purpose and the company received the full benefit thereof.

The musical quality of "Celanese Hour" has not been challenged, nor does the record contain anything reflecting on Miss Tennyson's competence as an artist. There is nothing in the testimony to show that some other soprano would have enhanced the artistic quality of the program or its advertising appeal. There is no suggestion that the present program is inefficient or that its cost is disproportionate to what a program of that character reasonably entails. Miss Tennyson's contract with the advertising agency retained by the directors was on a standard form, negotiated through her professional agent. Her compensation, as well as that of the other artists, was in conformity with that paid for comparable work. She received less than any of the other artists on the program. Although she appeared with greater regularity than any other singer, she received no undue prominence, no special build-up. Indeed, all of the artists were subordinated to the advertisement of the company and of its products. The company was featured. It appears also that the popularity of the program has increased since it was inaugurated.

It is clear, therefore, that the directors have not been guilty of any breach of fiduciary duty, in embarking upon the program of radio advertising and in renewing it. It is unfortunate that they have allowed themselves to be placed in a position where their motives concerning future decisions on radio advertising may be impugned. The free mind should be ever jealous of its freedom. "Power of control carries with it a trust or duty to exercise that power faithfully to promote the corporate interests, and the courts of this State will insist upon scrupulous performance of that duty." Lehman, Ch. J., in Everett v. Phillips, 288 N.Y. 227, 232, 43 N.E.2d 18, 19. Thus far, that duty has been performed and with noteworthy success. The corporation has not, up to the present time, been wronged by the radio advertising attacked in the complaints. * * *

POST v. BUCK'S STOVE & RANGE COMPANY et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Eighth Circuit, 1912. 200 F. 918.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri; David P. Dyer, Judge.

Suit by C. W. Post against the Buck's Stove & Range Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

HOOK, CIRCUIT JUDGE. This is a suit by Charles W. Post, as a stockholder of the Buck's Stove & Range Company, to enforce for its benefit a cause of action against the American Federation of Labor its allied organizations, and their representatives, for treble damages under section 7 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (26 Stat. 209), resulting from a combination in restraint of trade and commerce. The bill of complaint was dismissed on demurrer, and Post appealed.

The Stove Company is a Missouri corporation, engaged in the manufacture and sale in interstate commerce of stoves and ranges. Its general offices and factory are at St. Louis, Mo. Its capital stock is $1,500,000, of which Post owns about 7 per cent. Some years ago a controversy arose in one of its manufacturing departments over the hours of labor, and the union employés quit. Thereupon the labor organizations throughout the United States inaugurated an extensive boycott against the company, its manufactured products, and those who persisted in dealing in them, thereby, according to the bill of complaint, unlawfully inflicting upon it a financial loss to the extent of $250,000. The Stove Company brought a suit in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and obtained an injunction in broad terms. On appeal to the Court of Appeals of the District, the company again prevailed, though the injunction was substantially modified. 33 App. D.C. 83, 32 L.R.A.,N.S., 748. From the decree of that court the parties, both complainant and defendant, took appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States, but before the hearing they amicably adjusted their differences by executing writings containing expressions of mutual friendship and consideration, and provisions that the company would not sue because of past controversies, that it would establish union wages, hours of labor, and conditions of employment, and that the labor organizations on their part commended the product of the company to their members, sympathizers, and friends. When the settlement came to the attention of the Supreme Court, it dismissed the appeals as involving questions purely moot. 219 U.S. 581, 31 S.Ct. 472, 55 L.Ed. 345. A phase of the controversy appears in 221 U.S. 418, 31 S.Ct. 492, 55 L.Ed. 797, 34 L.R.A.,N.S., 874. Post protested against the settlement. In communications to the officers and directors of his company, he demanded that, having won its fight against the unlawful boycott, its right to recover the damages sustained be enforced. Failing in this, he brought the present suit as a stockholder, claiming the settlement was without consideration, and was illegal and void. The company was made a party defendant according to equity rule 94 then in force. The foregoing recital sufficiently presents the merits of the case, which we will consider to the exclusion of less important matters.

The settlement with the labor organizations was made upon the authority of the board of directors of the Stove Company, and the only objection or complaint by any one interested in or connected with it was by the minority stockholder. As the chartered agents of a corporation, the directors represent, not only the artificial body, but also all who own its shares of stock. While they must be mindful of the corporate welfare, and not act oppressively, fraudulently, or destructively of the corporate existence, or contrary to the laws of the state or nation, or the purposes for which the corporation was organized, nor dissipate its assets or secure private advantage at corporate expense, yet as its governing body they possess a wide discretion in determining its business policies and the methods of executing them, which a stockholder cannot control or have revised by an appeal to the courts. Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U.S. 450, 26 L.Ed. 827; Delaware & Hudson Co. v. Railroad, 213 U.S. 435, 29 S.Ct. 540, 53 L.Ed. 862. In United States v. Union Pacific R. Co., 98 U.S. 569, 611 (25 L.Ed. 143), the Supreme Court, speaking of a corporation, said:

"So long as it exists in the possession and unrestrained exercise of all its corporate powers, its board of directors, unless under judicial prohibition or compulsion, is vested with the sole authority to decide whether it will assert its right of action for a supposed injury, or will condone it."

In some respects there is an analogy between a corporation and a representative government, which proceeds according to the views of the majority within constitutional lines. The minority must rely upon persuading the greater number of the right or expediency of their position, and, failing that, must yield, unless some recognized limitation has been broken.

It is averred in the bill of complaint that the Stove Company was injured to the extent of $250,000 by an illegal boycott of its interstate business, that the Sherman act gave it the right to threefold damages, and that the defendants who did the wrong were solvent and good for the amount. Upon this it is argued that the directors, against the protest of the complaining stockholder, paid $750,000 for immunity from unlawful attacks, and thereby gave away assets aggregating half the amount of its capital stock without consideration. The claim for a penalty or a punitive increase of actual damage like one for a forfeiture, is not a favorite in the law. In no true sense was the claim of that kind in the case at bar a property asset, and we do not doubt that the managing officers of the corporation could in their discretion waive or refuse to enforce it without being brought to account in a court of equity. The claim for actual damage to the business of the company was an asset in a way, but the fact that it was unacknowledged and unliquidated still remained. The averments in the bill do not change its essential character. It was not like money in bank, nor even a credit with the debtor's sense of obligation born of a quid pro quo. Barring adjustment, its liquidation and collection to any extent meant continued expensive litigation. In the most favorable view, that was the prospect before the directors, and they were entitled to look at it practically as is commonly done in business transactions. The courts favor settlements of controversies, both before and after litigation, and will rarely overhaul them with a critical eye.

It is also inaccurate to say there was a mere purchase of immunity from unlawful attacks upon the business of the company, or that its claim for damages was given up without consideration. When the litigation with the labor organization stopped, it stood upon the decree of injunction of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. It is not our province to review that decree, but presumably it protected the company in all its legal rights. But, however this may be, there belonged to the labor organizations a large field of legitimate endeavor and activity, with respect to which every business man and corporation might lawfully contract with them, and regarding which negotiations and agreements are of everyday occurrence. Organized labor has become an important factor in modern industrial life, where its influence is widely recognized; and its rightful status in the law should not be denied because of excesses committed in its name. The directors of the Stove Company, charged with the management of its extensive interests, may have come to believe in the economic advantage of union wages, hours of labor, and conditions of employment, and may have regarded the affirmative friendship of the labor organizations as valuable and desirable, and their disfavor, not unlawfully exercised, as undesirable. In such a situation, and presumably it arose, there were sufficient elements of consideration for the contract, and to overthrow it we should not hunt for others, not expressed in the writings or acknowledged by either party. We see in the daily chronicles of business affairs frequent instances of similar negotiations and agreements in which the managers of large enterprises participate, and what they do is accepted without question. The directors of the Stove Company did nothing more, save to yield an unliquidated claim for damages. It was their province to determine the wisdom or expediency of the course adopted. They did not act oppressively or fraudulently, and no stockholder gained or lost more or less than another. They acted in good faith, according to the lights given them, and for the welfare of all the interests in their charge. * * *

The decree is affirmed.

(a) Care

HUN v. CARY.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1880. 82 N.Y. 65, 37 Am.Rep. 546.

EARL, J. This action was brought by the receiver of the Central Savings Bank of the city of New York, against the defendants who were trustees of the bank, to recover damages which, it is alleged, they caused the bank by their misconduct as such trustees.

The first question to be considered is the measure of fidelity, care and diligence which such trustees owe to such a bank and its depositors. The relation existing between the corporation and its trustees is mainly that of principal and agent, and the relation between the trustees and the depositors is similar to that of trustee and cestui que trust. The trustees are bound to observe the limits placed upon their powers in the charter, and if they transcend such limits and cause damage they incur liability. If they act fraudulently or do a wilful wrong, it is not doubted that they may be held for all the damage they cause to the bank or its depositors. But if they act in good faith within the limits of powers conferred, using proper prudence and diligence, they are not responsible for mere mistakes or errors of judgment. That the trustees of such corporations are bound to use some diligence in the discharge of their duties cannot be disputed. All the authorities hold so. What degree of care and diligence are they bound to exercise? Not the highest degree, not such as a very vigilant or extremely careful person would exercise. If such were required, it would be difficult to find trustees who would incur the responsibility of such trust position. It would not be proper to answer the question by saying the lowest degree. Few persons would be willing to deposit money in savings banks, or to take stock in corporations, with the understanding that the trustees or directors were bound only to exercise slight care, such as inattentive persons would give to their own business, in the management of the large and important interests committed to their hands. When one deposits money in a savings bank, or takes stock in a corporation, thus divesting himself of the immediate control of his property, he expects, and has the right to expect, that the trustees or directors, who are chosen to take his place in the management and control of his property, will exercise ordinary care and prudence in the trusts committed to them—the same degree of care and prudence that men prompted by self-interest generally exercise in their own affairs. When one voluntarily takes the position of trustee or director of a corporation, good faith, exact justice, and public policy unite in requiring of him such a degree of care and prudence, and it is a gross breach of duty—crassa negligentia—not to bestow them.

It is impossible to give the measure of culpable negligence for all cases, as the degree of care required depends upon the subjects to which it is to be applied. First Nat. Bank v. Ocean Nat. Bank, 60 N.Y. 278, 19 Am.Rep. 181. What would be slight neglect in the care of a quantity of iron might be gross neglect in the care of a jewel. What would be slight neglect in the care exercised in the affairs of a turnpike corporation or even of a manufacturing corporation, might be gross neglect in the care exercised in the management of a savings bank intrusted with the savings of a multitude of poor people, depending for its life upon credit and liable to be wrecked by the breath of suspicion. There is a classification of negligence to be found in the books, not always of practical value and yet sometimes serviceable, into slight negligence, gross negligence, and that decree of negligence intermediate the two attributed to the absence of ordinary care; and the claim on behalf of these trustees is that they can only be held responsible in this action in consequence of gross negligence, according to its ordinary meaning—as something nearly approaching fraud or bad faith—I cannot yield to this claim; and if there are any authorities upholding the claim, I emphatically dissent from them.

It seems to me that it would be a monstrous proposition to hold that trustees, intrusted with the management of the property, interests and business of other people, who divest themselves of the management and confide in them, are bound to give only slight care to the duties of their trust, and are liable only in case of gross inattention and negligence; and I have found no authority fully upholding such a proposition. It is true that authorities are found which hold that trustees are liable only for crassa negligentia, which literally means gross negligence; but that phrase has been defined to mean the absence of ordinary care and diligence adequate to the particular case. In Scott v. Depeyster, 1 Edw. Ch. 513, 543—a case much cited—the learned Vice Chancellor said: "I think the question in all such cases should and must necessarily be, whether they (directors) have omitted that care which men of common prudence take of their own concerns. To require more, would be adopting too rigid a rule rendering them liable for slight neglect; while to require less, would be relaxing too much the obligation which binds them to vigilance and attention in regard to the interests of those confided to their case, and expose them to liability for gross neglect only—which is very little short of fraud itself." In Spering's Appeal, 71 Pa. 11, 10 Am.Rep. 684, Judge Sharswood said: "They (directors) can only be regarded as mandataries—persons who have gratuitously undertaken to perform certain duties, and who are, therefore, bound to apply ordinary skill and diligence, but no more." In Hodges v. New England Screw Co., 1 R.I. 312, 53 Am.Dec. 624, Jenckes, J., said: "The sole question is whether the directors have or have not bestowed proper diligence. They are liable only for ordinary care; such care as prudent men take in their own affairs." And in the same case, Ames J., said: "They should not, therefore, be liable for innocent mistakes, unintentional negligence, honest errors of judgment, but only for willful fraud or neglect, and want of ordinary knowledge and care." The same case came again under consideration in 3 R.I. 9, and Green, Ch. J., said: "We think a board of directors, acting in good faith and with reasonable care and diligence who nevertheless fall into a mistake, either as to law or fact, are not liable for the consequences of such mistake." In the case of The Liquidators of the Western Bank v. Douglas (11 Session Cases [3d Series], 112 [Scotch]), it is said: "Whatever the duties (of directors) are, they must be discharged with fidelity and conscience, and with ordinary and reasonable care. It is not necessary that I should attempt to define where excusable remissness ends and gross negligence begins. That must depend to a large extent on the circumstances. It is enough to say that gross negligence in the performance of such a duty, the want of reasonable and ordinary fidelity and care, will impose liability for loss thereby occasioned." In The Charitable Corporation v. Suton (2 Atkyns, 405) Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said, that a person who accepted the office of director of a corporation "is obliged to execute it with fidelity and reasonable diligence," although he acts without compensation. In Litchfield v. White, 5 N.Y. Super. Ct. 545, Sandford, J., said: "In general, a trustee is bound to manage and employ the trust property for the benefit of the cestui que trust with the care and diligence of a provident owner. Consequently he is liable for every loss sustained by reason of his negligence, want of caution, or mistake, as well as positive misconduct."

In Spering's Appeal, Judge Sharswood said that directors "are not liable for mistakes of judgment, even though they may be so gross as to appear to us absurd and ridiculous, provided they were honest, and provided they are fairly within the scope of the powers and discretion confided to the managing body." As I understand this language, I cannot assent to it as properly defining to any extent the nature of a director's responsibility. Like a mandatary, to whom he has been likened, he is bound not only to exercise proper care and diligence, but ordinary skill and judgment. As he is bound to exercise ordinary skill and judgment, he cannot set up that he did not possess them. When damage is caused by his want of judgment, he cannot excuse himself by alleging his gross ignorance. One who voluntarily takes the position of director, and invites confidence in that relation, undertakes, like a mandatary, with those whom he represents or for whom he acts, that he possesses at least ordinary knowledge and skill, and that he will bring them to bear in the discharge of his duties. (Story on Bailments, § 182.) Such is the rule applicable to public officers, to professional men and to mechanics, and such is the rule which must be applicable to every person who undertakes to act for another in a situation or employment requiring skill and knowledge; and it matters not that the service is to be rendered gratuitously. These defendants voluntarily took the position of trustees of the bank. They invited depositors to confide to them their savings, and to intrust the safe-keeping and management of them to their skill and prudence. They undertook not only that they would discharge their duties with proper care, but that they would exercise the ordinary skill and judgment requisite for the discharge of their delicate trust.

Enough has now been said to show what measure of diligence, skill and prudence the law exacts from managers and directors of corporations; and we are now prepared to examine the facts of this case, for the purpose of seeing if these trustees fell short of this measure in the matters alleged in the complaint.

This bank was incorporated by the act chapter 467 of the Laws of 1867, and it commenced business in the spring of that year, in a hired building, on the east side of Third avenue, in the city of New York. It remained there for several years, and then removed to the west side of the avenue, between Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth streets, where it occupied hired rooms until near the time of its failure in the fall of 1875. During the whole time the deposits averaged only about $70,000. In 1867, the income of the bank was $942.12, and the expenses, including amounts paid for safe, fixtures, charter, current expenses and interest to depositors, were $5,571.34. In 1868, the income was $5,471.43, and the expenses, including interest to depositors, $5,719.43. In 1869, the income was $3,918.27, and the expenses and interest paid $5,346.05. In 1870 the income was $5,784.09, and expenses and interest $7,040.22. In 1871 the income was $13,551.14, which included a bonus of $4,000, or $6,000 obtained upon the purchase of a mortgage of $40,000, which mortgage was again sold in 1874 at a discount of $2,000, and the expenses, including interest paid, were $9,124.05. In 1872 the income was $5,100.51, and the expenses, including interest paid, were $7,212.49. Down to the 1st day of January, 1873, therefore, the total expenses, including interest paid, were $5,046, more than the income. To this sum should be added $2,000, deducted on the sale of the large mortgage in 1874, which was purchased at the large discount in 1871, as above mentioned, and yet entered in the assets at its face. From this apparent deficiency should be deducted the value of the safe and furniture of the bank, from which the receiver subsequently realized $500. At the same date, the amount due to over one thousand depositors was about $70,000, and the assets of the bank consisted of about $13,000 in cash and the balance mostly of mortgages upon real estate.

While the bank was in this condition, with a lease of the rooms then occupied by it expiring May 1, 1874, the project of purchasing a lot and erecting a banking-house thereon began to be talked of among the trustees. The only reason put on record in the minutes of the meetings held by the trustees for procuring a new banking-house was to better the financial condition of the bank. In February, 1873, at a meeting of the trustees, a committee was appointed "on site for new building"; and in March the committee entered into contract for the purchase of a plot of land, consisting of four lots, on the corner of Forty-eighth street and Third avenue, for the sum of $74,500; of which $1,000 was to be paid down, $9,000 on the first day of May then next, and $64,000 to be secured by a mortgage, payable on or before May 1, 1875, with interest from May 1, 1873, at seven per cent.; and there was an agreement that payment of the principal sum secured by the mortgage might be extended to May 1, 1877, provided a building should, without unavoidable delay, be erected upon the corner lot, worth not less than $25,000. This contract was reported by the committee to the trustees, at a meeting held April 7th. On the 1st day of May, 1873, the real estate was conveyed and the cash payment was made, and four separate mortgages were executed to secure the balance, one upon each lot. The mortgage upon the lot upon which the bank building was afterward erected was for $30,500. At the same time the bank became obligated to build upon that lot a building covering its whole front, 25 feet, and 60 feet deep, and not less than five stories high, and have the same enclosed by the first day of November then next. Upon that lot the bank proceeded, in the spring of 1875, to erect a building covering the whole front, and 76 feet deep, and five stories high, at an expense of about $27,000. And the building was nearly completed when the receiver of the bank was appointed, in November of that year. The three lots not needed for the building were disposed of, as we may assume, without any loss, leaving the corner lot used for the building to cost the bank $29,250. This case may then be treated as if these trustees had purchased the corner lot at $29,250, and bound themselves to erect thereon a building costing $27,000. When the receiver was appointed, that lot and building, and other assets which produced less than $1,000, constituted the whole property of the bank; and subsequently the lot and building were swept away by a mortgage foreclosure, and this action was brought to recover the damages caused to the bank by the alleged improper investment of its funds, as above stated, in the lot upon which the building was erected.

At the time of the purchase of the lot, the bank was substantially insolvent. If it had gone into liquidation, its assets would have fallen several thousand dollars short of discharging its liabilities, and this state of things was known to the trustees. It had been in existence about six years, doing a losing business. The amount of its deposits, which its managers had not been able to increase, shows that the enterprise was an abortion from the beginning, either because it lacked public confidence or was not needed in the place where it was located. It had changed its location once without any benefit. It had on hand but about $13,000 in cash, of which $10,000 were taken to make the first payments. The balance of its assets was mostly in mortgages not readily convertible. One was a mortgage for $40,000, which had been purchased at a large discount, and we may infer that it was not very saleable, as the trustees resolved to sell it as early as May, 1873, and in August, 1873, authorized it to be sold at a discount of not more than $2,500, and yet it was not sold until 1874. In this condition of things the trustees made the purchase complained of, under an obligation to place on the lot an expensive banking-house. Whether, under the circumstances, the purchase was such as the trustees, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, skill and care, could make; or whether the act of purchase was reckless, rash, extravagant, showing a want of ordinary prudence, skill and care, were questions for the jury. It is not disputed that, under the charter of this bank, as amended in 1868 (chap. 294), it had the power to purchase a lot for a banking-house "requisite for the transaction of its business." That was a power, like every other possessed by the bank, to be exercised with prudence and and care. Situated as this moribund institution was, was it a prudent and reasonable thing to do, to invest nearly half of all the trust funds in this expensive lot, with an obligation to take most of the balance to erect thereon an extravagant building? The trustees were urged on by no real necessity. They had hired rooms where they could have remained; or if those rooms were not adequate for their small business, we may assume that others could have been hired. They put forward the claim upon the trial that the rooms they then occupied were not safe. That may have been a good reason for making them more secure, or for getting other rooms, but not for the extravagance in which they indulged. It is inferable, however, that the principal motive which influenced the trustees to make the change of location was to improve the financial condition of the bank by increasing its deposits. Their project was to buy this corner lot and erect thereon an imposing edifice, to inspire confidence, attract attention, and thus draw deposits. It was intended as a sort of advertisement of the bank, a very expensive one indeed. Savings banks are not organized as business enterprises. They have no stockholders, and are not to engage in speculations or money-making in a business sense. They are simply to take the deposits, usually small, which are offered, aggregate them, and keep and invest them safely, paying such interest to the depositors as is thus made, after deducting expenses, and paying the principal upon demand. It is not legitimate for the trustees of such a bank to seek deposits at the expense of present depositors. It is their business to take deposits when offered. It was not proper for these trustees—or at least the jury may have found that it was not—to take money then on deposit and invest it in a banking-house, merely for the purpose of drawing other deposits. In making this investment, the interests of the depositors, whose money was taken, can scarcely be said to have been consulted.

It matters not that the trustees purchased this lot for no more than a fair value, and that the loss was occasioned by the subsequent general decline in the value of real estate. They had no right to expose their bank to the hazard of such a decline. If the purchase was an improper one when made, it matters not that the loss came from the unavoidable fall in the value of the real estate purchased. The jury may have found that it was grossly careless for the trustees to lock up the funds in their charge in such an investment, where they could not be reached in any emergency which was likely to arise in the affairs of the crippled bank.

We conclude, therefore, that the evidence justified a finding by the jury that this was not a case of mere error or mistake of judgment on the part of the trustees, but that it was a case of improvidence, or reckless, unreasonable extravagance, in which the trustees failed in that measure of reasonable prudence, care and skill which the law requires. * * *

KAVANAUGH v. GOULD.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1918. 223 N.Y. 103, 119 N.E. 237.

CRANE, J. The defendant, a director of a trust company, has been sued to recover losses sustained by the company through his alleged neglect of duties. The courts below have decided in his favor. The sufficiency of the complaint was before us in 181 N.Y. 121, 73 N.E. 562, and 191 N.Y. 522, 84 N.E. 1115. Although a new trial must be had as the trial court failed to pass upon the issues presented by the pleadings, yet, in order to present the matter clearly, a statement of the principal facts involved is necessary.

The Trust Company of the Republic, now the Commonwealth Trust Company, was organized under the Banking Law of the state of New York in March of 1902 with a capital of $1,000,000 and a surplus of $500,000, fully paid. The respondent, George J. Gould, became a director and qualified April 3, 1902, when he filed his oath with the banking department. He resigned as such director October 29, 1902. Within that time the trust company suffered heavy losses from bad management. Gould never attended the meetings of the directors, nor acquainted himself with the business or methods of the trust company.

The law governing the duties of directors in financial institutions is well settled. They are summoned to the same degree of care and prudence that men prompted by self-interest generally exercise in their own affairs. Hun v. Cary, 82 N.Y. 65, 37 Am.Rep. 546; Cassidy v. Uhlmann, 170 N.Y. 505, 63 N.E. 554; Hanna v. Lyon, 179 N.Y. 107, 110, 71 N.E. 778; General Rubber Co. v. Benedict, 215 N.Y. 18, 109 N.E. 96, L.R.A.1915F, 617; Campbell v. Watson, 62 N.J.Eq. 396, 50 A. 120; Warner v. Penoyer, 91 F. 587, 33 C.C.A. 222, 44 L.R.A. 761. They should know of and give direction to the general affairs of the institution and its business policy, and have a general knowledge of the manner in which the business is conducted, the character of the investments, and the employment of the resources. No custom or practice can make a directorship a mere position of honor void of responsibility, or cause a name to become a substitute for care and attention. The personnel of a directorate may give confidence and attract custom; it must also afford protection. * * * By arrangement with Mr. Gould when he became a director, he was not expected to attend the meetings, or to take active part in the affairs of the company.

Upon the organization of the Trust Company of the Republic, Daniel Le Roy Dresser was elected president. He had been a very successful business man, stood well in the community, but was never a banker. He had never served as a director of a bank.

The by-laws adopted by the stockholders made provision for a board of directors of 25 and an executive committee consisting of the president and 6 other directors elected by the board. The executive committee had the powers of the board when the latter was not in session. For all investments in stocks, bonds, mortgages, and personal securities the assent of the executive committee was necessary. The president, however, might be authorized by the executive committee to make investments in such securities without previously consulting it as to details, but all such transactions were to be reported at its next meeting. Tuesday of every week, at the main office of the company, was the meeting time for the executive committee. The directors were required to meet at the same place on the third Tuesday of every month. Regular minutes of the executive committee meetings were to be kept and read at the monthly meetings of the board. They were always to be open to any director. The president was also required to report the finances, affairs, and business of the company at the board meetings. Copies of the by-laws were given to each director; their sufficiency to properly regulate and control the affairs of the company was yet to be tested by experience. Dresser, the president, said:

"The by-laws were preliminary and experimental, and we were trying to feel our way and find out what was really best. They were permanent to the extent of being printed and distributed to the directors."

It was important, especially in a new company, that such by-laws as it did have should be complied with. When a by-law is adopted, it is as much the law of the corporation as if its provisions had been a part of the charter. Kent v. Quicksilver Mining Co., 78 N.Y. 159, 179; Hun v. Cary, 82 N.Y. 65, 37 Am.Rep. 546.

During the period in question, meetings of the board of directors were held on March 27th, April 15th, May 13th, June 17th, July 22d, September 16th, and October 21st. The meeting which should have been held on August 19, 1902, was passed. There was no meeting of the executive committee from the 22d day of July until the 9th of September.

Books were kept in which were recorded loans of various kinds and which were taken into the executive committee and board meetings, and were always open for inspection. The minutes of the executive committee, however, failed to show any loans reported to it or the nature of the securities taken for loans.

The losses sustained by the trust company were largely due to its connection with the United States Shipbuilding Company. It invested so heavily in the bonds of this company as to bring ruin to the institution but for the timely interference, in October of 1902—six months after its organization—of several of its directors. * * *

What a director must do in exercising reasonable care in the performance of his duties is always dependent upon the facts. Care is a relative term. This Trust Company of the Republic was of recent origin; its business had not become established or its methods fixed. Its president was a merchant with apparently no banking experience. Whether a director in exercising reasonable care would have left such an institution without some scrutiny of its initial investments or supervision of its loans, or without directing the nature of its business policy, is a question of fact for the trial court. * * *

BARNES v. ANDREWS.

District Court of the United States, New York, 1924. 298 F. 614.

In Equity. Suit by Earl B. Barnes, as receiver of the Liberty Starters Corporation, against Charles Lee Andrews. Decree for defendant.

LEARNED HAND, DISTRICT JUDGE. * * * The first liability must rest upon the defendant's general inattention to his duties as a director. He cannot be charged with neglect in attending directors' meetings, because there were only two during his incumbency, and of these he was present at one and had an adequate excuse for his absence from the other. His liability must therefore depend upon his failure in general to keep advised of the conduct of the corporate affairs. The measure of a director's duties in this regard is uncertain; the courts contenting themselves with vague declaration, such as that a director must give reasonable attention to the corporate business. While directors are collectively the managers of the company, they are not expected to interfere individually in the actual conduct of its affairs. To do so would disturb the authority of the officers and destroy their individual responsibility, without which no proper discipline is possible. To them must be left the initiative and the immediate direction of the business; the directors can act individually only by counsel and advice to them. Yet they have an individual duty to keep themselves informed in some detail, and it is this duty which the defendant in my judgment failed adequately to perform.

All he did was to talk with Maynard as they met, while commuting from Flushing, or at their homes. That, indeed, might be enough, because Andrews had no reason to suspect Maynard's candor, nor has any reason to question it been yet disclosed. But it is plain that he did not press him for details, as he should. It is not enough to content oneself with general answers that the business looks promising and that all seems prosperous. Andrews was bound, certainly as the months wore on, to inform himself of what was going on with some particularity, and, if he had done so, he would have learned that there were delays in getting into production which were putting the enterprise in most serious peril. It is entirely clear from his letters of April 14, 1920, and June 21, 1920, that he had made no effort to keep advised of the actual conduct of the corporate affairs, but had allowed himself to be carried along as a figurehead, in complete reliance upon Maynard. In spite of his own substantial investment in the company, which I must assume was as dear to him as it would be to other men, his position required of him more than this. Having accepted a post of confidence, he was charged with an active duty to learn whether the company was moving to production, and why it was not, and to consider, as best he might, what could be done to avoid the conflicts among the personnel, or their incompetence, which was slowly bleeding it to death.

Therefore I cannot acquit Andrews of misprision in his office, though his integrity is unquestioned. The plaintiff must, however, go further than to show that he should have been more active in his duties. This cause of action rests upon a tort, as much though it be a tort of omission as though it had rested upon a positive act. The plaintiff must accept the burden of showing that the performance of the defendant's duties would have avoided loss, and what loss it would have avoided. I pressed Mr. Alger to show me a case in which the courts have held that a director could be charged generally with the collapse of a business in respect of which he had been inattentive, and I am not aware that he has found one. In Bowerman v. Hammer, 250 U.S. 504, 39 S.Ct. 549, 63 L.Ed. 1113, the defendant was held for specific illegal loans, made by the president; so also in Kavanaugh v. Commonwealth Trust Co., 223 N.Y. 103, 119 N.E. 237. In Briggs v. Spaulding, 141 U.S. 132, 11 S.Ct. 924, 35 L.Ed. 662, a case decided by a narrow margin, which to-day would probably have gone the other way, the only attempt to charge the defendant was upon specific loans. Even in Hun v. Cary, 82 N.Y. 65, 37 Am.Rep. 546, it was for a single foolish investment that the defendant was held. The report of Allen v. Roydhouse (D.C.E.D.Pa.) 232 Fed. 1010, is not full enough to ascertain just what the verdict included, but apparently it, too, was for specific losses due to improper investments, and the same was true in Robinson v. Smith, 3 Paige (N.Y.) 222, 24 Am. Dec. 212.

When the corporate funds have been illegally lent, it is a fair inference that a protest would have stopped the loan, and that the director's neglect caused the loss. But when a business fails from general mismanagement, business incapacity, or bad judgment, how is it possible to say that a single director could have made the company successful, or how much in dollars he could have saved? Before this cause can go to a master, the plaintiff must show that, had Andrews done his full duty, he could have made the company prosper, or at least could have broken its fall. He must show what sum he could have saved the company. Neither of these has he made any effort to do.

The defendant is not subject to the burden of proving that the loss would have happened, whether he had done his duty or not. If he were, it would come to this: That, if a director were once shown slack in his duties, he would stand charged prima facie with the difference between the corporate treasury as it was, and as it would be, judged by a hypothetical standard of success. How could such a standard be determined? How could any one guess how far a director's skill and judgment would have prevailed upon his fellows, and what would have been the ultimate fate of the business, if they had? How is it possible to set any measure of liability, or to tell what he would have contributed to the event? Men's fortunes may not be subjected to such uncertain and speculative conjectures. It is hard to see how there can be any remedy, except one can put one's finger on a definite loss and say with reasonable assurance that protest would have deterred, or counsel persuaded, the managers who caused it. No men of sense would take the office, if the law imposed upon them a guaranty of the general success of their companies as a penalty for any negligence.

It is, indeed, hard to determine just what went wrong in the management of this company. Any conclusion is little better than a guess.

Still some discussion of the facts is necessary, and I shall discuss them. The claim that there were too many general employees turned out to be true, but, so far as I can see, only because of the delay in turning out the finished product. Had the factory gone into production in the spring of 1920, I cannot say, and the plaintiff cannot prove, that the selling department would have been prematurely or extravagantly organized. The expense of the stock sales was apparently not undue, and in any event Andrews was helpless to prevent it, because he found the contract an existing obligation of the company. So far as I can judge, the company had a fair chance of life, if the factory could have begun to turn out starters at the time expected. Whether this was the fault of Delano, as I suspect, is now too uncertain to say. It seems to me to make no difference in the result whether Delano, through inattention, or through sickness, or through contempt for Taylor, or for all these reasons, did not send along "Van Dycks," or whether Taylor should have got along without them, or should have shown more initiative and competence than he did. Between them the production lagged, until it was too late to resuscitate the dying company; its funds had oozed out in fixed payments, till there was nothing left with which to continue the business.

Suppose I charge Andrews with a complete knowledge of all that we have now learned. What action should he have taken, and how can I say that it would have stopped the losses? The plaintiff gives no definite answer to that question. Certainly he had no right to interject himself personally into the tangle; that was for Maynard to unravel. He would scarcely have helped to a solution by adding another cook to the broth. What suggestion could he have made to Maynard, or to his colleagues? The trouble arose either from an indifferent engineer, on whom the company was entirely dependent, or from an incompetent factory manager, who should have been discharged, or because the executives were themselves inefficient. Is Andrews to be charged for not insisting upon Taylor's discharge, or for not suggesting? Suppose he did suggest it; have I the slightest reason for saying that the directors would have discharged him? Or, had they discharged him, is it certain that a substitute employed in medias res would have speeded up production? Was there not as a fair chance that Delano and Taylor might be brought to an accommodation as there was in putting in a green man at that juncture? How can I, sitting here, lay it down that Andrews' intervention would have brought order out of this chaos, or how can I measure in dollars the losses he would have saved? Or am I to hold Andrews because he did not move to discharge Maynard? How can I know that a better man was available? It is easy to say that he should have done something, but that will not serve to harness upon him the whole loss, nor is it the equivalent of saying that, had he acted, the company would now flourish.

True, he was not very well-suited by experience for the job he had undertaken, but I cannot hold him on that account. After all, it is the same corporation that chose him which now seeks to charge him. I cannot agree with the language of Hun v. Cary, supra, that in effect he gave an implied warranty of any special fitness. Directors are not specialists, like lawyers or doctors. They must have good sense, perhaps they must have acquaintance with affairs; but they need not—indeed, perhaps they should not—have any technical talent. They are the general advisers of the business, and if they faithfully give such ability as they have to their charge, it would not be lawful to hold them liable. Must a director guarantee that his judgment is good? Can shareholders call him to account for deficiencies which their votes assured him did not disqualify him for his office? While he may not have been the Cromwell for that Civil War, Andrews did not engage to play any such rôle.

I conclude, therefore, as to this first claim that there is no evidence that the defendant's neglect caused any losses to the company, and that, if there were, that loss cannot be ascertained. * * *

Bill dismissed, without costs.

BATES v. DRESSER.

DRESSER v. BATES.

BATES v. DEAN et al.

SAME v. BUNKER et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1920. 251 U.S. 524, 40 S.Ct. 247.

Appeals from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the First Circuit.

Suit by John L. Bates, receiver of the National City Bank of Cambrige, Mass., against Sumner Dresser, administrator of Edwin Dresser, deceased, and others. From a decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals (250 F. 525, 162 C.C.A. 541), reversing a decree of the District Court (229 F. 772), and dismissing the bill against some of the defendants, the receiver and certain defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a bill in equity brought by the receiver of a national bank to charge its former president and directors with the loss of a great part of its assets through the thefts of an employé of the bank while they were in power. The case was sent to a master who found for the defendant; but the District Court entered a decree against all of them. 229 F. 772. The Circuit Court of Appeals reversed this decree, dismissed the bill as against all except the administrator of Edwin Dresser, the president, cut down the amount with which he was charged [28] and refused to add interest from the date of the decree of the District Court. Dresser v. Bates, 250 F. 525, 162 C.C.A. 541. Dresser's administrator and the receiver both appeal, the latter contending that the decree of the District Court should be affirmed with interest and costs.

The bank was a little bank at Cambridge with a capital of $100,000 and average deposits of somewhere about $300,000. It had a cashier, a bookkeeper, a teller and a messenger. Before and during the time of the losses. Dresser was its president and executive officer, a large stockholder, with an inactive deposit of from $35,000 to $50,000. From July, 1903, to the end, Frank L. Earl was cashier. Coleman, who made the trouble, entered the service of the bank as messenger in September, 1903. In January, 1904, he was promoted to be bookkeeper, being then not quite eighteen but having studied bookkeeping. In the previous August an auditor employed on the retirement of a cashier had reported that the daily balance book was very much behind, that it was impossible to prove the deposits, and that a competent bookkeeper should be employed upon the work immediately. Coleman kept the deposit ledger and this was the work that fell into his hands. There was no cage in the bank, and in 1904 and 1905 there were some small shortages in the accounts of three successive tellers that were not accounted for, and the last of them, Cutting, was asked by Dresser to resign on that ground. Before doing so he told Dresser that someone had taken the money and that if he might be allowed to stay he would set a trap and catch the man, but Dresser did not care to do that and thought that there was nothing wrong. From Cutting's resignation on October 7, 1905, Coleman acted as paying and receiving teller, in addition to his other duty, until November, 1907. During this time there were no shortages disclosed in the teller's accounts. In May, 1906, Coleman took $2,000 cash from the vaults of the bank, but restored it the next morning. In November of the same year he began the thefts that come into question here. Perhaps in the beginning he took the money directly. But as he ceased to have charge of the cash in November, 1907, he invented another way. Having a small account at the bank, he would draw checks for the amount he wanted, exchange checks with a Boston broker, get cash for the broker's check, and when his own check came to the bank through the clearing house, would abstract it from the envelope, enter the others on his book and conceal the difference by a charge to some other account or a false addition in the column of drafts or deposits in the depositors' ledger. He handed to the cashier only the slip from the clearing house that showed the totals. The cashier paid whatever appeared to be due and thus Coleman's checks were honored. So far as Coleman thought it necessary, in view of the absolute trust in him on the part of all concerned, he took care that his balances should agree with those in the cashier's book.

By May 1, 1907, Coleman had abstracted $17,000, concealing the fact by false additions in the column of total checks, and false balances in the deposit ledger. Then for the moment a safer concealment was effected by charging the whole to Dresser's account. Coleman adopted this method when a bank examiner was expected. Of course when the fraud was disguised by overcharging a depositor it could not be discovered except by calling in the passbooks, or taking all the deposit slips and comparing them with the depositors' ledger in detail. By November, 1907, the amount taken by Coleman was $30,100, and the charge on Dresser's account was $20,000. In 1908 the sum was raised from $33,000 to $49,671. In 1909 Coleman's activity began to increase. In January he took $6,829.26; in March, $10,833.73; in June, his previous stealings amounting to $83,390.94, he took $5,152.-06; in July, $18,050; in August, $6,250; in September, $17,350; in October, $47,277.08; in November, $51,847; in December, $46,956.44; in January, 1910, $27,395.53; in February, $6,473.97; making a total of $310,143.02, when the bank closed on February 21, 1910. As a result of this the amount of the monthly deposits seemed to decline noticeably and the directors considered the matter in September, but concluded that the falling off was due in part to the springing up of rivals, whose deposits were increasing, but was parallel to a similar decrease in New York. An examination by a bank examiner in December, 1909, disclosed nothing wrong to him.

In this connection it should be mentioned that in the previous semi-annual examinations by national bank examiners nothing was discovered pointing to malfeasance. The cashier was honest and everybody believed that they could rely upon him, although in fact he relied too much upon Coleman, who also was unsuspected by all. If Earl had opened the envelopes from the clearing house, and had seen the checks, or had examined the deposit ledger with any care he would have found out what was going on. The scrutiny of anyone accustomed to such details would have discovered the false additions and other indicia of fraud that were on the face of the book. But it may be doubted whether anything less than a continuous pursuit of the figures through pages would have done so except by a lucky chance.

The question of the liability of the directors in this case is the question whether they neglected their duty by accepting the cashier's statement of liabilities and failing to inspect the depositors' ledger. The statements of assets always were correct. A by-law that had been allowed to become obsolete or nearly so is invoked as establishing their own standard of conduct. By that a committee was to be appointed every six months "to examine into the affairs of the bank, to count its cash, and compare its assets and liabilities with the balances on the general ledger, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the books are correctly kept, and the condition of the bank in a sound and solvent condition." Of course liabilities as well as assets must be known to know the condition and, as this case shows, peculations may be concealed as well by a false understatement of liabilities as by a false show of assets. But the former is not the direction in which fraud would have been looked for, especially on the part of one who at the time of his principal abstractions was not in contact with the funds. A debtor hardly expects to have his liability understated. Some animals must have given at least one exhibition of dangerous propensities before the owner can be held. This fraud was a novelty in the way of swindling a bank so far as the knowledge of any experience had reached Cambridge before 1910. We are not prepared to reverse the finding of the master and the Circuit Court of Appeals that the directors should not be held answerable for taking the cashier's statement of liabilities to be as correct as the statement of assets always was. If he had not been negligent without their knowledge it would have been. Their confidence seemed warranted by the semi-annual examinations by the Government examiner and they were encouraged in their belief that all was well by the president, whose responsibility, as executive officer; interest, as large stockholder and depositor; and knowledge, from long daily presence in the bank, were greater than theirs. They were not bound by virtue of the office gratuitously assumed by them to call in the pass books and compare them with the ledger, and until the event showed the possibility they hardly could have seen that their failure to look at the ledger opened a way to fraud. See Briggs v. Spaulding, 141 U.S. 132, 11 S.Ct. 924, 35 L.Ed. 662; Warner v. Penoyer, 91 F. 587, 33 C.C.A. 222, 44, L.R.A. 761. We are not laying down general principles, however, but confine our decision to the circumstances of the particular case.

The position of the president is different. Practically he was the master of the situation. He was daily at the bank for hours, he had the deposit ledger in his hands at times and might have had it at any time. He had had hints and warnings in addition to those that we have mentioned, warnings that should not be magnified unduly, but still that taken with the auditor's report of 1903, the unexplained shortages, the suggestion of the teller, Cutting, in 1905, and the final seeming rapid decline in deposits, would have induced scrutiny but for an invincible repose upon the status quo. In 1908 one Fillmore learned that a package containing $150 left with the bank for safe keeping was not to be found, told Dresser of the loss, wrote to him that he could but conclude that the package had been destroyed or removed by someone connected with the bank, and in later conversation said that it was evident that there was a thief in the bank. He added that he would advise the president to look after Coleman, that he believed he was living at a pretty fast pace, and that he had pretty good authority for thinking that he was supporting a woman. In the same year or the year before, Coleman, whose pay was never more than twelve dollars a week, set up an automobile, as was known to Dresser and commented on unfavorably to him. There was also some evidence of notice to Dresser that Coleman was dealing in copper stocks. In 1909 came the great and inadequately explained seeming shrinkage in the deposits. No doubt plausible explanations of his conduct came from Coleman and the notice as to speculations may have been slight, but taking the whole story of the relations of the parties, we are not ready to say that the two courts below erred in finding that Dresser had been put upon his guard. However little the warnings may have pointed to the specific facts, had they been accepted they would have led to an examination of the depositors' ledger, a discovery of past and a prevention of future thefts. * * *

Decree modified by charging the estate of Dresser with interest from February 1, 1916, to June 1, 1918, upon the sum found to be due, and affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE MCKENNA and MR. JUSTICE PITNEY dissent, upon the ground that not only the administrator of the president of the bank but the other directors ought to be held liable to the extent to which they were held by the District Court. 229 F. 772.

MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER and MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS took no part in the decision.

BOSWORTH v. ALLEN.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1901. 168 N.Y. 157, 61 N.E. 163.

Appeal from supreme court, appellate division, Fourth department.

Action by John H. Bosworth, receiver of the Genesee National Savings & Loan Association, against Charles M. Allen and others. From an order of the appellate division (67 N.Y.Supp. 1133) affirming an interlocutory judgment of the special term sustaining demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The substance of the complaint is as follows: In 1898 the defendants were directors, duly elected by the stockholders, of the Genesee National Savings & Loan Association, a domestic corporation, the defendants Silas N. Gallup, James Walling, Ellery G. Allen, and Eli H. Gallup being respectively the president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer, and the defendant Charles M. Allen the attorney, for said corporation, appointed by the trustees pursuant to the by-laws. About the 11th of November, 1898, without the knowledge or consent of the stockholders, and in violation of their duty to the corporation, the defendants conspired with John L. White and John W. Reynolds, whom they knew to be irresponsible and untrustworthy, to elect them and other persons to be designated by them, whom they could control, as directors of the corporation, and to thereby place its business and property under their charge, and subject to sale and disposition by them. Pursuant to said conspiracy, the defendants agreed with Reynolds and White to resign in succession their positions as directors and officers, and elect in their places the said Reynolds and White, and other persons to be designated by them, for such purpose, and to thereby place in their possession and under their management and control the property, rights, and interests of the corporation, and to render the same subject to sale and disposition by the substituted management. In consideration of this agreement and these acts to be done by the defendants, said Reynolds and White and their associates were to pay to the defendants, upon the surrender of their capital stock to the corporation, the sum of $13,434.94, which exceeded its withdrawal value by $1,168.53. It was also part of the consideration that the corporation, by its board of directors, should hire the defendant Charles M. Allen as its counsel for the period of two years at a compensation of $200 a month, and that the defendant should be paid by Reynolds and White and the persons selected by them a bonus of about $18,000. In furtherance of such conspiracy, this agreement was carried into effect in all respects by the election of the new directors and officers, the placing of the business, property, and effects under their charge, and the making of a written contract with Charles M. Allen to employ him as counsel for the period and at the rate of compensation aforesaid. Such sums of money, to wit, $1,168.53 and about $18,000, were also paid in accordance with the agreement. All this is alleged to have been done on or about the 11th of November, 1898. It is further alleged that between the day last named and April 15, 1899, said White and Reynolds and their associates, as trustees and officers, grossly mismanaged the business and property of the corporation, and wasted its assets by the payment of unnecessary and unearned salaries to themselves and others to the amount of $7,425.79, and by the payment of extravagant and unnecessary expenses in managing the business of the corporation to the amount of about $5,000. On or about the 11th of November, 1898, White, Reynolds, and their said associates, as trustees and officers of the corporation, made various wasteful and improvident contracts against the rights of the corporation and its stockholders, and without their knowledge or consent. The corporation was compelled to expend about $5,000 in annulling said contracts, recovering real estate conveyed pursuant thereto, obtaining possession of its assets and property, and ousting White, Reynolds, and their associates from their positions as officers and trustees. It was also deprived of rents, issues, and profits of said real estate and interest on money paid on said improvident contracts amounting to about $3,000. On the 15th of April, 1899, the corporation repudiated its contract with Charles M. Allen, and removed him from office as its counsel, but he claims that said contract is still binding, and that he is entitled, by virtue thereof, to receive the compensation stipulated thereby. The relief demanded is that the Allen contract be annulled; that the amount of money paid to the defendants, as alleged, be ascertained and determined, and that they be required to account for it; that the amount of damages sustained by the corporation by the wrongful acts of the defendants be fixed, and that it would have judgment therefor. There was also a prayer for general relief. * * *

VANN, J. (after stating the facts). The defendants conspired to wreck the corporation of which they were directors and to thereby make money for themselves. Although they sustained a relation of trust to the corporation and were bound to promote its interests and protect its property, they entered into a combination to destroy it in order to enrich themselves. While not technically trustees, for the title of the corporate property was in the corporation itself, they were charged with the duties and subject to the liabilities of trustees. Clothed with the power of controlling the property and managing the affairs of the corporation, without let or hindrance, as to third persons they were its agents, but as to the corporation, itself, equity holds them liable as trustees. * * * the directors of a corporation are charged with the duties of trustees and bound to care for its property and manage its affairs in good faith, and for a violation of that duty, resulting in waste of its assets, injury to its property, or unlawful gain to themselves, they are liable to account in equity the same as ordinary trustees. The corporation has the right to call upon them to account, not only for all the property intrusted to their care, but also for all moneys furtively made by them at its expense. * * *

The sum of $1,168.53, specifically alleged to have been paid to the defendants in excess of the withdrawal value of their shares, belonged to the corporation, and they are liable to account for it as money wrongfully paid to them pursuant to the conspiracy. The amount, not specifically alleged, paid to them for official action, was money obtained pursuant to the same conspiracy by virtue of their office as directors, for which they must account as part of the assets of the corporation. This money they could not lawfully receive for themselves. They received it as the price of the transfer of all the corporate assets to the custody of irresponsible third parties, and the law, in order to protect the corporation, treats it as its property, and, therefore, money which it is entitled to recover from all the defendants. Their conspiracy was to keep it themselves, and the receipt thereof was an overt act in execution of the conspiracy. The loss of money by the corporation subsequent to the conspiracy, and in consequence thereof, through the wrongful acts of the defendants' successors, placed in office by their treachery, was the natural, and therefore the expected, result of the conspiracy itself. The value of the assets wasted and the amount of expense incurred as the direct and natural result of the conspiracy must be accounted for by the defendants, because those assets were intrusted to their care and protection as trustees, and, having broken their trust, they are liable for all the proximate consequences. * * * In a single equitable action the court may go to the bottom of the wrong, and work out, in such form as the facts require, all the relief called for by the conspiracy of the defendants against the corporation towards which they stood as trustees. The order appealed from should be reversed, the demurrers overruled, with costs in all courts, and the questions certified answered in the affirmative.

Ordered accordingly.

FORBES v. McDONALD et al.

Supreme Court of California, 1880. 54 Calif. 98.

Appeal from an order granting defendants a new trial, in the Fourth District Court, City and County of San Francisco. Morrison, J.

Department No. 2, MYRICK, J. Peter Owens was indebted to A. Forbes by reason of transactions in the stock of the Mahogany Gold and Silver Mining Company, in the sum of $2,102.50, for which Forbes held 150 shares of the stock as collateral, then worth about $4,200. Forbes was a trustee of the company. The management of the company was not harmonious, two trustees having views opposed to the other two, Forbes being the fifth. The defendants, McDonald and T. J. Owens, who were dealing in stock of the corporation, desired to have Forbes resign as trustee, that they might have some friend put in his place; and Forbes wanted payment of his indebtedness from Peter Owens secured. So, it was agreed that the defendants, McDonald and T. J. Owens, should give their promissory note for the amount of Peter Owens' indebtedness, payable at six months, interest at 1¼ per cent. per month, and Forbes should resign and aid them in electing a successor. The note was made payable to the plaintiffs, in which firm A. Forbes was a partner.

The note not having been paid, the plaintiffs brought suit; the defense of want of and illegality of consideration was interposed, and the case was heard by a jury. The Court below instructed the jury, in substance, among other things, that, if any part of the consideration for the giving of the note was the resignation by Forbes of his office as trustee of the corporation, that the consideration was illegal, and the whole note was void, and plaintiffs could not recover. Notwithstanding this instruction, the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs for the full amount of the note and interest. On motion of the defendants the Court below granted a new trial, and from this order this appeal is prosecuted.

It is not necessary to cite authorities to show that a contract is void if a portion only of the consideration is illegal. It does not appear to us to be at all doubtful, that if the whole or a part of a consideration be that a trustee resign his trust, the consideration is illegal. It is contra bonos mores. Trustees of corporations owe duties to others besides themselves; they have been placed in a position of trust by the stockholders, and to those stockholders they must be faithful. It is a violation of that trust for them to be bought out of office. They may resign when they please, but they must not make profit or benefit to themselves in the matter of such resignation.

The instructions of the Court below were correct; the verdict of the jury was contrary to the instructions, and the Court did not err in granting a new trial.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. MANICE v. POWELL et al.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1911. 201 N.Y. 194, 94 N.E. 634.

Mandamus by the People, on the relation of William Manice, against William H. Powell and others to set aside proceedings by which relator was removed from the office of director of a domestic corporation, and for his reinstatement in such office. From an order of the Appellate Division (140 App.Div. 912, 125 N.Y.S. 1139), affirming as a matter of law, and not in discretion, an order of the Special Term denying a motion for a peremptory mandamus, relator appeals. Affirmed.

CHASE, J. The relator, who had been elected a director of the defendant Atlantic Terra Cotta Company for a term which will not expire until January, 1912, has been removed from his office as a director as hereinafter stated, and another person has been elected to fill the alleged vacancy, and he is now performing the duties as such director. The relator seeks by peremptory mandamus to set aside the proceedings by which it is alleged he was removed and to be reinstated in his office as a director. * * *

The learned justice at Special Term in denying the motion for a peremptory mandamus, referring to the relator, said: "As a director he was but an agent of the corporation, and the principles of the law of agency were applicable to him. If wrongfully removed before the expiration of the period for which he was elected, he is entitled to recover if damages have resulted; but he cannot insist upon being retained in a fiduciary relation towards the stockholders against the latter's wishes. The stockholders had the power to revoke the agency, though not the right." In the reason so given for the denial of the motion we think the distinction between a person occupying an ordinary contract relation as an agent for a principal and a person elected for a specified term as a director of a private corporation was wholly overlooked. "The board of directors of a corporation do not stand in the same relation to the corporate body which a private agent holds towards his principal. * * * In corporate bodies the powers of the board of directors are in a very important sense original and undelegated." Hoyt v. Thompson's Executors, 19 N.Y. 207, 216; Beveridge v. N. Y. E. R. R. Co., 112 N.Y. 1, 22, 23, 19 N.E. 489, 2 L.R.A. 648.

While the ordinary rules of law relating to an agent are applicable in considering the acts of a board of directors in behalf of a corporation when dealing with third persons, the individual directors making up the board are not mere employés, but a part of an elected body of officers constituting the executive agents of the corporation. They hold such office charged with the duty to act for the corporation according to their best judgment, and in so doing they cannot be controlled in the reasonable exercise and performance of such duty. As a general rule, the stockholders cannot act in relation to the ordinary business of the corporation, nor can they control the directors in the exercise of the judgment vested in them by virtue of their office. The relation of the directors to the stockholders is essentially that of trustee and cestui que trust. The peculiar relation that they bear to the corporation and the owners of its stock grows out of the inability of the corporation to act except through such managing officers and agents. The corporation is the owner of the property, but the directors in the performance of their duty possess it, and act in every way as if they owned it.

This court in Bosworth v. Allen, 168 N.Y. 157, 61 N.E. 163, 55 L.R.A. 751, 85 Am.St.Rep. 667, referring to directors, say: "While not technically trustees, for the title of the corporate property was in the corporation itself, they were charged with the duties and subject to the liabilities of trustees. Clothed with the power of controlling the property and managing the affairs of the corporation, without let or hindrance, as to third persons they were its agents, but as to the corporation itself, equity holds them liable as trustees. 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, §§ 1061, 1063, 1088, 1097." The relator occupied a position toward the corporation that was one of trust and responsibility. He was given power and authority to act not only substantially uncontrolled by the corporation, but he was not subject to discharge as an employé unless such right is vested in some court or body of persons by statute or in its articles of incorporation duly authorized by statute. It would be somewhat startling to the business world if we definitely announced that the directors of a corporation were mere employés and that the stockholders of the corporation have the power to convene from time to time and remove at will any or all of the directors, although their respective terms of office have not expired. * * * [The court held that mandamus was not the appropriate remedy.]

Order affirmed.

GERDES et al. v. REYNOLDS et al.

BALLANTINE v. FERRETTI et al.

Supreme Court of New York, Special Term, 1941. 28 N.Y.S.2d 622.

Action by John Gerdes and another, trustees of the Reynolds Investment Company, Incorporated, debtor, against Clarence K. Reynolds, Franklin E. Mayer, and others to hold defendants accountable for assets of the company allegedly wasted and improperly applied, wherein defendants Mayer and another filed counterclaims and defendants Reynolds and another filed a cross-claim, and action by Arthur A. Ballantine, as trustee of the Continental Securities Corporation, against Vincent E. Ferretti and others, including Clarence K. Reynolds, Franklin E. Mayer, and others, to recover money allegedly taken from the treasury of the corporation illegally, wherein defendant Mayer filed a counterclaim and defendants Reynolds and another filed a cross-claim.

Counterclaims dismissed, and judgments in accordance with opinion. [Statement of facts from referee's report, 30 N.Y.S.2d 755, (Sup.Ct., N.Y., 1941):

PHILIP J. DUNN, REFEREE. * * * The defendants, Clarence K. Reynolds (hereinafter referred to as "Reynolds"), William F. Woodward, Richard S. Reynolds and Richard S. Reynolds, Jr. (the latter two of whom were not served in the action) owned the majority of the voting stock of Reynolds Investing Company, Inc., an investment trust, and constituted its board of directors. They sold their stock to a group composed in part of the defendants Prentice, Brady, Clayton, Ferretti and Calmur & Company, Inc.

Delivery of the major portion of the stock was made on December 31, 1937, the sellers receiving payment of approximately $1,500,000 of the purchase price of $2,110,000. At the same time, pursuant to the contract of sale, they resigned their offices as directors and elected as their successors the defendants Prentice, Mayer, Davis and McLanahan (who promptly elected Prentice president, Mayer vice-president, Davis secretary and Galvin, also a defendant herein, treasurer). The balance of the purchase price, in the sum of approximately $600,000 was paid on January 3 and January 12, 1938, and the balance of the stock delivered.

On January 3, 1938, the first business day after the new management had taken control, defendants Prentice and Davis, both directors and officers of the Company (acting under instruments executed by Mayer and Davis authorizing access to the safe deposit box of the company), proceeded, without any authorization of the board of directors, to open the box and remove therefrom securities worth approximately $1,000,000. These they placed in the possession of the brokerage firm of Prentice & Brady, of which defendants Prentice and Brady were members. During the next few days certain of these securities were sold by Prentice & Brady. Other securities of the company which had been pledged by the former management were redeemed and sold. As a result of these transactions, a credit balance of about $740,000, was created in favor of Reynolds Investing Company on the books of Prentice & Brady, the remainder of the securities deposited or redeemed continuing in the possession of Prentice & Brady.

From these sources the management, on January 10th, to procure funds needed in their manipulation of this and other investment trusts of which they had gained control, now abstracted the sum of $882,500.

To accomplish this diversion of funds, and to give it the appearance of a legitimate transaction, a circuitous method was adopted. Prentice & Brady drew to the order of Reynolds Investing Company their check for $882,500, and charged the account of the company therewith. This check was never deposited or cashed by the company. Instead it was endorsed by the company, acting by the defendants Mayer as vice-president and Galvin as treasurer, to Continental Securities Corporation, which company, acting through officers thereof in league with the defendants Prentice, Ferretti and others, in turn endorsed it back to Prentice & Brady, who duly credited the account of Continental therewith.

The ostensible consideration for the transfer of this sum by Reynolds Investing Company to Continental was the sale at par by Continental to Reynolds Investing of 8,825 shares of stock of Fiscal Management Company, Limited, of a par value of $100 per share, physical possession of which shares had in fact been delivered to Reynolds Investing several days previously. In truth, these shares were wholly worthless, and were known by Prentice and his associates to be so.
* * *

As a result of the $882,500 check having been charged to its account, Reynolds Investing Company's credit balance on the books of Prentice & Brady, amounting to approximately $740,000, was wiped out, and a debit balance of about $140,000 created (which was shortly thereafter increased by the purchase of certain securities to about $240,000). As security for such debit balance Prentice & Brady still held securities belonging to Reynolds Investing Company of a value considerably in excess of that amount.

Several weeks later, by reason of a disagreement between the defendants Mayer and the other defendants who were in league with Prentice, the affairs of the company were placed in the hands of the law firm of Messrs. Chadbourne, Hunt, Jaeckel & Brown, who were retained on February 9, 1938. Not long after, the defendant Prentice resigned from the board of directors. The investigation of the Chadbourne firm disclosed the material facts of the conspiracy including the sale of the securities and the transaction involving the check of $882,500. The Chadbourne firm consulted with Mr. Irving Rossi, a well-known investment banker, and on March 18, 1938, a new board of directors of the Reynolds Company consisting of Mr. Rossi, James E. Bruch, who was vice-president of National Dairy Products Corporation, E. O. Sowerwine, who was assistant to the president of Anaconda Copper Company, W. A. Hanway who was Vice-president of Hydro Electric System, an affiliate of the International Pulp & Paper Company, were elected directors with Mr. Rossi as president.

This board, on March 24, 1938, obtained from Prentice & Brady the securities of the Reynolds Company still held by that firm, by authorizing the payment to or for the account of Prentice & Brady of the sum of $233,846.77, the amount of the debit balance then standing against the company on the books of that firm.

On May 18, 1938, a petition for reorganization of the Reynolds Investing Company under the Corporate Reorganization Act, 11 U.S.C.A. § 207, was filed in the United States District Court in New Jersey. In the reorganization proceedings a plan contemplating the liquidation of the Reynolds Company was adopted and fees and expenses, including compensation to the trustee, accountants, attorneys for various committees, the attorneys for the petitioning creditors, etc., amounting to $182,722.24 were allowed and paid.

The interlocutory judgment herein has adjudged that the defendants Reynolds and Woodward shall pay the sum of $1,318,750 with interest, which sum was found by the court to represent the portion of the total purchase price of $2,110,000 received by the Reynolds group which was paid for the transfer of control and management of Reynolds Investing Company, as distinct from the transfer of its stock, such payment to be made in part to the plaintiffs and in part, for reasons not here material, to the trustee of Continental Securities Corporation. In addition, the judgment orders various defendants to account to the plaintiffs for property received, profits made, fees and commissions received and damages caused. * * *]

WALTER, JUSTICE. * * * Inherent in the very nature of stock corporations as constituted by our law are the settled principles that the shares of stock are the property of the stockholders, that the stockholders may sell their shares when and to whom they please and for such price as they can get, that they may sell to buyers of whose identity and integrity and responsibility they are unaware (as is the common practice in the multitudinous sales through brokers on and off exchanges), that the purchase price paid upon such sales belongs to the sellers, and that these same rights exist even where the stockholders hold a majority of the stock and where the sellers are a group who together own and sell such a majority. Equally inherent is the further principle that the holders of a majority (or other statutorially fixed percentage) of the voting shares elect the directors who are to manage the business affairs of the corporation, and in that sense and to that extent control the corporation and its assets. Equally inherent is the further principle that, in the absence of some statutory restriction, officers and directors may resign when they please; and in the case of this particular corporation, as in many others, the remaining directors were specifically authorized to fill vacancies. Over against these principles and rules there is the principle that officers and directors of a corporation, and under certain circumstances and for some purposes the majority stockholders, whether one or many, stand in a fiduciary relation to the corporation and to the minority stockholders, and must observe the high standards of diligence, good faith and loyalty required of all fiduciaries. These principles are not destructive one of the other. They are complementary to each other, and are merely misinterpreted when thought to be otherwise. The fact that a certain case states one without referring to the others thus affords no ground for supposing that those not stated are rejected. (Compare Rodkinson v. Haecker, 248 N.Y. 480, 488, 489, 162 N.E. 493, where the ever-present necessity for considering principles in the light of the facts of particular cases is emphasized.)

The cases in which majority stockholders have been said to stand in a fiduciary relation to the minority have been cases in which the court was speaking of a matter of corporate management committed by statute directly to the stockholders rather than to the directors (Kavanaugh v. Kavanaugh Knitting Co., 226 N.Y. 185, 194, 195, 123 N.E. 148; Kroger v. Jaburg, 231 App.Div. 641, 248 N.Y.S. 387), or cases in which the majority have in fact assumed the management of the corporation's property or business (Southern Pacific Co. v. Bogert, 250 U.S. 483, 491, 39 S.Ct. 533, 63 L.Ed. 1099; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. New York & Northern R. R. Co., 150 N.Y. 410, 430, 431, 44 N.E. 1043, 34 L.R.A. 76, 55 Am.St.Rep. 689; Cleary v. Higley, 154 Misc. 158, 168, 169, 277 N.Y.S. 63, affirmed 246 App.Div. 698, 284 N.Y.S. 989; Blaustein v. Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co., 174 Misc. 601, 665, 690, 21 N.Y.S.2d 651) or cases in which the majority have undertaken to act for the minority. Sautter v. Fulmer, 258 N.Y. 107, 179 N.E. 310; McManus v. Durant, 168 App.Div. 643, 154 N.Y.S. 580. Such cases may not exhaust the entire list of situations in which the majority may be held to be fiduciaries, but certainly as to matters not relating to management of the corporation's business or property, and in the absence of any express undertaking, the stockholders do not stand in a fiduciary relation to each other. Kavanaugh v. Kavanaugh Knitting Co., supra, 226 N.Y. at page 194, 123 N.E. 148; Rothchild v. Memphis & C. R. Co., 6 Cir., 113 F. 476, 479, 480, 481. Clearly, therefore, in the matter of selling their stock the holders of a majority thereof, whether one or a group, act for themselves alone and not as trustees, either technically or substantially, for the other stockholders, and no fiduciary duty is violated by such a sale, even though such sale ultimately bring about a change in the directorate. As long ago as 1896 the Court of Appeals, in speaking of a railroad corporation, said that "it is a matter of common knowledge that, where the ownership of a majority of the stock of such a corporation changes, the board usually changes, unless its members are already in harmony with the policy of the purchasers" (Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. New York & Northern R. Co., supra, 150 N.Y. at page 425, 44 N.E. at page 1046, 34 L.R.A. 76, 55 Am.St.Rep. 689), and that it is true today and is equally true of other kinds of corporations. No illegality can be found, therefore, in the mere fact of a sale of a majority of the voting stock with the necessarily accompanying incident of a change in the personality of those who by reason of stock ownership have the right to choose the directorate.

In this case, however, it indisputably was a condition of the sale that all the officers and directors then in office should forthwith resign and that under their power to fill vacancies they should forthwith elect an entirely new directorate chosen wholly by the purchaser of the stock, and all the officers and directors then in office did so resign and did so elect as directors persons designated by the purchaser. Furthermore, the brief submitted on behalf of this group of defendants accurately portrays the situation where it specifically states that the purchaser "insisted that on the closing date sufficient stock to constitute a majority should be actually delivered or placed in escrow beyond the control of the sellers," and "made certain that the purchaser was bound to get delivery of enough shares to constitute a clear majority contemporaneously with the closing on December 31st," and the contract was so arranged as to insure the purchaser that "the majority block was irrevocably within his control the minute the deal closed on the 31st of December." Immediate and complete control in advance of payment of the entire purchase price was thus specifically bargained for and accorded. The officers and directors were made specifically aware of the fact that what the purchaser or purchasers wanted was immediate and actual control, and not merely the right to elect directors which incidentally follows from a sale of a majority of voting stock.

Officers and directors always and necessarily stand in a fiduciary relation to the corporation and to its stockholders and creditors. They undoubtedly may free themselves of that fiduciary relationship by ceasing to be officers and directors, but their right to resign, although sometimes stated with seeming absoluteness (Bruce v. Platt, 80 N.Y. 379, 383), is qualified by their fiduciary obligations to others. "Rights are never absolute and independent of those of others." O'Neill v. City of Port Jervis, 253 N.Y. 423, 430, 171 N.E. 694, 696. Officers and directors thus "cannot terminate their agency or accept the resignation of others if the immediate consequence would be to leave the interests of the company without proper care and protection." 1 Morawetz on Corporations, sec. 563, quoted in Zeltner v. Henry Zeltner Brewing Co., 174 N.Y. 247, 253, 66 N.E. 810, 812, 95 Am.St.Rep. 574; and see Carnaghan v. Exporters' & Producers' Oil Co., 57 Hun 588, 11 N.Y.S. 172, 175. Neither can they accept pay in any form or guise, direct or devious, for their own resignation or for the election of others in their place. [Citing cases.] * * *

The statement in 3 Cook on Corporations, 8th Ed., section 622a, that "a contract by which the directors who own a majority of the stock sell such stock and agree to substitute the vendees as directors of the company is legal," may be literally correct, but it must be read subject to many limitations, many of which are plainly stated in other sentences of the same section and in the accompanying footnotes and cited cases, and all which perhaps can be summed up by saying that such a contract cannot be made a vehicle for a violation of any fiduciary duty. As stated on the next page of the text, "All such transactions are closely scrutinized by the courts, and if fraudulent, as a matter of fact, the retiring directors are personally responsible for any losses." Needless to say, constructive fraud or breach of fiduciary duty would have the same result. Barnes v. Brown, 80 N.Y. 527, likewise merely recognizes what I already have stated as inherent in the nature of stock corporations, namely, that majority stockholders may dispose of their stock, and that when they do so such right of control as the law vests in the majority necessarily passes to the buyer as a legal incident of the sale. It gives no countenance to any idea that either the ownership of stock or the right to sell it carries with it any license to breach any sort of duty owed to anyone.

It is obvious, of course that it would be illegal for officers and directors to resign and elect as their successors persons who they knew intended to loot the corporation's treasury. Even stockholders, despite their right to sell their stock to whom they please, could not legally do that. Liability for such an act would not have to be predicated upon breach of a fiduciary relation, for the act would amount to a wilful and malicious injury to property, tortious in its very nature. See Phelan v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co., 24 Misc. 109, 112, 113, 53 N.Y.S. 305; Ingraham v. National Salt Co., 72 App.Div. 582, 584, 74 N.Y.S. 388, 76 N.Y.S. 1016; affimed 179 N.Y. 556, 71 N.E. 1131; Delavan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. R. Co., 154 App.Div 8, 13, 14, 130 N.Y.S. 17, in which denial of injunctions restraining transfers of majority stock was based upon the absence of facts indicating probable damage to the corporation by those to whom control was about to be transferred. I here find as a fact that none of the sellers of the stock of Reynolds Investing Company had any knowledge that the purchasers thereof, or any one acting for them, had any intention to loot the corporation or to pay any part of the purchase price out of the corporation's own assets. Whether or not the resigning officers and directors nevertheless are chargeable with notice of such an intention—whether or not it was, under all the circumstances, a risk reasonably to be perceived—is, of course, another question.

The questions determinative of the liability of corporate officers and directors in such a situation as is here disclosed thus appear to me to be these: (1) Are the circumstances such that, despite actual ignorance of unlawful plans and designs on the part of the purchasers, they are chargeable, with notice of such plans and designs, or, perhaps more accurately, with notice that unlawful plans and designs are a risk reasonably to be perceived? "The risk reasonably to be perceived defines the duty to be obeyed." Palsgraf v. Long Island R. R. Co., 248 N.Y. 339, 344, 162 N.E. 99, 100, 59 A.L.R. 1253. (2) Is the price paid in reality a price paid for the stock, or is it, in part at least, a price paid for the resignations of the existing officers and directors and the election of the buyer's nominees? And the principal factors which must supply the answers to these questions are the nature of the assets which are to pass into the possession and control of the purchasers by reason of the transaction, the method by which the transaction is to be consummated, and the relation of the price paid to the value of the stock.

The immediate consequence of the resignation of the entire body of officers and directors of a corporation obviously is at least potentially different where the corporation's assets are land and buildings and where they are securities which to all intents and purposes are practically negotiable, and such potential difference must be taken into account, both by the officers and directors and by a court judging their conduct, in considering whether their en masse resignations would leave the assets without proper care and protection, because the risk of dissipation or speedy misapplication obviously is greater. Such difference in the nature of the assets must be considered, also, in gauging the significance of the purchaser's conceded requirement that custody and possession of the assets be accorded before payment of a substantial part of the purchase price. An assumption that the officers and directors of Reynolds Investing Company fully performed the fiduciary duty resting upon them thus requires an assumption that they realized that by doing what they did they were placing in the hands of those whom they elected as their successors the custody and possession of practically negotiable securities of a value of more than double the amount of the agreed purchase price, and were so placing such custody and possession at a time when a large part of the purchase price (over $600,000) still remained unpaid. For fiduciaries confronted with such a realization, I gravely doubt whether it is sufficient that they truthfully can say that they actually knew nothing against the character of the purchasers or of their nominees, or even that they had affirmative evidence that the purchasers were of good reputation. A man dealing with his own affairs may be as confiding and trusting as he pleases, and may be grossly negligent without being guilty of bad faith; but a fiduciary charged with the care of the property of others must be reasonably vigilant, and will not be heard to say that he did not know what the circumstances plainly indicated or that his faith in people was such that obvious opportunities for wrongdoing gave him no inkling that wrongdoing might be done, and schemes to acquire the stock of corporations by using assets of the corporation to pay the purchase price did not originate in the year 1937.

Precisely what would be the situation of directors who, by resignation and election, turned practically negotiable securities over to strangers who had not completed payment, need not be here determined, however, because here there is the added element that in connection with the same transaction a price was paid which is claimed to be grossly in excess of the value of the stock, and the situation of these directors must be considered in connection with that additional element.

Gross inadequacy of price long and frequently has been regarded as important evidence upon the question of good faith, and sometimes is sufficient in itself to charge a buyer with notice of fraudulent intent on the part of a seller. Anderson v. Nicholas, 28 N.Y. 600; First National Bank of Amsterdam v. Miller, 163 N.Y. 164, 57 N.E. 308; Second National Bank v. Weston, 172 N.Y. 250, 257, 64 N.E. 949; Johnson v. Woodworth, 134 App.Div. 715, 718, 119 N.Y.S. 146; Becker v. Hart, 135 App.Div. 785, 788, 789, 120 N.Y.S. 270; Moyer v. Bloomingdale, 38 App.Div. 227, 234, 56 N.Y.S. 991; 2 Pomeroy's Eq.Juris., 4th Ed., sec. 600, 747; Glenn, Fraudulent Conveyances, Rev.Ed., sec. 294, 298. For the same reasons, gross excessiveness of price may be equally significant in determining for what it really was paid, and may be sufficient to charge a seller with notice of a fraudulent intent on the part of a buyer.

Before discussing the question of excessiveness of price, however, I interject the finding of fact that the resigning officers and directors did not believe that Sartell Prentice was the purchaser of the 1,055,000 shares sold. They believed only that Prentice was interested as a purchaser in conjunction with other persons whose identity was unknown to them. * * *.

The substance of my holding, as I think already has been plainly indicated, is that the four officers and directors of Reynolds Investing Company arranged a transaction under which $791,250 was paid as the purchase price for 1,555 shares of stock and $1,318,750 was paid as a price for their resignations and the election of another's nominees as their successors. The $791,250 cannot be recovered from any one because it was a lawful price paid for what the owners of the stock had a right to sell, and as the sale of the stock is not being either rescinded or treated as void it also follows that those who received the stock need not return it, unless, for reasons hereafter to be discussed, such return becomes necessary for a proper adjustment of equities. The $1,318,750 must be returned because it was an unlawful price paid for what no one had any right to sell and the proceeds of which, if sold, are treated, for remedial purposes, as the property of the corporation (Bosworth v. Allen, supra, 168 N.Y. at page 167, 61 N.E. 163, 55 L.R.A. 751, 85 Am.St.Rep. 667), and the persons who must return it are those who arranged the transaction and gave the illegal consideration for it, viz., the four officers who so resigned and elected the successors. The basis of their liability for its return is their participation in a breach of fiduciary duty, and their liability is joint and several (Jackson v. Smith, 254 U.S. 586, 589, 41 S.Ct. 200, 65 L.Ed. 418; Asphalt Construction Co. v. Bouker, 150 App.Div. 691, 694, 135 N.Y.S. 714, affirmed 210 N.Y. 643, 105 N.E. 1080; Irving Trust Co. v. Deutsch, 2 Cir., 73 F.2d 121, 125; Id., 2 Cir., 87 F.2d 1008), and as a part of that $1,318,750 is shown to have come from Continental, and as Continental's rights are not cut off by the intervention of any bona fide purchaser, equity should take the direct instead of the circuitous route and make them liable directly to Continental's trustee for that part. * * *

I conclude, therefore, that Continental's trustee is entitled to final judgment in his favor against defendants C. K. Reynolds and Woodward for $1,106,175.77, with interest thereon from December 31, 1937, and costs, or for $691,359.85, with like interest and costs, according to whether Continental's trustee elects to turn over or retain the 946,435 shares of common stock of Reynolds Investing Company. The judgment is not to run against C. K. Reynolds as trustee of any of the trusts mentioned in the pleadings and evidence. He is being held liable for acts done as an officer and director of Reynolds Investing Company. Whether or not he can seek contribution or indemnity from any other person is not susceptible of determination in this suit. * * *

The $1,666.66 paid to Prentice, and the $1,000 paid to Woodward, as alleged in the sixth and seventh causes of action in the Gerdes suit, will be included in the amounts to be accounted for by Prentice, and the $1,000 will be included in the amount to be accounted for by Woodward. Recovery of those sums is sought also from Mayer and McLanahan, but as I have found that they acted without guilty knowledge I do not think such recovery should be allowed.

Costs are awarded to the plaintiffs in both actions against all defendants against whom they prevail. No costs are awarded First Income Trading Corporation.

C. K. Reynolds and Woodward have pleaded cross-claims in which they allege that if a recovery be had against them it will have been brought about by reason of acts of others, and they consequently ask for judgment over against those others. No argument has been submitted in support of such cross-claims, and I seriously doubt whether they can be sustained. Possibly, however, the facts to be developed upon the reference to be ordered in the Gerdes suit may show that their wrong has been aggravated by wrongs of others, and thus show a situation camparable to that of a wrongdoer whose wrong in causing a personal injury has been aggravated by malpractice of a physician, and for that reason the cross-claim in the Gerdes suit will be referred as to all defendants in that suit whom I have found to be actual wrong-doers. See Parchefsky v. Kroll Bros., Inc., 267 N.Y. 410, at page 414, 196 N.E. 308, 98 A.L.R. 1387. As to all other defendants in that suit such cross-claim is dismissed, but without costs. If C. K. Reynolds and Woodward desire a reference of their cross-claim in the Ballantine action in order to litigate it with additional defendants in that suit upon whom it has been served, such reference thereof may be included in the judgment to be entered in that suit.

Submit judgments accordingly.

ABBOT v. AMERICAN HARD RUBBER CO.

Supreme Court of New York, 1861. 33 Barb. 578.

[The statement of facts is omitted.]

ALLEN, J. The history of the origin, rise and progress of "The American Hard Rubber Company", and of the connection of the plaintiff with it, and of his dealings with and relations to the Goodyears and his other associates in the corporation, and the several patents referred to, is curious and instructive. The facts alleged are all important as bearing upon a question of fraud in fact involved in the case, and which will have to be met, unless the case upon a final hearing shall be disposed of upon the legal questions presented upon the undisputed facts. But upon this appeal, in the view I take of the legal rights of the parties, it will not be necessary to consider the question of actual fraud, and therefore I am relieved from the necessity of examining very critically the various and somewhat complicated and multifarious transactions stated with great detail in the complaint and answer. A very brief statement will suffice to present the questions which I deem essential to consider upon this appeal.

1. The "American Hard Rubber Company" of Connecticut, as distinguished from the "Beacon Dam Company," to which it succeeded, was originated and established to develop and bring into use the "hard rubber compound," to be manufactured under the patents of the Goodyears, in pursuance of the several arrangements and agreements with the patentees, and with a view to the pecuniary benefit of the corporators.

2. Between December, 1850, and February, 1860, mainly through the instrumentality of the plaintiff, the property and corporate franchises of the "Beacon Dam Company" were acquired; the name of the corporation changed, more clearly to indicate the new purpose and object of the corporators; its capital increased from $25,000 to $300,-000; valuable and exclusive rights under the letters patent for making the hard compound of India rubber, including the right to make and vend, and sell to others the right to make and vend the compound, and to use it for the different purposes, and in the manufacture of the various articles for which it is valuable, were secured to the company; large additions were made to the real property and water privileges of the corporation, and extensive manufactories and shops for making the compound and bringing it into use in every variety of form, and for every variety of purpose, with machinery adapted to the design, were erected and put in operation.

3. The rights and franchises were acquired, the capital stock of the corporation increased, the additional real estate purchased, and the manufactories erected, and other expensive improvements made, solely for the purpose of making the interests and rights under the letters patent available and profitable to the associates, by manufacturing and using the compound under the patents. Except as connected with the manufacturing and bringing into use the hard compound of India rubber, the increased capital cannot be employed, and would not have been subscribed; the real property is, so far as the case shows, comparatively valueless to the company, and not essential to the carrying into execution the original purposes and objects of the "Beacon Dam Company"; and the buildings and machinery erected and constructed upon the property, adapted only to the manufacture of the hard rubber compound, and the making of the various articles to be made from it, are of necessity utterly valueless for other purposes, and are worth but little more than the materials of which they are composed.

In briefer terms, the increased capital, the additional real estate acquired, and the manufactories and machinery thereon, are valuable with the rights under the letters patent, but of comparatively little, if of any, value without such rights. Without the rights no prudent man would think of investing a dollar in the property and franchises, or looking after or caring for an investment already made, in the hope or expectation of getting any return from it.

4. At the time of the transaction complained of, the plaintiff was a stockholder in the company to the amount of $62,500, a creditor to the amount of $12,500, and under liabilities for the company to a large amount. He was also a trustee or director of the corporation, and had been from an early period in its history, if not from the commencement of the enterprise.

5. The direction of the company was, from June, 1855, committed to seven directors or trustees, of whom, in February, 1850, the plaintiff and the defendants Judson, Ropes, Norton and Henry B. Goodyear, were five, and by law it required four to constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. On the third day of February, 1860, the four defendants last named met as trustees at the office of Judson, in New York; but whether a meeting of the board of trustees had been adjourned to, or legally called, for that time and at that place, so as to give efficacy to their acts as a board, does not very satisfactorily appear from the allegations of the answer. The four trustees then resolved to sell to the firm of Poppenhusen & Konig, composed of the defendants Poppenhusen, Konig and Funcke, all the personal property, tools, dies, machinery, fixtures, stock manufactured and unmanufactured, all the patent rights and privileges under the letters patent belonging to the corporation, together with the benefit of all contracts made with the corporation, for $120,000, to be settled for by the twelve notes of the purchasers of $10,000 each, payable one in each month for twelve successive months, and to lease the factory buildings and premises to the same parties for one year, at a rent of $3500.

6. On or after the ninth day of February, 1860, the resolution was carried into effect, and the sale consummated upon the terms mentioned.

7. The resolution was passed and the sale effected without the consent and against the wishes of the plaintiff, and against his protest and remonstrance. His objections were well known to his co-trustees, and there is reason to believe were also known to the purchasers before the consummation of the sale.

8. On the thirteenth day of February, 1860, the defendants Poppenhusen, Konig, Judson, Norton and Ropes associated themselves together, and became incorporated under the general laws of this state, under the name of "The American Hard Rubber Company," for the manufacture of articles, compounds, goods and substances, composed in whole or in part of India rubber, &c., &c.; that is, for the same purpose and under the same name as the Connecticut corporation named defendant in this action. The defendants last named were the five trustees named in the certificate of organization.

9. Poppenhusen & Konig immediately transferred to the new corporation all the property, rights and effects transferred to them a few days before by the old corporation.

Upon the undisputed facts of the case, thus fairly but imperfectly stated, the transactions complained of and the sale to Poppenhusen & Konig, cannot be permitted to stand. A bare statement of the case shows as conclusively as an elaborate argument could establish it, that the transfer was without power, and a violation of the trust and confidence reposed in the trustees and directors of the corporation. * * *

2. The transfer was a violation of trust and an abuse of the power vested in the directors to manage the affairs of the company, for the benefit of the corporators. As before suggested, I do not propose to consider the question of fraudulent intent or fraud in fact, involved in the case.

No principle is better settled than that a person having a duty to perform for others cannot act in the same matter for his own benefit. A trustee cannot, directly or indirectly, by himself or through the agency of another, become the purchaser of the trust estate. Neither can he purchase an interest in property, and hold it for his own benefit, when, in respect to such property, he has a duty to perform, inconsistent with the character of a purchaser on his own account. Van Epps v. Van Epps, 9 Paige, 237. Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cow. 717. Slade v. Van Vechten, 11 Paige, 21. DeCaters v. LeRay De Chaumont, 3 Paige, 178. It requires no authority to establish the fact, that the directors of the "American Hard Rubber Company" could not have transferred the property of the corporation directly to themselves, or to a corporation in which they were stockholders and directors. That is, they could not act as buyers and sellers in the same transaction, whether they acted in their individual capacity, or as the directors of two trading corporations. New York Central Ins. Co. v. National Protection Ins. Co., 20 Barb. 468. * * * This rule of law which makes certain cases of presumption conclusive, merely attaches itself to the circumstances when proved—it is not deduced from them. It is not a rule of inference from testimony, but a rule of protection as expedient for the public good. (Greenl.Ev. 32.) Here, the transfer to Poppenhusen and Konig, in Connecticut, was at the latest on the 9th of February, and on the 13th of the same month the new company was fully organized in New York, and the property and rights conveyed to Poppenhusen and Konig immediately transferred to it. The transfer from the original American Hard Rubber Company, of which the plaintiff was a stockholder, to the new company from which he is excluded, and in which three of the four trustees and directors making the conveyance, with Poppenhusen and Konig, are the sole corporators, was effected without any loss of time, as soon as it could well have been done, so that the transfer may be said to have been made by Poppenhusen and Konig to the new company, immediately on their receiving the title. There were only two entire days, exclusive of the Sunday intervening, for accomplishing the whole thing. It would be wrong to permit the presumption of intent attaching to these circumstances to be overcome by any amount of evidence. If it could be, stockholders would never be safe against the acts of faithless trustees. If evidence could prevail against the presumption, the affidavits of the parties implicated are entirely insufficient and unsatisfactory. But it is not necessary to comment upon them. The experiment of the acting trustees in the two hard rubber companies has the merit of boldness as well as originality. Three of them marched out of the old company, laden with spoils with which they enriched themselves as stockholders of the new, and it cannot be that their wronged and injured associates are remediless. The plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, and an injunction and receiver are necessary to the preservation of the property, and the protection of his interests, pendente lite.

The order of the court made at the special term should be affirmed, with costs.

SEYMOUR v. SPRING FOREST CEMETERY ASS'N.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1895. 144 N.Y. 333, 39 N.E. 365, 26 L.R.A. 859.

FINCH, J. This appeal is from a final judgment rendered upon an accounting which ascertained the amount payable upon bonds held by the plaintiff, and issued by the defendant corporation. Necessarily, the main questions involved are as to the legality of that issue, and the right of the plaintiff to hold and enforce the obligations upon which she sues; and these questions arise out of a situation about which there is little, if any, dispute.

Eleven citizens of Binghamton became the owners of about 30 acres of land, which they bought for the purposes of a rural cemetery. Hotchkiss and Seymour, lawyers of standing and reputation in the city, owned an undivided tenth of the property; and each of the remaining nine associates, a similar share. They entered at once upon the work of improving the land, and preparing it for the intended use, and expended more or less of their own means upon it, looking forward to reimbursement and reasonable profit from the future sale of burial lots. As time passed, it became apparent that some change of the situation was imperatively needed. That every sale of a lot should require the signature of each of the eleven, and of their wives, was a serious inconvenience, and one likely to be greatly increased if any of the associates should die, leaving infant children to inherit. Good sense and sound business policy dictated that the tenancy in common of the individuals should be transformed into the single title of a corporation, and that change was effected. The associates conveyed to the newly-created corporation, of which they were the sole stockholders, and in which they were the only persons interested. They fixed the consideration of the transfer at $30,000, to be paid by the issue of corporate bonds to that amount, one-tenth of which was to be allotted to each of the original shares. Twenty-one thousand dollars in amount of such bonds was issued, and the securities delivered to the proper owners, and those bonds are still outstanding. While the technical form of this transaction was a sale by the 11 to the corporation, its substance was merely a change in the manner of holding. The sellers were the buyers. They sold as individuals, and bought as a corporation, and no one else had any interest in the question of price, or terms of sale. If they were the vendors, on the one hand, dealing with themselves, in a corporate capacity, on the other, they were also the sole beneficiaries to be affected, and could not defraud themselves. The abstraction of the corporate entity should never be allowed to bar out and pervert the real and obvious truth. As beneficiaries, the stockholders necessarily assented to all the details of the arrangement, and no just criticism is possible either upon the legality or morality of the transaction. Evidence was given to show that the land conveyed was not worth the sum secured, but that is a totally immaterial fact. Whatever the price, it wronged no one, and could wrong no one, and accomplished nothing, except to fix a primary limit to the anticipated profits. It was immaterial for another reason. The bonds were payable wholly out of the enterprise. First 50 per cent., and then 75 per cent., of the company's receipts from sales of lots, was to be applied on the bonds, and they were payable from no other source. If the price nominally fixed had been three times as great, its real product would have remained the same; for, either as bondholders or as stockholders, the whole proceeds, above expenses, would become theirs, and no more. It was the enterprise that was debtor, which could only pay by a liberal improvement and maintenance, and the actual price was the amount of its net surplus above expenditure, payable to the associates in the capacity of bondholders, at least; a price to which they were fully entitled and which represented the profits they might justly claim to reap. No doctrine as to the dealing of a fiduciary agent with the property of his principal has any application to such a transfer as was made. * * *

But the further claim is made that because Hotchkiss and Seymour were officers of the corporation, holding a fiduciary relation, as trustees or directors, they could not lawfully buy the valid and outstanding obligations of the company at less than par, and enforce them for the full amount against the debtors. If that be sound doctrine, as is stoutly maintained,—if directors cannot, in any case, invest in the bonds of their own companies, except at the peril of a constructive fraud; if they cannot safely buy such bonds below par, because they deem them unduly depressed; if titles to corporate obligations, passing through their hands, become tainted by their touches,—it is quite time that the courts should give (what they have not given) a very definite and distinct warning. Some citations of seeming authority are pressed upon us, and others exist. The broad rule is stated in Perry, Trusts, § 428, that "a trustee, executor, or assignee cannot buy up a debt or incumbrance to which the trust estate is liable, for less than is actually due thereon, and make a profit to himself"; and that is the doctrine invoked in this case, as applicable to a director regarded as a trustee of the corporation. But the statement, however correct in its application to specific instances, must be taken with the limitations which belong to it. Its foundation is that a fiduciary agent, owing a duty to his principal, cannot make a contract for his own benefit which is or may be inconsistent with that duty; and the cases generally are of two kinds: The trustee buys in the property of his principal at a sacrifice, for his own benefit, when, if he bought it at all, it was his duty to do it for his principal; or he makes a contract, in behalf of his principal, with himself, directly or indirectly, as the other party to the agreement. The first class of cases is illustrated by Slade v. Van Vechten, 11 Paige, 26, where the assignee bought in assigned property at a sheriff's sale, and claimed the personal benefit of his bargain; and the second class, by Munson v. Railroad Co., 103 N.Y. 58, 8 N.E. 355, in which the directors contracting had a private and personal interest, possibly adverse to their fiduciary duty. Almost, if not quite, all of the cases cited by the learned counsel for the appellant belong to one or the other of these two classes. But they do not decide this case, for Hotchkiss and Seymour neither bought in any property of the company, nor dealt with the corporation in any respect. They made their contract, not with it, but with third persons, capable of protecting their own rights, and bought nothing which the corporation owned, or to which it had a right. We must go to still other cases, founded, it may be, to some extent, upon similar ideas of fiduciary duty, to discover even an approximate authority. There are cases of copartnership in which the general rules pertaining to that specific relation might prove to be broad enough to cover the purchase of the debt owing by the firm (Bank-Note Co. v. Edson, 56 Barb. 89), and other cases in which the duties flowing from a liquidation conducted by the trustee, and to which he owes a specific trust duty, forbid a purchase by the trustee, for his own benefit, at a discount. But in every class of cases the rule is founded upon the unwillingness of the law to uphold contracts which bring into collision the trust duty and the personal interest; and it is because of that collision, and the temptations which surround it, that it declares the contract voidable at the election of the beneficiary, without investigating the good or bad faith of the trustee. The entire basis of the rule consists in this collision between trust duty and personal interest and the equitable prohibition has no application where there is no such possible inconsistency. There is no such conflict in the ordinary case of the purchase by a director in a going corporation of its outstanding obligations. There is no present duty resting upon him to extinguish them. The time for that has not come; the duty has not arisen, may never arise; the corporation is not prepared to pay, does not contemplate paying, but intends and expects to await the full maturity of the debt. Unless some special fund has been provided, or some special liquidation has been ordered, the director owes no duty to his company to discharge or buy in the outstanding bonds, and may purchase for himself, because no inconsistent trust duty has arisen. Why should he not? While the bonds are running to their maturity, and the corporation is not able to extinguish them, is not bound to do so, does not even wish or seek to do so, what does it matter who holds the securities, or on what terms they pass from hand to hand? It seems to me that we are asked to crowd the rule almost to the verge of an absurdity, and to inflict a vital injury upon business interests by tainting with invalidity the holding by a director of the unmatured obligations of the corporation bought by him in the open market, and not put in liquidation or sought to be extinguished. There must at least be some fact or circumstance which charges the trustee with a present duty to act for his company in respect to the bonds, which duty is or may be inconsistent with a personal purchase. No such duty rested upon Hotchkiss and Seymour, and they had a right to buy and hold for their own benefit. * * *

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

YOUNG v. COLUMBIA LAND & INVESTMENT CO.

Supreme Court of Oregon, 1909. 53 Or. 438, 99 P. 936, 133 Am.St.Rep. 844.

[The statement of facts is omitted.]

EAKIN, J. 1. The first question of importance is as to the right of plaintiffs, under the facts, to purchase the liabilities of defendant corporation at a discount for their own personal advantage. We conclude that their purchase of defendant's mortgage notes was made under such circumstances that the stockholders have a right to the advantage of it as made for the benefit of the company. An offer was made by W. C. Brown to sell to defendant company these mortgage notes at a discount and the change in the offer, making it a personal one to the plaintiffs, was made at the suggestion of one of the plaintiffs. The company was well able to take advantage of this offer, and the acting directors of defendant company were either parties to the purchase or acquiescing in the transaction, notwithstanding it was their duty to use their best endeavor to advance the interest of the corporation. Where the trust duty of directors of a corporation and personal interest conflicts, the latter must give way. W. G. Gosline, in the interest of Hammond, and W. C. Smith, a stockholder, were active in attempting to procure some settlement of the notes and mortgage and in securing an offer of discount thereon for the benefit of the company. One witness testifies that there was some strife between the Hammond interest and that of the other stockholders, and in giving his reasons for desiring to get hold of the mortgage stated that some of the stockholders thought it about time to wind up the company, thus indicating that the purchase was made in opposition to the company's interest.

2. In Higgins v. Lansingh, 154 Ill. 301, 384, 40 N.E. 362, 387, it appears that Higgins owned such a large interest in the company that he practically controlled it. He also owned the secured debts of the company that were overdue, and purchased at a discount pledged stock of the company. It was held to be the duty of the managers of which he was one to make provision for their payment out of the resources of the company, if possible. He knew it was for the interest of the company to do so, but did not inform the other managers of the proposed sale, nor give the company any opportunity to receive the benefit of the transaction. The court said: "We have also held that a director may purchase outstanding obligations of the company and enforce their collection. But the question, so far as we know, has not before been presented whether or not he may purchase such claims at a discount, and enforce them in full. If he acts fairly and for the interest of the corporation, we think he may. He certainly would be doing the corporation no injury in case his management were in the interest of the corporation, and it were given a fair opportunity to itself become the purchaser, and could not or would not embrace such opportunity. We are of the opinion, however, from the evidence in this case, that Higgins could not under the circumstances attending the transaction purchase these securities, as he did, at a discount, and hold them against the company for payment in full, but that the company and its stockholders have the right to treat the purchase as made for their benefit." We think the principle here announced applied to the case before us, and that it was the duty of its board to take up these notes to protect the interests of the stockholders, and not in their own right against the interest of the company. This principle in no way conflicts with the case of Seymour v. S. F. C. Ass'n, 144 N.Y. 333, 39 N.E. 365, 26 L.R.A. 859, relied upon by plaintiffs. The transaction in the case related to unmatured obligations of the company that it did not desire to take up, and it was upon that circumstance that the case rested. It is said in the opinion there are "other cases in which the duties flowing from a liquidation conducted by the trustee, and to which he owes a specific trust duty, forbid a purchase by the trustee for his own benefit at a discount. But in every class of cases the rule is founded upon the unwillingness of the law to uphold contracts which bring into collision that trust duty and the personal interest." And, if plaintiffs obtained these notes at a discount, still the purchase must be treated as for the benefit of the company, and they cannot enforce the mortgage for more than the amount paid for it.

It is also important to ascertain the amount paid for the mortgage for the purpose of determining the amount for which the company is chargeable. There is some conflict in the evidence upon this question. Plaintiffs contend that they paid $11,000 for the notes, while defendant contends that plaintiffs paid but $5,000. The sum paid by plaintiffs in the whole transaction was $27,500 in payment of the individual notes of plaintiffs, amounting to $16,002, and the notes of Wright, Smith, and Prael, each $7,000, and the two notes of the company $11,000, together with 50 shares of stock of defendant company, held by Brown, at the price of $500. Plaintiffs contend that the mortgage notes were taken at their full value and all the discount was on the three notes of Smith, Wright, and Prael upon the theory that the makers of these three notes were insolvent, and that their 300 shares of stock, in defendant company, held by Brown as collateral security for the payment of their notes, were worth only $10 per share, Brown having offered his 50 shares at that value. But Brown was anxious to close out his interest in the company and was making a sacrifice for that purpose. The evidence shows that plaintiffs put a much higher value on the stock than $10 a share. This appears from their testimony, as well as from the offer of the company to sell to Hammond, as shown by Plaintiffs' Exhibit D, namely, $16,000, for the water front, and he to pay the mortgage notes and surrender his 100 shares of stock, and the people to be benefited by proposed improvements to pay defendant company a bonus of $10,000, leaving 100 acres of the land, probably worth $5,000, to defendant company. This would make the water front cost Hammond $30,000 and leave clear to plaintiffs the $16,000 to be paid by Hammond, and the 100 acres at $5,000, with the $10,000 bonus, making $31,000 to be divided among 800 shares, a valuation of over $36 per share, or, without the bonus, worth $26 a share at the lowest estimate. Other witnesses placed the value of the property much higher.

It was conceded that Brown made no discount to plaintiffs on their individual notes. Therefore the mortgage notes and the Wright, Smith, and Prael notes were purchased for $11,000, while the stock of those three men was at these figures worth $7,800, and was turned over to plaintiffs without other expense or trouble, showing that, if the full value had been paid for the mortgage notes, plaintiffs received the notes and stock of Wright, Smith, and Prael without consideration. These figures, together with the fact that Brown, shortly before this time, had been offering the mortgage notes for $5,000, tends strongly to corroborate the testimony of defendant's witnesses, and fully justifies the conclusion that the purchase price of the mortgage notes was $5,000.

We find no error in the decree of the lower court, and it is affirmed.

FARWELL v. PYLE-NATIONAL ELECTRIC HEADLIGHT COMPANY.

Supreme Court of Illinois, 1919. 289 Ill. 157, 124 N.E. 449.

Bill by Granger Farwell against the Pyle-National Electric Headlight Company. Judgment for complainant was reversed by the Appellate Court (212 Ill.App. 450), and complainant brings certiorari. Affirmed.

DUNN, C. J. On a bill filed against the Pyle-National Electric Headlight company in the superior court of Cook county by Granger Farwell, in his own behalf and as trustee, the court rendered a decree for an accounting, from which the complainant, being dissatisfied with the basis fixed for taking the account, appealed to the Appellate Court for the First District. The defendant assigned cross-errors, which were sustained. The decree was reversed, and the cause was remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill. Upon the petition of the complainant a writ of certiorari was awarded to bring up the record for review.

The Pyle-National Electric Headlight Company was incorporated in 1897 under the laws of New Jersey to manufacture and deal in electric headlights, and on February 9, 1897, George C. Pyle and Frank H. Ewers, who were the owners of four patents for steam turbines and three patents for electric lamps, of which Pyle was the inventor, entered into a written contract whereby they granted to the company an exclusive license to manufacture and sell patented articles and devices for all purposes for which such patented articles or devices, or parts thereof, could be utilized under the patents so assigned, or any patents or improvements that might thereafter be made to accomplish the same or similar purposes. The consideration for this agreement was $500 cash, $4,500 to be paid February 1, 1898, the issue to the owners of the patents of all capital stock of the corporation, of the par value of $700,000, except 10 shares, and the agreement of the corporation to pay monthly a royalty of 5 per cent. of the gross receipts derived from sales made under the license, such royalty to be not less than $150 for each calendar month from January 1, 1898. The president of the corporation was Royal C. Vilas, and the secretary Perry Trumbull.

The record does not show to whom the 6,990 shares of the capital stock which the contract provided should be issued to Pyle and Ewers were transferred, but it appears that Vilas and members of his family have during the entire existence of the corporation owned a majority of the stock, though the number of shares so owned by them, or by any of them, is not disclosed. Neither does the evidence show the names of the stockholders outside the Vilas family, or the number of their shares, except in a few instances. In January, 1898, an extension of a year on the $4,500 payment was agreed on and evidenced in writing, the contract of February 9, 1897, being in all other respects confirmed. The company was then manufacturing and selling the headlights, and paid royalties until March 1, 1898, but soon afterward began a suit in the superior court of Cook county, charging that Pyle and Ewers had procured the agreement of February 9, 1897, by fraudulent representations or concealments. This suit was settled in October, 1898, the royalties due October 1, 1898, were paid, and a written agreement was entered into for the dismissal of the suit at the complainant's costs, for a further extension of the $4,500 payment to January 1, 1900, and for the extension of the time of payment of royalties accruing for the period from October 1, 1898, to the end of December, 1899, to January 1, 1900.

In the latter part of 1898 or beginning of 1899 Granger Farwell became a director of the Pyle-National Electric Headlight Company at the request of Royal C. Vilas, who gave Farwell 10 shares of stock to qualify him for that position. Farwell afterward purchased more stock and continued to be a director until January, 1912, except for the period from February 7 to May 2, 1900, during which time no directors' meeting was held. On June 5, 1899, he obtained from Pyle and Ewers an assignment of their contract of February 9, 1897, with the Pyle-National Electric Headlight Company as well as of the legal title to the patents mentioned in that contract, and an agreement for the assignment of two other patents when issued upon applications then on file in the Patent Office—one for a rotary engine governor and the other for an arc lamp—of which patents the Pyle-National Electric Headlight Company would become the exclusive licensee by virtue of the agreement of February 9, 1897. These patents were subsequently issued and duly assigned to Farwell. The consideration of these assignments was $14,473.10, which Farwell paid. At the time of the assignment the payment of $4,500, which had been extended to January 1, 1900, and the royalties accruing since October 1, 1898, the payment of which had been extended to the same date, were unpaid, and they were afterward paid to Farwell. The purchase of the patents and all the contracts was made by Farwell for the joint benefit of Vilas and himself. Vilas soon after sold to Perry Trumbull one-third of his one-half interest.

Vilas was president, Trumbull secretary, and Vilas, Trumbull, and Farwell, directors, of the corporation, and the three were a majority of the board of directors. They continued to be such majority until February, 1901, when the number of directors was increased to seven, but at the same time Vilas and Farwell were appointed an executive committee, to which the board of directors delegated all its powers. Vilas died in 1904, and was succeeded as president by his brother, William Vilas, who died in 1908. Carrie A. Vilas, the widow of Royal C. Vilas, was then president until her death, in 1910, when her son, Royal C. Vilas, Jr., became president. He continued to hold that office when this suit was brought. After the assignment of the patents and contract to Farwell, the $4,500 payment and the deferred royalties, which were accumulating at the rate of more than $3,000 a year, payment of which had been postponed to January 1, 1900, were paid to him, and the monthly payment of royalties under the contract continued to be made in increasing amounts until 1912; the total amount of royalties so paid exceeding $144,000. After the death of Vilas and Trumbull, the monthly payments were made, one-half to Farwell, one-third of one-half to Trumbull's executor, and two-thirds of one-half to Vilas' heirs.

On May 14, 1912, Farwell filed this bill for himself, the heirs of Vilas, and the executor of Trumbull's will, alleging that the company had manufactured and sold large quantities of the articles mentioned in the contract under the patents and by virtue of its license, and had built up a large, lucrative, and prosperous business, but that for large quantities of the articles so made and sold it had not paid the royalties provided in the agreement. The defendant filed an answer, which was afterward amended, admitting the execution of the agreements and assignments alleged in the bill, averring that it had for many years paid royalties on the basis of the total sales of the electric headlight equipments embodying the inventions covered by the patents, insisting that upon a proper construction of the agreement it was not liable to pay royalties on the basis claimed by the complainant, alleging that it had discontinued the use of all the inventions covered by the patents in the construction of its electric headlight equipments, and denying that any royalties were due under the terms of the contract. * * *

The directors of a corporation are intrusted with the management of its business and property for the benefit of all the stockholders, and occupy the position of trustees for the collective body of stockholders in respect to such business. They are subject to the general rule, which prevails in regard to trusts and trustees, that they cannot use the trust property, or their relation to it, for their own personal gain. It is their duty to administer the corporate affairs for the common benefit of all the stockholders, and exercise their best care, skill, and judgment in the management of the corporate business solely in the interest of the corporation. 3 Thompson on Corp. § 4009, et seq. They cannot have or acquire any personal or pecuniary interest in conflict with their duty as such trustees. Hooker v. Midland Steel Co., 215 Ill. 444, 74 N.E. 445, 106 Am.St.Rep. 170. The mere statement of the rule gains its approval. In Nowak v. National Car Coupler Co., 260 Ill. 260, 103 N.E. 222, the question of the disqualification of a director to purchase property of the corporation was considered, and, citing previous cases, it was said:

"The general rule to be derived from the decisions is that a director of a solvent corporation may trade with, borrow money from, or loan money to the corporation, or purchase its property, but in doing so he must act fairly, and be free from all fraud and oppression, and must impose no unfair or unreasonable terms. While a director is not disabled from purchasing the property of his corporation, the transaction will be subjected to the closest scrutiny by a court of equity, and if it was not conducted with the utmost fairness, to the end that the full value of the property should be obtained, the court will set it aside."

There is here no purchase of property from or by the corporation, or contract between the director and the corporation, which is sought to be set aside; but the rule in regard to the duty of directors, as trustees for the stockholders, reaches further than to transactions occurring directly between the directors and the corporation. In Gilman, Clinton & Springfield Railroad Co. v. Kelly, 77 Ill. 426, it was stated that the same rule applies to directors as to all persons acting in a fiduciary capacity, which requires the utmost fidelity to the interests of the cestui que trust; that it is a breach of duty for the directors to place themselves in a position where their own individual interests would prevent them from acting for the best interests of those they represent; and that the rule embraces every relation in which there may by any possibility arise a conflict between the duty to the person with whom the trustee is dealing or on whose account he is acting and his own individual interest.

"The general rule stands upon our great moral obligation to refrain from placing ourselves in relations which ordinarily excite a conflict between self-interest and integrity. * * * In this conflict of interest the law wisely interposes. It acts not on the possibility that, in some cases, the sense of that duty may prevail over the motives of self-interest, but it provides against the probability in many cases, and the danger in all cases, that the dictates of self-interest will exercise a predominant influence, and supersede that of duty." Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. 503, 11 L.Ed. 1076.

It is conceded that a director may loan money to the corporation or purchase its bonds. It has not been decided in this state that he may purchase the corporation's outstanding obligations at a discount and enforce them in full, though it was intimated in Higgins v. Lansingh, 154 Ill. 301, 40 N.E. 362, that he may, if he act fairly and for the interest of the corporation. The intimation carries with it the corollary that he may not make such purchase for speculation in his own interest, and enforce payment for the full amount against the corporation. If it is for the interest of the corporation to buy its bonds at a discount, and it is financially able to do so, a director will not be permitted to buy those bonds at a discount and enforce payment in full against the corporation. In Harts v. Brown, 77 Ill. 226, where it was held that the directors of a corporation may trade with, borrow from, or loan money to the corporation on the same terms and in like manner as other persons, may purchase the property and stock belonging to it in the same manner as though they were not directors, and may purchase its bonds and other indebtedness, it is still said that if the company had possessed money or property, or any assets that could have been converted into money, with which to redeem and discharge its debts, then the purchase of them would have been in bad faith.

The contract of the corporation with Pyle and Ewers was not a liquidated demand against the corporation. It was an executory contract, continuing during the life of the patents, calling, not for the payment of certain sums of money at stated times, but for the payment, monthly, of 5 per cent. of the gross receipts from sales made by virtue of the contract. The interest of Pyle and Ewers was necessarily adverse to that of the corporation, and, under the principles which have been referred to, a director of a corporation could not acquire that interest for himself, unless he could make it appear that his act was for the interest of the corporation. The conflict of the individual interest of Farwell with that of the corporation, which it was his duty as a director to protect, is illustrated by the fact that he is claiming in this suit that he is entitled to royalties on sales of whole electric headlight equipments, and also on all sales of repairs and replacement parts, while the corporation contends that the royalties are payable only on the separate lamps, turbines, and governors, and not on the whole equipment, and not on repair and replacement parts. Royalties had been paid on the whole equipments, and not upon repair or replacement parts, and the court held that they should have been paid, not upon whole equipments, but upon the patented articles and devices, and upon repair or replacement parts. These are not the only differences of construction, but are merely illustrative. In becoming the owner of the contract with Pyle and Ewers, Farwell placed himself in a position where his individual interest was in conflict with his duty to the corporation of which he was a director. He had no right to buy the contract for his own profit, but the corporation was entitled to the benefit of his bargain. It was solvent, and there is nothing to indicate that it was unable to purchase the contract. Farwell has been repaid many times over. The directors were bound to give the corporation the benefit of the royalties, instead of taking it to themselves. * * *

This suit is against the corporation, and is brought by the unfaithful director, who comes into equity to obtain the benefit of a contract which it is apparently a violation of his trust to enforce for his own benefit. The stockholders are not parties to the suit, and are represented only by the corporation, and their rights can be protected only through the corporation. If a decree should be rendered against the corporation, it would have to be paid out of the funds of the corporation, and the payment would fall proportionately on each stockholder. The complainant seeks to enforce a claim to which the corporation, on settled equitable principles, has a clear defense. It is no answer to this defense that equities exist against certain of the stockholders. If such equities do exist, they cannot be enforced in a suit to which stockholders are not parties, and a court will not be astute to ascertain equities in the distribution of profits among directors jointly engaged in the breach of trust.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW YORK TRUST COMPANY v. AMERICAN REALTY COMPANY et al.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1926. 244 N.Y. 209, 155 N.E. 102.

Appeal from Supreme Court, Appellate Division, First Department.

Action by the New York Trust Company as trustee under a deed of trust from George F. Underwood and wife against the American Realty Company and another. From an order of the Appellate Division (215 App. Div. 416, 213 N.Y.S. 569) reversing an order of the Special Term, granting plaintiff's motion for judgment and answering certified question (216 App. Div. 755, 214 N.Y.S. 891), plaintiff appeals on certified questions by permission. Order of Appellate Division affirmed, and certified questions answered.

LEHMAN, J. * * * The defendant American Realty Company purchased in November, 1920, from the plaintiff more than 55,000 acres of timberland. The consideration agreed upon for the sale of this land was the sum of $1,364,895, to be paid to the plaintiff as trustee under a deed of trust from George F. Underwood and Jennie A.,

his wife, dated July 28, 1920, and, in addition, the execution of a contract between the said George F. Underwood and the International Paper Company, which owned all the capital stock of the American Realty Company; $1,000,000 of the said purchase price was paid in ten notes of American Realty Company, guaranteed by International Paper Company, each in the principal amount of $100,000, and maturing serially one on December 1st of each year from 1921 to 1930, both inclusive. Three of the said notes have been paid. The remaining seven are those referred to in the complaint herein.

George F. Underwood, named with his wife as the grantor of the deed of trust to the New York Trust Company, was a director of the International Paper Company from August 28, 1901, until his death on or about August 6, 1923, and was from October 24, 1906, until his death, a member of the executive committee of said company. He was also from September 25, 1918, until his death, the president and a director of the American Realty Company. The conveyance of the timberlands to the plaintiff under the deed of trust of July, 1920, from George F. Underwood and Jennie A. Underwood, his wife, was gratuitous. The land was to be sold as soon as possible. The trust deed directed that certain small amounts of the purchase price be paid over to designated charitable and other institutions, and that the great bulk be paid or applied either by outright gift or through the establishment of trust funds, to the benefit of the immediate family of George F. Underwood. The largest beneficiary under the said trust is his wife. * * *

Undoubtedly it has frequently been held that a director or officer of a corporation must account to the corporation for profits received in disregard of duty owed to the corporation. * * * The remedy has been granted at times even in cases where the corporation does not rescind the transaction through which such profits have been made by the delinquent trustee or agent. * * * An agent for a buyer must account to his principal for the amount allowed by the seller to the agent for his services in making the sale. McMillan v. Arthur, 98 N.Y. 167. On analogous principles an agent or director may be compelled to account for profits made on the sale of property to his principal, though the principal retains the property sold, where, even before such sale, the agent or director was holding the property as trustee for the principal. In such case, even though the corporation repudiates the act of the director as its agent upon the sale of the property at a profit, it would still be entitled to hold the property conveyed to it, because in equity, ownership by the agent was for the benefit of the corporation, and the fruits of such ownership belong to it. * * *

Different question arises where the agent sells to his principal at a profit property which the agent might have retained for himself or sold to a stranger. If the contract of purchase is rescinded, the principal has no title to the property or right to retain it. If the principal fails to return the property, he may not claim that the contract was made without authority. A corporation may not repudiate the obligations of a contract made with a director and at the same time retain its benefits. If the contract with the director was valid, the corporation must pay the agreed price; if invalid, the corporation must rescind or repudiate the contract in its entirety. A director who may sell or retain the property at his will may also determine the price which will induce him to sell to the corporation. Profit made is the fruit of his ownership, and not of his agency. Burland v. Earle, 1902 A.C. 83; Matter of Lady Forest [Murchison] Gold Mine, Ltd., 1901, 1 Ch. 582. The agent or director may, therefore, not be called upon to account for such profits. If the contract which fixed the amount of the seller's profits is not rescinded or void, the fact that the profits are so large that they might be called "exorbitant" is ordinarily immaterial. * * * For property which belonged wholly to Underwood, Underwood might lawfully exact from a purchaser any price he could obtain and retain any profits he could acquire. As to such property, legal wrong, if any, on the part of Underwood consisted only in his making a contract for the benefit of his family or himself with corporations to which he owed duty of undivided loyalty. So long as the defendants cling to the benefit of the contract so made and assert rights against the plaintiff which they derive only from such contract, they may not claim that their directors and agents acted wrongfully or caused them damage by imposing upon them corresponding contractual obligations.

Underwood had owned some of the land sold for some years. There is no claim that in buying these lands he acted as agent for the corporation, or that the corporation had any interest therein, legal or equitable. Part of the land he purchased in the year 1919. The defendants allege that he purchased this part, with knowledge that "International Paper Company contemplated and was considering the purchase of the tracts." If that knowledge induced the purchase by Underwood of land; if he acquired it with intent to divert into his own coffers prospective benefit which the corporation expected to acquire; if he bought for himself when duty to the corporation required him to act only for it—then the corporation might insist that his title so acquired was held for its benefit. Robinson v. Jewett, 116 N.Y. 40, 22 N.E. 224; Parker v. Nickerson, 112 Mass. 195. Here the allegations of the counterclaim may be construed as stating that Underwood bought with intention to resell to the corporation. That he might not do. Having so bought, he was under duty, on request of the corporation, to transfer the property to the corporation at cost. He could not rid himself of this trust by transferring the property to the plaintiff. The plaintiff took title subject to the same obligation. * * * To that extent the first counterclaim, therefore, states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed with costs, and the certified questions answered in the affirmative.

UNION ICE COMPANY OF PHILADELPHIA v. HULTON et al.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1928. 291 Pa. 416, 140 A. 514.

Suit for an accounting by the Union Ice Company of Philadelphia against James Hulton, Sr., and others. Decree for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

SCHAFFER, J. Defendant appeals from the decree of the chancellor directing him to account. He was the president of plaintiff company, and made loans to it of $33,000. The loans not being paid, he brought suit against the company, and obtained judgment for the amount due to him, and issued execution and sold the property at sheriff's sale, purchasing it for a nominal sum, subject to a mortgage. He did not give the directors of the company any notice of the issuing of the execution or of the time and place of the sheriff's sale, and they did not know of either, although he had notified them of his intention to reduce his claim to judgment. Alleging that the fair market value of the property was much in excess of the amount at which he purchased it at the sale, this proceeding was begun to compel defendant to account, and the court by its decree requires him to do so.

Appellant takes the position that the chancellor erred in finding that he did not give the directors or stockholders notice of his intention to issue execution and to become the purchaser at the sheriff's sale. The basis of this contention is that the attorney, who represented him, and who was also vice president of the company told the directors that appellant would have to reduce his notes to judgment, and that eventually he would have to sell the property. This was not such notice as the directors were entitled to receive. It was vague and indefinite, only indicating a possible future intention. They were entitled to know when the execution issued, and the time and place of sale in order that they might take steps to protect the interests of the stockholders for whom they and defendant were trustees. Gilmore v. Gilmore Drug Co., 279 Pa. 193, 123 A. 730.

Appellant further contends that he was not required to give notice of the execution and sale; that, when he began legal proceedings to reduce his claim to judgment, that was notice of all the consequences that might result from such proceedings, including notice that the property of the company would be sold after judgment if it was not paid. While it is true that, in enforcing his claim against a corporation a director or officer may employ the same methods as are open to other creditors (14a Corpus Juris, § 1905), yet in so doing he must take no unfair advantage of it. He must be scrupulous to see that some one on the corporation's behalf knows what is being done so that its interests may be safeguarded. Hechelman v. Geyer, 248 Pa. 430, 94 A. 188, Ann.Cas.1917A, 236; Thompson on Corporations, § 1254, p. 245; Marr v. Marr, 73 N.J.Eq. 643, 70 A. 375, 133 Am.St.Rep. 742. The last citation being a case, closely analogous to the one at bar, where also the president of a corporation bought its property at a sale on his own judgment, and in which he gave no notice of the sale, and it was held that the complaining stockholder could either treat the defendant as his trustee to the extent that the defendant profited by the sale or set it aside. Law v. Fuller, 217 Pa. 439, 66 A. 754; cited by appellant in support of his contention that notice by him of the execution and sale was rot required, points out that, where an officer or director who is a creditor of the corporation enforces his claim against it, and buys its property in at the sale, he is "subject to severe scrutiny, and under the obligation of acting in the utmost good faith," and that, while he may buy at the sale, the sale must be a fair one. In the pending case the proofs indicate that the price paid by appellant was not the fair value of the property. * * *

We are satisfied, in view of the fact that no notice was given of the execution or sale, and in the light of the prima facie proof that by his purchase appellant will profit at his company's expense, that the court properly decreed an accounting which will proceed in accordance with the equity rules.

The decree is affirmed, at appellant's cost.

ROSS TRANSPORT CO. v. CROTHERS.[29]

Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1946. 45 A.2d 267.

MARBURY, CHIEF JUSTICE. * * * It has long been the law in this State that trustees cannot purchase at their own sale, and trustees, in this sense, include directors of corporations. This principle of the law was discussed by Chief Justice LeGrand in the first of the cases involving the dealings of Sherman with the Cumberland Coal and Iron Company, Hoffman Coal Company v. Cumberland C. & I. Co., 16 Md. 456 at pages 507–508, 77 Am.Dec. 311. This case referred to the earlier case of Richardson v. Jones, 3 Gill & J. 163, 22 Am.Dec. 293. As authority for the general policy of the law forbidding a trustee to become a purchaser, either directly or indirectly at his own sale, and stating "if he does, such sale may, and will be set aside, on the proper and reasonable application of the parties interested." The same statement is repeated in the second Sherman case, Cumberland C. & I. Co. v. Sherman, 20 Md. 117, pages 133, 134. This would lead to the conclusion that such a transaction is entirely voidable at the option of a party interested. In the third case involving the same company, Cumberland Coal and Iron Co. v. Parish, 42 Md. 598, Judge Alvey, speaking for this Court said: "The affairs of corporations are generally intrusted to the exclusive management and control of the board of directors; and there is an inherent obligation, implied in the acceptance of such trust, not only that they will use their best efforts to promote the interest of the shareholders, but that they will in no manner use their positions to advance their own individual interest as distinguished from that of the corporation, or acquire interests that may conflict with the fair and proper discharge of their duty." After some other observations on the subject, the opinion then states: "The transaction may not be ipso facto void, but it is not necessary to establish that there has been actual fraud or imposition practiced by the party holding the confidential or fiduciary relation;—the onus of proof being upon him to establish the perfect fairness, adequacy, and equity of the transaction; and that too by proof entirely independent of the instrument under which he may claim." This last quotation indicates that such a transaction is not absolutely voided at the option of the interested parties, but shifts the burden of proof upon the directors to establish its fairness. This last view was again stated by Judge Alvey in the case of Booth v. Robinson, 55 Md. 419, at pages 441–442, and his words in the last case are quoted by this Court in the case of Penn. R.

[29] Statement of facts and first part of opinion appears, supra, p. 352.

Co. v. Minis, 120 Md. 461, at page 486, 87 A. 1062. See also Macgill v. Macgill, 135 Md. 384 and cases cited on page 394, 109 A. 72. Coffman v. Publishing Co., 167 Md. 275, 173 A. 248, and Williams v. Messick, 177 Md. 605, 11 A.2d 472, 129 A.L.R. 1035.

It is not necessary for us to determine in this case whether the sale of stock to the Williams family and Ross is voidable merely upon the application of some of the other stockholders, or whether proof of such sale merely makes it necessary for these appellants to show the complete equity of the transaction. If we take the latter view, which is that most favorable to these appellants, we must hold that the burden placed upon the two directors has not been met. They have not shown that the company needed the money so badly and was in such a financial condition that the sale of the additional stock to themselves was the only way the money could be obtained. On the contrary, the corporation appears to have been in a very good financial condition. It is probable that any necessary financing of any buses could easily have been arranged through some financial institution, and Williams and Ross benefited greatly by their action in selling the stock to themselves. Nor is there any corroboration of William's statement that it was all arranged in the beginning, who was to get this additional stock. None of the other incorporators or directors were called to testify about this, and Ross himself, as we have noted, did not testify at all. We conclude, therefore, that the sale must be set aside as a constructive fraud upon the other stockholders.

The decree will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed with costs.

(2) ARISING FROM "INTERLOCKING DIRECTORATE."

GLOBE WOOLEN COMPANY v. UTICA GAS & ELECTRIC COMPANY.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1918. 224 N.Y. 483, 121 N.E. 378.

Action by the Globe Woolen Company against the Utica Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (170 App.Div. 940, 154 N.Y.S. 1123) modifying and affirming a judgment in favor of defendant, entered on the report of a referee, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

CARDOZO, J. The plaintiff, a corporation, sues to compel the specific performance of contracts to supply electric current to its mills. The defendant, also a corporation, answers that the contracts were made under the dominating influence of a common director; that their terms are unfair, and their consequences oppressive; and that hence they may not stand. A referee has sustained the defense; and the Appellate Division, with some modification, has affirmed his judgment.

The plaintiff is the owner of two mills in the city of Utica. One is for the manufacture of worsteds, and the other for that of woolens. The defendant generates and sells electricity for light and power. For many years John F. Maynard has been the plaintiff's chief stockholder, its president, and a member of its board of directors. He has also been a director of the defendant, and chairman of its executive committee. He received a single share of the defendant's stock to qualify him for office. He returned the share at once, and he has never held another. His property interest in the plaintiff is large. In the defendant he has none.

The history of the transaction may be briefly stated. At the beginning the mills were run by steam, and the plant was antiquated and inadequate. As early as 1903 one Greenidge, then the superintendent and later the general manager of the defendant's electrical department, suggested to Mr. Maynard the substitution of electric power. Nothing came of the suggestion then. Mr. Maynard was fearful that the cost of equipment would be too great unless the defendant would guarantee a saving in the cost of operation. None the less a change was felt to be important, and from time to time the subject was taken up anew. In 1904 there was an investigation of the power plant by Greenidge and a written report of its condition. For this service, though he was still in the defendant's employ, he was paid by Mr. Maynard. In 1905 the substitution of electricity was again considered, but dismissed as impracticable because of the plaintiff's continued insistence upon a guaranty of saving. In the fall of 1906 the project was renewed. It was renewed by Maynard and Greenidge, who debated it between themselves. There were other officers of the defendant who knew that the project was afoot, but they took no part in formulating it. Maynard still insisted upon a guaranty of saving. The plaintiff's books were thrown open to Greenidge, who calculated for himself the cost of operation with steam and the probable cost with electricity. When the investigation was over, a contract was closed. It took the form of letters exchanged between Greenidge and Maynard. In the letter signed by Greenidge, the defendant proposed to supply the plaintiff's worsted mill with electricity at a maximum rate of $.0104 per kilowatt hour, and to guarantee that the cost for heat and light and power would show a saving each month of $300 as compared with the cost for the corresponding month in the year previous to the change. There was to be a trial period ending July 1, 1907. Then, at the plaintiff's option, the contract was to run for five years, with a privilege of renewal for a like term. In a letter signed by Maynard on October 22, 1906, the plaintiff accepted the proposal. At once the defendant made preparations to install the new equipment. Six weeks, later, on December 1, 1906, Mr. Maynard laid the contract before the defendant's executive committee. He went to the meeting with Mr. Greenidge. The contract was read. Mr. Lewis, the vice president, asked Mr. Greenidge what the rate would be, and was told about $.0104 per kilowatt hour. Mr. Beardsley, another director, asked whether the contract was a profitable one for the company, and was told by Mr. Greenidge that it was. Mr. Maynard kept silent. A resolution was moved and carried that the contract be ratified. Mr. Maynard presided at the meeting, and put the resolution, but was excused from voting.

This settled the problem of power for the worsted mill. Attention was next directed to the woolen mill. Again Mr. Maynard and Mr. Greenidge put the project through unaided. In February, 1907, letters, similar in most things to the earlier ones, were exchanged. The guaranty of saving for this mill as for the other was to be $300 a month. There were, however, new provisions to the effect that the contract should apply to "current used for any purposes in any extensions or additions to the mills," and that in case of shortage of electricity the plaintiff should be preferred in service over all other customers except the city of Utica. At a meeting of the executive committee held February 11, 1907, this contract was ratified. The statement was made by Mr. Greenidge, in the presence of Mr. Maynard, that it was practically a duplicate of the first contract, except that it related to another mill. Nothing was said about the new provisions. Mr. Maynard presided and put the resolution, but did not vote.

At a cost to the plaintiff of more than $21,000 the requisite changes in the mills were made, and the new power was supplied. It quickly appeared that the defendant had made a losing contract; but only gradually did the extent of the loss, its permanence, and its causes unfold themselves. Greenidge had miscalculated the amount of steam that would be required to heat the dye houses. The expenditure for coal mounted by leaps and bounds. The plaintiff dyed more yarn and less slubbing than before. But the dyeing of yarn takes twice as much heat as that of slubbing, and thus doubles the cost of fuel. These and like changes in the output of the mills had not been foreseen by Greenidge, and Maynard had not warned of them. In 1909 the defendant became alarmed at the mounting loss. Various tests and palliatives were suggested and adopted, but there was no change in the result. Finally, in February, 1911, the defendant gave notice of rescission. At that time it had supplied the plaintiff with electricity worth $69,500.75 if paid for at the maximum rate fixed by the contract, and $60,000 if paid for at the lowest rate charged to any customer in Utica. Yet not only had it received nothing, but it owed the plaintiff under its guaranty $11,721.41. The finding is that a like loss prolonged to the end of the term would amount to $300,000.

These are the contracts which the courts below have annulled. The referee annulled them absolutely. The Appellate Division imposed the condition that the defendant reimburse the plaintiff for the cost of installation. The defendant makes no complaint of the condition. The plaintiff, appealing, stands upon its bargain.

We think the evidence supports the conclusion that the contracts are voidable at the election of the defendant. The plaintiff does not deny that this would be true if the dual director had voted for their adoption. Munson v. Syracuse, G. & C. R. R. Co., 103 N.Y. 58, 8 N.E. 355. But the argument is that by refusing to vote he shifted the responsibility to his associates, and may reap a profit from their errors. One does not divest oneself so readily of one's duties as trustee. The refusal to vote has, indeed, this importance: It gives to the transaction the form and presumption of propriety, and requires one who would invalidate it to probe beneath the surface. Davids v. Davids, 135 App.Div. 206, 209, 120 N.Y.S. 350. But "the great rule of law" (Andrews, J., in Munson v. Syracuse, G. & C. R. R. Co., supra, 103 N. Y. at page 73, 8 N.E. at page 358) which holds a trustee to the duty of constant and unqualified fidelity is not a thing of forms and phrases. A dominating influence may be exerted in other ways than by a vote. Adams v. Burke, 201 Ill. 395, 66 N.E. 235; Davids v. Davids, supra. A beneficiary, about to plunge into a ruinous course of dealing, may be betrayed by silence as well as by the spoken word.

The trustee is free to stand aloof, while others act, if all is equitable and fair. He cannot rid himself of the duty to warn and to denounce, if there is improvidence or oppression, either apparent on the surface, or lurking beneath the surface, but visible to his practiced eye. Davids v. Davids, supra; Crocker v. Cumberland Mining & Milling Co., 31 S. D. 137, 146, 139 N.W. 783; Fort Payne v. Hill, 174 Mass. 224, 54 N.E. 532; Wyman v. Bowman, 127 F. 257, 274, 62 C.C.A. 189.

There was an influence here, dominating, perhaps, and surely potent and persuasive, which was exerted by Mr. Maynard from the beginning to the end. In all the stages of preliminary treaty he dealt with a subordinate, who looked up to him as to a superior, and was alert to serve his pleasure. There was no clean-cut cleavage in those stages between his conflicting offices and agencies. Hoyle v. Plattsburgh & M. R. R. Co., 54 N.Y. 314, 328, 329, 13 Am.Rep. 595. No label identified the request of Mr. Maynard, the plaintiff's president, as something separate from the advice of Mr. Maynard, the defendant's chairman. Superior and subordinate together framed a contract, and together closed it. It came before the executive committee as an accomplished fact. The letters had been signed and delivered. Work had been begun. All that remained was a ratification, which may have been needless, and which, even if needful, took the aspect of mere formality. There was some attempt to show that Mr. Lewis, the vice president, had seen the letters before. The testimony of Mr. Greenidge indicates the contrary. In support of the judgment, we accept his testimony as true. That the letters had been seen by others, there is not even a pretense. The members of the committee, hearing the contract for the first time, knew that it had been framed by the chairman of the meeting. They were assured in his presence that it was just and equitable. Faith in his loyalty disarmed suspicion.

There was, then, a relation of trust reposed, of influence exerted, of superior knowledge on the one side and legitimate dependence on the other. Sage v. Culver, 147 N.Y. 241, 247, 41 N.E. 513; Davids v. Davids, supra. At least, a finding that there was this relation has evidence to sustain it. A trustee may not cling to contracts thus won, unless their terms are fair and just. Crocker v. Cumberland Mining & Milling Co., supra, and cases there cited; Dongan v. MacPherson, 1902 A.C. 197, 200; Thompson on Corp. 1228, 1231. His dealings with his beneficiary are "viewed with jealousy by the courts, and may be set aside on slight grounds." Twin Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587, 588 (23 L.Ed. 328). He takes the risk of an enforced surrender of his bargain if it turns out to be improvident. There must be candor and equity in the transaction, and some reasonable proportion between benefits and burdens.

The contracts before us do not survive these tests. The unfairness is startling, and the consequences have been disastrous. The mischief consists in this: That the guaranty has not been limited by a statement of the conditions under which the mills are to be run. No matter how large the business, no matter how great the increase in the price of labor or of fuel, no matter what the changes in the nature or the proportion of the products, no matter even though there be extensions of the plant, the defendant has pledged its word that for ten years there will be a saving of $600 a month, $300 for each mill, $7,200 a year. As a result of that pledge it has supplied the plaintiff with electric current for nothing, and owes, if the contract stands, about $11,000 for the privilege. These elements of unfairness Mr. Maynard must have known, if indeed his knowledge be material. He may not have known how great the loss would be. He may have trusted to the superior technical skill of Mr. Greenidge to compute with approximate accuracy the comparative cost of steam and electricity. But he cannot have failed to know that he held a one-sided contract which left the defendant at his mercy. He was not blind to the likelihood that in a term of ten years there would be changes in the business. The swiftness with which some of the changes followed permits the inference that they were premeditated. There was a prompt increase in the proportion of yarns as compared with slubbing when the guaranty of saving charged the defendant with the greater cost of fuel. But, whether these and other changes were premeditated or not, at least they were recognized as possible. With that recognition, no word of warning was uttered to Greenidge or to any of the defendant's officers. There slumbered within these contracts a potency of profit which the plaintiff neither ignored in their making nor forgot in their enforcement.

It is no answer to say that this potency, if obvious to Maynard, ought also to have been obvious to other members of the committee. They did not know, as he did, the likelihood or the significance of changes in the business. There was need, too, of reflection and analysis before the dangers stood revealed. For the man who framed the contracts, there was opportunity to consider and to judge. His fellow members, hearing them for the first time, and trustful of his loyalty, would have no thought of latent peril. That they had none is sufficiently attested by the fact that the contracts were approved. There was inequality, therefore, both in knowledge and in the opportunity for knowledge. It is not important in such circumstances whether the trustee foresaw the precise evils that developed. The inference that he did might not be unsupported by the evidence. But the indefinite possibilities of hardship, the opportunity in changing circumstances to wrest unlooked-for profits and impose unlooked-for losses, these must have been foreseen. Foreseen or not, they were there, and their presence permeates the contracts with oppression and inequity.

We hold, therefore, that the refusal to vote does not nullify as of course an influence and predominance exerted without a vote. We hold that the constant duty rests on a trustee to seek no harsh advantage to the detriment of his trust, but rather to protest and renounce if through the blindness of those who treat with him he gains what is unfair. And, because there is evidence that in the making of these contracts that duty was ignored, the power of equity was fittingly exercised to bring them to an end.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

EVERETT v. PHILLIPS et al.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1942. 288 N.Y. 227, 43 N.E.2d 18.

Stockholders' derivative action by Victor S. Everett against Ellis L. Phillips and others, impleaded with others. From a judgment entered upon an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, 261 App.Div. 1082, 26 N.Y.S.2d 881, which reversed upon the law and the facts an interlocutory judgment in favor of plaintiff entered upon a decision of the court on trial at Special Term (Kadien, J.), 22 N.Y. S.2d 852, and directed a dismissal of the complaint on the law upon new findings, the plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

LEHMAN, CHIEF JUDGE. The plaintiff is the owner of 100 shares of the "participating stock" of Empire Power Corporation. The issued and outstanding capital stock of the corporation consists of 77,000 shares of six per cent cumulative preferred stock with a stated value of $7,133,000; 400,000 shares of "participating" stock with a stated value of $3,150,000, and 400,000 shares of common stock with a stated value of $1,000,000. The directors of the corporation and members of their families owned all the common stock and large amounts of the preferred stock and the "participating" stock. At the same time they also owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, 1,500,000 shares, constituting a majority of the common stock of Long Island Lighting Company. In 1931 and 1932 the Empire Power Corporation loaned to Long Island Lighting Company large sums of money. Payment of these loans was from time to time extended and the loans are still unpaid. Claiming that these loans and the extension of time of payment were ultra vires and were "not made to promote any business purpose of Empire Power Corporation, but were made for the sole purpose of promoting the interests of the individual defendants and that of Long Island Lighting Company," the plaintiff has brought an action in behalf of himself and other minority stockholders in which he has asked that directors of Empire Power Corporation named as individual defendants be compelled to demand payment of the indebtedness by Long Island Lighting Company and that "in the event that the said indebtedness cannot be collected from Long Island Lighting Company, then that the individual defendants shall be directed to pay the same." At Special Term an interlocutory judgment was granted awarding substantially the relief which the plaintiff asked. The judgment was unanimously reversed by the Appellate Division on the law and the facts and the complaint was dismissed.

To establish his cause of action the plaintiff must show that the individual defendants in causing the Empire Power Corporation to loan the moneys to the Long Island Lighting Company and in failing to demand payment of such loans as they became due, have acted in disregard of the duties they owe Empire Power Corporation and that Empire Power Corporation has suffered, or at least may suffer, some detriment or loss. In a long line of decisions this court has held directors who control corporate action responsible for dereliction of duty where they have used the property of the corporation or managed its affairs to promote their own interests, disregarding the interests of the corporation. Power of control carries with it a trust or duty to exercise that power faithfully to promote the corporate interests, and the courts of this State will insist upon scrupulous performance of that duty. Yet, however high may be the standard of fidelity to duty which the court may exact, errors of judgment by directors do not alone suffice to demonstrate lack of fidelity. That is true even though the errors may be so gross that they may demonstrate the unfitness of the directors to manage the corporate affairs.

The plaintiff here is asserting a cause of action for wrong done to the corporation of which he is a minority stockholder. In such an action it is immaterial whether the minority stockholder who asserts it has a large or a small interest; but in determining whether those who have power to control the corporation have committed a wrong either to the corporation or to its stockholders, the corporate capital structure, the certificate of incorporation, and the corporate constitution or by-laws may be factors of great weight; for within limits prescribed by law these define to whom the power of control is entrusted, its scope and the manner in which it must be exercised. Directors are elected by the holders of stock which have voting rights. Here the certificate of incorporation of Empire Power Corporation provides that only the holders of common stock shall have voting rights. According to the testimony of the defendant Phillips, who has been president of the corporation from its formation in 1924 and who with George W. Olmsted, its vice-president until he died in 1940, owned or controlled, either directly or indirectly, all of its common stock, the corporation was "formed for the purpose of financing and taking care of the various companies in which we were then interested and later became interested further." They invited the public to subscribe to the capital of the corporation which would be managed by directors in whose election no other stockholders would have any part, and those who might furnish the capital which these directors would manage were not left under any illusion that the directors when acting for the corporation would be free from other interests which might prevent an unprejudiced exercise of judgment. The certificate of incorporation contained a provision that: "No contract or other transaction between the Corporation and any other corporation shall be affected or invalidated by the fact that any one or more of the directors of this Corporation is or are interested in, or is a director or officer, or are directors or officers of such other corporation, * * * and no contract, act or transaction of this Corporation with any person or persons, firm or corporation, shall be affected or invalidated by the fact that any director or directors of this Corporation is a party, or are parties to or interested in such contract, act or transaction, or in any way connected with such person or persons, firm or association, and each and every person who may become a director of this Corporation is hereby relieved from any liability that might otherwise exist from contracting with the Corporation for the benefit of himself or any firm, association or corporation in which he may be in anywise interested." It is against this background that the court must consider the claim of the appellant that he has established by the overwhelming weight of testimony that the directors were faithless to their trust.

The complaint of the plaintiff concerns, as we have said, loans made to Long Island Lighting Company. The defendants controlled that corporation. Their stock interest in it was large. According to the balance sheets of the corporation introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, the corporation in 1931 and also at the time of the trial had a very large surplus and was earning large profits, but needed money for the development of its business. Corporate balance sheets unfortunately do not always present a correct picture of the corporate finances. The Public Service Commission—on appropriate occasions—can and does make independent examinations of the balance sheets of utility corporations; a court can ordinarily consider only the evidence produced by the parties and no evidence was produced which would challenge the correctness of the balance sheets or which would enable the court to reconstruct them. We may not assume that the financial condition of the lighting company was not favorable, but the evidence establishes that unless it had succeeded in borrowing money it would have been obliged to discontinue payment of dividends, at least temporarily, and, to use all its earnings for needed improvements, and that perhaps the earnings might have provided insufficient moneys for its needs. The evidence establishes too that the defendants expected to derive benefit not only as stockholders but also in other ways from the moneys which, as directors, they caused Long Island Lighting Company to borrow. The question remains whether in seeking benefit for themselves and for the Long Island Lighting Company, which they controlled through stock ownership, they caused Empire Power Corporation, which the defendants also controlled through stock ownership, to make a loan, which might work harm to the Empire Power Corporation.

The Long Island Lighting Company at the end of 1930 owed banks approximately $10,500,000 on short term, unsecured notes. Though, according to the balance sheet of the Long Island Lighting Company, it had assets greatly in excess of its indebtedness, and had a net income of more than $3,000,000 a year, its financial position was not entirely safe or sound. The banks might press for payment of short term obligations at a time when Long Island Lighting Company might find it difficult to borrow elsewhere the money to pay such obligations. Moreover, the needs of the territory served by Long Island Lighting Company required constant extension of its plant. We may assume that prudent and conservative directors would, in such circumstances, have sought to obtain by an issue of bonds the money the corporation might require to refund its short term obligations and for new capital. We need not resort to doubtful inferences to find that the directors in their management of Long Island Lighting Company did not feel themselves restricted to conservative plans and methods. The evidence clearly indicates that.

Stocks, bonds, notes or other evidences of indebtedness "payable at periods of more than twelve months after the date thereof" could not be issued by Long Island Lighting Company without approval of the Public Service Commission obtained in accordance with section 69 of the Public Service Law, Consol. Laws, ch. 48. The Long Island Lighting Company did in 1932 apply to the Public Service Commission for permission to issue approximately $15,000,000 of refunding bonds. The directors of the Long Island Lighting Company preferred, however, to borrow the moneys under a plan which would not be subject to the restrictions which the Public Service Commission might impose as conditions to its approval. An inference that the directors were influenced by that consideration when they sought to borrow the moneys for Long Island Lighting Company upon notes payable within one year from that date might reasonably be drawn from the evidence in this case. The transaction would not be unlawful for that reason. The Legislature has in the public interest provided that bonds or notes evidencing loans for a longer period than one year may be issued only with the approval of the Commission. The Legislature has not decreed that the public interest requires similar safeguards for issues where the loans became due within the year. The Legislature has drawn the line, and "the very meaning of a line in the law is that you intentionally may go as close to it as you can if you do not pass it." Superior Oil Co. v. Mississippi, 280 U.S. 390, 395, 50 S.Ct. 169, 170, 74 L.Ed. 504, opinion by Mr. Justice Holmes. True, the inference might reasonably be drawn that the directors of the Long Island Lighting Company arranged that Empire Power Corporation should loan the money on short term notes with the expectation that Empire Power Corporation under their control would continue to renew the loans as they became due, until the time arrived when it would be convenient for Long Island Lighting Company to repay them. The directors regarded these loans as "investments" rather than temporary loans which would be paid at maturity. Nevertheless, the lender could have insisted upon payment of the loans as they became due, and the defendants can be charged with no wrong to the Empire Power Corporation on account of repeated renewals of the loans nor on account of the way in which they were handled, without proof that in these acts the defendants willfully failed to protect the interests of Empire Power Corporation in order to serve better their personal interests and the interests of the Long Island Lighting Company. There may be difference of opinion as to whether these defendants as directors of Empire Power Corporation acted wisely in the handling of the loans. There are many matters disclosed by the record which cast doubt upon the prudence, the wisdom, and the concern for the public interest shown by these directors. We are constrained, however, to agree with the Appellate Division that there is little, if any, evidence to sustain a finding that they have violated their trust or have failed to protect the interests of the Empire Power Corporation according to the dictates of their judgment, be that judgment good or bad.

It is argued, however, that the transactions in which the defendants acted as directors both of the Empire Power Corporation and the Long Island Lighting Company should be set aside because the dual position of these directors precluded an unprejudiced exercise of judgment. The dual position of the directors making the unprejudiced exercise of judgment by them more difficult, should lead the courts to scrutinize these transactions with care. Sage v. Culver, 147 N.Y. 241, 41 N.E. 513; Koral v. Savory, Inc., 276 N.Y. 215, 11 N.E.2d 883; Geddes

v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., 254 U.S. 590, 41 S.Ct. 209, 65 L.Ed. 425; United Copper Securities Co. v. Amalgamated Copper Co., 244 U.S. 261, 37 S.Ct. 509, 61 L.Ed. 1119. It does not, however, alone suffice to render the transactions void, and the provision of the certificate of incorporation of Empire Power Corporation expressly authorizing the directors to act even in matters where they have dual interest, has the effect of exonerating the directors, at least in part, "from adverse inferences which might otherwise be drawn against them." Spiegel v. Beacon Participations, 297 Mass. 398, 417, 8 N.E.2d 895, 907. We may point out here also that if by reason of these loans Empire Power Corporation should sustain a loss, the loss would fall primarily upon these defendants as owners of the entire capital stock. The proportion of stock of all classes owned by these defendants in Empire Power Corporation whose moneys they are claimed to have diverted wrongfully, is indeed, much greater than the proportion of the stock owned by them in Long Island Lighting Company which received these moneys. The loans were not excessive in relation to the capital assets and the income of the borrower as shown in the borrower's balance sheet. The evidence demonstrates that the defendants acting as the directors of the Long Island Lighting Company borrowed moneys from Empire Power Corporation because in their opinion the loans promoted the interests of the borrower and the stockholders of the borrower; the evidence does not demonstrate that the defendants acting as directors of the Empire Power Corporation in loaning its moneys to Long Island Lighting Company did not decide upon sufficient grounds that the loans would also promote the interests of the lender and its stockholders.

The judgment should be affirmed, without costs.

DESMOND, JUDGE (dissenting). At all the times of which we write, the individual defendants controlled both Long Island Lighting Company and Empire Power Corporation. In dealings between those corporations these individual defendants sat on both sides of the table. They caused Empire Power Corporation, from November, 1930, to February, 1933, to loan Long Island Lighting Company $5,330,000 on the latter's unsecured notes. These notes and various renewals thereof were all made for periods of less than a year. See Public Service Law, § 69. Interest has been paid regularly but, up to the beginning of this action, nothing was ever paid on principal. The lighting company needed these moneys—and used them—to pay off, from time to time, notes held by banks which were asking for payment. In 1930, when Empire made its first loan to the lighting company, the latter owed the banks more than $10,000,000 and found it increasingly difficult to persuade the banks to accept renewals of their unsecured notes. The banks had suggested to the individual defendants that the lighting company discontinue paying cash dividends, so that it might accumulate in its treasury funds with which to pay off the bank loans. This the individual defendants, who owned or controlled half of the lighting company's common stock, were unwilling to do. An application to the Public Service Commission for authority to issue mortgage bonds to raise money to pay off the banks was pending but undetermined. There was only one other convenient source of funds. A lender had to be found who would supply, without security and without question, the cash needed from time to time to satisfy the banks. Such a lender was ready at hand in Empire Power Corporation, completely controlled by these individual defendants themselves.

During 1930 and 1932 these defendants arranged loans aggregating $4,500,000 from the power corporation to the lighting company, most, if not all, of the proceeds going to pay off the bank loans. In March, 1932, when the lighting company owed the power Corporation about $4,500,000 and the banks about $8,750,000, an agreement was made between the lighting company and the banks whereby the latter accepted renewals of their notes for six months, and agreed to accept renewals for another six months if necessary, on condition that the lighting company make certain payments which were intended to come from, and did come from, Empire Power Corporation. It was part of this arrangement that the whole of the lighting company's debt to Empire Power Corporation should be postdated to that of the banks, postdated rather than subordinated because it was felt that subordination "would be openly subject to attack on account of the unity of interest between Empire Power and Long Island Lighting."

A little later Empire's directors passed a resolution agreeing on behalf of Empire "to extend and keep extended the time of payment" of the lighting company's notes to Empire Power Corporation until the banks should be paid in full. An agreement to the same effect was made by defendant Phillips on behalf of Empire, in 1933, and approved by Empire's board of directors. Later that same year the Public Service Commission granted permission to the lighting company to sell the issue of bonds above referred to, but sale at the stipulated price was found to be impossible. Again the bank notes had to be renewed, and again Empire Power Corporation was caused to agree to subordinate its claims to those of the bank. Finally, in 1934, the authorized bond issue was sold by the lighting company under a contract which provided that the indebtedness to Empire Power Corporation would not be paid, discharged or secured by the issuance of any bonds of the lighting company secured by a lien prior to or on a parity with the lien of the bond issue. All of the proceeds of this bond issue went to the banks, none to Empire Power Corporation. In 1936 the lighting company paid off all its unsecured indebtedness, except that owing to Empire Power Corporation. Among the creditors so paid off were the common directors of the two corporations and their relatives and corporations controlled by them. Thus Empire Power Corporation, starting out with short term loans to the lighting company, ended up with what amounted to a "permanent investment" of $5,000,000 in the lighting company, in the form of unsecured notes, payment of which, if this suit fails, must await the pleasure of the defendants.

In this suit plaintiffs on behalf of Empire Power Corporation asked the court to compel Long Island Lighting Company to repay the moneys loaned to it by the Empire Corporation, to compel the individual defendants, as directors of Long Island Lighting Company, to pay that indebtedness if the lighting company does not, and to restrain the individual defendants from further extending the time of payment. Special Term found, as stated in its opinion, that the conduct of the individual defendants, in making and renewing these loans, was biased in favor of the lighting company, and ordered judgment for plaintiff. The Appellate Division reversed on the law and the facts and rendered final judgment dismissing the complaint. Contracts between two corporations having common officers are, of course, not void per se (Burden v. Burden, 159 N.Y. 287, 54 N.E. 17; Continental Ins. Co. v. New York & H. R. Co., 187 N.Y. 225, 79 N.E. 1026), but are voidable by either corporation, irrespective of the balance of benefits (Globe Woolen Co. v. Utica Gas & Electric Co., 224 N.Y. 483, 121 N.E. 378; Munson v. Syracuse, G. & C. R. Co., 103 N.Y. 58, 8 N.E. 355), or by a court of equity at the instance of either corporation (or its stockholder), where it appears that such a contract was made in bad faith, fraud, other breach of trust or under circumstances preventing "an unprejudiced exercise of judgment." United Copper Securities Co. v. Amalgamated Copper Co., 244 U.S. 261, 264, 37 S.Ct. 509, 510, 61 L. Ed. 1119; Sage v. Culver, 147 N.Y. 241, 41 N.E. 513; Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. New York & Northern Ry. Co., 150 N.Y. 410, 44 N.E. 1043, 34 L.R.A. 76, 55 Am.St.Rep. 689; Kavanaugh v. Kavanaugh Knitting Co., 226 N.Y. 185, 123 N.E. 148; Geddes v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., 254 U.S. 590, 41 S.Ct. 209, 65 L.Ed. 425; Koral v. Savory, Inc., 276 N.Y. 215, 11 N.E.2d 883. A court will not attempt to pass upon questions of expediency or to control the corporate managers in the faithful exercise of their discretion. City Bank Farmers' Trust Co. v. Hewitt Realty Co., 257 N.Y. 62, 177 N.E. 309, 76 A.L.R. 881; United Copper Securities Co. v. Amalgamated Copper Co., supra; Burden v. Burden, supra. To make a case for the invalidation of such a contract there must be shown circumstances tending to prove that the contract was made in bad faith, fraud or other breach of trust, including a biased exercise of judgment. Globe Woolen Co. v. Utica Gas & Electric Co., Sage v. Culver, United Copper Securities Co. v. Amalgamated Copper Co., Koral v. Savory, Inc., supra. Given such a showing, the burden is then upon those who would maintain the contract to establish its fairness (Sage v. Culver, supra), particularly when they themselves are shown to have exercised the dominating influence in effecting the contract. Geddes v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., supra. Whether the particular contract between these two corporations having the same directors was or was not made under circumstances amounting to a breach of the directors' fiduciary duty, is a question of fact.

Here the individual defendants who arranged the loans by Empire Power Corporation to Long Island Lighting Company, were completely aware of the latter's financial difficulties at the times the loans and renewals were made. They and their families owned the majority of the lighting company's stock; they directed its policies and managed its affairs; some of them were unsecured creditors of the lighting company in substantial amounts. It was to their interest individually, that the lighting company's urgent need of funds to pay its unsecured and demanding bank creditors be met. They met it by loaning Empire's money to Long Island on such terms that Empire's capital funds were used to pay off Long Island's bank loans in part, then these loans were made subordinate to the balances owing to the banks and finally remained wholly unpaid when all Long Island's other creditors of the same class were taken care of by the proceeds of a bond issue. The inference is unescapable that in the making of these loans, and renewals, the welfare of Empire Power Corporation was ignored and that the purpose of defendants was to benefit Long Island Lighting Company, and themselves. It is no answer to all this that Empire's financial structure may have resilience enough to absorb the risk or the damage of the loans, or that the individual defendant's stake in Empire is large and the plaintiff's small. Plain disclosure of the inequity of the situation and of the unfairness of the risk to the Empire Corporation, makes a strong appeal to the conscience of the court. It is not answered by defendants' protestations that Empire has a good investment in these loans, that they would surely be paid on a liquidation of the lighting company, that the lighting company's credit is good, etc., or by the provision in Empire Power Corporation's charter concerning contracts between that corporation and other corporations with the same officers or directors.

A court of equity in such a case as this does not stand aside and await the outcome of defendants' conduct. It acts promptly and effectively. It sets the whole transaction aside without waiting, or compelling minority stockholders to wait, to see whether those who unlawfully put a corporation's property at risk, may possibly at some undetermined time, have the skill, or luck, to get it back intact for the corporation.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed and that of the Special Term reinstated, with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

ROGERS v. HILL et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1933. 289 U.S. 582, 53 S.Ct. 731.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

Consolidated suits by Richard Reid Rogers against George W. Hill and others and against Thomas R. Taylor and another. An order granting a temporary injunction having been reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals [60 F.2d 109], the District Court vacated the temporary injunction and dismissed the bills of complaint upon the merits, which decree was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals [62 F.2d 1079], and plaintiffs bring certiorari [289 U.S. 716, 53 S.Ct. 593, 77 L.Ed. 1469].

Decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, decree of the District Court dismissing the bills on the merits vacated, and case remanded to the District Court with directions.

MR. JUSTICE BUTLER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The American Tobacco Company is a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey. The petitioner, plaintiff below, acquired in 1916 and has since been the owner of 200 shares of its common stock.

He also has 400 shares of common stock B. In accordance with by-law XII,[30] adopted by the stockholders at their annual meeting, March 13, 1912, the company for many years has annually paid its president and vice presidents large amounts in addition to their fixed salaries and other sums allowed them as compensation for services.[31]

Plaintiff maintains that the by-law is invalid and that, even if valid, the amounts paid under it are unreasonably large and therefore subject to revision by the courts. In March, 1931, he demanded that the company bring suit against the officers who have received such payments to compel them to account to the company for all or such part thereof as the court may hold illegal. The company, insisting that such a suit would be without basis in law or fact, refused to comply with his demand. He brought suit in the Supreme Court of New York against the president and some of the vice presidents to require them so to account, and joined the company as defendant. The case was re-

30 "Section 1. As soon as practicable after the end of the year 1912 and of each year of the company's operations thereafter, the Treasurer of the Company shall ascertain the net profits, as hereinafter defined, earned by the Company during such year, and, if such net profits exceed the sum of $8,222,245.82, which is the estimated amount of such net profits earned during the year 1910 by the business that now belong to the Company, the Treasurer shall pay an amount equal in the aggregate to 10 per cent. of such excess to the President and five Vice-Presidents of the Company in the following proportions, to wit: One-fourth thereof, or 2½ per cent. of such amount, to the President; one-fifth of the remainder or 1½ per cent. of such amount, to each of the five Vice-Presidents as salary for the year, in addition to the fixed salary of each of said officers. * * *

"Section 3. For the purpose of this By-Law the net profits earned by the Company in any year shall consist of the net earnings made by the Company in its business as a manufacturer and seller of tobacco and its products after deducting all expenses and losses, such provisions as shall be determined by the Board of Directors of the Company for depreciation and for all outstanding trade obligations, and an additional amount equal to 6 per cent. dividends on $52,459,400 of its 6 per cent. preferred stock, to which profits shall be added, or from which profits shall be deducted, as the case may be, the Company's proportion (based on its stock holdings) of the net profits or losses for the year of its subsidiary companies engaged in the manufacture and sale of smoking tobacco, chewing tobacco, cigarettes, or little cigars, except earnings on preference shares of British-American Tobacco, Limited, and shares of Imperial Tobacco Company (of Great Britian and Ireland), Limited. * * *

moved to the federal court for the Southern District of New York. In May, 1931, plaintiff brought suit in that court against Taylor, a vice president, not a defendant in the earlier suit, to require him to account and made the company defendant. The cases were consolidated, plaintiff filed an amended complaint and defendants answered. The officers of the company now before the court are Hill, the president, Neiley, Riggio, and Taylor, vice presidents. The answer, after admissions, denials, and explanations, asserts several separate defenses. * * *[32] But plaintiff alleges that the measure of compensation fixed by it is not now equitable or fair. And he prays that the court fix and determine the fair and reasonable compensation of the individual defendants, respectively, for each of the years in question. The allegations of the complaint are not sufficient to permit consideration by the court of the validity or reasonableness of any of the payments on account of fixed salaries or of special credits or of the allotments of stock therein mentioned. Indeed, plaintiff alleges that other proceedings have been instituted for the restoration of special credits, and his suits to invalidate the stock allotments were recently considered here. Rogers v. Guaranty Trust Co., 288 U.S. 123, 53 S.Ct. 295, 77 L.Ed. 652. The only payments that plaintiff by this suit seeks to have restored to the company are the payments made to the individual defendants under the by-law.

We come to consider whether these amounts are subject to examination and revision in the District Court. As the amounts payable depend upon the gains of the business, the specified percentages are not per se unreasonable. The by-law was adopted in 1912 by an almost unanimous vote of the shares represented at the annual meeting and presumably the stockholders supporting the measure acted in good faith and according to their best judgment. The tabular statement in the margin shows the payments to individual defendants under the by-law. Plaintiff does not complain of any made prior to 1921. Regard is to be had to the enormous increase of the company's profits in recent years. The 2½ per cent. yielded President Hill $447,870.30 in 1929 and $842,507.72 in 1930. The 1½ per cent. yielded to each of the vice presidents, Neiley and Riggio, $115,141.86 in 1929 and $409,495.-25 in 1930 and for these years payments under the by-law were in addition to the cash credits and fixed salaries shown in the statement.

While the amounts produced by the application of the prescribed percentages give rise to no inference of actual or constructive fraud, the payments under the by-law have by reason of increase of profits become so large as to warrant investigation in equity in the interest of the company. Much weight is to be given to the action of the stockholders, and the by-law is supported by the presumption of regularity and continuity. But the rule prescribed by it cannot, against the protest of a shareholder, be used to justify payments of sums as salaries so large as in substance and effect to amount to spoliation or waste of corporate property. The dissenting opinion of Judge Swan indicates the applicable rule: "If a bonus payment has no relation to the value of services for which it is given, it is in reality a gift in part, and the majority stockholders have no power to give away corporate property against the protest of the minority." 60 F.(2d) 109, 113. The facts alleged by plaintiff are sufficient to require that the District Court, upon a consideration of all the relevant facts brought forward by the parties, determine whether and to what extent payments to the individual defendants under the by-laws constitute misuse and waste of the money of the corporation. [Citing cases.] * * *

The separate defenses set up in the answer to the amended complaint are: Failure of plaintiff to comply with Equity Rule 27 (28 USCA § 723), ratification, forum non conveniens, laches, and that the payments were justified. As they were not passed on below, we refrain from expressing opinion concerning them. The decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reversed, the decree of the District Court dismissing the bills on the merits is vacated, and the case is remanded to the District Court with directions to reinstate its decree granting injunction pendente lite and for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

ROGERS v. GUARANTY TRUST COMPANY OF NEW YORK et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1933. 288 U.S. 123, 53 S.Ct. 295.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

Suits by Richard Reid Rogers against the Guaranty Trust Company of New York and others, and against the American Tobacco Company and another, to enjoin the execution of an employees' stock subscription plan [33] of the defendant American Tobacco Company. Judgment of dismissal [60 F.2d 106] was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals [60 F.2d 114], and plaintiff brings certiorari [287 U.S. 586, 53 S.Ct. 80, 77 L.Ed. 652].

Judgment of Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, and judgment of District Court, entered on mandate, reversed, and case remanded with directions.

MR. JUSTICE STONE. (Dissenting) I think the court should decide this case on its merits in favor of the petitioner.

Respondent, the American Tobacco Company, organized under the laws of New Jersey, is a large and prosperous corporation, engaged in the manufacture and distribution of cigarettes and other forms of tobacco. It has upwards of 40,000 stockholders. At the commencement of this suit it had a board of sixteen directors, including a president, five vice presidents, a secretary and a treasurer, all actively engaged in its management. For many years these officers have received large annual fixed salaries, as well as large annual cash profit sharing bonuses paid under a by-law of the company, adopted in 1912. See Rogers v. Hill (C.C.A.) 60 F.2d 109. In the year 1930, the profit sharing bonus of the president, added to his fixed salary of $168,000, gave him a total compensation of over $1,010,000, which was further augmented by a special "credit" of $273,470. In the same year, four of the five vice presidents received an aggregate annual salary and bonus of more than $2,077,000. In addition, a number of stock subscription plans have from time to time been put into operation by the directors, without authority of the charter or by-laws of the corporation, or the knowledge or approval of its stockholders, by which they largely benefited. In that of 1926, the respondent Hill, the president and also a director of the company, acquired 8,000 shares of common stock, and other directors, who are respondents here, received substantial amounts. In that of 1929, one year before the transactions now complained of, 46,500 of 51,750 shares of common stock, purchased by the corporation and set aside for the purpose, were sold to the corporate directors at $47 per share less than market value. Convenient arrangements were made for postponed payment of the purchase price. Respondents received 23,050 shares, of which the president received 15,050.

On January 28, 1931, a new allotment of stock was made, which is the subject of this litigation. On that day, the Board of Directors (the president and officers constituting a majority of those in attendance) considered and passed upon the adequacy of the compensation which its members were then receiving for their services to the corporation, and the necessity of conferring further benefits on themselves in order to insure the continuance of those services. Having resolved these questions in their own favor, they proceeded to award additional benefits in the form of the privilege to subscribe to unissued common stock B of the corporation, at a small fraction of its market value. By resolution of that date, they put into effect a stock subscription plan by which 56,712 shares of unissued common stock B of the corporation were distributed in accordance with recommendations made by the president. Of this number 32,370, more than half, were allotted to the directors, of which 13,440 were allotted to the president. The remaining 24,342 shares were allotted in relatively small amounts to 525 employees. None of the recipients was of lower rank than factory subassistant. Four hundred and seventy-three received allotments of less than 100 shares each, the great majority receiving from 15 to 50 shares. The stated consideration for issue of the stock was a subscription price of $25 per share, the par value, and the services of the allottee, not specifically described, to be rendered to the American Tobacco Company for the remainder of the year.

The certificates of stock were to be delivered to the respondents, the Guaranty Trust Company of New York and an individual, as trustees. They were authorized to borrow money upon them to the extent of $25 per share, in order to effect immediate payment of the subscription price to the tobacco company, to apply dividends received on account of the purchase price to be paid by the allottees and to deliver the certificates to them after the close of the year, upon payment in full of their subscriptions. They were given discretion to waive performance of the stipulated service by any allottee and in the event that the subscriber was discharged or resigned from the employ of the company within the year to cancel the subscription agreement or not, as they pleased.

On the day of the resolution allotting the stock, its market price was $112 per share, more than four times the subscription price. It was then paying, and has ever since paid, dividends at the rate of $5 per year, sufficient to pay the subscription price in five years. Valuing the subscription privilege by the difference between the subscription price and the market value of the shares the president received by the allotment the equivalent of $1,169,280, in addition to his annual compensation of more than $1,000,000. The stock subscription rights awarded the five vice presidents similarly valued, amounted to $1,451,-595. That the subscription privilege, accorded for the avowed purpose of assuring the continuance of these executives in the company's employ, was then and has been ever since of great value, upon any theory of valuation is not questioned.

Conceiving himself aggrieved by this transaction, petitioner, a nonassenting stockholder, brought two suits in the Supreme Court of New York, the state in which he resides, joining as defendants the American Tobacco Company, the trustees of the allotted stock, and certain of the directors, including the president, secretary, treasurer, and five vice presidents, one of whom has since died and two of whom were not served with process. Included in the relief sought was a decree that the corporation, its officers and directors be enjoined from carrying out the stock allotments and that the stock allotted to the directors be surrendered to the company. On motion of defendants, the tobacco company and a non-resident director, the causes were removed to the District Court for Southern New York, on grounds of diversity of citizenship of the parties to a separable controversy, and there consolidated.

Thus called upon in this suit to account for their stewardship and to justify their action, the defendants, the respondents here, place their whole reliance upon a statute of New Jersey in conformity with which, they contend, they secured, in advance the authorization of the stockholders to make the challenged allotments of stock.

Section 1, c. 175, of the New Jersey Laws for 1920 (Comp.St.Supp. N.J. § 47—183(a), authorizes any New Jersey corporation to provide and carry out a plan for "(a) the issue or the purchase and sale of its capital stock to any or all of its employees and those actively engaged in the conduct of its business or to trustees on their behalf * * * and for aiding any such employees and said other persons in paying for such stock by contributions, compensation for services, or otherwise. * * *" Section 2(b), Comp.St.Supp.N.J. § 47—184(b) provides that, where, as in this case, the corporation has been formed without charter or by-law provisions authorizing the issuance or the purchase and sale of stock for such purposes, "the board of directors shall first formulate such plan or plans and pass a resolution declaring that in its opinion the adoption thereof is advisable, and shall call a meeting of the stockholders to take action thereon. * * *" It requires an affirmative vote of two-thirds in interest of each class of stockholders, present at the meeting, for the adoption of the plan.

In June, 1930, the directors, purporting to act under this statute, presented to the stockholders, by notice of a special meeting, a so-called "plan" under which the employees of the corporation and those actively engaged in its business were to be permitted to subscribe to unissued shares of its common stock B. The notice of the meeting was accompanied by a document designated "Employees' Stock Subscription Plan," and by a copy of resolutions of the board of directors authorizing the submission of the plan to the stockholders, proposing a a reduction in the par value of the common stock and the non-voting common stock B from $50 to $25 per share, and an increase of the authorized common stock from 1,000,000 to 2,000,000 shares, and of the authorized common stock B from 2,000,000 to 4,000,000 shares, each stockholder to receive two shares of the new stock for one of the old. By thus increasing the authorized, unissued shares of common B, stock was to be made available for subscription by employees.

The Employees' Stock Subscription Plan proposed "to allot for subscription * * * by way of additional compensation for services to be rendered, shares of unissued common stock B * * * to such employees of the corporation and/or its subsidiaries and those actively engaged in the conduct of its or their business as may be selected. * * *" The prescribed method of execution of the plan was that "the Board of Directors may, at such time or times as it may determine * * * offer and allot such stock for subscription * * * in such amounts and proportions to such persons, at such prices, not less than the par value of the shares allotted, payable in full or in such installments, and upon such other terms and conditions, all as shall be determined with respect to each offering of stock to each individual pursuant to authority to be granted by the Board of Directors to the President for such purpose."

Accompanying the notice of the meeting was a circular letter by the president to stockholders, in which they were told of the prosperous condition of the company, that the purpose of the stock allotment plan was to encourage those who had made the company's success possible to continue in its employ, and that it was the expectation of the Board of Directors, if the program set forth in the notice of the meeting and accompanying documents should be approved by stockholders to declare an extra dividend of $4 per share on the common stock and common stock B, and to initiate regular quarterly dividends on the newly authorized shares of common stock and common stock B at the increased annual rate of $5 per share. The letter closed with a request to sign and return the enclosed proxy, thereby indicating "your approval of the proposed steps and your support of your Company's management."

Moved, perhaps, by these inducements, the proposal was approved at the meeting by vote of the requisite number of shares of each class.

No disclosure was made to the stockholders by the officers and directors of the stock subscription plans previously put into operation by them, without authority of the charter or by-laws or the knowledge and approval of the stockholders. No disclosure was made of the number or amounts of the annual cash bonuses which had been paid to the president and vice presidents of the company, under the by-law adopted in 1912, and never, so far as appears, subsequently mentioned to the stockholders until after the stock allotments here involved. The only hint of the intention of the management to participate in the proposed Employees' Stock Subscription Plan was contained in a single sentence appearing in the Plan: "No employee, or person actively engaged in the conduct of the business of the Corporation, or its subsidiaries, shall be deemed ineligible to the benefits of the Plan by reason of being also a director of the Corporation or of any of its subsidiaries or of holding any office therein."

With all these facts presented by the pleadings, the District Court, acknowledging its jurisdiction both as a federal court and a court of equity to decide the cause on its merits, nevertheless, held that as the suit concerns the internal affairs of a New Jersey corporation, discretion should be exercised to dismiss it without prejudice to its maintenance in the courts of New Jersey. On appeal, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, Judge Swan dissenting, considered the merits and upheld the legality of the stock allotments. The decree of dismissal was affirmed on the merits and the trial court has entered a final decree accordingly. This court now reverses that judgment, reestablishing the original decree of the trial court, on the ground that a proper exercise of judicial discretion requires that the cause should not be heard. Thus after approximately two years of litigation in state and federal courts, all of which could, and I think should, have decided the case on the merits, the plaintiff must now start the litigation afresh in the courts of New Jersey.

In determining whether the federal courts should decline to exercise the jurisdiction conferred on them by removal, the nature of this controversy and its merits cannot be ignored. I do not stop to consider numerous objections to the stock allotments, urged by petitioner, which are not without weight. It suffices for present purposes that no plan of sufficient definiteness to comply with the New Jersey statute was ever submitted to the stockholders for their approval; and that even if it be conceded that a "plan" was approved, the action of the directors in allotting the stock to themselves, in violation of their duty as fiduciaries, exceeded the authority conferred upon them by the stockholders, and was, therefore, ultra vires.

The statute directs that the board of directors shall "first formulate such plan," declare it "advisable," and call a meeting of stockholders to act on it. Without presenting for the consideration of the stockholders any workable plan of stock allotment, the directors, in effect, asked the stockholders to confer plenary authority on them to formulate a plan and to carry it into execution without any disclosure of its provisions. After the meeting, as before, no stockholder, not in the confidence of the directors, knew in what the plan consisted, who were the persons to participate in it, what principle was to control their selection or determine the amount of stock they were to receive, or the price they were to pay. It is a misuse of words of plain meaning to speak of such a proposal as a "plan," much less a formulated plan for stock allotment to employees, or as one which, in the form presented to the stockholders, the directors could have pronounced advisable or have carried into operation. It was no more than an invitation to stockholders to abrogate the discretion which the statute vested in them to approve a formulated plan, having at least some aspects of definiteness, and vest in the directors powers which could be conferred on them only by charter amendment in the manner prescribed by the statute. The invitation was accompanied by a skillfully phrased suggestion that it was necessary to accept it in order to hold the services of employees, and that, if accepted, the directors would cause new benefits to flow into the pockets of stockholders in the form of extra and increased dividends. Such a maneuver cannot rightly be regarded as a compliance with the plain language of the statute, which requires the directors first to formulate a plan for stock allotment and declare it advisable, and then to submit it to the stockholders for their approval. If it were, it would be difficult to suggest any conceivable purpose of the statute which could not be thwarted by a similar procedure.

The respondents stand in no better position even if we assume that the proposal submitted to the stockholders was a formulated plan, within the meaning of the New Jersey statute. For in that case, authority for the directors' action must be found in the stockholders' approval of the proposal which they submitted, and we must interpret the proposal and the action taken by the stockholders in terms of their legitimate expectation that the directors were complying with their duty as fiduciaries and not dealing with them at arm's length. They were entitled to read the proposal in the light of the fundamental duty of directors to derive no profit from their own official action, without the consent of the stockholders, obtained after full and fair revelation of every circumstance which might reasonably influence them to withhold their consent. Wardell v. Railroad Co., 103 U.S. 651, 26 L.Ed. 509; General Investment Co. v. American Hide & Leather Co., 97 N.J.Eq. 230, 233, 127 A. 659; see United States Steel Corp. v. Hodge, 64 N.J.Eq. 807, 813, 54 A. 1, 60 L.R.A. 742; Globe Woolen Co. v. Utica Gas & Electric Co., 224 N.Y. 483, 489, 121 N.E. 378; compare Meinhard v. Salmon, 249 N.Y. 458, 164 N.E. 545, 62 A.L.R. 1; Wendt v. Fischer, 243 N.Y. 439, 154 N.E. 303. They were entitled to assume that the proposal involved nothing which did not fairly appear on its face and above all that it was not a cloak for a scheme by which the directors were to enrich themselves in great amounts at the expense of the corporation, of whose interests they were the legal guardians.

The respondents must, therefore, rest their case on the bare statement in their proposal to the stockholders that no employee or person actively engaged in the business of the company "shall be deemed ineligible to the benefits of the Plan," because a director or officer. But it would be extravagant to say that these words, addressed by men in the position of trustees to their beneficiaries, gave warning of the wholesale gratuities which the directors subsequently bestowed upon themselves. No more extensive authority could be derived from this language than the disclosure which it made. By consenting that the directors should be "eligible" to share in a plan avowedly for the benefit of employees, the stockholders did not consent that they should be the chief beneficiaries of their own unrestrained munificence, or that they should add any new bounties to the unrevealed stock allotments and bonuses which the directors had previously enjoyed in secrecy. Even if the stockholders consented that some of the directors should be eligible to benefit from action taken by other disinterested directors, they certainly did not consent that the allotments should be made by a group of directors who, because of the magnitude of the benefits they anticipated for themselves, were obviously incapable of passing an independent and unbiased judgment upon the propriety of the distribution which they co-operated in making to each other. Respondents' contention that if the directors were unable to vote on each other's participation no plan could be put into effect under which a majority of the directors were to participate, is without weight, for it obviously could be if the statute were followed and the plan revealed in its entirety to the stockholders.

To surmount these difficulties, respondents point to the fact that a representative of petitioner stated at the stockholders' meeting that favorable action on the proposal might result in the issuance of a large amount of stock to employees, including officers and directors, without adequate consideration, and that this did not induce the stockholders to express their disapproval. It is unnecessary to speculate whether this outcome is to be attributed to the fact that those present, being without the aid of prevision, regarded the prediction as too improbable to be credited, or to the fact that those who attended the meeting were not, for the most part, the stockholders, but the recipients of their proxies selected by the management of the corporation for the occasion. A statement made to them would, as a New Jersey court has said, fall "upon ears not allowed to hear and minds not permitted to judge; upon automatons, whose principals are uninformed of their own injury." See Berendt v. Bethlehem Steel Corp., 108 N.J.Eq. 148, 151, 154 A. 321, 322. In any event it is enough that neither in the notice of meeting and accompanying documents, which the stockholders saw and on which they relied, nor at the meeting itself, did the officers and directors disclose that such was their purpose.

We need not conjecture whether, if the directors had had the hardihood to disclose in advance the benefits which they were to award to themselves, the stockholders would nevertheless have given their approval. Nor is it important that these directors have successfully managed the corporation and that under their direction it has earned large profits for its stockholders. Their business competence did not confer on them the privilege of making concealed or unauthorized profits or relieve them of the elementary obligation which the law imposes on all corporate directors to deal frankly and openly with stockholders in seeking their consent to benefit personally by reason of their relationship to the corporation.

The directors, having failed to comply with petitioner's seasonable demand that they exercise their authority to bring this suit in the name of the corporation, petitioner was not required by general equitable principles or by Equity Rule 27 to appeal to the stockholders before bringing it, as the action complained of here was not one which the stockholders could ratify. * * *

3. MANAGEMENT RESPONSIBILITY TO STOCKHOLDERS

Originally the corporate management consisted of that group—usually the board of directors—in whom was vested the exercise of the corporate powers. This remains a technical rule today, though it has been expanded to include senior or responsible officers.

But it presently became obvious that the titular management might or might not be the actual management. The directors who were "dummies"—weak men who merely did what they were told by someone else—might be technically responsible as a management; but the real management might be men higher up. The business responsibility rested on the dominant individual or individuals, no matter what office he or they held, or whether he or they did not have office at all.

The law has posited a set of standards for corporate managements. In terms these are apt to be the same year by year; in application, they are apt to change.

A management which is strictly limited by law to performing certain functions so that it has a minimum of discretion manifestly cannot be held to the same standard of responsibility as can a management with absolute control—at least so far as business sense would indicate. Where the participants themselves give instructions or mark out a line of policy, naturally they and not the officers are responsible for the results of that line.

Where, however, the management is chosen by the participants and represents them, but has full discretion, the participants are relatively more helpless; the management is relatively more powerful; and as a business matter more is expected in the way of good faith, ability, and success. But to the extent that the management has been chosen by the participants, there is at least a presumption that this management is protecting the interests of those who chose it.

Where, however, the management is not chosen by the participants, and has complete discretion, it is manifest that the participants are, from the business point of view, completely in the hands of a group over whom they have no control whatever. This situation may arise as a matter of fact or as a matter of law. In practice the managements of very large corporations (United States Steel Co., American Telephone and Telegraph Co.), though they are elected by the shareholders, are practically independent of the shareholders since the distribution of stock is so wide and the expense of changing a management so great that from mere inertia boards of directors are re-elected year after year, or virtually nominate their own successors. Legal devices have been invented to secure the same result; for instance, non-voting stock.

The problem of the enhanced liability of managements depending on their power is discussed in Berle: Studies in the Law of Corporation Finance: "Non-Voting Stock and 'Bankers' Control.'" This thesis has been questioned by Wood, "Status of Management Stockholders," 38 Yale L.J. 57, 1928.

CARPENTER v. DANFORTH.

Supreme Court of New York, 1868. 52 Barb. 581.

Action to have a sale of stock set aside, on the ground of fraud and undue influence.

SUTHERLAND, J. The defendant Danforth bought of the plaintiff, as administrator, in December, 1862, one hundred and thirty-six shares of the stock of "The National Bank Note Company," a New York corporation, for $60 a share, the par value being $50 a share. When Danforth bought the stock he was one of the trustees or directors of the corporation, and had been from its organization in 1859.

The purpose of this action is, to have the sale of the stock declared void, and the plaintiff restored to the rights and interests which he would have had, had the sale not been made, upon the ground of fraud and undue influence.

There is a preliminary question of law, of great, perhaps I should say, of controlling importance. The counsel for the plaintiff insists, and has submitted an elaborate and very able brief to show, that from the relation between Danforth as a trustee, or director, and the plaintiff as a share or stockholder, undue influence on the one side, and a corresponding trust and confidence on the other side, is to be presumed; so that, applying to this case a well known principle of equity applicable to dealings and contracts of parties, between whom there was a trust or confidential relation, the result would be that the sale or transaction must be declared void, unless the proofs show, independent of the question of actual or positive fraud, not only that Danforth paid a full and fair price for the stock, but also that he disclosed to the plaintiff every fact or circumstance known to him, Danforth, and not known to the plaintiff, material on the question of the value of the stock. * * *

There was certainly a trust relation between the plaintiff as the holder of, or as the person having the legal title to, the shares of stock, and the defendant Danforth, as a trustee or director. A corporation aggregate can only act by agents. Its trustees or directors are its agents for managing its affairs. They are such agents, viewing the corporation either in the abstract, as an immaterial thing, of legislative creation, with a name and certain powers and rights given by law, or as composed of its corporators, or shareholders, having the right to share pro rata in its dividends. There is, therefore, a certain trust relation between the shareholders and the directors of a corporation; but the trust put in the directors usually extends, and I must assume that in this case it extended only to the management of the general affairs of the corporation, with a view to dividends of profits; and, therefore, that the trust relation between the plaintiff and the defendant Danforth, extended no farther. The title to the property of a corporation is in neither the directors nor shareholders. It is in the corporation as an abstract, immaterial thing of legal creation. The directors are not trustees for the sale of the stock of the corporation. They have no power, as directors, to sell stock; they have no power to sell any stock but their own. The defendant Danforth, was not a trustee for the sale of the plaintiff's stock. The plaintiff's stock was not the subject of trust between them, nor had the trust relation between them any connection with the plaintiff's stock, except so far as the good or bad management of the general affairs of a corporation by its directors, indirectly affects the value of its stock. * * * [Complaint dismissed.]

STRONG v. REPIDE.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1909. 213 U.S. 419, 29 S.Ct. 521.

In error to and appeal from the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands to review a judgment which, reversing the judgment of the Court of First Instance of the City of Manila, dismissed the complaint in an action to recover certain shares of corporate stock from the purchaser on the ground that such shares were sold by plaintiff's agent without authority, and that the purchaser had fraudulently concealed facts affecting the value of such stock. Reversed. The judgment of the Court of First Instance affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE PECKHAM. * * * The question in this case, therefore, is whether, under the circumstances above set forth, it was the duty of the defendant, acting in good faith, to disclose to the agent of the plaintiff the facts bearing upon or which might affect the value of the stock.

If it were conceded, for the purpose of the argument, that the ordinary relations between directors and shareholders in a business corporation are not of such a fiduciary nature as to make it the duty of a director to disclose to a shareholder the general knowledge which he may possess regarding the value of the shares of the company before he purchases any from a shareholder, yet there are cases where, by reason of the special facts, such duty exists. The supreme courts of Kansas and of Georgia have held the relationship existed in the cases before those courts because of the special facts which took them out of the general rule, and that, under those facts, the director could not purchase from the shareholder his shares without informing him of the facts which affected their value. Stewart v. Harris, 69 Kan. 498, 66 L.R.A. 261, 105 Am.St.Rep. 178, 77 P. 277, 2 A. & E. Ann.Cas. 873; Oliver v. Oliver, 118 Ga. 362, 45 S.E. 232. The case before us is of the same general character. On the other hand, there is the case of Tippecanoe County v. Reynolds, 44 Ind. 509–515, 15 Am.Rep. 245, where it was held (after referring to cases) that no relationship of a fiduciary nature exists between a director and a shareholder in a business corporation. Other cases are cited to that effect by counsel for defendant in error. These cases involved only the bare relationship between director and shareholder. It is here sought to make defendant responsible for his actions, not alone and simply in his character as a director, but because, in consideration of all the existing circumstances above detailed, it became the duty of the defendant, acting in good faith, to state the facts before making the purchase. That the defendant was a director of the corporation is but one of the facts upon which the liability is asserted, the existence of all the others in addition making such a combination as rendered it the plain duty of the defendant to speak. He was not only a director, but he owned three fourths of the shares of its stock, and was, at the time of the purchase of the stock, administrator general of the company, with large powers, and engaged in the negotiations which finally led to the sale of the company's lands (together with all the other friar lands) to the government at a price which very greatly enhanced the value of the stock. He was the chief negotiator for the sale of all the lands, and was acting substantially as the agent of the shareholders of his company by reason of his ownership of the shares of stock in the corporation and by the acquiescence of all the other shareholders, and the negotiations were for the sale of the whole of the property of the company. By reason of such ownership and agency, and his participation as such owner and agent in the negotiations then going on, no one knew as well as he the exact condition of such negotiations. No one knew as well as he the probability of the sale of the lands to the government. No one knew as well as he the probable price that might be obtained on such sale. The lands were the only valuable asset owned by the company. Under these circumstances, and before the negotiations for the sale were completed, the defendant employs an agent to purchase the stock, and conceals from the plaintiff's agent his own identity and his knowledge of the state of the negotiations and their probable result, with which he was familiar as the agent of the shareholders, and much of which knowledge he obtained while acting as such agent, and by reason thereof. The inference is inevitable that, at this time, he had concluded to press the negotiations for a sale of the lands to a successful conclusion; else, why would he desire to purchase more shares which, if no sale went through, were in his opinion, worthless because of the failure of the government to properly protect the lands in the hands of their then owners? The agent of the plaintiff was ignorant in regard to the state of the negotiations for the sale of the land, which negotiations and their probable result were a most material fact affecting the value of the shares of stock of the company, and he would not have sold them at the price he did had he known the actual state of the negotiations as to the lands, and that it was the defendant who was seeking to purchase the stock. Concealing his identity when procuring the purchase of the stock, by his agent, was in itself strong evidence of fraud on the part of the defendant. Why did he not ask Jones, who occupied an adjoining office, if he would sell? But, by concealing his identity, he could, by such means, the more easily avoid any questions relative to the negotiations for the sale of the lands and their probable result, and could also avoid any actual misrepresentations on that subject, which he evidently thought were necessary in his case to constitute a fraud. He kept up the concealment as long as he could, by giving the check of a third person for the purchase money. Evidence that he did so was objected to on the ground that it could not possibly even tend to prove that the prior consent to sell had been procured by the subsequent check given in payment. That was not its purpose. Of course, the giving of the check could not have induced the prior consent, but it was proper evidence as tending to show that the concealment of identiy was not a mere inadvertent omission, an omission without any fraudulent or deceitful intent, but was a studied and intentional omission, to be characterized as part of the deceitful machinations to obtain the purchase without giving any information whatever as to the state and probable result of the negotiations, to the vendor of the stock, and to, in that way, obtain the same at a lower price. After the purchase of the stock he continued his negotiations for the sale of the lands, and finally, he says, as administrator general of the company, under the special authority of the shareholders, and as attorney in fact, he entered into the contract of sale December 21, 1903. The whole transaction gives conclusive evidence of the overwhelming influence defendant had in the course of the negotiations as owner of a majority of the stock and as agent for the other owners, and it is clear that the final consummation was in his hands at all times. If, under all these facts, he purchased the stock from the plaintiff, the law would indeed be impotent if the sale could not be set aside or the defendant cast in damages for his fraud.

The supreme court of the islands, in holding that there was no fraud in the purchase, said that the responsibility of the directors of a corporation to the individual stockholders did not extend beyond the corporate property actually under the control of the directors; that they did not owe any duty to the members in respect to their individual stock, which would prevent them from purchasing the same in the usual manner. While this may, in general, be true, we think it is not an accurate statement of the case, regard being had to the facts above mentioned.

It is said that, by the Code of Commerce of the Philippine Islands the directors are declared to be mandatories of the society, and that, by article 1459 of the Spanish Civil Code, they are prohibited from acquiring by purchase, even at public or judicial auction, the property the administration or sale of which may have been intrusted to them, and that this is the extent of the prohibition. This provision has no reference to the purchase for himself, under such facts as existed here, by an officer of a corporation, of stock in the corporation owned by another. The case before us seems a plain one for holding that, under the circumstances detailed, there was a legal obligation on the part of the defendant to make these disclosures.

It is further objected, however, that the plaintiff, Mrs. Strong, denied that she had ever authorized her agent to sell this stock, and therefore, by her own evidence, there had never been any consent by her, obtained by fraud or otherwise, because there had never been any consent at all. There is nothing in this objection. Mrs. Strong contended that such authority as she had given never authorized her agent to sell this stock. That had nothing to do with the obligation of the defendant to make the disclosure of the facts already adverted to before the purchase of the stock from plaintiff's agent, and if, by reason of such failure, the defendant was guilty of a fraud in procuring the purchase from the plaintiff's agent, it was a fraud for which he became liable to the plaintiff, even though the plaintiff maintained that her agent was not authorized to sell. The court held that he was authorized, and therefore, if he sold by reason of the fraud committed by defendant, the plaintiff was thereby injured and the defendant became liable. In legal effect her consent was obtained by the fraud.

We have not overlooked the objections made in regard to the form of the judgment in the court of first instance, but are of opinion that such objections are not of a material nature, and we are disposed to follow the course pursued by that court in this case.

Other objections made by the defendant's counsel we have examined, but do not regard them as important. We therefore reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court, dismissing the complaint, and affirm that of the Court of First Instance, and it is so ordered.

CONNOLLY v. SHANNON.

Court of Chancery, New Jersey, 1929. 105 N.J.Eq. 155, 147 A. 234.

Suit by Michael T. Connolly against Joseph Shannon. On motion to strike out bill of complaint. Granted.

BERRY, VICE CHANCELLOR. The bill alleges that the complainant was the owner of 60 shares of the capital stock of the Mercantile Trust Company of Jersey City, and was also a director of the corporation, and that the defendant was president, director, and chairman of the executive committee of the board of directors of said company; that the defendant, as such president and chairman, prior to the date mentioned in the bill of complaint, had been negotiating for the sale and merger of said company with another bank, and with knowledge of "the practical certainty of a sale and merger being consummated on the basis of a value of at least $2,500 for each share of stock of said Mercantile Trust Company, and without informing complainant of any such facts, as it was his duty to do, offered to buy from complainant his said stock at $1,400 per share," and that complainant, without any knowledge of the said facts, and "relying upon the relationship of trust that existed between said Joseph Shannon and himself with regard to the affairs of said Mercantile Trust Company," sold 50 shares of his said stock to the defendant at $1,400 per share; that later said proposed merger was effected on a basis which gave to each stockholder of Mercantile Trust Company, for each share of stock held by him, $1,397.73 in cash and 8 shares of Commercial Trust Company of New Jersey, of the market value of $220 per share; and that upon learning of the proposed sale and merger complainant repudiated his sale of stock to the defendant, and offered to return to him the purchase price, which offer the defendant refused.

The bill further alleges that the defendant on said merger received for the 50 shares of stock purchased from the complainant the sum of $69,286.50 cash and 400 shares of Commercial Trust Company of New Jersey; also that 400 shares of stock of Commercial Trust Company are not readily obtainable in the open market. The complainant renews his offer to pay the defendant the amount of the purchase price of said 50 shares of stock, and demands that the defendant turn over to him what he received in exchange for said stock on said merger. The bill prays an accounting and a decree directing the defendant to transfer and deliver to the complainant the proceeds of complainant's stock on said merger.

This motion is based upon the ground that the bill of complaint discloses no cause of action. My decision on this motion is controlled by the decision of the Court of Errors and Appeals in Crowell v. Jackson, 53 N.J.Law, 656, 23 A. 426, 427. It was there held:

"A director or the treasurer of a corporation is not, because of his office, in duty bound to disclose to an individual stockholder, before purchasing his stock, that which he may know as to the real condition of the corporation affecting the value of that stock. He is, to some extent, trustee for the stockholders as a body in respect to the property and business of the corporation, but does not sustain that relation to individual stockholders with respect to their several holdings of stock, over which he has no control."

There seem to be two distinct lines of authorities on the point involved on this motion; that is, whether or not an officer and director of a corporation occupies such a fiduciary relation toward individual stockholders as to make it the duty of such officer and director to disclose to an individual stockholder, before purchasing his stock, that which he may know as to the real conditions of the corporation affecting the value of that stock. The majority view, apparently, is that adopted by the Court of Errors and Appeals in Crowell v. Jackson, supra, which holds that he does not occupy such fiduciary relation. The minority view is that expressed in Oliver v. Oliver, 118 Ga. 362, 45 S.E. 232, cited by counsel for the complainant, and which holds that such fiduciary relation does exist. For a discussion of the conflicting rules, see L.R.A.1916B, page 706, note; Fletcher's Cyclopedia, of Corporations, vol. 4, § 2464; and Corpus Juris, vol. 14a, p. 128, par. 1896.

Since our court of last resort has adopted the majority rule my own view as to which of the rules is the more consonant with equity and justice is immaterial. I will therefore advise an order striking out the bill of complaint.

GOODWIN v. AGASSIZ et al.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1933. 283 Mass. 358, 186 N.E. 659.

Suit by Homer Goodwin against Rodolphe L. Agassiz and another. From a decree dismissing plaintiff's bill plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

RUGG, CHIEF JUSTICE. A stockholder in a corporation seeks in this suit relief for losses suffered by him in selling shares of stock in Cliff Mining Company by way of accounting, rescission of sales, or redelivery of shares. The named defendants are MacNaughton, a resident of Michigan not served or appearing, and Agassiz, a resident of this commonwealth, the active party defendant. * * * The facts thus displayed are these: The defendants, in May, 1926, purchased through brokers on the Boston stock exchange seven hundred shares of stock of the Cliff Mining Company which up to that time the plaintiff had owned. Agassiz was president and director and MacNaughton a director and general manager of the company. They had certain knowledge, material as to the value of the stock, which the plaintiff did not have. The plaintiff contends that such purchase in all the circumstances without disclosure to him of that knowledge was a wrong against him. That knowledge was that an experienced geologist had formulated in writing in March, 1926, a theory as to the possible existence of copper deposits under conditions prevailing in the region where the property of the company was located. That region was known as the mineral belt in Northern Michigan, where are located mines of several copper mining companies. Another such company, of which the defendants were officers, had made extensive geological surveys of its lands. In consequence of recommendations resulting from that survey, exploration was started on property of the Cliff Mining Company in 1925. That exploration was ended in May, 1926, because completed unsuccessfully, and the equipment was removed. The defendants discussed the geologist's theory shortly after it was formulated. Both felt that the theory had value and should be tested, but they agreed that, before starting to test it, options should be obtained by another copper company of which they were officers on land adjacent to or nearby in the copper belt, that if the geologist's theory were known to the owners of such other land there might be difficulty in securing options, and that that theory should not be communicated to any one unless it became absolutely necessary. Thereafter, options were secured which, if taken up would involve a large expenditure by the other company. The defendants both thought, also that, if there was any merit in the geologist's theory, the price of Cliff Mining Company stock in the market would go up. Its stock was quoted and bought and sold on the Boston Stock Exchange. Pursuant to agreement, they bought many shares of that stock through agents on joint account. The plaintiff first learned of the closing of exploratory operations on property of the Cliff Mining Company from an article in a paper on May 15, 1926, and immediately sold his shares of stock through brokers. It does not appear that the defendants were in any way responsible for the publication of that article. The plaintiff did not know that the purchase was made for the defendants and they did not know that his stock was being bought for them. There was no communication between them touching the subject. The plaintiff would not have sold his stock if he had known of the geologist's theory. The finding is express that the defendants were not guilty of fraud, that they committed no breach of duty owed by them to the Cliff Mining Company, and that that company was not harmed by the nondisclosure of the geologist's theory, or by their purchases of its stock, or by shutting down the exploratory operations.

The contention of the plaintiff is that the purchase of his stock in the company by the defendants without disclosing to him as a stockholder their knowledge of the geologist's theory, their belief that the theory was true, had value, the keeping secret the existence of the theory, discontinuance by the defendants of exploratory operations begun in 1925 on property of the Cliff Mining Company and their plan ultimately to test the value of the theory, constitute actionable wrong for which he as stockholder can recover.

The trial judge ruled that conditions may exist which would make it the duty of an officer of a corporation purchasing its stock from a stockholder to inform him as to knowledge possessed by the buyer and not by the seller, but found, on all the circumstances developed by the trial and set out at some length by him in his decision, that there was no fiduciary relation requiring such disclosure by the defendants to the plaintiff before buying his stock in the manner in which they did.

The question presented is whether the decree dismissing the bill rightly was entered on the facts found.

The directors of a commercial corporation stand in a relation of trust to the corporation and are bound to exercise the strictest good faith in respect to its property and business. Elliott v. Baker, 194 Mass. 518, 523, 80 N.E. 450; Beaudette v. Graham, 267 Mass. 7, 165 N.E. 671; L. E. Fosgate Co. v. Boston Market Terminal Co., 275 Mass. 99, 107, 175 N.E. 86. The contention that directors also occupy the position of trustee toward individual stockholders in the corporation is plainly contrary to repeated decisions of this court and cannot be supported. In Smith v. Hurd, 12 Metc. 371, 384, 46 Am.Dec. 690, it was said by Chief Justice Shaw: "There is no legal privity, relation, or immediate connexion, between the holders of shares in a bank, in their individual capacity, on the one side, and the directors of the bank on the other. The directors are not the bailees, the factors, agents or trustees of such individual stockholders." In Stewart v. Joyce, 201 Mass. 301, 311, 312, 87 N.E. 613, and Lee v. Frisk, 222 Mass. 424, 426, 109 N.E. 835, the same principle was reiterated. In Blabon v. Hay, 269 Mass. 401, 407, 169 N.E. 268, 271, occurs this language with reference to sale of stock in a corporation by a stockholder to two of its directors: "The fact that the defendants were directors created no fiduciary relation between them and the plaintiff in the matter of the sale of his stock."

The principle thus established is supported by an imposing weight of authority in other jurisdictions. * * * A rule holding that directors are trustees for individual stockholders with respect to their stock prevails in comparatively few states; but in view of our own adjudications it is not necessary to review decisions to that effect. * * *

While the general principle is as stated, circumstances may exist requiring that transactions between a director and a stockholder as to stock in the corporation be set aside. The knowledge naturally in the possession of a director as to the condition of a corporation places upon him a peculiar obligation to observe every requirement of fair dealing when directly buying or selling its stock. Mere silence does not usually amount to a breach of duty, but parties may stand in such relation to each other that an equitable responsibility arises to communicate facts. Wellington v. Rugg, 243 Mass. 30, 35, 136 N.E. 831. Purchases and sales of stock dealt in on the stock exchange are commonly impersonal affairs. An honest director would be in a difficult situation if he could neither buy nor sell on the stock exchange shares of stock in his corporation without first seeking out the other actual ultimate party to the transaction and disclosing to him everything which a court or jury might later find that he then knew affecting the real or speculative value of such shares. Business of that nature is a matter to be governed by practical rules. Fiduciary obligations of directors ought not to be made so onerous that men of experience and ability will be deterred from accepting such office. Law in its sanctions is not coextensive with morality. It cannot undertake to put all parties to every contract on an equality as to knowledge, experience, skill and shrewdness. It cannot undertake to relieve against hard bargains made between competent parties without fraud. On the other hand, directors cannot rightly be allowed to indulge with impunity in practices which do violence to prevailing standards of upright business men. Therefore, where a director personally seeks a stockholder for the purpose of buying his shares without making disclosure of material facts within his peculiar knowledge and not within reach of the stockholder, the transaction will be closely scrutinized and relief may be granted in appropriate instances. [Citing cases.] The applicable legal principles "have almost always been the fundamental ethical rules of right and wrong." Robinson v. Mollett, L. R. 7 H. L. 802, 817.

The precise question to be decided in the case at bar is whether on the facts found the defendants as directors had a right to buy stock of the plaintiff, a stockholder. Every element of actual fraud or misdoing by the defendants is negatived by the findings. Fraud cannot be presumed; it must be proved. Brown v. Little, Brown & Co., Inc., 269 Mass. 102, 117, 168 N.E. 521, 66 A.L.R. 1284. The facts found afford no ground for inferring fraud or conspiracy. The only knowledge possessed by the defendants not open to the plaintiff was the existence of a theory formulated in a thesis by a geologist as to the possible existence of copper deposits where certain geological conditions existed common to the property of the Cliff Mining Company and that of other mining companies in its neighborhood. This thesis did not express an opinion that copper deposits would be found at any particular spot or on property of any specified owner. Whether that theory was sound or fallacious, no one knew, and so far as appears has never been demonstrated. The defendants made no representations to anybody about the theory. No facts found placed upon them any obligation to disclose the theory. A few days after the thesis expounding the theory was brought to the attention of the defendants, the annual report by the directors of the Cliff Mining Company for the calendar year 1925, signed by Agassiz for the directors, was issued. It did not cover the time when the theory was formulated. The report described the status of the operations under the exploration which had been begun in 1925. At the annual meeting of the stockholders of the company held early in April, 1926, no reference was made to the theory. It was then at most a hope, possibly an expectation. It had not passed the nebulous stage. No disclosure was made of it. The Cliff Mining Company was not harmed by the nondisclosure. There would have been no advantage to it, so far as appears, from a disclosure. The disclosure would have been detrimental to the interests of another mining corporation in which the defendants were directors. In the circumstances there was no duty on the part of the defendants to set forth to the stockholders at the annual meeting their faith, aspirations and plans for the future. Events as they developed might render advisable radical changes in such views. Disclosure of the theory, if it ultimately was proved to be erroneous or without foundation in fact, might involve the defendants in litigation with those who might act on the hypothesis that it was correct. The stock of the Cliff Mining Company was bought and sold on the stock exchange. The identity of buyers and seller of the stock in question in fact was not known to the parties and perhaps could not readily have been ascertained. The defendants caused the shares to be bought through brokers on the stock exchange. They said nothing to anybody as to the reasons actuating them. The plaintiff was no novice. He was a member of the Boston stock exchange and had kept a record of sale of Cliff Mining Company stock. He acted upon his own judgment in selling his stock. He made no inquiries of the defendants or of other officers of the company. The result is that the plaintiff cannot prevail.

Decree dismissing bill affirmed with costs.

4. MANAGEMENT RESPONSIBILITY TO CREDITORS

ALLEN et al. v. COCHRAN et al.

Supreme Court of Louisiana, 1926. 160 La. 425, 107 So. 292.

Action by F. C. Allen and others against S. H. Cochran and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

BRUNOT, J. The plaintiffs were depositors in the Plain Dealing Bank, a banking corporation, domiciled at Plain Dealing, La., and the defendants were the officers and directors of the bank.

The bank failed, and this suit is against its officers and directors for the losses sustained by the plaintiffs as a result of the failure.

The petition charges the defendants with negligence, inefficiency, and omissions of duty in their conduct of the business and affairs of the bank. It alleges that their negligence and omissions of duty enabled the cashier of the bank to embezzle and dissipate its funds, and to wreck the institution. It is upon these allegations that plaintiffs have based their suit. They do not allege fraud, conspiracy, malfeasance, or actionable deceit. The prayer of their petition is for a judgment jointly and in solido against the defendants and in favor of each plaintiff for the sums, respectively, each is alleged to have lost by reason of the bank's failure.

Defendants excepted to the suit upon the grounds that the petition did not disclose a right of action or cause of action. From a judgment sustaining the exceptions and rejecting the demands of plaintiffs they appealed.

There is no statute or law of this state authorizing the creditors of a corporation to bring a personal action against its officers or directors for the recovery of losses resulting from their negligent management of the affairs of the corporation. The officers and directors are merely the agents of the corporation, and, except for acts of malfeasance, they are answerable to it alone. The depositors in a bank are creditors of the bank, and there is no contractual relation between the officers and directors of a bank and its creditors. The corporation itself and, in proper cases, the stockholders have a right of action against the agents of the corporation for gross negligence, maladministration of the corporate affairs, and omissions of official duty, but a creditor of the corporation has no such right.

Plaintiffs cite 8 Mart. (N.S.) 68, and 3 La. 568, in support of their contention that, where depositors in a bank suffer loss by reason of the gross negligence of the officials of the bank, there is a cause of action in favor of such depositors directly against the negligent officials. The two cases cited are but one case, viz. Percy et al. v. Milladon et al. The plaintiffs in the case were stockholders of the Planters' Bank of Louisiana, and the defendants were its officers and other stockholders of the bank. The suit was for a liquidation of the affairs of the bank and a division of its funds. When the case was first brought up on appeal, it was remanded, and was finally decided on the second appeal. This case has no application to the contention here made by plaintiffs.

It is also contended that directors of a bank are quasi public officials, and delinquency in the performance of their ministerial duties gives rise to a civil action in favor of a person who is injured thereby. Plaintiffs cite State v. Hunsicker, 90 So. 765, 150 La. 475, and section 1, Act 193 of 1910. Plaintiffs concede that bank directors are not eo nomine public officials, but it is contended that, as section 1 of Act 193 of 1910 provides that only stockholders of a bank are eligible as directors, and that each director, before entering upon his duties as such, shall take an oath to administer the bank's affairs diligently and honestly, therefore bank directors become quasi public officials. It is true that they and their corporation serve the public, but they do so for private gain. They are not charged with any public function, and they perform no public duty. A public officer is an agent of the state or of one of its subdivisions.

"A public officer is an individual who has been appointed or elected in the manner prescribed by law, and who exercises the functions concerning the public assigned to him by law." Am. & Eng. Ency. (2d Ed.) 23, p. 322.

In the case of State v. Hunsicker, Mr. Hunsicker was state treasurer. His term of office had expired. The books of his office were not posted, and, after the state had expended a large sum of money to have them audited and properly posted, a suit followed for the reimbursement of that sum. This court sustained an exception of no cause of action for the expense incurred in auditing defendant's books, but overruled the exception as to the sum expended for posting the books. While this case may be authority for the proposition that a public official may be sued directly by one who suffers loss through his neglect of duty, it is not authority for the proposition that depositors in a bank may seek personal judgments against the directors of a bank for losses resulting from their negligent management of the bank's affairs.

As the directors are the agents of the bank, they are not responsible to third persons for mere negligence of duty or nonfeasance toward their principal. * * *

We also quote the following from 7 Corpus Juris, p. 565:

"The directors of a bank are liable only to the corporation whose agents they are for violation or negligence of duty; and in the absence of actionable deceit, they are not liable to a creditor of the corporation for loss suffered through the neglect of their official duties."

The judgment appealed from is correct, and it is therefore affirmed, at appellants' cost.

PEPPER v. LITTON.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1939. 308 U.S. 295, 60 S.Ct. 238.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

Proceeding in the matter of Dixie Splint Coal Company, bankrupt, wherein Scott Litton filed a claim which was opposed by Jean McNeil Pepper. A judgment of the District Court disallowing the claim was reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, 100 F.2d 830, and Jean McNeil Pepper brings certiorari.

Judgment of Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, and judgment of District Court affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, delivered the opinion of the Court. * * * The mere fact that an officer, director, or stockholder has a claim against his bankrupt corporation or that he has reduced that claim to judgment does not mean that the bankruptcy court must accord it pari passu treatment with the claims of other creditors. Its disallowance or subordination may be necessitated by certain cardinal principles of equity jurisprudence. A director is a fiduciary. Twin-Lick Oil Company v. Marbury, 91 U.S. 587, 588, 23 L.Ed. 328. So is a dominant or controlling stockholder or group of stockholders. Southern Pacific Company v. Bogert, 250 U.S. 483, 492, 39 S.Ct. 533, 537, 63 L.Ed. 1099. Their powers are powers in trust. See Jackson v. Ludeling, 21 Wall. 616, 624, 22 L.Ed. 492. Their dealings with the corporation are subjected to rigorous scrutiny and where any of their contracts or engagements with the corporation is challenged the burden is on the director or stockholder not only to prove the good faith of the transaction but also to show its inherent fairness from the viewpoint of the corporation and those interested therein. Geddes v. Anaconda Copper Mining Company, 254 U.S. 590, 599, 41 S.Ct. 209, 212, 65 L.Ed. 425. The essence of the test is whether or not under all the circumstances the transaction carries the earmarks of an arm's length bargain. If it does not, equity will set it aside. While normally that fiduciary obligation is enforceable directly by the corporation, or through a stockholder's derivative action, it is, in the event of bankruptcy of the corporation, enforceable by the trustee. For that standard of fiduciary obligation is designed for the protection of the entire community of interests in the corporation—creditors as well as stockholders.

As we have said, the bankruptcy court in passing on allowance of claims sits as a court of equity. Hence these rules governing the fiduciary responsibilities of directors and stockholders come into play on allowance of their claims in bankruptcy. In the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction the bankruptcy court has the power to sift the circumstances surrounding any claim to see that injustice or unfairness is not done in administration of the bankrupt estate. And its duty so to do is especially clear when the claim seeking allowance accrues to the benefit of an officer, director, or stockholder. That is clearly the power and duty of the bankruptcy courts under the reorganization sections. In Taylor v. Standard Gas & Electric Co., 306 U.S. 307, 59 S.Ct. 543, 83 L.Ed. 669, this Court held that the claim of Standard against its subsidiary (admittedly a claim due and owing) should be allowed to participate in the reorganization plan of the subsidiary only in subordination to the preferred stock of the subsidiary. This was based on the equities of the case—the history of spoliation, mismanagement, and faithless stewardship of the affairs of the subsidiary by Standard to the detriment of the public investors. Similar results have properly been reached in ordinary bankruptcy proceedings. Thus, salary claims of officers, directors, and stockholders in the bankruptcy of "one-man" or family corporations have been disallowed or subordinated where the courts have been satisfied that allowance of the claims would not be fair or equitable to other creditors. And that result may be reached even though the salary claim has been reduced to judgment. It is reached where the claim asserted is void or voidable because the vote of the interested director or stockholder helped bring it into being or where the history of the corporation shows dominancy and exploitation on the part of the claimant. It is also reached where on the facts the bankrupt has been used merely as a corporate pocket of the dominant stockholder, who, with disregard of the substance or form of corporate management, has treated its affairs as his own. And so-called loans or advances by the dominant or controlling stockholder will be subordinated to claims of other creditors and thus treated in effect as capital contributions by the stockholder not only in the foregoing types of situations but also where the paid-in capital is purely nominal, the capital necessary for the scope and magnitude of the operations of the company being furnished by the stockholder as a loan.

Though disallowance of such claims will be ordered where they are fictitious or a sham, these cases do not turn on the existence or non-existence of the debt. Rather they involve simply the question of order of payment. At times equity has ordered disallowance or subordination by disregarding the corporate entity. That is to say, it has treated the debtor-corporation simply as a part of the stockholder's own enterprise, consistently with the course of conduct of the stockholder. But in that situation as well as in the others to which we have referred, a sufficient consideration may be simply the violation of rules of fair play and good conscience by the claimant; a breach of the fiduciary standards of conduct which he owes the corporation, its stockholders and creditors. He who is in such a fiduciary position cannot serve himself first and his cestuis second. He cannot manipulate the affairs of his corporation to their detriment and in disregard of the standards of common decency and honesty. He cannot by the intervention of a corporate entity violate the ancient precept against serving two masters. He cannot by the use of the corporate device avail himself of privileges normally permitted outsiders in a race of creditors. He cannot utilize his inside information and his strategic position for his own preferment. He cannot violate rules of fair play by doing indirectly through the corporation what he could not do directly. He cannot use his power for his personal advantage and to the detriment of the stockholders and creditors no matter how absolute in terms that power may be and no matter how meticulous he is to satisfy technical requirements. For that power is at all times subject to the equitable limitation that it may not be exercised for the aggrandisement, preference, or advantage of the fiduciary to the exclusion or detriment of the cestuis. Where there is a violation of those principles, equity will undo the wrong or intervene to prevent its consummation.

On such a test the action of the District Court in disallowing or subordinating Litton's claim was clearly correct. Litton allowed his salary claims to lie dormant for years and sought to enforce them only when his debtor corporation was in financial difficulty. Then he used them so that the rights of another creditor were impaired. Litton as an insider utilized his strategic position for his own preferment to the damage of Pepper. Litton as the dominant influence over Dixie Splint Coal Company used his power not to deal fairly with the creditors of that company but to manipulate its affairs in such a manner that when one of its creditors came to collect her just debt the bulk of the assets had disappeared into another Litton company. Litton, though a fiduciary, was enabled by astute legal manœuvering to acquire most of the assets of the bankrupt not for cash or other consideration of value to creditors but for bookkeeping entries representing at best merely Litton's appraisal of the worth of Litton's services over the years.

This alone would be a sufficient basis for the exercise by the District Court of its equitable powers in disallowing the Litton claim. But when there is added the existence of a "planned and fraudulent scheme", as found by the District Court, the necessity of equitable relief against that fraud becomes insistent. No matter how technically legal each step in that scheme may have been, once its basic nature was uncovered it was the duty of the bankruptcy court in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction to undo it. Otherwise, the fiduciary duties of dominant or management stockholders would go for naught; exploitation would become a substitute for justice; and equity would be perverted as an instrument for approving what it was designed to thwart.

The fact that Litton perfected his lien more than four months preceding bankruptcy is no obstacle to equitable relief. In the first place, that lien was but a step in a general fraudulent plan which must be viewed in its entirety. The subsequent sale cannot be taken as an isolated step unconnected with the long antecedent events, all designed to defeat creditors. Buffum, Trustee in Bankruptcy v. Peter Barceloux Co., 289 U.S. 227, 232, 233, 53 S.Ct. 539, 541, 77 L.Ed. 1140. In the second place, Litton is seeking approval by the bankruptcy court of his claim. The four months' provision of the bankruptcy act, is certainly not a statutory limitation on equitable defenses arising out of a breach of fiduciary duties by him who seeks allowance of a claim.

In view of these considerations we do not have occasion to determine the legitimacy of the "one-man" corporation as a bulwark against the claims of creditors.

Accordingly the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals is reversed and that of the District Court is affirmed.

Reversed.

5. NON-TITULAR MANAGEMENT: "THE DOMINANT STOCKHOLDER"

CENTRAL TRUST CO. OF NEW YORK v. BRIDGES.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1893. 57 F. 753, 766.

TAFT, CIRCUIT JUDGE: * * * We are clearly of the opinion, therefore, that the contract of August, 1887, whenever executed, correctly represents Eager's actual relation to the company in constructing its road. The contract was one out of which Eager hoped to make profit for himself. It is said that it is one of those contracts frequently condemned by the supreme court. This is true; but the vice of such contracts is not that they do not represent the real relation between the parties, but that they are contracts made by a corporation with one who exercises such an undue influence over the directors, by reason of his relation to them as principal stockholder or otherwise, that it is inequitable and unconscionable for him by such influence to secure individual profit to himself at the expense of the corporation and its other stockholders and bond holders. On this ground, the other stockholders or the bond holders or the corporation itself may call upon a court of equity to set aside the contract against the other party, but no third person can deny its legal existence so long as those who are parties to it do not object to it. It is manifestly absurd to say that the petitioners who supposed they were dealing with Eager as an individual were injured by a contract made by him with the company for his personal benefit and profit, on the ground that he unduly used his influence with the directors of the company to secure this advantage to himself. As they were not injured by it, they cannot complain of it. * * *

FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST CO. v. NEW YORK & N. RY. CO.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1896.
150 N.Y. 410, 44 N.E. 1043, 34 L.R.A. 76, 55 Am.St.Rep. 689.

MARTIN, J. That the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company purchased a majority of the second mortgage bonds and a majority of the stock of the New York & Northern Railway Company, for the sole purpose of obtaining control of the property of the latter, is clearly established by the proof contained in the record. Indeed, such was the avowed purpose of its purchase. The record renders it equally clear that the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company was the actual and beneficial owner of such bonds and stock for several months before the commencement of this action.

They were retained in the hands of Drexel, Morgan & Co., not as owners or holders in their own right, but as agents or naked trustees for the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad, and were clearly subject to the order and control of the latter. Moreover, the request that Drexel, Morgan & Co. made to the plaintiff to commence this action was not only based upon the bonds owned by the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company and others it had contracted to purchase, but the sole purpose of that request was to procure a foreclosure, and thus enable the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company to acquire control of the property and franchises of the New York & Northern Railway Company for its own benefit, as set forth in the circular letter sent to the stockholders of the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company. The president of the latter company himself testified that that was the object and purpose which induced the sending of the notice requesting the commencement of this action. The notice given by the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company to its stockholders states the fact that on March 18, 1893, agreements had already been made in respect to the purchase of a controlling interest in the New York & Northern Railway Company, subject to the approval therein asked for. The letter of Drexel, Morgan & Co. to the treasurer of the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company, dated April 5, 1893, shows that the majority of the stock and bonds mentioned therein was held by them, subject to the order of the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company, and that they had received the note of that company in payment therefor. Thus, it is obvious that this action was procured to be commenced by the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company, while it owned a majority of the stock and bonds of the New York & Northern Railway Company, for the sole and avowed purpose of obtaining control of its property and business, regardless of the rights of the minority stockholders or the owners of the remainder of the bonds. The appellants contend that the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company, as such majority stockholder, also acquired the entire control of the affairs of the New York & Northern Railway Company through its board of directors, who were willing to serve the interests of those owning a majority of the stock, as was indicated by the resignation of three of the directors, the appointment of others in their places, by the resignation of two officers who occupied important positions in the affairs of that company, and by the appointment of two officers in their places who were in the employ of the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company, to discharge the duties of such officers, and compensated for their services by the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company. While the proof upon that question was not perhaps conclusive, yet the circumstances developed by the evidence plainly indicate that, after it became the owner of a majority of the stock and bonds, the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company dictated and governed the action of the board of directors, and controlled the management of the affairs, of the New York & Northern Railway Company.

The facts already referred to are strong proof that the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company was in the control of the affairs of the New York & Northern Railway Company. It is hardly to be supposed that a board of directors which was not under the control of another corporation would appoint three of the friends of the president of that corporation as directors of the company, and place the officers of that company in control of its financial affairs, especially when it was the owner of competing lines of railroad. The clear and legitimate inference to be drawn from the circumstances proved in this case is that, after the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company purchased a majority of the stock and bonds of the New York & Northern Railway Company, it controlled its officers and directors as fully and completely as though they had been elected by its votes. All the facts and circumstances, so far as the defendants were permitted to prove them, tend to show that such was the situation. Indeed, it is a matter of common knowledge that, where the ownership of a majority of the stock of such corporation changes, the board usually changes, unless its members are already in harmony with the policy of the purchasers.

On the trial, the appellants sought to prove that after the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company became the owner of such stock and bonds, and while its officers were in substantial control of the New York & Northern Railway Company, they declined to accept traffic from other roads that would have produced a fund with which to pay the interest due on the bonds in question; that the income of the road which should have been employed to pay such interest was used for other and improper purposes; and that such action caused the inability of the New York & Northern Railway Company to pay the interest, and thus cure its default. This evidence was rejected as immaterial, and the appellants duly excepted.

In determining the correctness of the rulings made by the trial court, it becomes necessary to determine incidentally whether a corporation, purchasing a majority of the stock of another competing corporation, may thus obtain control of its affairs, cause it to divert the income from its business, or to refuse business which would enable it to pay the interest for which it was in default, and then institute an action in equity to enforce its obligations, for the purpose of obtaining control of its property at less than its value, to the injury of the minority stockholders, and they have no remedy; or, in other words, whether a court of equity, with those facts established, would lend its aid to such a stockholder, by enforcing the mortgage and decreeing a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises, at its request, in its behalf, and to accomplish such a purpose. If it would, then the rulings of the trial court were proper; if not, then the appellants were entitled to prove those facts, and it was error to reject the evidence.

In Gamble v. Water Co., 123 N.Y. 91, 25 N.E. 201, in discussing a similar question, Judge Peckham, in effect, said that, although it is not every question of mere administration or of policy upon which there might be a difference of opinion that would justify the minority in coming into a court of equity to obtain relief, yet, where the action of a majority of the stockholders of a corporation is fraudulent or oppressive to the minority shareholders, an action may be maintained by the latter, where the contemplated action of the majority is so far opposed to the interests of the corporation as to lead to a clear inference that such action is with an intent to serve some outside purpose, regardless of the consequences to the company and inconsistent with its interests.

In Pondir v. Railroad Co., 72 Hun, 385, 389, 25 N.Y.S. 560, where the Erie Railroad Company, through the action of the Buffalo, Bradford & Pittsburgh Railroad Company, whose directors were elected and controlled by the Erie Company, without consideration, obtained the property of the latter corporation, and so arranged its affairs as to render all the shares of its stock, other than those held by the Erie Company, valueless, it was held that a stockholder of the Buffalo, Bradford & Pittsburgh Railroad Company might maintain an action to redress the wrong done to his company. In that case Mr. Justice Follett said: "This was a fraud on the Buffalo, Bradford & Pittsburgh Railroad Company and its shareholders. Such frauds are not uncommon in the management of corporations, and, when they are exposed, should be condemned by the courts, and a heavy hand laid upon all who participate in them."

In Barr v. Railroad Co., 96 N.Y. 444, where the officers of another corporation had leased the property of the first corporation, controlled a majority of its stock, and conspired to compel the minority to sell its stock by refusing to pay the rent due, it was held that a court of equity, on the application of the minority, would compel the payment of the rent; and that, where the majority of the stockholders of a corporation are illegally pursuing a course which is in violation of the rights of the other stockholders, an action to obtain equitable relief may be maintained by an aggrieved stockholder.

Sage v. Culver, 147 N.Y. 241, 41 N.E. 513, is to the effect that, when it can be fairly gathered that the officers and directors of a corporation have made use of relations of trust and confidence to secure or promote some selfish interest, it is enough to set a court of equity in motion, and to require them to explain such a transaction which there is a presumption against in equity.

In Meyer v. Railway Co., 7 N.Y.St.Rep. 245, it was held, that a majority of the stockholders of a corporation would not be permitted to sanction a transaction which is the outcome of a scheme, dishonest or fraudulent in its inception, and that the minority stockholders have rights which under such circumstances must be recognized; that the majority may legally control the company's business, but, in assuming such control, they take upon themselves the correlative duty of diligence and good faith; and that they cannot manipulate the company's business in their own interests, to the injury of the minority stockholders.

In Ervin v. Navigation Co., 27 F. 630, it was held that when a number of stockholders combine to constitute themselves a majority, to control the corporation as they see fit, they become, for all practical purposes, the corporation itself, and assume the trust relation of the corporation towards its stockholders; and if they seek to make profit out of it, at the expense of those whose rights are the same as their own, they are unfaithful to the relation they have assumed, and guilty, at least, of constructive fraud, which a court of equity will remedy.

While the question in some of the cases cited arose between stockholders and the directors and officers of a company who, as such, held a position of trust as to the former, still where, as in this case, a majority of the stock is owned by a corporation or a combination of individuals, and it assumes the control of another company's business and affairs through its control of the officers and directors of the corporation, it would seem that for all practical purposes, it becomes the corporation of which it holds a majority of stock, and assumes the same trust relation towards the minority stockholders that a corporation itself usually bears to its stockholders, and therefore, under such circumstances, the rule stated in the Sage Case and other similar cases applies to majority stockholders who control the affairs of the company, as well as to its directors or officers.

It is a controlling maxim that a court of equity will not aid parties in the perpetration or consummation of a fraud, nor give any assistance whereby either of the parties connected with the betrayal of a trust can derive any advantage therefrom. Farley v. Railway Co., 4 McCrary, 138, 14 Fed. 114. "It is a sound principle that he who prevents a thing being done shall not avail himself of the nonperformance he has occasioned." Fleming v. Gilbert, 3 Johns. 528, 531; U.S. v. Peck, 102 U.S. 64; Dolan v. Rodgers, 149 N.Y. 491, 44 N.E. 167.

The principle of these authorities renders it quite obvious that a corporation, purchasing a majority of the stock of another competing one, cannot obtain control of its affairs, divert the income of its business, refuse business which would enable the defaulting company to pay its interest, and then institute an action in equity to enforce its obligations, for the avowed purpose of obtaining entire control of its property, to the injury of the minority stockholders. Such a course of action is clearly opposed to the true interests of the corporation itself, and plainly discloses that one thus acting was not influenced by any honest desire to secure such interests, but that its action was to serve an outside purpose, regardless of consequences to the debtor company, and in a manner inconsistent with its interest and the interest of its minority stockholders.

The respondents, however, contend that the doctrine of the authorities cited is not controlling in this case, but that the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company had a right to purchase a majority of the stock and bonds of the New York & Northern Railway Company, for the express purpose of obtaining control of the affairs of the latter for its own use and benefit, and to thus acquire its property at less than its actual value, to the injury of the minority stockholders; and that such stockholders had no remedy, in law or in equity, to protect themselves against such action of the majority stockholders, although it diverted the income which should have been applied to the payment of such interest to other and improper purposes, and refused business which would have enabled the defaulting company to pay its interest. In other words, the claim of the respondents is, and the General Term in effect held, that the purpose for which the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company obtained a majority of the stock and bonds of the New York & Northern Railway Company is entirely immaterial, and that, notwithstanding the existence of such a purpose, a court of equity will aid them in enforcing the mortgage. * * *

That any person or corporation authorized to do so might have purchased the bonds of the New York & Northern Railway Company, and have rigorously enforced them by a sale of its property, there can be no doubt. They might also have purchased the stock of the company, and thus have become the owners of both, and, while such owners, might have enforced the liability of the company upon its bonds, so long as they acted in good faith and their purpose was proper. But when the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company purchased the stock and bonds in question, thus obtaining a controlling interest in the affairs of the New York & Northern Railway Company, for the avowed purpose of destroying it, to serve a purpose entirely outside of that for which it was organized, and in hostility to it, it becomes clear that, as such stockholder, it owed a duty to the minority stockholders, that the law implied a quasi trust upon its part, and that a court of equity will not aid it in the destruction of that corporation, and a confiscation of its property, although it held a majority of its stock and the required amount of its bonds.

Hence we are of the opinion that the court erred in rejecting, as immaterial, evidence offered by the appellants to show that after the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company became the owner of a majority of the stock and bonds of the New York & Northern Railway Company, and while its officers were in control of the latter corporation and its affairs, it declined to accept traffic from other roads, which would have produced a fund with which to pay the interest that was due; that the income of the road, which should have been employed to pay such interest, was used for other and improper purposes; and that such action upon the part of the majority stockholder occasioned the inability of the company to pay the interest and cure the default. To the rejection of this evidence the defendants excepted. We think many of these rulings were erroneous, and that the appellants had the right to make the proof offered, so far as it related to the transaction of the business of the New York & Northern Railway Company during the time the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company owned a majority of its stock, and controlled its affairs; and for the error in those rulings the judgment should be reversed. * * *

JONES v. MISSOURI EDISON ELECTRIC COMPANY et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Eighth Circuit, 1906. 144 F. 765, 771.

A majority of the holders of stock owe to the minority the duty to exercise good faith, care, and diligence to make the property of the corporation in their charge produce the largest possible amount, to protect the interests of the holders of the minority of the stock and to secure and deliver to them their just proportion of the income and of the proceeds of the property. Any sale of the corporate property to themselves, any disposition by them of the corporation or of its property to deprive the minority holders of their just share of it or to get gain for themselves at the expense of the holders of the minority of the stock, becomes a breach of duty and of trust which invokes plenary relief from a court of chancery.

LEBOLD et al. v. INLAND STEEL COMPANY.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Seventh Circuit, 1941. 125 F.2d 369.

Action by Foreman M. Lebold and another, minority stockholders of the Inland Steamship Company, aginst the Inland Steel Company, to recover damages for fraud in dissolving the steamship company, buying its assets, and appropriating its business. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

LINDLEY, DISTRICT JUDGE. Plaintiffs, minority stockholders of the Inland Steamship Company, brought suit in the District Court to recover damages claimed to have been incurred by them by reason of alleged fraudulent acts of defendant Inland Steel Company in dissolving the Steamship Company, buying its assets and appropriating its business. The theory of plaintiffs was that defendant, owning some 80 per cent of the stock of the Steamship Company, had so utilized its dominant position as majority stockholder as to force the latter company out of a prosperous going business, to bring about its dissolution and to take over its property and its business to the detriment of plaintiffs. The court dismissed the complaint and this appeal followed.

The events preceding the dissolution and sale were before us in Lebold v. Inland Steamship Co., 7 Cir., 82 F.2d 351. There a bill to enjoin dissolution had been dismissed by the District Court. Upon appeal we held the complaint premature and affirmed the dismissal, without prejudice however, to the right of plaintiffs to apply for relief if developments thereafter, coupled with what had already happened, should justify such action. Neither the facts there involved nor the law there announced need repetition.

In addition to the facts presented in that record, we have here evidence of events subsequent to that decision. Throughout the duration of the litigation involved in the prior decision, the business of the Steamship Company continued without interruption or change. The operations for the year 1935, which were not in the prior record, were successful, as had been those of all earlier years, and on December 19, 1935 the directors authorized an annual dividend of $150 per share. The decision was announced on March 18, 1936. Eight days thereafter, notice of a special meeting of stockholders was given, to be held April 2, 1936, for the purpose of dissolution. Mr. P. D. Block, president of the Steamship Company and of the Steel Company presided. Others present were L. E. Block, a director of both corporations, Randall, vice president, director and manager of the transportation business of the Steamship Company and also vice president and director of the Steel Company, E. L. Ryerson, Jr., director of both companies, Morris, employee of the Steel Company and secretary of the Steamship Company, Truesdale of the Steel Company and Mullen and plaintiffs, minority stockholders, and counsel for the Inland Steel Company. Over the negative vote of the minority stockholders, a resolution was adopted directing dissolution of the Steamship Company. Block stated that the reason for such action had been submitted before and that he saw no good reason for "rehashing" it. One of plaintiffs asked Randall whether the Steamship Company had been given opportunity to bid for the Steel Company freight traffic or whether, as a director of the Steamship Company, he had made an effort to get the traffic on a competitive basis with other bids received. Randall replied that he had been instructed by President Block that "under no circumstances" did he, Block, wish to transact any business with the Steamship Company. Plaintiffs requested that the minutes reflect the fact that the Steamship Company had been given no opportunity to bid on carrying freight for the Steel Company. Block observed that the meeting was a Steamship Company meeting and not one of the Steel Company and that "they were not obligated to give any information concerning" the latter. Randall went so far as to say that but for his courtesy, he would not have replied to the question. At the trial Randall testified that he had made no effort to secure traffic for the Steamship Company from any sources other than from the Steel Company because that company had kept the Steamship Company's boats busy during 1934 and 1935. He said further that when he became "certain of dissolution," he made no effort to get traffic for the Steamship Company on the theory that it might be able to continue in business. Later a directors' meeting was held on April 14, 1936, attended by the Blocks, Randall and Foreman Lebold. The latter did not vote. The directors authorized a sale of all assets on May 1. At that time the Steel Company bid in the three boats owned by the Steamship Company at $1,120,000, apparently their fair value. There were no other bidders. Defendant immediately took over the boats. It continued the transportation business formerly conducted by the Steamship Company and has carried it on without interruption or change, continuously, ever since.

The master found that plaintiffs were entitled only to their pro rata share of the proceeds of sale of the boats. The court agreed and dismissal followed. Plaintiffs insist that the District Court failed to apprehend the purport of and give effect to this court's decision and to draw from the facts in the record proper legal conclusions.

At the outset, giving consideration to the facts involved in the former proceeding and those presented for the first time, it is well to keep in mind that at all of the stockholders' meetings and directors' meetings involved, the majority stockholder, defendant, was in control. Defendant, owning 80 per cent of the stock, had the power to determine and did determine the actions of the Steamship Company. It is perfectly apparent, indeed, the officers of defendant themselves indicate that their interest was to force dissolution so that they might get rid of the minority interest and take over the assets and business of the Steamship Company. It is only with this elementary indisputable premise in mind that the proper answer to the controversy can be reached.

The directors of a corporation represent it and its stockholders; the majority stockholders of a corporation represent it and its minority stockholders. The vote of every director and of every majority stockholder must be directed to and controlled by the guiding question of what is best for the corporation, for which he is, to all legal intents and purposes, trustee. In his voting, in his management, he is bound to be wholeheartedly, earnestly and honestly faithful to his corporation and its best interests; his own selfish interests must be ignored. If when he votes he does so against the interest of his company, against the interest of his minority and in favor of his own interest, by such selfish action, by omission of fidelity to his own duty as a trustee, he forfeits approval in a court of equity. When the Blocks and Randall voted in the Steamship Company meeting they were within their statutory right to force a dissolution, but no legislative enactment could endow them with the right as trustees for the minority stockholders to take over for their own, through any legal device, plan or method all assets and all business of the company for which they were fiduciaries, if to do so was clearly and obviously against the best interests of the company and the minority stockholders. Obviously and admittedly these gentlemen were not thinking of the Steamship Company's interest; they were wholly ignoring it. Their sole interest lay in the Steel Company and, in the words of Randall, it "griped them to see that the minority stockholders were enjoying any profit." Therefore, we must accept the obvious fact, namely, that defendant and its officials, failing to perform their duties as stockholders and directors of the Steamship Company, were faithless to that company and to the minority stockholders. The latter were powerless to help themselves; they rightfully complain of the breach of trust upon the part of defendant resulting in damage.

In Pepper v. Litton, 308 U.S. 295 at page 306, 60 S.Ct. 238, 245, 84 L.Ed. 281, Mr. Justice Douglas, discussing the responsibility of directors and of dominant or controlling stockholders, said: "A director is a fiduciary. Twin-Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U.S. 587, 588, 23 L.Ed. 328. So is a dominant or controlling stockholder or group of stockholders. Southern Pacific Co. v. Bogert, 250 U.S. 483, 492, 39 S.Ct. 533, 537, 63 L.Ed. 1099. Their powers are powers in trust. See Jackson v. Ludeling, 21 Wall. 616, 624, 22 L.Ed. 492. Their dealings with the corporation are subjected to rigorous scrutiny and where any of their contracts or engagements with the corporation is challenged the burden is on the director or stockholder not only to prove the good faith of the transaction but also to show its inherent fairness from the viewpoint of the corporation and those interested therein. Geddes v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., 254 U.S. 590, 599, 41 S.Ct. 209, 212, 65 L.Ed. 425. The essence of the test is whether or not under all the circumstances the transaction carries the earmarks of an arm's length bargain. * * * He who is in such a fiduciary position cannot serve himself first and his cestuis second. He cannot manipulate the affairs of his corporation to their detriment and in disregard of the standards of common decency and honesty. He cannot by the intervention of a corporate entity violate the ancient precept against serving two masters. * * * He cannot utilize his inside information and his strategic position for his own preferment. He cannot violate rules of fair play by doing indirectly through the corporation what he could not do directly. He cannot use his power for his personal advantage and to the detriment of the stockholders and creditors no matter how absolute in terms that power may be and no matter how meticulous he is to satisfy technical requirements. For that power is at all times subject to the equitable limitation that it may not be exercised for the aggrandisement, preference, or advantage of the fiduciary to the exclusion or detriment of the cestuis." Here the strategic position of defendant was used solely for its own preferment; the affairs of the corporation were "manipulated" to plaintiffs' detriment. Here defendant did "indirectly through the corporation what it could not do directly."

Defendant says it has not appropriated the business of the Steamship Company. The statutes of West Virginia, Sec. 80, Chap. 31, Art. 1, W.Va. Code of 1931, which control the dissolution proceedings, authorize the majority to dissolve and "discontinue the business of the corporation." Here the business was not discontinued; defendant took over the boats, it continued to operate them, it continued to devote them to the same transportation that they had always carried on. The business which had been prosperous for twenty-five years was turned over to defendant. By its strategic position, by its dominant situation, it could and did force a sale, bid in the property itself and thereafter continue to operate the business as before. The Steamship Company had been organized many years before to transport freight for hire; it had transported only the freight of defendant; this it continues to do, the only difference being that now the latter realizes all the profit which results from such transportation and the minority stockholders get none of it.

This transportation business was in no wise the business of the Steel Company. It was the business carried on by the Steamship Company, a business which the defendant expressly said it was going to put out of existence. In its strategic position of dominance, even though it was trustee for the minority stockholders, defendant warned plaintiffs that if they did not sell their stock, the Steel Company would end all business relations with the Steamship Company and that they must either sell their stock or see the Steamship Company go out of business. That these threats were not idle, that they were made with the ulterior motive, to bring duress to bear and to force plaintiffs, is now obvious. The business was never interrupted, never curtailed, never modified but continued without interruption.

What defendant might have accomplished under color of the West Virginia statute was discontinuance of the business. What it did, was to take, through form of a sale, the physical assets and the entire business of the Steamship Company. Whether we stamp the happenings as dissolution or with some other name, equity looks to the essential character and result to determine whether there has been faithlessness and fraud upon the part of the fiduciary. However proper a plan may be legally, a majority stockholder can not, under its color, appropriate a business belonging to a corporation to the detriment of the minority stockholder. The so called dissolution was a mere device by means of which defendant appropriated for itself the transportation business of the Steamship Company to the detriment of plaintiffs. That the source of this power is found in a statute, supplies no reason for clothing it with a superior sanctity, or vesting it with the attributes of tyranny. Allied Chemical & Dye Corp. v. Steel & Tube Co. of America, 14 Del. 1, 120 A. 486. The books are full of instances of disapproval of such action. If it be an absorption by the dominant member of all the returns of the corporate investment, or a sale of the property to oneself for an inadequate consideration, or deprivation by a syndicate formed to freeze out a minority stockholder through sale and dissolution or if the buyer and seller are the same, the right of a stockholder to vote becomes a power in trust when he owns the majority and assumes and exercises domination and control over corporate affairs. Such majority stockholders' vote "must not be so antagonistic to the corporation as a whole as to indicate that their interests are wholly outside of the interest of the corporation and destructive of the interests of the minority shareholders." * * *

Furthermore it seems to us that defendant may not be permitted to say that there were no values other than those of physical assets. By taking over the assets and by continuing the prosperous business of its former cestui que trust defendant has removed itself from the place where it is permissible for it to contend that there is no prosperous business. That there was value over and above physical assets is perfectly obvious from the fact that a prosperous business existed and is still being conducted; that plaintiffs, if they had not been deprived to their interest, would be still sharing in the returns from that business and that at the present time all the profits of such are being enjoyed by defendant to the total exclusion of plaintiffs.

It follows that the true rule for determination of the value of plaintiffs' interest must be based upon the value not of the physical assets alone but upon all the elements mentioned in our former opinion and in arriving at such value, all those elements, including value as a going concern, must be taken into consideration. In twenty-five years the business of the Steamship Company has never ceased to be a going concern. It has been extremely prosperous. It continues to be so without threat of interruption. In this going concern plaintiffs had an interest. * * * The master found that defendant had not appropriated anything belonging to plaintiffs as minority stockholders and that the value of such minority interests did not exceed their pro rata shares of the proceeds of sale of the ships. The court approved this finding.

* * * It appears from both plaintiffs' and defendant's testimony that if the Steamship Company had been considered a going concern and if its business might reasonably be expected to continue, the value of plaintiffs' stock would be in the neighborhood of $2000 per share.

That the master was misled in his reasoning is apparent from some of his findings. He said "the permitted participation in handsome returns for twenty-five years seems to me a very reasonable limitation for the duration of any such obligation." Obviously this is fallacious. It is not a question of how much profit plaintiffs and defendant have previously enjoyed from ownership of stock in the Steamship Company, but a question of what the existence of the transportation business of that company, which defendant has wrongfully taken, is now fairly worth. Henry Ford could not rightfully say to one of the stockholders who invested in the Ford automobile company in its beginning and whose investment had multiplied thousands of times in value, that in view of the handsome returns he had had upon the investment, he must deliver the stock to Mr. Ford upon receipt of his pro rata share of the value of the physical assets of the Ford Company or Mr. Ford would dissolve the company and bid in the assets and deprive him of any such returns.

After the sale of the physical assets, the proceeds were divided amongst the stockholders of the Steamship Company, each receiving his proportionate share. These were treated as liquidating dividends and as such plaintiffs receipted for them. Defendant now contends that by acceptance of the distributive share of the proceeds of sale of the boats, plaintiffs are estopped to prosecute the present suit.

No estoppel arises upon these facts. Plaintiffs are suing, not to rescind the sale, but to recover a money judgment, alleged to be due them because of their damage incurred by the fraud of defendant. This demand is for something over and above and in addition to plaintiffs' proportionate share of the proceeds of liquidation of physical assets. Estoppel arises only when one has so acted as to mislead another and the one thus misled has relied upon the action of the inducing party to his prejudice. * * *

Plaintiffs did not remain silent. They brought their suit prematurely and this court affirmed its dismissal because of such prematurity, expressly stating, however, that the dismissal should be without prejudice to plaintiffs to complain if future developments should justify their fears. Defendant had the right under the statute of the state in which the Steamship Company was incorporated to work a dissolution. Following that it was bound to distribute the proceeds realized pro rata amongst the stockholders, but the receipt of such share in no wise affected the complaint of plaintiffs not that the sale should be rescinded but that in prosecuting the legal procedure of dissolution defendant had over-reached plaintiffs and damaged them. Their demand for damages was not involved at all in their receipt of the pro rata shares of the proceeds of sale of the Steamship Company's boats. Plaintiffs did not acquiesce in or consent to perpetration of a fraud against them. Defendant has not been misled; it has not relied, to its injury or prejudice, upon any acquiescence or inducement on the part of plaintiffs.

Upon the record defendant is liable to plaintiffs. The damages to be allowed are the difference between what plaintiffs have received from the sale of the physical assets and what the stock was really worth as stock in a going prosperous concern continuing in business. Upon that rule the trial court will fix plaintiffs' damages.

The judgment is reversed for action by the District Court consistent with this opinion.

DIRECTORS, OFFICERS, AND PRINCIPAL STOCKHOLDERS

Sec. 16. (a) Every person who is directly or indirectly the beneficial owner of more than 10 per centum of any class of any equity security (other than an exempted security) which is registered on a national securities exchange, or who is a director or an officer of the issuer of such security, shall file, at the time of the registration of such security or within ten days after he becomes such beneficial owner, director, or officer, a statement with the exchange (and a duplicate original thereof with the Commission) of the amount of all equity securities of such issuer of which he is the beneficial owner, and within ten days after the close of each calendar month thereafter, if there has been any change in such ownership during such month, shall file with the exchange a statement (and a duplicate original thereof with the Commission) indicating his ownership at the close of the calendar month and such changes in his ownership as have occurred during such calendar month.

(b) For the purpose of preventing the unfair use of information which may have been obtained by such beneficial owner, director, or officer by reason of his relationship to the issuer, any profit realized by him from any purchase and sale, or any sale and purchase, of any equity security of such issuer (other than an exempted security) within any period of less than six months, unless such security was acquired in good faith in connection with a debt previously contracted, shall inure to and be recoverable by the issuer, irrespective of any intention on the part of such beneficial owner, director, or officer in entering into such transaction of holding the security purchased or of not repurchasing the security sold for a period exceeding six months. Suit to recover such profit may be instituted at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction by the issuer, or by the owner of any security of the issuer in the name and in behalf of the issuer if the issuer shall fail or refuse to bring such suit within sixty days after request or shall fail diligently to prosecute the same thereafter; but no such suit shall be brought more than two years after the date such profit was realized. This subsection shall not be construed to cover any transaction where such beneficial owner was not such both at the time of the purchase and sale, or the sale and purchase, of the security involved, or any transaction or transactions which the Commission by rules and regulations may exempt as not comprehended within the purpose of this subsection.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any such beneficial owner, director, or officer, directly or indirectly, to sell any equity security of such issuer (other than an exempted security), if the person selling the security or his principal (1) does not own the security sold, or (2) if owning the security, does not deliver it against such sale within twenty days thereafter, or does not within five days after such sale deposit it in the mails or other usual channels of transportation; but no person shall be deemed to have violated this subsection if he proves that notwithstanding the exercise of good faith he was unable to make such delivery or deposit within such time, or that to do so would cause undue inconvenience or expense.

(d) The provisions of this section shall not apply to foreign or domestic arbitrage transactions unless made in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may adopt in order to carry out the purposes of this section.

6. ARE THERE WIDER RESPONSIBILITIES

NOTE

(A) The view that those who manage our business corporations should concern themselves with the interests of employees, consumers, and the general public, as well as of the stockholders, is thus advanced today by persons whose position in the business world is such as to give them great power of influencing both business opinion and public opinion generally. Little or no attempt seems to have been made, however, to consider how far such an attitude on the part of corporate managers is compatible with the legal duties which they owe the stockholder-owners as the elected representatives of the latter.

No doubt it is to a large extent true that an attempt by business managers to take into consideration the welfare of employees and consumers (and under modern industrial conditions the two classes are largely the same) will in the long run increase the profits of stockholders. As Dean Donham and others have demonstrated, it is the lack of a feeling of security on the part of those who are dependent on employment for their livelihood which is largely responsible for the present under-consumption which has so disastrous an effect upon business profits. If the social responsibility of business means merely a more enlightened view as to the ultimate advantage of the stockholder-owners, then obviously corporate managers may accept such social responsibility without any departure from the traditional view that their function is to seek to obtain the maximum amount of profits for their stockholders.

And yet one need not be unduly credulous to feel that there is more to this talk of social responsibility on the part of corporation managers than merely a more intelligent appreciation of what tends to the ultimate benefit of their stockholders. Modern large-scale industry has given to the managers of our principal corporations enormous power over the welfare of wage earners and consumers, particularly the former. Power over the lives of others tends to create on the part of those most worthy to exercise it a sense of responsibility. The managers, who along with the subordinate employees are part of the group which is contributing to the success of the enterprise by day-to-day efforts, may easily come to feel as strong a community of interest with their fellow workers as with a group of investors whose only connection with the enterprise is that they or their predecessors in title invested money in it, perhaps in the rather remote past.[34]

[34] Some of our most successful industrial corporations have for years obtained all the additional capital which they needed out of surplus profits without any further issue of securities. See, e. g., The General Electric Co., Moody's Manual of In-

Moreover, the concept that the managers are merely, in Mr. Young's phrase, "attorneys for the investors" leads to the conclusion that if other classes who are affected by the corporation's activities need protection, that protection must be entrusted to other hands than those of the managers. Desire to retain their present powers accordingly encourages the latter to adopt and disseminate the view that they are guardians of all the interests which the corporation affects and not merely servants of its absentee owners.

Any clash between this point of view and the orthodox theory that the managers are elected by stockholder-owners to serve their interests exclusively has thus far been chiefly potential rather than actual. Judicial willingness—which has increased of late—to allow corporate directors a wide range of discretion as to what policies will best promote the interests of the stockholders, together with managerial disinclination to indulge a sense of social responsibility to a point where it is likely to injure the stockholders, has thus far prevented the issue from being frequently raised in clear-cut fashion in litigation.[35]

Nevertheless there are indications that even today corporation managers not infrequently use corporate funds in ways which suggest a social responsibility rather than an exclusively profit-making viewpoint. * * * The view that directors may within limits properly use corporate funds to support charities which are important to the welfare of the community in which the corporation does business probably comes much nearer representing the attitude of public opinion and the present corporate practice than does the traditional language of courts and lawyers. Nor are there wanting signs of the adoption of a more liberal attitude by legislatures [36] and judges.[37] vestments, Industrial Securities (1931) 971, indicating that the only outstanding bonds of that corporation were issued in 1902 and that no stock has been issued since 1920 except as a stock dividend or split-up.

35 It was raised in the case of Dodge v. Ford Motor Co., * * * in which Mr. Ford's expressions of an intention to share profits with the public through a reduction in prices were relied upon as justifying a decree compelling the declaration of a dividend out of the large surplus of the company. Neither the language of the opinion nor the relief granted necessarily involves an unqualified acceptance of the maximum-profit-for-stockholders formula. The opinion states that "a business corporation is organized and carried on primarily for the profit of the stockholders" and that directors cannot lawfully "conduct the affairs of a corporation for the merely incidental benefit of shareholders and for the primary purpose of benefiting others." 204 Mich. at 507, 170 N.W. at 684. Despite testimony of Mr. Ford that he planned to expand the enterprise in the interest of consumers rather than of stockholders, the court was careful so to limit its decree as not to interfere seriously with the expansion program. Its avowed reason for so doing was that expansion might be made profitable despite Mr. Ford's expressed indifference to profit. One may suspect that it was also motivated, consciously or unconsciously, by a reluctance to prevent the growth of a socially important enterprise.

37 Again, we see no reason why if a railroad company desires to foster, encourage and contribute to a charitable enterprise, or to one designed for the public weal and welfare, it may not do so. Maitland, in "Collected Essays," says: "If the law allows men to form permanently organized groups, those groups will be, for common opinion, right-and-duty bearing units; and if the lawgiver will not openly treat them as such he will misrepresent, or, as the French say, he will 'denature' the facts: in other words, he will make a mess and call it law." We see no reason why a railroad corporation may not, to a reasonable extent, donate funds or services to aid in good works. Per Letton, J., in State ex rel. Sorensen v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. R., 112 Neb. 248, 255–56, 199 N.W. 534, 537 (1924).

Such a view is difficult to justify if we insist on thinking of the business corporation as merely an aggregate of stockholders with directors and officers chosen by them as their trustees or agents. It is not for a trustee to be public-spirited with his beneficiary's property. But we are not bound to treat the corporation as a mere aggregate of stockholders. The traditional view of our law is that a corporation is a distinct legal entity. Unfortunately, its entity character has been thought of as something conferred upon it by the state which, by a mysterious rite called incorporation, magically produces "e pluribus unum." The present vogue of legal realism breeds dissatisfaction with such legal mysteries and leads to insistence on viewing the corporation as it really is. So viewing it we may, as many do, insist that it is a mere aggregate of stockholders; but there is another way of regarding it which has distinguished adherents. According to this concept any organized group, particularly if its organization is of a permanent character, is a factual unit, "a body which from no fiction of law but from the very nature of things differs from the individuals of whom it is constituted." [38] * * *

* * * A sense of social responsibility toward employees, consumers, and the general public may thus come to be regarded as the appropriate attitude to be adopted by those who are engaged in business, with the result that those who own their own businesses and are free to do what they like may increasingly adopt such an attitude. Business ethics may thus tend to become in some degree those of a profession rather than of a trade.

Such a development of business ethics which goes beyond the requirements of law and beyond the dictates of enlightened self-interest is impossible in these days when most business is incorporated unless it can touch incorporated business enterprises as well as those conducted by individual owners. As a practical matter, this can happen only if the managers of such corporations have some degree of legal freedom to act upon such an attitude without waiting for the unanimous consent of the stockholders. That the duty of the managers is to employ the funds of the corporate institution which they manage solely for the purposes of their institution is indisputable. That that purpose, both factually and legally, is maximum stockholder profit has commonly been assumed by lawyers. That such is factually the purpose of the stockholders in creating the association may be granted. Nevertheless, the association, once it becomes a going concern, takes its place in a business world with certain ethical standards which appear to be developing in the direction of increased social responsibility. If we think of it as an institution which differs in the nature of things from the individuals who compose it, we may then readily conceive of it as a person, which, like other persons engaged in business, is affected not only by the laws which regulate business but by the attitude of public and business opinion as to the social obligations of business. If business is tending to become a profession, then a corporate person engaged in business is a professional even though its stockholders, who take no active part in the conduct of the business, may not be. Those through whom it acts may therefore employ its funds in a manner appropriate to a person practising a profession and imbued with a sense of social responsibility without thereby being guilty of a breach of trust. Dodd, For Whom are Corporate Managers Trustees? 45 Harv.L.Rev. 1145, 1156–1161 (1932).

(B) The administration of corporations—peculiarly, a few hundred large corporations—is now the crux of American industrial life. Upon the securities of these corporations has been erected the dominant part of the property system of the industrial east. A major function of these securities is to provide safety, security, or means of support for that part of the community which is unable to earn its living in the normal channels of work or trade. Under cover of that system, certain individuals may perhaps acquire a disproportionate share of wealth. But this is an incident to the system and not its major premise; statistically, it plays a relatively minor part. Historically, and as a matter of law, corporate managements have been required to run their affairs in the interests of their security holders. From time to time other groups, notably labor, have asserted their claims; and these claims are receiving steadily greater recognition as a cost of industry. If these costs are not met, security holders receive an illusory additional profit. But the security holder's claim was the supposed main objective.

Professor Dodd has challenged the theory.[39] * * *

Now I submit that you can not abandon emphasis on "the view that business corporations exist for the sole purpose of making profits for their stockholders" until such time as you are prepared to offer a clear and reasonably enforceable scheme of responsibilities to someone else. * * * Nothing is accomplished, either as a matter of law or of economics, merely by saying that the claim of this group ought not to be "emphasized." Either you have a system based on individual ownership of property or you do not. If not—and there are at the moment plenty of reasons why capitalism does not seem ideal—it becomes necessary to present a system (none has been presented) of law or government, or both, by which responsibility for control of national wealth and income is so apportioned and enforced that the community as a whole, or at least the great bulk of it, is properly taken care of. Otherwise the economic power now mobilized and massed under the corporate form, in the hands of a few thousand directors, and the few hundred individuals holding "control"[40] is simply handed over, weakly, to the present administrators with a pious wish that something nice will come out of it all.

40 The two hundred largest corporations, comprising somewhere between forty and fifty per cent of the industrial wealth of the country, have altogether slightly more than twenty-eight hundred directors. From this must be subtracted a certain number of inactive representatives of large stockholdings. The "control" of these corporations represented by holders of dominant minorities or by the beneficiaries of devices such as voting trusts, pyramided holding corporations, and the like, analyzes down to a very few men. If in place of two hundred corporations perhaps six hundred and fifty corporations are taken, the result would show approximately sixty-five per cent of the industrial wealth of the country administered by perhaps five thousand directors and perhaps seven or eight hundred individuals holding "control."

The only thing that can come out of it, in any long view, is the massing of group after group to assert their private claims by force or threat—to take what each can get, just as corporate managements do. The laborer is invited to organize and strike, the security holder is invited either to jettison his corporate securities and demand relief from the state, or to decline to save money at all under a system which grants to someone else power to take his savings at will. The consumer or patron is left nowhere, unless he learns the dubious art of boycott. This is an invitation not to law or orderly government, but to a process of economic civil war. * * *

What ought to be the part of lawyers and the law in this interplay of great hope and disillusioning fact?

Unfortunately, the lawyers have not given too good an account of themselves thus far, either in theory or administration. * * *

Nevertheless, development in the corporate field is more likely to come through lawyers than through any other group. For one thing, they do, approximately, understand the system. They have, however, a function widely divergent from that of the economist or the social theorist. They must meet a series of practical situations from day to day. They are not, accordingly, in a position to relinquish one position—here, the idea of corporate trusteeship for security holdings—leaving the situation in flux until a new order shall emerge. Legal technique does not contemplate intervening periods of chaos; it can only follow out new theories as they become established and accepted by the community at large. It is likely that claims upon corporate wealth and corporate income will be asserted from many directions. The shareholder who now has a primary property right over residual income after expenses are met, may ultimately be conceived of as having an equal participation with a number of other claimants. Or he may emerge, still with a primary property right over residual income, but subordinated to a number of claims by labor, by customers and patrons, by the community and the like, which cut down that residue. It would, as Professor Dodd points out, be unfortunate to leave the law in such shape that these developments could not be recognized as a matter of constitutional or corporation law. But it is one thing to say that the law must allow for such developments. It is quite another to grant uncontrolled power to corporate managers in the hope that they will produce that development. * * * Berle, For Whom Corporate Managers Are Trustees: A Note, 45 Harv.L.Rev. 1365 (1932).

(C) For more than a hundred years we kept up the pretty fiction that each industrial enterprise, no matter how big, was a purely private concern. How the managers handled it was nobody else's business, so long as they kept away from the less conventional forms of fraud. They were supposed to be responsible to the stockholders alone; their operations—in theory—were of no interest to the rest of the community.

This curious fancy survived only because it was tied up with another polite fiction—the pretense that there were hundreds of independent little firms in each industry; that competition would keep all of them on their best behavior; and that everything somehow would work out automatically in the public interest.

For a long time now it has been perfectly clear that both of these theories are wildly unreal. Most of the nation's key industries are now dominated by companies which you can count on the fingers of a mutilated hand—for example, three in automobiles (90 per cent), four in steel (64 per cent), four in copper (82 per cent), two in aluminum (more than 90 per cent), and so on through the list. What competition still remains usually is conducted with gentlemanly restraint.

And as everybody knows, the business of such companies no longer is a merely private concern. When the board of U. S. Steel makes a decision on prices—or on wages or its rate of new investment—every citizen of the United States is affected, just as truly as he would be by an act of Congress. Frequently even more. Many laws touch us only lightly; but if any one of the two hundred top corporations starts to jack up prices or to lay off men, that means money out of our pockets. If many of them act together—as they generally do—it may mean lost jobs or short rations for millions of us. When a giant American oil company makes a deal with its British counterpart for the exploitation of the Middle East oil pool, the agreement has all the effects of a treaty. It expresses the national interest in one of the world's most vital resources, and it commits American diplomacy (and ultimately American lives) to defend that interest.

Perhaps it is time, then, for us to recognize the obvious truth: such decisions cannot properly be made in the secrecy of a private board room, by men who bear no direct public responsibility. These are political questions, in the fundamental sense of res publica; they are matters of first consequence to the entire body politic. They ought to be debated as openly and fully as any act of Congress; and the men who decide them must somehow be held publicly accountable for their decisions.

This would mean a new status for a relatively few great corporations—the two hundred, more or less, which make up the central switchboard of the nation's economy. It would mean that these companies—less than one per cent of the country's total number—would no longer be regarded as private businesses, but as public institutions. Their management would no longer be responsible to the stockholders alone, but to all the people. Their first duty would become, not simply to earn the biggest possible profit for each individual firm, but to keep the whole economy running smoothly on the tracks.

Such a concept need not involve public ownership. On the contrary, its aim would be to avoid that wholesale nationalization—with all its dangers to freedom, initiative, and efficiency—which is almost certain to engulf us (as it already has engulfed most of the rest of the world) if we collapse into another major depression. Nor would it necessarily mean more interference with business. For some 99 per cent of America's business firms, it might in fact result in considerably less regimentation and direct government supervision.

What it would mean is a new kind of responsible capitalism. It would mean a new relationship between the government and the two hundred strategic corporations, which would leave them under private management but which would insure that their power to control the nation's economy always would be used in the public interest.

The idea is by no means new. In Great Britain certain big corporations have long worked so closely with the government (especially in foreign affairs) that it is often difficult to tell just where their private business leaves off and His Majesty's business starts in. The Bank of England, of course, is the classic example. Although its stock was privately held, and paid handsome dividends, the Bank behaved for many years as if it were an arm of the cabinet. It became the main link between the government and the business world, the central mechanism for managing the British economy; its governors thought of themselves as statesmen, whose first responsibility was to the nation rather than to their stockholders. Consequently, when the Bank was finally nationalized a few months ago, the ceremony was purely symbolic—the same gentlemen in striped trousers and black homburgs kept right on doing the same things in precisely the same old way.

In this country too, the idea of responsible corporate behavior already has made some headway. The great oil companies, for instance, normally consult the State Department on the big policy decisions concerning their foreign operations. So do investment bankers engaged in large-scale foreign lending. In the domestic field, a few of the wiser monopolies, such as A T & T and Western Union, conduct their day-today affairs very much as if they were government agencies—presumably on the theory that this is the surest way to stave off public ownership. Recently one or two big companies—notably Ford and International Harvester—have cut prices in the avowed interest of national economic stability, although this action cost them plenty of money and was not forced by either competition or market conditions. Through their Committee for Economic Development a good many business men have made a tacit and rudimentary acknowledgment of their joint responsibility for long-range economic planning, and such leaders as Beardsley Ruml, Henry Kaiser, and Charles Luckman have become forthright spokesmen for a new business philosophy.

So far, however, these are sporadic cases, arising out of the occasional insight of a few uncommonly courageous and far-sighted executives. The problem is to extend this pattern of behavior—to establish it as a consistent habit among all the men who run our strategic concentrations of economic power.

This cannot, of course, be accomplished merely by exhortation. It requires a new relationship between the dominant corporations and society, under which rewards and honors will go to those managers who act as responsible stewards, and penalties will fall upon those who persist in behaving like robber barons. The carrot and the stick are still the only reliable means for keeping the donkey moving down the straight and narrow path.

If liberal political theory develops along these lines—as I think it may—its chief task for the next decade will be to work out the techniques and nuances of this new relationship between government and big business. For a concept of this kind cannot be brought to life simply by passing a law or setting up a new regulatory agency. It will require many devices, hammered out through a tedious process of trial and error.

Some of the machinery already is at hand. A start might be made, for example, by the President's new Council of Economic Advisers, which seems destined to develop into a sort of economic general staff. As a first step it might well undertake an inquiry into the present structure of American industry, with the purpose of drawing up a master list of the two hundred or so corporations which exercise working direction over the nation's economic life. Its report could set forth —for future guidance—just how each of these strategic firms fits into the intricate mechanism of control, and how it manipulates the lower echelons of business by means of purchasing and marketing agreements, financial connections, patent licensing, interlocking directorates, and similar administrative levers.

On the basis of such a report, the Council could then ask Congress to recognize formally the crucially important role of the Two Hundred, by conferring on them a special status and special responsibilities. Perhaps this could be done most easily by some such scheme as Senator O'Mahoney's plan for federal incorporation. These key companies—and these alone—might be required to operate under federal charters, providing specific guarantees of responsible behavior. They would have to agree, for example, never to use their vast quasi-monopolistic powers to restrict output, extort unjustified prices, or rig cartel agreements with foreign concerns. They would also be required to conduct their affairs in a goldfish bowl, just like any other public institution; and the Economic Council no doubt would need to develop a specially trained staff to keep their records and day-to-day operations under constant scrutiny.

Publicity probably would serve, in normal circumstances, as the only weapon needed to enforce these rules. No executive would care to have the Economic Council announce that he was cooking up a little stock deal for his personal profit, gigging the customers with a price-fixing scheme, bribing a state legislature, flirting with a Swiss cartel, or otherwise disporting himself in a manner unbecoming to a corporation officer and a gentleman. To deal with any recalcitrant survivors of the old public-be-damned school, however, the Council might occasionally have to turn to the courts. It would hardly be worthwhile to impose fines, because our anti-trust experience has shown that they are seldom an effective deterrent to wealthy transgressors. Instead the courts might be empowered to rule that any official who does not live up to his august responsibilities should be barred forever from employment in any of the two hundred key corporations. The social stigma of such a decree might become, in time, almost as fearsome as imprisonment.

The management of the Two Hundred could well be called upon to shoulder certain group responsibilities as well. Their most important decisions, from the standpoint of the national economy, are those concerning the volume of corporate savings (in the form of reserves, depreciation, and undistributed profits) and the rate of new investment. These are the two gyroscopes—as Mr. Keynes has taught us—which largely govern the stability of the economy. When they get out of kilter, so that savings pile up faster than they can find an outlet in investment, the result is a depression.

Consequently, the Economic Council might call the Two Hundred into consultation each year on their future plans for savings and investment. (After all, these firms directly control something like sixty per cent of the total stream of investment, and indirectly they influence a good deal more. Similarly, their wage, dividend, and price policies largely determine the rate of individual savings and consumer spending.) If it should appear that business investment for the year is likely to fall short of the total necessary to keep the economy rolling, the Council might suggest that they revise their estimates upward. Their incentive to oblige would be strong, because the alternative would be government investment in public works to fill the gap—and that money, in the long run, would mostly come out of business's pocket in taxes.

In like fashion, whenever savings began to stack up at the expense of consumer purchasing power, the Council might recommend price cuts, higher wages, and lower profit margins. No prudent management could ignore such hints; for if it did, responsibility for the ensuing smashup would be inescapably fixed.

Such co-operative planning for economic stability should go a long way toward curing our labor troubles, because it would aim to end that insecurity—that haunting fear of unemployment—which underlies most labor unrest. Moreover, the unions presumably would sit in with government and management in the planning process; and the sharing of responsibility is the surest way of learning responsible behavior.

In a few peculiarly vital industries, however, labor might have to forego its right to strike; and in return it would have to receive a special standing and special privileges comparable to those of the civil service. Railway labor already has something approaching this status. It works under a special law, the Railway Labor Act; it has its own security legislation in the Railroad Retirement Act; its union contracts have established a sort of civil service procedure on promotions and working conditions; and President Truman (with overwhelming public support) recently denied its right to paralyze the nation by striking. In any such industry where strikes are clearly intolerable, labor probably would demand—and should get—one further guarantee before it gives up its strike weapon. Some machinery would have to be set up for the periodic review of wages, so that increases would come automatically with every increase in labor's productivity.

Certainly it would not be easy to make a responsible and directed capitalism of this kind work. It would require, first of all, a new attitude among both our business leaders and our bureaucrats. Government employees would have to quit talking about business men as if they were all public enemies; and industrialists would have to learn that Washington is not populated entirely by crazy college professors and disguised Bolsheviks plotting to wreck The American Way of Life. A certain minimum of good faith and respect on both sides would be indispensable—plus a mutual willingness to give the scheme a fair trial.

Also necessary would be a thoroughgoing reorganization of the government, to bring some order out of the present demented jungle of overlapping and uncoordinated agencies. Until Washington develops a machinery for producing prompt, consistent policy decisions, it clearly will not be able to give much useful guidance to business men; nor can industrialists be expected to co-operate as long as a dozen different bureaus and commissions are belaboring them with conflicting advice. The creation of a competent and well-paid civil service, capable of attracting really first-rate men, together with a coordinating cabinet secretariat of the sort recently suggested by Joseph and Stewart Alsop, might be a good first step.

Obviously, too, the system would be beset by dangers, as any adventurous undertaking is bound to be. Some extreme leftwingers no doubt would seize upon it as a first step toward a Communist society, while their counterparts of the extreme right might try to convert it into a corporative state. Constant vigilance would be necessary to keep either the government from trying to run the Two Hundred Corporations, or the Two Hundred Corporations from getting ambitions to take over the government. In addition, it would have to be made perfectly clear that the special status of the selected corporations would not imply either an excuse for inefficient management nor a promise of public subsidy.

But these difficulties are not necessarily insuperable—and it is not an American habit to flinch from tough jobs. Any program for handling the impending economic crisis will bristle with dangers and difficulties. They can be avoided entirely only by doing nothing—which is, of course, the most dangerous choice of all.

Whether the country's progressives will in fact work out a new road map of the kind outlined so sketchily here is, at the moment, a matter of sheer guesswork. All that can be said is that some of the most thoughtful are feeling their way in roughly this direction. Fischer, The Lost Liberals, 194 Harper's Magazine 385. (1947)

C. STOCKHOLDERS' PARTICIPATION IN MANAGEMENT

RIGHTS OF STOCKHOLDERS IMPLEMENTING THEIR RIGHTS AND DUTIES IN CORPORATE MANAGEMENT

The corporation is an aggregate organization, principally managed by its Board of Directors and officers. Certain rights in management are given to shareholders —namely, to vote to select a management (which may, of course, be limited); the right to vote on changes in the corporate charter; the right to pass upon certain transactions of general interest (for example, arrangements for compensation of directors, employees' pension plans, mortgaging assets of the corporation, dissolution of the enterprise, and so forth).

These functions correspond, roughly, to the functions required of a citizen in a democratic municipality, or a democratic government. As in the political analogue, they cannot effectively perform without certain information, and the stockholder's right to information thus corresponds roughly to one of the fields of civil rights in a democratic state.

As in the case of civil rights, the stockholder's right to information is partly for the purpose of securing effective and intelligent judgment on corporate issues (the corporate vote, etc.) and partly for the purpose of protecting the individual interest of the shareholder (securing information permitting him to prevent the management of the corporation from fraudulent dealing).

The field is not yet fully covered, and the law is developing. We may distinguish, however, between certain types:

(a) Stockholders have certain rights to secure the list of shareholders—this plainly for the purpose of permitting stockholders other than the management to campaign for new directors, or for or against specific stockholder action, and the like. This is information guaranteed to a stockholder to implement his voting right.

(b) Stockholders have the right to information as to the books and accounts of business transactions of the corporation. A stockholder has a right to hold the management of a corporation to certain standards of conduct—attention to business, loyalty, due care, and so forth. The records of the business as shown in the accounts and statements are essential in determining whether these standards have been lived up to.

A stockholder likewise has a right to know approximately the value of his share of stock, and the right to information thus safeguards him individually as well.

(c) Under some circumstances at least, the stockholder has a right to know what action the management has taken in matters of policy. This information is commonly contained in the minute books and records (other than accounts). There is a limited right to have this information made available to him, though the law is not yet well settled on the point, and a clear line has not yet been drawn between information which can probably be kept confidential by the management, and information which the stockholder should have.

(d) Is there a right to technical information—information covering the wide decisions which must be made by management in technological matters? Clearly this is a field to be dealt with primarily by sound managerial judgment, in which stockholders have no right to intervene so long as the judgment is exercised in good faith and with reasonable care. Yet it is perfectly clear that judgment exercised in this field could be oppressive or anti-social. There is no settled law covering this field; yet it is equally plain that the field is there, and will present problems to the law if it does not already.

In this respect it is to be noted that few stockholders would be remotely competent to secure such information, or to analyze or use it if secured. A stockholder in a radio corporation, for instance, seeking information as to what the management was really doing in the field of electronics would need to be an expert to understand the data even if it were presented to him. The generality of stockholders would find such information a hopelessly intricate puzzle. Here there is a possibility other than direct inspection—the simpler rights which have been worked out in other respects. It is possible that the new and growing field may be covered by the device of an expert report—the right to have an impartial, competent, expert go over the information, and report on it, reducing the facts and issues to a form comprehensible to laymen.

On further analysis, it will be seen that a stockholder seeking to establish a right to secure information may be acting in any of three ways:

(1) He may be seeking to put himself and other stockholders in a position to exercise intelligently corporate rights, e.g., voting, as a part of the administration of the corporation itself. The statutory and charter scheme calls for stockholders' judgment on certain matters and as a participating member he is endeavoring to exercise this function;

(2) Or he may be seeking to ascertain or establish his individual right—the value of his share of stock, or the exact interest he has in voting one way or another on any proposition; and so forth. Such information is not in aid of the corporate function, but in aid of his own property and interest;

(3) Or he may be seeking information for use in connection with an object unrelated either to the management of the corporation or to his property interest therein—as when he seeks the list of stockholders for the purpose of selling it to an advertising agency, or seeks the accounts of the corporation for the purpose of turning the information over to a competitor. Here, of course, he seeks information so that it may be used adversely to the corporation and his fellow shareholders. If mailed, it shall be directed to a stockholder at his address as it appears on the stock-book unless he shall have filed with the secretary of the corporation a written request that notices intended for him to be mailed to some other address, in which case it shall be mailed to the address designated in such request. The by-laws may require that such notice be also published in one or more newspapers.

THE ——— COMPANY

(a New Jersey Corporation)

Minutes of Annual Meeting of Stockholders

MINUTES of the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of THE ——— COMPANY held at the registered office of the Company, No. 15 Exchange Place, Jersey City, Hudson County, New Jersey, on Wednesday, April 16, 1941, at 10:00 o'clock A.M.

The President of the Company, ———, called the meeting to order.

Nominations having been made, on motion, duly seconded, the Chairman of the Board of Directors, Mr. ———, was elected Chairman of the meeting. Mr. ———, Secretary of the Company, was thereupon duly elected Secretary of the meeting.

The Secretary presented the notice of call of the meeting together with due proof by affidavit that a copy of said notice together with the proxy statement required by Regulation X-14 of the Securities and Exchange Commission had been served upon every stockholder of the Company of record at the close of business on March 19, 1941, that being the date for the determination of the stockholders entitled to notice of and to vote at the meeting, in the manner and within the time provided by the By-Laws of the Company. Said affidavit also covered the mailing to every such stockholder of a copy of the President's letter to stockholders dated March 19, 1941. On motion, duly seconded, the said affidavit, notice and proxy statement were ordered filed with the records of the meeting.

The Chairman stated that the objects of the meeting were (a) to elect a Board of thirteen (13) Directors for the ensuing year and until the election and qualification of their respective successors; (b) to take action upon a proposal that the By-Laws of the Company be amended by adding thereto a new Article providing for the indemnification of directors and officers against suits, in the form set forth in the proxy statement that accompanied the notice of the meeting, and (c) to transact such other business as may properly come before the meeting.

The Secretary presented to the Chairman the transfer books and the stock books, together with a full, true and complete list in alphabetical order, duly certified to by the Secretary of the Company, of all the stockholders entitled to vote at the meeting with the residence of each and the number of shares held by each, and stated that the same had been on file at the principal and registered office of the Company and open to inspection by any stockholder during the ten days immediately preceding the meeting. The said list marked "A" remained open to the inspection of the stockholders and was ordered filed with the records of the meeting.

The Secretary reported that there were present in person or by proxy, stockholders holding 2,608,797 shares of the capital stock of the Company out of a total of 4,396,704 shares issued and outstanding at the close of business on March 19, 1941, this being the record date for this meeting. The Secretary stated that the above figure of 4,396,-704 shares issued and outstanding did not include 21,254 shares heretofore issued but now held in the treasury of the Company. The Secretary further reported that no additional shares had been issued prior to the date of this meeting.

The Secretary reported the names of the stockholders present in person or by proxy and the number of shares held by each as shown by the list marked "B" which was ordered filed with the records of the meeting; that stockholders holding more than a majority in par value of the outstanding capital stock of the Company were present at the meeting in person or by proxy. The Chairman thereupon announced that a quorum was in attendance at the meeting.

On motion, duly seconded, the proxies presented were ordered filed as a part of the records of the meeting.

The minutes of the last previous annual meeting of stockholders held April 17, 1940, were read and, on motion, duly seconded, were duly approved. On motion, it was voted to proceed with the election of Directors for the ensuing year and by vote of the stockholders present, ——— and ——— were duly appointed to act as Inspectors of Election at this meeting of the stockholders, neither of them being a candidate for the office of Director. The said Inspectors were duly sworn and their oath was ordered filed with the records of the meeting.

Nominations for Directors then being called for, the following names were placed in nomination:

The Chairman then reported the polls open for the election of Directors, it then being the hour of 10:20 A.M. The meeting thereupon proceeded to the election of thirteen Directors in accordance with the By-Laws, and the stockholders prepared their ballots and delivered them to the Inspectors.

The Secretary then submitted and read to the meeting a further extract from the minutes of said meeting of the Board of Directors held on Tuesday, January 28, 1941, relating to the proposed amendment of the By-Laws of the Company submitted to the stockholders thereof at this meeting. Said extract was in words and figures the following:

"The Chairman presented to the meeting a proposed new By-Law which he stated was of the kind that a number of corporations had recently been adding to their By-Laws, the purpose of such new By-Law being to provide indemnification for directors and officers against expenses incurred by them in connection with suits brought against them by reason of their office and in which they are not held liable.

"General discussion then ensued after which, on motion duly made and seconded, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the vote of the Directors present:

"Resolved, that this Board of Directors hereby declares advisable an amendment of the By-Laws of the Company by the addition of a new Article to read as follows:

" 'Each director and officer shall be indemnified by the Company against expenses reasonably incurred by him (including, but not limited to, counsel fees and settlements out of court in amounts approved by the Board of Directors, but not including any case where in the opinion of counsel for the Company the directors and officers affected are liable) in connection with any action, suit or proceeding to which he may be made a party by reason of his being or having been a director or officer of the Company (whether or not he continues to be a director or officer at the time of incurring such expenses), except in relation to matters as to which he shall be adjudged in such action, suit or proceeding to be liable or to have been derelict in the performance of his duty as such director or officer. The foregoing right of indemnification shall not be exclusive of other rights to which any director or officer may be entitled as a matter of law.'

"Further resolved, that a meeting of the stockholders be, and the same hereby is, called to take action upon the adoption of the new By-Law aforesaid, which meeting shall also be the annual meeting of the stockholders to be held April 16, 1941.

"Further Resolved, that if the stockholders at said meeting adopt the new By-Law aforesaid it shall constitute Article XI of the By-Laws of the Company and that the present Article XI be renumbered to be Article XII, and that any changes in references necessitated by the inclusion of said new article shall thereupon be made."

After the reading of the above extract from the minutes of the meeting of the Board of Directors held January 28, 1941, the following preamble and resolution were offered by Mr. ———, who moved their adoption, the said motion being duly seconded by Mr. ———.

Whereas, the Board of Directors of this Company at its meeting held January 28, 1941, (a) declared advisable an amendment of the By-Laws of the Company by adding thereto a new Article providing for the indemnification of directors and officers against suits in the form set forth in the proxy statement which accompanied the notice of this meeting, and (b) called this meeting of stockholders to take action upon a proposal that the By-Laws of the Company be so amended;

Now, therefore, be it resolved, (a) that the By-Laws of this Company be, and they hereby are, amended by adding thereto a new Article in the form set forth in the proxy statement which accompanied the notice of this meeting and reading as follows:

"Each director and officer shall be indemnified by the Company against expenses reasonably incurred by him (including, but not limited to, counsel fees and settlements out of court in amounts approved by the Board of Directors, but not including any case where in the opinion of counsel for the Company the directors and officers affected are liable) in connection with any action, suit or proceeding to which he may be made a party by reason of his being or having been a director or officer of the Company (whether or not he continues to be a director or officer at the time of incurring such expenses), except in relation to matters as to which he shall be adjudged in such action, suit or proceeding to be liable or to have been derelict in the performance of his duty as such director or officer. The foregoing right of indemnification shall not be exclusive of other rights to which any director or officer may be entitled as a matter of law."

and (b) that said new Article of the By-Laws shall be numbered in accordance with the resolutions of the Board of Directors adopted at their said meeting held January 28, 1941.

The Chairman directed that a vote by ballot be taken upon said preamble and resolution.

Upon the vote by ballot on the foregoing preamble and resolution 2,512,470 shares of the capital stock, constituting more than a majority in interest of the capital stock of the Company represented at the meeting, voted in the affirmative and 94,266 shares voted in the negative. The Chairman thereupon declared that said preamble and resolution had been duly adopted by the affirmative vote of more than a majority in interest of the capital stock of the Company represented at the meeting and that, therefore, said amendment of the By-Laws of the Company had been duly adopted.

The Chairman stated to the stockholders that the minute book containing the minutes of the proceedings of the Board of Directors since the last annual meeting of the stockholders held April 17, 1940, was on hand, on the table, and would remain open to the inspection of the stockholders at any time during the meeting. Included in the minute book was a statement showing the provision that has been made for compensation of each officer and director in their official capacities for the year 1941, as well as the total compensation of each of the officers and directors of the Company for the year 1940 and certain other years.

The Chairman presented to the meeting a copy of the annual report of the Company and all its subsidiary companies for the year ended December 31, 1940, said annual report containing, among other things, a comment or analysis signed by ———, President, a consolidated balance sheet as of December 31, 1940 and 1939 and related statements of consolidated net income, earned surplus, and capital surplus of The ——— Company and its subsidiary companies for the years ended December 31, 1940, and 1939, and an accountants' certificate of Messrs. Haskins & Sells. The Chairman presented to the meeting proof by affidavit that a copy of the said annual report had been mailed to stockholders of record on March 7, 1941, and also to persons who became stockholders of record between March 7, 1941, and the close of business of March 19, 1941.

The Chairman stated that he and the officers of the Company would be glad to answer any pertinent and proper inquiry by any stockholder as to any matter referred to in the said minutes of the Directors or in the annual report to the stockholders for the year ended December 31, 1940.

An informal recess was taken to give the stockholders then present a further opportunity to examine the papers, etc. which had been submitted to the meeting.

During the recess the President of the Company ———, commented at some length on various phases of the business of the Company, and some of the problems facing it during the balance of the year.

At this point the Inspectors reported that since the organization of the meeting subsequent to the taking of the ballots on the amendment of the By-Laws proxies for an additional 1,835 shares of stock had been filed, and that all of them were in favor of said amendment of the By-Laws.

The hour of 11:20 A.M. having arrived and the polls having remained open one hour, the Chairman thereupon declared the polls closed for the election of Directors. The Inspectors thereupon presented their report in writing showing that they had received and counted the ballots of the stockholders and that 2,610,632 votes had been cast in favor of the following thirteen gentlemen as Directors of the Company for the ensuing year, namely: that no votes had been cast for any other person, and that the above named gentlemen had been unanimously elected Directors, the holders of more than a majority of the outstanding capital stock of the Company having voted in favor of these gentlemen.

On motion, duly seconded, the report of the Inspectors was accepted, approved and ordered filed with the records of the meeting, a majority of the stockholders present in person or by proxy voting in the affirmative.

The Chairman thereupon announced that the above named gentlemen had been duly elected Directors of the Company, to hold office until the next annual meeting of the stockholders, and until their successors are elected and qualified.

On motion, duly seconded, the meeting then adjourned.

NORTH MILWAUKEE TOWN-SITE COMPANY NO. 2 v. BISHOP.

Supreme Court of Wisconsin, 1899. 103 Wis. 492, 79 N.W. 785.

Action by the North Milwaukee Town-Site Company No. 2 against Frank Bishop, Jr. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff is a corporation. The defendant is the owner of 58 shares of its capitál stock, of the par value of $100, upon which assessments to the amount of $54 have been paid. On April 20, 1896, the plaintiff's board of directors adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, that a call be, and hereby is, made upon the unpaid portion of subscription for stock in this company, amounting to $46 per share, the same to be paid thirty days from date, either in cash or by a promise to pay in the form of a land contract or contracts; and when the same shall be paid that the stock shall be shown as full-paid on the books of the company; and the secretary is hereby directed to proceed and use all legal means necessary for the collection of any unpaid portion of said call, and, if any party refuse or neglect to make such payment, proper steps be taken to advertise and foreclose the stock upon which such payment shall not have been made." At the same time the board passed the following resolution: "Resolved, that the secretary be, and hereby is, instructed to notify the stockholders of this company of said call by mailing to each stockholder a copy of said resolution." The defendant failed to pay the call so made and this action was commenced to enforce payment. After hearing the plaintiff's evidence, the court granted a nonsuit. From a judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff appeals.

BARDEEN, J. (after stating the facts). The judgment of nonsuit was justified upon either of two grounds: * * *

2. No proof was made of giving notice of such call according to the by-laws of the corporation. Section 1754, Rev.St. 1898, provides that, "unless otherwise expressly provided by law or the articles of organization, the directors of any corporation may call in the subscriptions to the capital stock by installments, in such proportion and at such times as they shall think proper, by giving such notice thereof as the by-laws shall prescribe." It was admitted on the trial that no by-law of the corporation in this regard had ever been adopted. The action of the board was attempted to be justified, however, by showing that the board, after adopting the resolution for the call, adopted another resolution instructing the secretary to notify each stockholder thereof by mailing to him a copy of said resolution. This latter action of the board is claimed to be equivalent to a regular by-law, and answers all the purposes of the statute. The difficulty with this contention is that the board of directors have no power to enact by-laws unless so authorized by law, by the articles of organization, or by proper action of the stockholders. A by-law is a permanent and continuing rule for the government of the corporation and its officers. The power to enact them resides primarily with the stockholders. They have few functions to perform, and this right to make by-laws is an essential and an important one. It is a power that the directors have no inherent right to exercise. * * *

It is argued, however, that because section 1776, Rev.St., provides that "the stock, property, affairs, and business" of every corporation shall be under the care of and be managed by a board of directors, the power to enact proper by-laws may be implied therefrom. As before intimated, the power to make by-laws is incident to the corporation, itself, and results from the necessity of such a power to enable the body politic to answer to the purposes for which it was created. It being a valuable and important right, it ought not to be taken away by inference or implication. The power given to the directors to control the stock and business of the corporation may exist, and be entirely consistent with the power of the stockholders to say upon what terms and conditions the stock of the corporation shall be paid for and issued. We therefore hold that, unless taken away by the charter, or some law of the state, the power to enact suitable by-laws rests in the stockholders of the corporation, and not in the board of directors. * * * The judgment of the superior court of Milwaukee county is affirmed.

1. RIGHT TO VOTE: PROXIES AND PROXY STATEMENTS

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 47. Qualification of voters. Unless otherwise provided in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law, every stockholder of record of a stock corporation shall be entitled at every meeting of the corporation to one vote for every share of stock standing in his name on the books of the corporation. The board of directors of a stock corporation, unless otherwise provided in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law or in the by-laws, may prescribe a period, not exceeding forty days prior to the date of meetings of the stockholders or prior to the last day on which the consent or dissent of stockholders may be effectively expressed for any purpose without a meeting, during which no transfer of stock on the books of the corporation may be made; or in lieu of prohibiting the transfer of stock may fix a time not more than forty days prior to the date of any meeting of stockholders or prior to the last day on which the consent or dissent of stockholders may be effectively expressed for any purpose without a meeting as the time as of which stockholders entitled to notice of and to vote at such a meeting or whose consent or dissent is required or may be expressed for any purpose, as the case may be, shall be determined, and all persons who were holders of record of voting stock at such time and no others shall be entitled to notice of and to vote at such meeting or to express their consent or dissent, as the case may be. Except in cases of express trust, or in which other provision shall have been made by written agreement between the parties, the record holder of stock which shall be held by him as security or which shall actually belong to another, upon demand therefor and payment of necessary expenses thereof, shall issue to such pledger or to such actual owner of such stock, a proxy to vote thereon. A stockholder shall not sell his vote or issue a proxy to vote to any person for any sum of money or anything of value. The books and papers containing the list of stockholders shall be produced at any meeting of the stockholders upon the request of any stockholder. If the right to vote at any such meeting shall be challenged, the inspectors of election, or other person presiding thereat, shall require such books, if they can be had, to be produced as evidence of the right of the person challenged to vote at such meeting, and all persons who may appear from such books to be stockholders of the corporation entitled to vote may vote at such meeting in person or by proxy subject to the provisions of this chapter.

§ 49. Cumulative voting. The certificate of incorporation of any stock corporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law may provide that at all elections of directors of such corporation each stockholder shall be entitled to as many votes as shall equal the number of votes which (except for such provisions as to cumulative voting) he would be entitled to cast for the election of directors with respect to his shares of stock multiplied by the number of directors to be elected, and that he may cast all of such votes for a single director or may distribute them among the number to be voted for, or any two or more of them, as he may see fit, which right, when exercised, shall be termed cumulative voting. The stockholders of a corporation heretofore formed, who, by the provisions of laws existing on April thirtieth, eighteen hundred and ninety-one, were entitled to the exercise of such right, may hereafter exercise such right, according to the provisions of this section.

§ 51. Limitations on right to vote. Except as in this section otherwise provided, the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law may provide, either absolutely or conditionally, that the holders of any designated class or classes of stock shall not be entitled to vote, or it may otherwise limit or define the respective voting powers of the several classes of stock, and, except as otherwise in this section provided, such provisions of such certificate shall prevail, according to their tenor, in all elections and in all proceedings, over the provisions of any statute which authorizes any action by the vote or written consent of the holders of all the shares, or of a specified proportion of the shares of the corporation. Unless specifically excluded by the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law from the right to vote in a proceeding (a) for mortgaging the property and franchises of the corporation pursuant to section sixteen, (b) for authorizing any guaranty pursuant to section nineteen, (c) for sale of the franchises and property pursuant to section twenty, (d) for consolidation pursuant to section eighty-six, (e) for voluntary dissolution pursuant to section one hundred and five, or (f) for change of name pursuant to the general corporation law, the holders of all shares of stock shall be entitled to vote in every such proceeding.

In any proceeding for excluding or limiting the right of the holders of any class or classes of stock to vote, except as the same may be limited by the voting rights that may be given to the holders of new shares of any class that may be authorized in that or some later proceeding, the holders of all shares of such class or classes of stock shall be entitled to vote regardless of any provision to the contrary in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law.

In a proceeding pursuant to section thirty-six for classifying or reclassifying, as defined in paragraph (E) of said section, any authorized or outstanding shares, the holders of all shares of any class or classes that will be adversely affected by such action shall be entitled to vote, and in a proceeding pursuant to said section for authorizing shares having preferences which will be in any respect superior to the rights of any outstanding shares, the holders of all outstanding shares whose rights will be subordinated by such action shall be entitled to vote, in either event regardless of any provision to the contrary in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law.

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of this section, the consent or vote required for revival of corporate existence under section forty-nine of the general corporation law shall be governed soley by the provisions thereof.

NEW YORK GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

§ 19. Proxies. Every member of a corporation, except a religious corporation, entitled to vote at any meeting thereof may vote by proxy.

Every proxy must be executed in writing by the member, or by his duly authorized attorney. No proxy shall be valid after the expiration of eleven months from the date of its execution unless the member executing it shall have specified therein its duration. Every proxy shall be revocable at the pleasure of the person executing it or of his personal representatives or assigns; but the parties to a valid pledge or to an executory contract of sale may agree in writing as to which of them shall vote the stock pledged or sold until the contract of pledge or sale is fully executed. * * *

§ 20. Challenges. Every member of a corporation offering to vote at any meeting of the corporation, if challenged by an inspector of election or other officer presiding at such meeting, or by any other member present, shall take and subscribe the following oath: "I do solemnly swear that in voting at this election I have not, either directly, indirectly or impliedly received any promise or any sum of money or any thing of value to influence the giving of my vote or votes at this meeting or as a consideration therefor." Any person offering to vote as proxy shall present his proxy and, if so challenged, take and subscribe the following oath: "I do solemnly swear that I have not, either directly, indirectly or impliedly, given any promise or any sum of money or any thing of value to induce the giving of a proxy to me to vote at this meeting, or received any promise or any sum of money or any thing of value to influence the giving of my vote at this meeting, or as a consideration therefor." The inspectors or persons presiding at the election may administer such oath, and all such oaths and proxies shall be filed in the office of the corporation. A member or proxy who shall fail to take such oath when so challenged shall not be permitted to vote.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 17. Power of Stockholders to Vote in Person or by Proxy; Limitation of Power; Closing of Transfer Books or Fixing Date for Determination of Stockholders of Record for Certain Purposes; Cumulative Voting; Quorum:—Unless otherwise provided in the Certificate of Incorporation, each stockholder, shall at every meeting of the stockholders be entitled to one vote in person or by proxy for each share of the capital stock held by such stockholder, but no proxy shall be voted on after three years from its date, unless said proxy provides for a longer period, and, except where the transfer books of the corporation shall have been closed or a date shall have been fixed as a record date for the determination of its stockholders entitled to vote, as hereinafter provided, no share of stock shall be voted on at any election for directors which shall have been transferred on the books of the corporation within twenty days next preceding such election of directors.

The board of directors shall have power to close the stock transfer books of the corporation for a period not exceeding fifty days preceding the date of any meeting of stockholders or the date for payment of any dividend or the date for the allotment of rights or the date when any change or conversion or exchange of capital stock shall go into effect or for a period of not exceeding fifty days in connection with obtaining the consent of stockholders for any purpose; provided, however, that in lieu of closing the stock transfer books as aforesaid, the by-laws may fix or authorize the board of directors to fix in advance a date, not exceeding fifty days preceding the date of any meeting of stockholders, or the date for the payment of any dividend, or the date for the allotment of rights, or the date when any change or conversion or exchange of capital stock shall go into effect, or a date in connection with obtaining such consent, as a record date for the determination of the stockholders entitled to notice of, and to vote at, any such meeting and any adjournment thereof, or entitled to receive payment of any such dividend, or to any such allotment of rights, or to exercise the rights in respect of any such change, conversion or exchange of capital stock, or to give such consent, and in such case such stockholders and only such stockholders as shall be stockholders of record on the date so fixed shall be entitled to such notice of, and to vote at, such meeting and any adjournment thereof, or to receive payment of such dividend, or to receive such allotment of rights, or to exercise such rights, or to give such consent, as the case may be, notwithstanding any transfer of any stock on the books of the corporation after any such record date fixed as aforesaid.

The Certificate of Incorporation of any corporation may provide that at all elections of directors of such corporation, each stockholder shall be entitled to as many votes as shall equal the number of his shares of stock multiplied by the number of directors to be elected, and that he may cast all of such votes for a single director or may distribute them among the number to be voted for, or any two or more of them as he may see fit, which right when exercised, shall be termed cumulative voting. * * *

Subject to the provisions of this Chapter in respect of the vote that shall be required for a specified action, the Certificate of Incorporation or by-laws of any corporation may specify the number of shares and/or the amount of other securities having voting power the holders of which (or in the case of a corporation with no capital stock, the number of the members thereof having voting power who) shall be present or represented by proxy at any meeting in order to constitute a quorum for, and the votes that shall be necessary for, the transaction of any business.

Remuneration And Related Matters

The following information is given for the year 1946 with respect to each person who acted as a director of the Corporation during such year, each person nominated for election as a director and each person who has acted as an officer but not as a director and who has received payments or remuneration totalling more than $20,000 during such year:

(a) The Corporation in 1946 paid into the Retirement Fund, on account of all members of the Retirement Plan but not allocated to the individual members, a further contribution of $249,663, this being the amount estimated by the Actuary for the Fund to be necessary in that year to meet the reserve requirements of the Fund.

(b) Except as to Mr. Chase, who is retired, the amounts listed in this column have been estimated on the assumption that the individual will continue in the employ of the Corporation until retirement age, will continue to receive the same salary as at present and that the Retirement Plan as presently constituted will continue in effect.

No director nor officer nor any person nominated for election as director was indebted to the Corporation and its subsidiaries at any time during the year 1946.

The aggregate remuneration received from the Corporation and its subsidiaries by all directors and officers of the Corporation as a group for 1946 was $453,590, which is $17,467 more than was received by this group for the year 1945. There was paid into the Retirement Fund by the Corporation in 1946 on account of this group a total of $18,669 exclusive of the further contribution paid on account of all members referred to in footnote (a) to the table concerning Remuneration and Related Matters.

The number of employees of the Corporation and its subsidiaries (other than officers and directors of the Corporation) who during the last fiscal year received from the Corporation and its subsidiaries remuneration in excess of $20,000 is shown in the following table:

Salary Group	Number of Employees	Aggregate Amount
$20,000–$50,000	11	$306,972
50,000–100,000	none	none
Over $100,000	none	none

The only remuneration paid or accrued in 1946 by the Corporation in excess of $20,000 other than to directors, officers and employees was the sum of $24,828 to Loomis, Suffern & Fernald, certified public accountants, for services in connection with accounting and tax matters, and $25,000 to Covington, Burling, Rublee, Acheson & Shorb for legal services.

Interest Of Directors In Transactions With Corporation

J. P. Morgan & Co. Incorporated, of which Messrs. Whitney and Dickey are officers, acts as Trustee under the Trust indenture relative to the Corporation's Retirement Fund. During the year 1946 certain subsidiaries of the Corporation sold, in the ordinary course of business, copper and fabricated products to various divisions of General Motors Corporation of which Mr. Sloan is Chairman of the Board.

Solicitation Of Proxies

The expense involved in the solicitation of proxies for the Annual Meeting of Stockholders will be borne by the Corporation. The Corporation intends to reimburse banks, brokers and other persons holding stock in their names or in the names of nominees for expenses, estimated at approximately $1,500, in sending proxy material to principals.

Other Matters

As stated in the Notice of Meeting, the matters to be presented to stockholders at the Annual Meeting are (a) the election of directors and (b) the transaction of all such other business as may properly come before the meeting. The Management does not intend to bring any business before the meeting other than the election of directors and does not now know of any other business that will be presented by others for action by stockholders at said meeting. However, if any other business shall properly come before the meeting, it is intended that votes will be cast pursuant to said proxy in respect of any such business in accordance with the best judgment of the person or persons acting under said proxy.

Auditors

Messrs. Loomis, Suffern & Fernald, Certified Public Accountants of 80 Broad Street, New York 4, N. Y., were appointed as independent auditors of the accounts of this Corporation and of its subsidiaries for the year 1947. No approval of this appointment is requested. In accordance with past practice, one of the partners of Loomis, Suffern & Fernald will be present at the Annual Meeting for the purpose of answering questions of stockholders relative to accounting matters.

Annual Report

An Annual Report for the year 1946 was mailed to stockholders on March 6, 1947. Reference to the Annual Report is not intended and shall not be construed as incorporating in the proxy material, sent to stockholders in connection with the Annual Meeting to be held May 6, 1947, said Annual Report or any of the statements or information therein contained.

The Corporation welcomes the comments of its stockholders on matters concerning the Corporation's business.

By Order of the Board of Directors,

Dated, March 31, 1947. A. S. Cherouny, Secretary.

WYATT et al. v. ARMSTRONG et al.

Supreme Court of New York, Special Term, 1945. 186 Misc. 216, 59 N.Y.S.2d 502.

Proceeding in the matter of the petition of Kenneth S. Wyatt and others, on their own behalf and on behalf of all bondholders and stockholders of Third Avenue Transit Corporation, against Malcolm A. Armstrong and others for an order to set aside the election of directors of Third Avenue Transit Corporation at a meeting held on May 9, 1945, and at a meeting held May 29, 1945, and the subsequent election of officers of the corporation, and for an order directing the holding of a new meeting of stockholders for the purpose of electing a board of directors.

Decision in accordance with opinion setting aside elections and directing a new election.

HOFSTADTER, JUSTICE. This is an application pursuant to section 25 of the General Corporation Law for an order vacating and declaring void the election of directors of the Third Avenue Transit Corporation held on the 9th of May, 1945, and directing a new election to take place forthwith, and for other relief.

Stripped of its plethora of irrelevant and redundant allegations, the petition alleges that the election held on May 9, 1945, should be set aside because the proxies voted thereat were secured by withholding vital information from the electors—information which might have affected their vote had it been furnished them. In brief, it appears and is not seriously challenged in any of the replying papers, that Mr. Fred Cox signed and delivered to Mr. Malcolm A. Armstrong an undated resignation on or prior to the 9th day of May, 1945, and that the purpose of this resignation was to enable Armstrong and John A. Kaye between them to control the board of directors. The petition also alleges that other nominees, on whose behalf proxies were solicited, aside from Mr. Cox, likewise furnished resignations in advance; but it does not appear that any others actually signed undated resignations at or prior to the election held on May 9th. In addition, numerous allegations of fraud and conspiracy against the respondents are generally charged in the petition and in the affidavits of the Attorney General of the State of New York requesting leave to intervene in support of the petition. A number of the respondents, who are directors of the corporation as a result of the election on May 9, 1945, have likewise joined in the request that the election be set aside and that a new election be ordered.

The general picture that emerges for the numerous papers filed, both in support and in opposition to the pending application, is one of confusion and backstage machinations for the purpose of securing control of an important public utility. Enough is alleged and either explicitly conceded or not denied to show that when the election on May 9, 1945, was held, the electors who had given their proxies to the various committees soliciting them, had been kept in ignorance of the true state of affairs, and were, indeed, unaware of the fact that their proxies were being used, at least in the case of the so-called "Investors Group," for the purpose of handing over the control of the corporation to others than those named as the nominees for the directorships involved.

Such conduct on the part of those who are in the highest fiduciary relationship with stockholders and bondholders of a corporation is reprehensible in the extreme and should not be tolerated in a court of equity. Section 25 of the General Corporation Law[2] is specifically designed for the purpose of enabling a court of equity to correct a situation of this kind when brought to its attention. I have had occasion, in another case, to state the general principles of law applicable to cases of this kind.[3] In brief, it may be said that under section 25 of the General Corporation Law, the court is not confined to strict legal considerations, but has broad equitable powers which should be exercised whenever the election sought to be reviewed is so clouded with doubt or tainted with questionable circumstances that the standards of fair dealing require the court to order a new, clear and adequate expression of security holders' will. No other conclusion could be drawn from the mandate of the court contained in Matter of Kaminsky, 251 App.Div. 132, 295 N.Y.S. 989, 999, affirmed 277 N.Y. 524, 13 N.E.2d 456, where the court said: "If the result is not free from suspicion, or is clouded with doubt, and justice demands, we may in all fairness require the parties to start all over again. When right, justice and fair play require, a new election should be ordered." [Citing cases.]

The rule is clearly applicable to this case. The security holders entitled to vote were misled by being deprived of information which might easily have affected their judgment. The result is, therefore, not only clouded in doubt but highly suspicious. Those who hold positions of trust and confidence are under a duty so to conduct themselves as to avoid the inference that they are seeking for self interest, to mislead the real owners of their corporations. Upon their failure to abide by those principles of fair dealing, the court is under a duty to deal with them as justice may require.

Numerous objections to the granting of the petition have been urged before me, both on oral argument and in briefs submitted by various respondents. * * *

Secondly, it is alleged that even if the election of May 9, 1945, was improper, and should be set aside, that nevertheless the incumbent directors must be allowed to continue in office and that no new election should be held because they were likewise elected at a meeting of the old board held on May 29, 1945. On that date, it appears in the record the members of the old board, who had been defeated at the May 9th election but who nevertheless maintained that they had a right to continue in office, met and resigned one by one, and as each member resigned, a substitute was elected from the slate that had secured a plurality at the May 9th election.

2 Section 25 of the General Corporation Law provides as follows: "Powers of supreme court respecting elections. Upon the application of any member aggrieved by an election, and upon notice to the persons declared elected thereat, the corporation and such other persons as the court may direct, the supreme court at a special term thereof shall forthwith hear the proofs and allegations of the parties, and confirm the election or order a new election, as justice may require."

3 See Matter of Scheuer, (London Terrace, Inc.), — Misc. —, 59 N.Y.S.2d 500, confirming the report of Referee Bachner. The cases are collected in the report and the principles of law involved stated extensively.

The circumstances which led to this unusual procedure arose out of the fact that the stockholders of the corporation changed the date of the annual election from November to May 9th. It is argued that this change of date could not have the effect of cutting short the term of office of the directors who had been elected in November, 1944. The argument is based upon decisions of courts in some states in which it has been held that a mere change in the date of the annual meeting for the election of directors cannot affect the term of office of the directors then in office. The principal case relied upon in support of this proposition is Toledo Traction v. Smith, D.C., 205 F. 643, construing the Ohio corporation law. It is to be noted, however, that in that case the court points out that "All the Ohio statutes speak of annual elections at which directors shall be chosen." 205 F. at page 646. The New York statutes however, do not require annual elections, the only reference to annual elections in our corporation law being contained in section 55 of the Stock Corporation Law, which provides that "at least one-fourth in number of the directors of every stock corporation shall be elected annually." That section, however, is intended to provide a method for staggering the election of directors and the word "annual" there used does not preclude elections for a shorter term. Indeed, section 25 of the General Corporation Law itself, which authorizes the court to order a special election, would not be effective if the directors elected at such election were required to hold office for a full year. On the contrary, it is perfectly clear that the directors to be elected at the special election to be ordered by the court will, in this case, hold office only until May 9, 1946, when the regular annual meeting of stockholders takes place.

But even if it be admitted that the election of May 9th was ineffective to curtail the term of the board then in office, it would merely follow that that election was a nullity. The board that was then in office has since resigned and we are then faced with the question of whether the action taken by that board on May 29, 1945, may be allowed to stand. I am of opinion that to do so would be contrary to the requirements of justice in the instant case. The resignations and elections which took place on May 29, 1945, were a result of pressure brought by the present incumbents upon the old board. Indeed, the proceedings taken on that date may well be considered as part and parcel of the whole effort which resulted in the illegal election on May 9th. The present incumbents came into office by securing votes from security holders on the basis of concealment amounting to misrepresentation. Having secured the so-called plurality of security holders' votes, then they proceeded to bring pressure upon the old board to regularize their election by the corporate maneuvering which took place on May 29th. I am of opinion that what took place on that date must be regarded as part of the same transaction which occurred on May 9th and tainted with the same evils that section 25 of the General Corporation Law is designed to remedy.

Third, it is argued that the petitioners have no standing in this proceeding because they are bondholders rather than stockholders. But they are bondholders who are entitled to vote for the election of directors and as such they are members of the corporation who are "aggrieved" within the meaning of section 25 of the General Corporation Law. Moreover, upon the oral argument, an application was made for leave of stockholders to intervene in this proceeding. Such application is hereby granted and the proceeding continued on behalf of stockholders as well as bondholders. In addition, the petition is joined in by directors of the corporation whose right to question the regularity of these proceedings under section 25 of the General Corporation Law cannot be doubted.

The public interest in the proper conduct of corporate elections is a matter of great concern in the commercial community in which we live. It is of utmost importance that the many millions of security holders throughout the land should have reason to rely upon the integrity of those who manage the affairs of our corporations; that they be permitted the same freedom in the expression of their wishes with respect to the election of directors that is accorded to citizens in political elections. The affidavit filed by the learned Attorney General of the State of New York contains important material, though not specifically relevant to the precise issues before me, and was no doubt presented to the court for the purpose of demonstrating that the atmosphere surrounding the proceedings taken by this corporation on May 9 and May 29, 1945, was completely devoid of that candid and honest dealing which alone justify the refusal of the court to interfere with the internal affairs of a corporation. Our courts have wisely adopted a policy of judicial self-limitation, refraining, wherever possible, from interfering by judicial fiat with management of matters entrusted to directors, officers and stockholders of corporate enterprises. But the court would fail in its plain duty if it did not interpose its equitable process to prevent the continued perpetuation of fraud or to right wrongs which have resulted in depriving security holders of their complete freedom to vote at corporate elections in the light of a complete disclosure of all the relevant facts and circumstances.

The matters before me are, therefore, disposed of as follows: (1) The application to set aside the elections of directors of the Third Avenue Transit Corporation held on May 9 and May 29, 1945, is granted; (2) a new election is directed to be held on a date to be fixed in the order to be entered herein, within thirty days from the date of said order; (3) notice of said meeting is to be given to all security holders entitled to vote thereat, in accordance with the provisions of the bylaws of the corporation; (4) the motion to dismiss the petition is hereby denied; (5) the motion to expunge from the record portions of the affidavit of the Attorney General, sworn to the 26th day of November, 1945, is likewise denied; (6) the court will entertain an application, but only on consent of all the parties hereto, for the appointment of a referee to supervise the forthcoming special election, and to pass upon all letters and communications to be sent to security holders for the solicitation of proxies.

Settle order on notice.

2. RIGHT TO STOCK LIST

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 10. Books to be kept; inspection; presumptive evidence; penalties. Every stock corporation shall keep at its office correct books of account of all its business and transactions, and a book to be known as the stock book, containing the names, alphabetically arranged, of all persons who are stockholders of the corporation, showing their places of residence, the number of shares of stock held by them respectively, the time when they respectively became the owners thereof, and the amount paid thereon. If any such corporation has in this state a transfer agent, such stock book may be deposited in the office of such agent, or may be kept in the office of the corporation, at its option, provided, that if kept in the office of the transfer agent there shall be posted in a conspicuous place in the office of the corporation a statement setting forth that fact with the name and address of the transfer agent where the stock book is kept. The stock book of every such corporation shall be open daily, during at least three business hours, for inspection by any judgment creditor of the corporation; or by any person who shall have been a stockholder of record in such corporation for at least six months immediately preceding his demand; or by any person holding or thereunto in writing authorized by the holders of at least five per centum of all its outstanding shares; provided (a) that such inspection shall not be for the purpose of communicating with stockholders in the interest of a business or object other than the business of the corporation, and (b) that such stockholder or other person has not within five years sold or offered for sale any list of stockholders of such corporation or any other corporation, or aided or abetted any person in procuring any stock list for any such purpose; and provided further that such inspection may be denied to such stockholder or other person upon refusal to furnish to such corporation or its transfer agent a written statement that such inspection is not desired for purpose (a) and that such stockholder or other person has not been connected with any stock list as provided in (b). Persons so entitled to inspect stock books may make extracts therefrom. No transfer of stock shall be valid as against the corporation, its stockholders and creditors for any purpose except to render the transferee liable for the debts of the corporation to the extent provided for in this chapter until it shall have been entered in such book as required by this section, by an entry showing from and to whom transferred; nor, in the case of domestic stock life insurance corporation until ten days after written notice of such transfer shall have been filed in the office of the superintendent of insurance. Every corporation that shall neglect or refuse to keep or cause to be kept such books, or to keep any stock book open for inspection, as herein required, shall forfeit to the people the sum of fifty dollars for every day it shall so neglect or refuse. If any officer or agent of any such corporation shall willfully neglect or refuse to make any proper entry in such book or books, or shall neglect or refuse to exhibit any such stock book, or to allow any such stock book to be inspected and extracts taken therefrom as provided in this section, the corporation and such officer or agent shall each forfeit and pay to the party injured a penalty of fifty dollars for every such neglect or refusal, and all damages resulting to him therefrom. Nothing herein shall impair the power of the courts to compel the production for examination of the books of a corporation. The stock book and books of account of every stock corporation shall be presumptive evidence of the facts therein so stated in favor of the plaintiff, in any action or proceeding against such corporation or any of its officers, directors or stockholders.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 29. Voting List of Stockholders; Preparation; Inspection; Refusal to Produce; Penalty; Voting Powers of Security Holders:—It shall be the duty of the officer who shall have charge of the stock ledger of a corporation to prepare and make, at least ten days before every election of directors, a complete list of the stockholders entitled to vote at said election, arranged in alphabetical order. Such list shall be open at the place where said election is to be held for said ten days, to the examination of any stockholder, and shall be produced and kept at the time and place of election during the whole time thereof, and subject to the inspection of any stockholder who may be present. Upon the wilful neglect or refusal of the said directors to produce such a list at any election they shall be ineligible to any office at such election. The original or duplicate stock ledger shall be the only evidence as to whom are the stockholders entitled to examine such list or the books of the corporation, or to vote in person or by proxy at such election. The original or duplicate stock ledger containing the name and addresses of the stockholders, and the number of shares held by them, respectively, shall, at all times, during the usual hours for business, be open to the examination of every stockholder at its principal office or place of business in this State, and said original or duplicate stock ledger shall be evidence in all courts of this State.

Every corporation, now or hereafter organized under and pursuant to the provisions of this Chapter, may make suitable provision in its Certificate of Incorporation and thereby to the extent, in the manner and subject to the conditions provided in the Certificate of Incorporation confer upon the holders of any bonds or debentures issued or to be issued by any such corporation, whether secured by mortgage or otherwise, the power to vote in respect to the corporate affairs and management of the corporation to the same extent and in the same manner as stockholders of the said corporation, as may be provided in the Certificate of Incorporation and, in case of a default in the payment of the principal or interest on said bonds or debentures, or otherwise, or in any other case, confer upon such bondholders or debenture holders the same right of inspection of the corporate books and accounts and records of any such corporation, and also any other rights, which the stockholders of the corporation have or may have by reason of the provisions of the Statutes of this State or pursuant to the provisions of the Certificate of Incorporation.

Sec. 30. Election of Directors; Filling of Vacancies.—All elections of directors shall be by ballot, unless otherwise provided in the Certificate of Incorporation. The first meeting for the election of directors at which meeting any business may be transacted shall be held at any place either within or without this State fixed by a majority of the incorporators in a writing signed by them, and thereafter the said directors shall be elected at the time and place within or without this State named in the by-laws, and which shall not be changed within sixty days next before the day on which the election is to be held. A notice of any change shall be given to each stockholder twenty days before the election is held, in person or by letter mailed to his last known postoffice address.

Vacancies shall be filled by a majority of the remaining directors, though less than a quorum, unless it is otherwise provided in the Certificate of Incorporation or the by-laws and the directors so chosen shall hold office until the next annual election and until their successors shall be duly elected and qualified, unless sooner displaced; provided, however, that, if the remaining directors shall constitute less than a majority of the whole Board, upon application of any stockholder or stockholders holding at least ten per cent (10%) of the total number of shares of the capital stock of the corporation at the time outstanding having the right to vote for directors, the Chancellor may in his discretion, summarily order an election to be held to fill any such vacancy or vacancies or to replace the director or directors chosen by the remaining directors as aforesaid, which election shall be governed by the provisions of Section 31 of this Chapter in so far as such provisions are applicable. The person or persons elected pursuant to said order shall serve as a director or as directors until the next annual meeting of stockholders and until their successors shall have been duly elected and qualified, and shall displace any person or persons who may theretofore have been appointed by the remaining directors as aforesaid.

STATE ex rel. GRISMER et al. v. MERGER MINES CORPORATION et al.

Supreme Court of Washington, 1940. 3 Wash.2d 417, 101 P.2d 308.

Mandamus proceeding by the State, on the relation of J. V. Grismer and others, against the Merger Mines Corporation, a corporation, and others. From a judgment for the plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

ROBINSON, JUSTICE. The Merger Mines Corporation is organized under the laws of Arizona. It is authorized to do business in this state, and has a registered office in the city of Spokane. The respondents are shareholders. This action was instituted upon their relation for the purpose of obtaining an inspection of the books and records of the corporation, including the share register or list of shareholders. The complaint alleged that proper demand for such inspection had been made upon the officers of the corporation, and that such demand had been refused. The appellants, in their answer, admitted that the respondents were shareholders of the corporation, and that a demand for an inspection of the books and records of the corporation had been made. They admitted that they had refused to allow an inspection of the share register or list of shareholders, and alleged, by way of an affirmative defense, that an inspection of the share register was sought for the purpose of harassing the corporation, stirring up strife among the shareholders, and bringing about a change in the management. * * *

Appellants' first contention is that "no proper proof was made of the laws of the State of Arizona governing the right of a stockholder to inspect corporate records as of the date when demand was made herein." The contention is that there is no presumption that the act of 1935 was in force and effect on the date respondents demanded an inspection of the books and records of the corporation. Courts are warranted in reposing confidence in the permanency and stability of the laws of a sister state, to the extent that, when a statute is proven to have existed, it will be assumed to remain in force in the absence of evidence showing its repeal. (Citing cases)

But even if the statute has been repealed, the common law right of a stockholder to examine the books and records of the corporation at proper times and for proper purposes remains. State ex rel. Weinberg v. Pacific Brewing & Malting Co., 21 Wash. 451, 58 P. 584, 47 L.R.A. 208; Guthrie v. Harkness, 199 U.S. 148, 26 S.Ct. 4, 50 L.Ed. 130, 4 Ann.Cas. 433. And, under the common law rule, as it prevails in most states, and under statutes similar to the Arizona statute, the burden of showing improper motives on the part of the shareholder in demanding an inspection of the books and records of the corporation is upon the defendant. It is presumed, until the contrary is shown, that the shareholder seeks the information for a proper purpose. [Citing cases.]

* * * As illustrative of this type of case, see State ex rel. Boldt v. St. Cloud Milk Producers' Ass'n, 200 Minn. 1, 273 N.W. 603; Soreno Hotel Co. v. State ex rel. Otis Elevator Co., 107 Fla. 195, 144 So. 339.

It is also the rule that the books and records of the corporation which the shareholder is entitled to inspect include the share register or list of shareholders. [Citing cases.]

It may well be doubted whether, under the weight of authority, proof of the affirmative matter set up in the answer in this case would have barred the relief asked. State ex rel. Beaty v. Guarantee Mfg. Co., 103 Wash. 151, 174 P. 459. In the complete absence of such proof, the respondents were unquestionably entitled to the writ.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

DAVIDS et al. v. SILLCOX et al.

Supreme Court of New York, Special Term, 1946. 188 Misc. 45, 66 N.Y.S.2d 508.

Proceedings under the Civil Practice Act, § 1283 et seq., by Nancy Davids and another against Luise M. Sillcox as executive Secretary of the Authors' Guild of the Authors' League of America, Incorporated, and another for an order compelling respondents to permit petitioners to inspect the Guild's list of members and the minutes of the meeting for the preceding year, of the Guild's governing body.

Application granted in accordance with opinion.

SHIENTAG, JUSTICE. The respondent Authors' Guild is a division of the Authors' League of America, a membership corporation. The petitioners are members. Proceeding under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Act, the petitioners seek an order compelling respondents to permit them to inspect the Guild's list of members and the minutes of the meetings for the preceding year, of the Guild's governing body.

The Authors' League of America was incorporated in 1912 "to protect the rights and property of all authors". The membership was divided into four "Guilds", of which respondent is one, which operate to some degree autonomously. The respondent has over two thousand members. The direction of its affairs is in the hands of a Council, which consists of thirty members elected at the respondent's annual meeting. Special meetings may be called at the direction of the Council or upon the written request of fifty members.

Petitioners belong to a group of members which is dissatisfied with the conduct of the Guild's affairs. Calling itself "The Committee for Action in the Authors' Guild," this group urges the adoption of a uniform author-publisher contract which would provide for the leasing rather than the outright sale of the book and subsidiary rights, the establishment of basic minimum terms with respect to magazine articles, and the attainment of certain other objectives which the group regards as desirable. The respondent asserts that in so far as these objectives are in the interests of the membership, either they have already been attained, or efforts toward their attainment are in progress.

The application assigns as reasons for the requested relief that the petitioners wish to be informed of the activities of the Council during the preceding year, and to discuss the Council's actions with other members of the Guild. The annual membership meeting, petitioners assert, is inadequate for this purpose, since the membership is large and geographically diffuse. They say that the information sent out by the Council is incomplete; that the membership does not know who attends particular meetings of the Council and who votes for and against particular proposals. They have asked the respondents for copies of the minutes and the membership list, but their request has been rejected. They assert that the usual recourse in a representative organization—the election of new officers—is denied them because of their inability to address their arguments to their unknown fellow-members.

The answer of the respondents denies certain allegations of the petition, and sets up objections in point of law and certain affirmative defenses.

The first affirmative defense alleges that with respect to the petitioners' plan to set up regional chapters and to hold quarterly membership meetings, a similar proposal was transmitted to the membership, upon the petitioners' urging, and the proposal was overwhelmingly defeated. The petitioners reply that in presenting the proposal the Council heavily censored the arguments in support thereof.

The second affirmative defense alleges that publicity would be ruinous to the Guild's plans to improve contracts with publishers, and that a revelation to the membership of the discussions and actions at Council meetings would inevitably lead to a disclosure to publishers. At such meetings, it is stated, "charges are sometimes heard; complaints, criticisms and disclosures made; plagiarism accusations discussed; on occasion specific inquiries involving pending negotiations between authors and named publishers or others are in consideration." The petitioners reply that the alleged anxiety lest publishers receive confidential information is "strange" in view of the fact that until recently one of the members of the Council was himself an editor of an important magazine. Respondents' affidavit in rebuttal defends the integrity of this individual but does not deny his position.

The third defense alleges that the membership is kept informed of the affairs of the Council, contrary to petitioners' averments, by the circulation of an "Authors' League Bulletin". This defense also alleges that the Council has taken action on the petitioners' request for a membership list and inspection of the minutes, and has determined that the granting of such requests would be detrimental to the membership. * * *

Petitioners reply that the information in the Authors' League Bulletin is inadequate; that many professional organizations have no hesitancy in disclosing their membership rolls; that publicly distributed directories list persons by occupations, and that "If any assurance were needed, petitioners would not hesitate to assure this court that they have no intention of distributing any membership list to any commercial organization for purposes not germane to the affairs of the Guild." * * *

The fourth defense states that the dissident group to which petitioners belong proposed a separate slate of candidates in the elections of 1945; that argumentative matter in support of these candidates was sent out with the ballots, and that the slate was defeated. The respondents refer to a by-law adopted by the Council in September, 1946, governing the transmission of material to members. The by-law provides that no membership list shall be furnished without specific authorization from the Council, and that, at the request of fifty members, the Secretary shall mail to the membership material dealing with any matter "upon which a mail vote is pending". The petitioners assert that the procedure set up is altogether inadequate because of the limitation to matters presented for vote, and charge that the by-law was specifically designed to foreclose the relief which petitioners seek.

The fifth defense points out that any fifteen members of the Guild may nominate candidates and refers again to the petitioners' unsuccessful effort to win an election, emphasizing the opportunity afforded to the petitioners to send out campaign material with the ballots. The petitioners reply that a single mailing of material cannot substitute for a full and free exchange of information.

The questions presented to the court, broadly stated, are whether the court has power to direct the desired inspection in cases of this type, and, assuming the power, whether and how the court's discretion should be exercised in this particular case.

The courts of this state have many times held, in connection with stock corporations, that there is an inherent power, apart from and unaffected by particular statutory provisions, to order a disclosure of corporate books and records to a petitioning stockholder. No valid distinction can be made on the ground that a membership corporation rather than a stock corporation is involved. While counsel have not brought to the court's attention any case dealing with an inspection of the books and records of a membership corporation, the power of mandamus, from which the power to issue an order of this type under Article 78 is derived, is not limited to stock corporations. In the leading case on this general subject (Matter of Steinway, 159 N.Y. 250, 258, 53 N.E. 1103, 1105, 45 L.R.A. 461), the Court of Appeals, after a careful historical review of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, stated: "The right of a corporator, who has an interest, in common with the other corporators, to inspect the books and records of the corporation, for a proper purpose and under reasonable circumstances, was recognized by the courts of King's bench and chancery from an early day, and enforced by motion or mandamus, but always with caution, so as to prevent abuse." * * *

The respondents cite Section 26 of the Membership Corporations Law, stating that the petitioners seek their relief under that section and that none of the situations specified in that section is present here. However, the petition is not based on that section nor are the petitioners' rights limited by its provisions. Although the term "visitation" is applied both to the power to order inspection and to the power contemplated in Section 26, it is clear that something quite different from what is sought here is dealt with in that section. The statute is directed to situations where it is shown that the corporation has been mismanaged; the power of mandamus to compel disclosure goes beyond the field of mismanagement (Durr v. Paragon Trading Corporation, 270 N.Y. 464, 1 N.E.2d 967), and the enactment of this statute cannot be deemed to have extinguished the inherent power. Cf. Matter of Steinway, 159 N.Y. 250, 53 N.E. 1103, 45 L.R.A. 461. The power, then, exists; there is no doubt, however, that it is a discretionary one. [Citing cases.] The standard which governs the exercise of the court's discretion is easily stated. Ordinarily, the court will direct a corporation to open its books and records to its members if the purpose for which inspection is sought appears to be a proper one. However, as the cases cited above show, the order of inspection will by no means issue perfunctorily upon the mere statement of a purpose which appears to be proper, and its issuance may be subject to such limitations and safeguards as the circumstances require. The blackmailer, the scandalmonger, the irresponsible busybody and trouble maker, the professed seeker of information which is really intended to be used for some ulterior purpose, will be given no consideration by the court.

The propriety of petitioners' purpose is revealed by respondent, although, paradoxically, the revelation is made as part of an argument in opposition. Much of what respondent has to say against the application is summarized in the concluding sentence of its brief, which states: "It is clear that the undisclosed purpose of the group is to attack the governing body, * * *." This purpose is neither undisclosed nor improper. A distinction must be made between an attempt to subvert an organization and an attempt to impugn or to replace its present leadership. The former, of course, could not furnish the basis for the issuance of the writ; the corporation obviously should not be compelled to aid in its own harm or destruction. But it is the interests of the corporation, and not those of the group which holds power within the corporation, which the court must protect. The amendment of a corporation's procedures and the replacement of its present officers are legitimate objectives for members of the corporation. The petitioners' projects, in aid of which they seek the disclosure, are directed toward what they conceive to be the interests of the membership. It is not for the court to say how well they are adapted toward that end, or whether the petitioners' or the respondents' program is better for the members of the corporation. Respondents' papers contain no averment that petitioners seek the disclosure for some purpose other than those described above. Accordingly, there is no triable issue of fact as to the propriety of the petitioners' purpose.

The purpose being proper, are there any considerations which require that the application be denied? The respondents urge that disclosure of the names and addresses of the members would be dangerous. The dangers do not seem to me to be serious enough to deny to the petitioners the access which they might otherwise have. The problems peculiar to a stock corporation (where the right to lists of shareholders and bondholders is governed by statute) are not present here; we are not faced with the risk that a list of security-holders may be used by those having knowledge which the scattered investors lack, to the detriment of those investors and to the profit of those possessing the list. The only concrete danger which respondents set forth is that the list would have "a high financial value to organizations whose business it is to sell lists 'of prospects' in various fields of business endeavor." This danger cannot be regarded as a serious one. Nor can the fact that various members have requested that their addresses be kept confidential be given weight on this application. Section 46 of the Membership Corporations Law provides that the directors of a membership corporation shall present at its annual meeting a report which includes, among other things, the names and addresses of all persons who have become members of the corporation during the preceding year. If this provision is complied with, a complete membership list is available to any member who attends all the yearly meetings. Since the statute contemplates this degree of publicity, the court cannot say that there are reasons for keeping the membership list secret which must outweigh the considerations in favor of disclosure.

However, the order will enjoin the use of the list for any purposes other than those related to Guild affairs. There may be situations where, instead of ordering access to the list of the names and addresses of members, it would suffice to direct the mailing to the membership at large of material prepared by objecting members. Here, however, such an expedient would not serve petitioners' legitimate purposes. The expense of copying the list of members and their addresses must, of course, be borne by the petitioners.

Respondents' objections to disclosing the minutes of the Council meetings are more substantial, for the potentialities of harm described by the respondents are real. The discussions at Council meetings may well involve matters which, from the point of view of the general membership, should be kept confidential. No case has been cited by counsel dealing with an inspection of minutes of the executive board of a corporation. While the mandamus power undoubtedly extends to all corporate books and records (see Brentmore Estates, Inc., v. Hotel Barbizon, 263 App.Div. 389, 394, 33 N.Y.S.2d 331, 336) a wise discretion may dictate that certain records are to be more jealously guarded than others. Included in the category of records which the courts should be slow to open are records of the deliberations of the governing bodies of organizations whose activities include arm's-length negotiations with outsiders.

However, the principal object of the petitioners in this regard—information concerning the past activities of the Council—can be substantially accomplished without disclosing the confidential discussions or transactions which respondents urge should be kept secret. This can be done by limiting the disclosure to the dates of the meetings, the names of those present, the subjects that were taken up, and the formal resolutions and action taken at each meeting. The respondents will not be required to disclose minutes of proposals, discussions or negotiations, nor will they be required to disclose resolutions dealing entirely with the action taken in matters limited in scope to the affairs of individual members of the organization. These limitations are imposed, not in the interests of the present governing officials, but in the interests of the membership as a whole. If there is any substantial difficulty concerning the scope of the inspection of the minutes, as above limited, the order to be settled may provide that the inspection take place under the supervision of a referee to be appointed by the court.

Certain of respondents' objections not specifically dealt with above may be referred to briefly. The petitioners' legitimate purposes being proved, it does not matter that the petition charges no bad faith, malice or violation of organization rules. The various arguments based on the court's unwillingness to interfere with the management of corporations, and cases such as City Bank Farmers' Trust Co. v. Hewitt Realty Co., 257 N.Y. 62, 177 N.E. 309, 76 A.L.R. 881, Flynn v. Brooklyn City R. Co., 158 N.Y. 493, 53 N.E. 520, and Van Campen v. Olean General Hospital, 210 App.Div. 204, 205 N.Y.S. 554, have no bearing on the present issue. The Council's decision not to accede to the petitioners' request cannot be regarded as a matter of internal management within the meaning of those cases. If it were to be so regarded, every attempt to inspect corporate records, except where the petitioner could show fraud or bad faith, could be forestalled by the simple device of passing a resolution. The "clear legal right" which the decisions mention is established, as the cases cited earlier in the opinion demonstrate, when a member seeks inspection for a proper purpose. The petitioners have "substantial property rights" in whose aid the court's processes may be invoked, as do the members of a union in an analogous situation. Cf. Dusing v. Nuzzo, 177 Misc. 35, 29 N.Y.S.2d 882.

On the papers before me, it is not questioned that the petitioners are members of the Guild. The disclosure they seek is in connection with plans designed—whether well or poorly designed is immaterial—for the benefit of the corporation. The petitioners' application is granted; the disclosure will be limited, however, in the manner described above, in accordance with what appears to be the best interests of the membership.

The disclosure, despite all safeguards, may result in some inconvenience; the possibility that harm may ensue cannot be entirely avoided. But these risks are, in the present case, greatly outweighed by the benefits to be derived from a more democratic form of procedure that will give all members information as to how their organization is being managed and afford the opportunity to place their views as to its conduct before their fellow members.

Settle order in accordance with the foregoing determination.[4]

3. RIGHT TO INFORMATION

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 77. Financial statement to stockholders. Stockholders owning three per centum of the shares of any corporation other than a moneyed corporation may make a written request to the treasurer or other fiscal officer thereof for a statement of its affairs, under oath, embracing a particular account of all its assets and liabilities, and the treasurer shall make such statement and deliver it to the person making the request within thirty days thereafter, and keep on file in the office of the corporation for twelve months thereafter a copy of such statement, which shall at all times during business hours be exhibited to any stockholder demanding an examination thereof; but the treasurer shall not be required to deliver more than one such statement in any one year. The supreme court, or any justice thereof, may upon application, for good cause shown, extend the time for making and delivering such statement. For every neglect or refusal to comply with the provisions of this section the corporation shall forfeit and pay to the person making such request the sum of fifty dollars, and the further sum of ten dollars for every twenty-four hours thereafter until such statement shall be furnished.

GUTHRIE v. HARKNESS.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1905. 199 U.S. 148, 26 S.Ct. 4.

The defendant in error was the owner of nearly one-fifth of the capital stock of the Commercial National Bank of Ogden, Utah. As such shareholder he applied for leave to inspect the books, accounts and loans of the bank, which was refused him. He alleges the reasons for seeking such inspection to be that he might ascertain the value of his stock in the bank and whether the business affairs of the same had been conducted according to law. He charges that loans had been made to patrons of the bank of more than one-tenth of the capital stock in violation of law, and that an inspection of the books, accounts and loans of the bank would reveal other irregularities. * * *

MR. JUSTICE DAY, * * * There can be no question that the decisive weight of American authority recognizes the common law right of the shareholder, for proper purposes and under reasonable regulations as to place and time, to inspect the books of the corporation of which he is a member. Morawetz in his work on Corporations, section 473, says:

"However, in the United States the prevailing doctrine appears to be that the individual shareholders in a corporation have the same right as the members of an ordinary partnership to examine their company's books, although they have no power to interfere with the management." * * *

The right of inspection rests upon the proposition that those in charge of the corporation are merely the agents of the stockholders who are the real owners of the property. Cincinnati Volksblatt Co. v. Hoffmeister, 62 Ohio St. 189, 201, 56 N.E. 1033.

It is suggested in argument that if the shareholder has this right it may be abused, in that he may make an improper use of the knowledge thus gained. There is nothing in this record, however, to suggest, by way of argument or testimony, that the shareholder desired the information which the books would give for other than a lawful purpose. On the other hand, there is a distinct finding that the inspection was desired for the purpose of ascertaining the true financial condition of the bank and for the purpose of enabling the complainant to find out the value of his stock, and whether its business was being conducted according to law. There is no suggestion that the complainant was acting in bad faith or from improper motives, or that he was seeking in any way to misuse the information which the books would afford him. We need not hold that there may not be circumstances which would justify the courts in withholding relief to a stockholder seeking an examination of the books and accounts of the bank. In the case before us no reason is shown for denying to the stockholder the right to know how his agents are conducting the affairs of a concern of which he is part owner. Many legal rights may be the subjects of abuse, but cannot be denied for that reason. A director, who has the right to an examination of the books, may abuse the confidence reposed in him. Certainly this possibility will not be held to justify a denial of legal right, if such right exists in the shareholder. The possibility of the abuse of a legal right affords no ground for its denial. State ex rel. Doyle v. Laughlin, 53 Mo.App. 542, supra; People v. Goldstein, 37 App.Div.N.Y. 550, 56 N.Y.S. 306. The text books are to the same effect as the decided cases. Cook on Stock and Stockholders, sec. 511; Boone on Law of Banking, sec. 235; Angel & Ames on Corporations, 607.

It does not follow that the courts will compel the inspection of the bank's books under all circumstances. In issuing the writ of mandamus the court will exercise a sound discretion and grant the right under proper safeguards to protect the interests of all concerned. The writ should not be granted for speculative purposes or to gratify idle curiosity or to aid a blackmailer, but it may not be denied to the stockholder who seeks the information for legitimate purposes. In re Steinway, 159 N.Y. 250, 53 N.E. 1103; Thompson on Corporations, § 4412 et seq. * * *

Finding nothing in the act of Congress limiting the common law right of the shareholder, we think that, under the circumstances of this case, he was wrongfully denied an inspection of the books and accounts of the bank by its officers, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Utah is affirmed.

ALBEE v. LAMSON & HUBBARD CORPORATION et al.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1946. 69 N.E.2d 811.

Proceeding by Arthur L. Albee for a writ of mandamus to compel the Lamson & Hubbard Corporation and another to permit petitioner to examine certain records, accounts, and documents of respondent corporation. Order to allow examination of certain classes of records, books, and documents, and respondents bring exceptions.

Exceptions sustained.

RONAN, JUSTICE. The respondents have excepted to an order requiring them to permit the petitioner, a stockholder in the respondent corporation, to examine certain corporate records, accounts and documents. The bill of exceptions states that the case came on to be heard on the petition and answer, and that the judge entered an order which, after stating that "it was agreed" by the respondents that "the facts were as set forth in the petition," ordered the respondents to allow an examination of four different classes of records, books and documents.

The petition for a writ of mandamus alleged that the petitioner was a stockholder in the respondent corporation; that he had made a demand for the examination of certain books and records; and that such demand had been refused. These allegations were admitted by the respondents' answer, which further alleged that the petitioner had brought a bill in equity against the respondent corporation and others, the pleadings in which were made a part of the answer. The answer also alleged that the petition was brought in aid of the said bill in equity; that the petitioner had a plain and adequate remedy in the equity suit to enforce his right of inspection of the corporate books and records; that the petition for a writ of mandamus was intended to oppress and harass the respondents and was unnecessary; and that the petitioner was barred by laches from maintaining the petition. * * *

Our inquiry is whether on the facts alleged and admitted the petitioner was entitled to prevail. At the outset it must be observed that the petitioner is not seeking to enforce any statutory right of examination of the books and records specified in G.L.(Ter.Ed.) c. 155, § 22, and no such statutory right is involved in the present case. See Powelson v. Tennessee Eastern Electric Co., 220 Mass. 380, 107 N.E. 997, Ann.Cas.1917A, 102; Shea v. Parker, 234 Mass. 592, 126 N.E. 47.

The common law right of a stockholder to examine the books and accounts of the corporation is not an absolute right but is a qualified one. Stockholders are the beneficial owners of all the assets of the corporation, and they are entitled to reliable information as to the financial condition of the corporation, the manner in which its business has been conducted and its affairs have been managed, and whether those to whom they have entrusted their property have acted faithfully and efficiently in the interests of the corporation. A stockholder who is acting in good faith for the purpose of advancing the interests of the corporation and protecting his own interest as a stockholder is generally entitled to examine the corporate records and accounts. But he has no such right to an examination if his purpose be to satisfy his curiosity, to annoy or harass the corporation, or to accomplish some object hostile to the corporation or detrimental to its interests. [Citing cases.]

The burden of proof was upon the petitioner to allege and prove his good faith and a proper purpose. His right being a qualified one, he fails if his petition and proof are insufficient to bring his case within the limitations of his common law right. There was error in ordering the writ to issue, where, as here, all that appeared was that the petitioner was a stockholder and that his demand for an examination of certain books, records and documents had been denied. [Citing cases.]

Exceptions sustained.

SLAY v. POLONIA PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Supreme Court of Michigan, 1930. 249 Mich. 609, 229 N.W. 434.

Action by Louis C. Slay against the Polonia Publishing Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings certiorari.

Reversed, and petition dismissed.

SHARPE, J. Plaintiff, the owner of one share of stock in the defendant company, petitioned for mandamus to compel its officers to permit him to inspect and examine the books and statements of the corporation. Defendant seeks review by certiorari of the order of the trial court granting the writ.

Plaintiff's right thereto is based upon the following provision in section 11 of chapter 1 of part 2 of Act No. 84, Pub. Acts 1921:

"The books of every corporation containing its accounts shall be kept, and shall at all reasonable times be open in the city, village or town where such corporation is located, or at the office of the treasurer of such corporation within this state, for inspection by any of the stockholders of said corporation, and said stockholders shall have access to the books and statements of said corporation and shall have the right to examine the same in the said city, village or town or at said office."

Before its enactment, this court had held that, under the common law, a stockholder in a corporation had the right in a proper case, and for a proper purpose, to inspect the corporate records. Woodworth v.

Old Second Natl. Bank, 154 Mich. 459, 117 N.W. 893, 118 N.W. 581; Eldred v. Elliott, 161 Mich. 262, 126 N.W. 219. But such right was a qualified, and not an absolute one. The duty devolved upon the stockholder to make it appear to the officers that he was actuated by motives that were lawful and proper, and that his purpose in securing the information was to subserve the interests of the corporation or his personal interest as a holder of corporate stock.

The provision in the statute above quoted contains no such limitation. This court must assume that the Legislature was aware of the rights of the stockholder under the common law, and that its purpose in including this provision in the Corporation Act was to make some change therein. It cannot be said to be merely declaratory of the common law, for the reason that it omits the requirement in that law as to the duty devolving on the stockholder, as above stated, when making his request.

It is to be assumed that the request is made for a proper purpose; that the stockholder is acting in good faith, and seeking thereby to protect his own interest or that of the corporation, and therefore his request therefor need not be accompanied by any statement of his purpose. The statute accords the right to him, and he is entitled to the privilege for the asking. See notes in 22 A.L.R. 24; 43 A.L.R. 783.

Thus far it may fairly be said there is substantial uniformity in the holdings of the courts. But, when his request is denied, and he seeks mandatory relief, and the answer of the corporation sets up facts from which it appears that his purpose is not as above stated, but is inimical to the best interests of the corporation and its other stockholders, and these facts are conceded, or established by proofs, the authorities are much at variance as to the duty of the court to issue the writ.

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin (State ex rel. Dempsey v. Werra Aluminum Foundry Co., 173 Wis. 651, 182 N.W. 354, 22 A.L.R. 1) has held that the writ will issue as a matter of course, but intimates that the stockholder may be prevented from using the information thus secured for an unlawful purpose. In Johnson v. Langdon, 135 Cal. 624, 67 P. 1050, 1052, 87 Am.St.Rep. 156, the right of the stockholder is held to be absolute, and that he cannot "be met with the defense that his motives are improper." In Wilson v. Mackinaw State Bank, 217 Ill.App. 494, it was said that the right was absolute, and did not depend upon any circumstance or condition except the ownership of stock. There are other decisions of similar import, although later cases in some of the same courts qualify the language used.

But the great weight of authority sustains the rule that, while the right given by the statute is absolute, mandamus is a discretionary writ, which will not be issued to enforce such right except for a just cause and a proper purpose. * * *

Mandamus is the proper remedy of a stockholder to secure such right. Leach v. Davy, 199 Mich. 378, 165 N.W. 927. It is "not a writ of right * * * and will not issue to compel an unlawful act, or to work an injustice." Johnson v. Board of Supervisors, 202 Mich. 597, 600, 168 N.W. 421, 422. The question presented, then, is this, Under the facts appearing in this record, was the plaintiff entitled to the writ?

The defendant in its answer to the order to show cause, verified by its vice president and general manager, averred that the real owner of the share of stock assigned to plaintiff was one Louis Wojcik. The seventh paragraph thereof reads as follows:

"That as to the matters alleged in paragraph seven of said petition, this respondent says that one, Louis Wojcik, is, and has been for some time past, the principal owner and the editor of the Polish Daily News, the sole competitor of this respondent in publishing a Polish daily newspaper in the city of Detroit. That the said Louis Wojcik has interviewed numerous of the advertisers, whose advertisements appear in the issues of this respondent's paper, and falsely stated to them that this respondent did not have the circulation it claimed to have; that it was losing money and it would only be a matter of time when he, the said Louis Wojcik, would own this respondent or put it out of business; and that they, the advertisers, were foolish in wasting their time in advertising in respondent's paper, and made divers and false statements relative to this respondent corporation, to its paper, and to its business, and made threats to divers persons that he would ruin this respondent, and, as a part of his scheme so to do, this respondent shows that in the month of June or July in the year 1927, he induced one, Anthony Glowczewski, to buy one share of this respondent's capital stock, and to that end the said Anthony Glowczewski approached one, Dr. Lazowski, and purchased from the said Dr. Lazowski one share of stock, and that the consideration therefor was paid to the said Anthony Glowczewski by the said Louis Wojcik.

"This respondent further shows that the said Louis C. Slay, alleged petitioner herein, was and is an employee of the said Louis Wojcik, and has been associated with him in business for some years in the Detroit Commerce Corporation and in other enterprises; and avers and charges the truth to be, that the said Louis C. Slay is merely a figurehead for the said Louis Wojcik, and that the said Louis Wojcik is desirous of obtaining the information sought by the said Louis C. Slay for the purpose of using the same against the best interests of this respondent and of the stockholders, and of distorting the information obtained thereby for the purpose of unfair competition with this respondent and with its business, and for the purpose of attempting to cripple this respondent and its stockholders, and that the information sought by this alleged petitioner is not sought in good faith, nor for the personal use of said petitioner, and that the furnishing of such information would be detrimental to the interests of all the stockholders of this respondent, but, as aforesaid, it is merely a blind to obtain such information to use in an unjust and unfair attempt to injure and damage this respondent and its stockholders."

At the opening of the hearing, counsel for the defendant said: "If the relator is willing to make it the sole issue, that is, that the motive for the obtainance of information is not relevant to the issue and that he has a right of inspection irrespective of motives or desires; then I am willing to proceed. If he is willing to admit that it does not make any difference what a man's motives are, but that he has a right to inspect the books irrespective of any ulterior or improper motives."

After some discussion, he further said: "Your proposition is that no matter how detrimental to the Polonia Publishing Company your desire may be, it is absolutely material (immaterial)." To which counsel for the plaintiff replied: "Absolute, unless it appears we are going to perpetrate a criminal act."

We must therefore accept the statements in the answer above quoted as expressive of the purpose of the plaintiff in seeking the inspection. It needs no analysis of the language used to conclude that such purpose was entirely foreign to his status as a stockholder, that the privilege of inspection by him was not sought in good faith for the protection of the interests of the corporation, or of his own interest as a stockholder, and that he was not entitled to the writ.

The order is reversed and set aside, and the petition dismissed, with costs to appellant.

TATE v. SONOTONE CORPORATION et al.

Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, First Department, 1947.
272 App.Div. 103, 69 N.Y.S.2d 535.

Proceeding in the matter of the application of Bertram B. Tate against Sonotone Corporation and others, for an order, under article 78 of the Civil Practice Act directing defendants to permit petitioner to inspect the stock book of defendant corporation. From an order for petitioner, defendants appeal.

Reversed and motion denied.

PER CURIAM. The order below authorizes petitioner to inspect and make extracts from the stock book of appellant Sonotone Corporation as a stockholder under section 10 of the Stock Corporation Law. The proceeding is in the nature of mandamus under art. 78 of the Civil Practice Act. "While Section 10 of the Stock Corporation Law gives stockholders the right to inspect the stock book of a corporation, the court may consider the purpose of such an examination on an application for an order under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Act, and may, in its discretion, deny such an application where the purpose is not consonant with law, the business of the corporation or good faith. Matter of Coombs v. Edwards, 280 N.Y. 361, 364, 21 N.E.2d 353, 354; Matter of Durr v. Paragon Trading Corp., 270 N.Y. 464, 469, 1 N.E. 2d 967, 969." Baker v. Macfadden Publications, Inc., 270 App.Div. 440, 443, 59 N.Y.S.2d 841, 844. That is similar to the common law rule (Matter of Steinway, 159 N.Y. 250, 53 N.E. 1103, 45 L.R.A. 461) and, although it has sometimes been stated that the right of inspection under what is now section 10 of the Stock Corporation Law is absolute (Henry v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 196 N.Y. 302, 89 N.E. 942, 134 Am.St.Rep. 835), "during the last few years, especially, the principle that the stockholder's bad faith and improper purposes or motives constitute a bar to the judicial enforcement of the right of inspection has received new support. As said in one late case, 'the trend, however, is toward a reversion to the common-law rule, which makes motive and good faith material in an application for inspection.' In some of the states where the courts originally took the position that the positive terms of the statute were mandatory with respect to the granting of mandamus to enforce the right, as well as to the abstract right itself, that extreme position has been receded from, especially with respect to the remedy, either by the legislature, or by the courts themselves in overruling or limiting their former decisions and adhering to the common-law rule that on application to the courts to enforce the right, a showing of bad faith and improper purpose or motives are sufficient to move the court to exercise its discretion against enforcing the right." (Fletcher: Cyclopedia Corporations, 1931 ed., Vol. 5, sec. 2220; see annotation 59 A.L.R. 1375 et seq.)

It is not intimated that the burden is on the stockholder affirmatively to show his good faith, but where, as here, the papers before the court establish that the purpose of the inspection is unrelated to the welfare of the petitioner as a stockholder, the application should be denied. If the papers before the court disclosed an issue of fact on this subject, an order in the nature of an alternative mandamus would be warranted, but the facts in this record lead only to the conclusion that the application is made in bad faith. That petitioner is not motivated by a desire to aid a competing business has no tendency to establish that he is trying to better his economic position as stockholder where what actuates him is clearly "disinterested malevolence" (American Bank & Trust Co. v. Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, Georgia, 256 U.S. 350, 41 S.Ct. 499, 65 L.Ed. 983, 25 A.L.R. 971; Beardsley v. Kilmer, 236 N.Y. 80, 88–90, 140 N.E. 203, 205, 206, 27 A.L.R. 1411) against the individuals in charge of the corporation. * * *

Order reversed with $10 costs and disbursements to the appellants and the motion denied. Settle order on notice.

STATE ex rel. ROGERS v. SHERMAN OIL COMPANY.

Superior Court of Delaware, 1922. 1 W.W.Harr. 570, 117 A. 122.

Mandamus by the State of Delaware, on the relation of Remington Rogers, against the Sherman Oil Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Delaware. Motion to quash return granted in part, and refused in part.

Petition granted against respondent for the purpose of determining the value of relator's stock; refused as to the Gates Oil Company.

PENNEWILL, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court:

This case is before the court on a motion to quash certain parts of respondent's answer or return to the alternative writ.

There are three questions raised by the petition and answer:

(1) The right of the petitioner to inspect the books and papers of the defendant company.

(2) The right to inspect the books and papers of the Gates Oil Company.

(3) The right to make copies of such books and papers.

The right of the petitioner to inspect the books and papers of the Sherman Oil Company, the respondent, is not seriously controverted; indeed, it is granted in the return. But, even if it was not granted or admitted, the court would feel constrained to concede the right, under the law of this as well as other states.

Where the reason or motive for inspection is a proper one, the court will grant the right to inspect such books and papers of the respondent corporation as may be necessary to furnish the information desired by the petitioner, such right to be exercised at reasonable and proper times and places.

The reason alleged for inspection in this case is to obtain information that will enable the petitioner to ascertain the value of his stock.

The reason alleged seems to be a proper one, and the court are not convinced by anything averred in respondent's return that it is improper, or not made in good faith.

But the respondent insists that it would be unable to allow inspection of the books and papers of the Gates Oil Company because it has neither the possession or control of them.

It is undisputed that the two companies are legally separate and independent entities; that the directors and officers are entirely distinct; that all the books and papers are kept, not only in different offices, but in different states, and far apart. It is averred in the return that the respondent acquired its stock in the Gates Oil Company purely as an investment; that it has had nothing to do with the financing, management or control of said company, which was and is a going concern, having a profitable business and making gains which could be applied to dividends.

While it is alleged in the petition that the respondent has control of the management, books and papers of the Gates Oil Company, it is not claimed that it is not legally a separate and independent corporation, having directors, officers and place of business entirely distinct from the respondent; it is not alleged that there has been any meeting of the stockholders of the Gates Oil Company since the respondent acquired its stock therein in September last, at which the respondent voted, or could have voted its stock and thereby obtained control of the company.

The relator's case is based entirely on the theory that, because the respondent has a largely preponderating amount of the capital stock of the Gates Oil Company, it has the power to produce, for the inspection of one of its share holders, the books and papers of said company.

It may be that, because of the respondent's large interests in the company, it might exert such persuasive power as to secure the production of its books for the relator's inspection, but in this proceeding we are not dealing with possibilities, but only with the legal power or ability of the respondent to comply with the command of the court, if a peremptory writ should be issued as prayed for by the petitioner.

If the power of the respondent to comply with the writ would be lacking, then, under all the authorities, it should not be issued. To entitle the relator to the issuance of the writ, his right to the relief sought must be clear, and the ability of the respondent to grant the relief must sufficiently appear.

It is true, as argued by the relator, that the respondent's return is not to be accepted as true in respect to averments that are conclusions of law, or that are merely argumentative, but it must be taken to be true as to averments of facts, and the court are of the opinion that from such averments it sufficiently appears that the respondent would not have the legal ability to furnish the relief asked for. The writ is never issued if the court is convinced that it would be unavailing, or that it would be vain and futile for the purpose for which it is sought.

The relator's thought seems to be, that the court may compel the respondent to secure a meeting of the stockholders of the Gates Oil Company, and thereby gain control of the company and furnish for inspection the books and papers desired. It is quite possible that the defendant might be able, by virtue of its stock holdings in said company, to acquire control of it by voting its stock, if a stockholders' meeting were held, but it does not appear that such a meeting has been held since the respondent secured its stock; neither does it appear when or how a meeting could be held under the laws and rules governing the corporation. It is sufficient to say, it is not shown that the respondent was, at the time the petition was filed, is now, or would be if the writ was issued, in a position to comply with its mandate.

So far as the court are informed, this is the first time the question we are now discussing has been distinctly raised in this or any other state. And it so happens that the one case in which a question somewhat analogous to the present one was passed on was in our own state, viz.: Martin v. Martin, 10 Del.Ch. 211, 88 A. 612, 102 A. 373. But that case was different from the one at bar in these particulars: (1) It was in a court of equity where the principles of law are not so controlling as in this court. (2) The companies that were required to produce their books and disclose the information required in connection with the charge of fraudulent mismanagement of corporate affairs, were practically one and the same in so far as management and control were concerned. There were eight companies engaged in the same general business. The president of the respondent company was president of all the allied companies but one, the respondent company owned all the shares of stock of seven of them. All the members of the boards of directors of four of the allied companies were directors of the respondent company, and a majority of the members of the boards of directors of the other four were directors of the respondent company.

It was held that the subsidiary corporations should be regarded by a court of equity as mere instrumentalities of the respondent, and compelled to produce the books of such companies, for discovery, as well as its own.

Certainly a court of equity, under the searching and almost unlimited power it possesses, and its disregard of mere forms, in discovering and revealing fraud, had, under such circumstances the right to compel the production of the books and papers of such companies. The case was different from the one before us, not only because of the character of the court in which it was brought, but also because of the close relations existing between the companies and the identity of management and control. They were not, in fact, independent entities, or separate and distinct, as in the present case.

But, even though the relator has a right to inspect the books, records and papers of the respondent corporation for the purpose of ascertaining the value of his stock, has he the right to make copies thereof?

This question has been considered and passed upon by our own courts, which hold, in conformity with the law laid down by text writers and adjudicated cases elsewhere that:

"The right of a stockholder to make copies, abstracts and memoranda of documents, books and papers is an incident to the right of inspection. * * * The right rests, as does the similar right to examination, upon the broad ground that the business of the corporation is not the business of the officers exclusively, but the business of the stockholders." 4 Fletcher's Enc. of Corporations, 4123, 4124, § 2840; Swift v. Richardson, 7 Houst. 338, 6 A. 856, 32 A. 143, 40 Am.St.Rep. 127; State v. Jessup & Moore Paper Co., 1 Boyce, 379, 398, 77 A. 16, 30 L.R.A.,N.S., 290; State v. Jessup & Moore Paper Co., 3 Boyce, 329, 331, 83 A. 30.

In the last-cited case, it was held that a stockholder has the right to inspect and make copies of such of the books, papers, accounts and writings of the respondent mentioned in his petition, and only of such of them, that are found essential and sufficient to furnish the information whereby the relator may determine the value of his stock.

The court hold in the present case that the relator is entitled to inspect and make copies of such of the books, records and papers of the respondent company, mentioned in his petition, that are essential and sufficient to furnish the information whereby the relator may determine the value of his stock, and that a peremptory writ should be issued for that purpose; but also hold that such writ should not be issued against the respondent company commanding it to permit the relator to inspect and make copies of the books, records and papers of the Gates Oil Company.

The relator's motion to quash the return of respondent is accordingly granted in part and refused in part.

4. STOCKHOLDERS AGREEMENTS AS TO VOTING

(a) Not To Alienate His Vote

PALMBAUM v. MAGULSKY.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1914. 217 Mass. 306, 104 N.E. 746.

Action by Joseph Palmbaum against Abraham M. Magulsky. There was a verdict for defendant, and plaintiff brings exceptions. Sustained, and judgment entered for plaintiff.

CROSBY, J. This is an action of contract upon a promissory note executed and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff for money advanced by him (the plaintiff) to the defendant, with which he (the defendant) purchased certain shares of stock in a corporation known as the American Biscuit Company, in which the plaintiff and one Hoffman were also shareholders. The stock so purchased by the defendant was held by the plaintiff by assignment to secure the payment of the note. It appeared at the trial that about two years after the note was given the defendant agreed with the plaintiff, in consideration of the plaintiff's surrendering the note, to attend a stockholders' meeting of the corporation and vote with the plaintiff to dispose of all the assets of the corporation which, according to the report, amounted to several thousand dollars. Among other defenses in his answer and amended answer, the defendant alleged that he had performed his part of the foregoing agreement. The exceptions set forth substantially all the evidence introduced at the trial, from which it appears that the defendant is liable upon the note, unless his performance of the agreement is a valid defense.

The defendant testified to the making of the agreement and that he had carried out his part thereof, and offered other evidence to the same effect. There was no evidence that the only other stockholder, Hoffman, assented to the agreement or had any knowledge of it.

At the close of the evidence the plaintiff requested the court to make nine rulings, the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth of which were given. The second request was waived. The third was covered substantially by the ninth, which was given. The fourth and fifth requests could not have been given in the form presented.

The court instructed the jury that the agreement, if proved, constituted a defense to the action, to which the plaintiff excepted.

In our opinion the court should have ruled that the agreement was not a defense, and should have instructed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiff in accordance with his first request.

It is the duty of a stockholder of a corporation, in attendance at meetings of the stockholders, to act fairly and in good faith. He is not justified in entering into any agreement to vote so as to perpetrate a fraud upon another stockholder. The defendant's vote to dispose of all the assets of the corporation was in consideration of the surrender of the note to him by the plaintiff. This was illegal, and the agreement was void as against public policy.

As was said by Colt, J., in Guernsey v. Cook, 120 Mass. 501, 502: "It was the purpose and effect of the contract to influence the defendant, in the decision of a question affecting the private rights of others, by considerations foreign to those rights. The promisee was placed under direct inducement to disregard his duties to other members of the corporation, who had a right to demand his disinterested action in the selection of suitable officers. He was in a relation of trust and confidence, which required him to look only to the best interest of the whole, uninfluenced by private gain. The contract operated as a fraud upon his associates." The contract in the case now before us operated as a fraud upon Hoffman.

Where an agreement is made which is either contrary to public policy or fraudulent as to third parties, it will not be enforced, although in the particular instance no injury may have resulted. Gibbs v. Smith, 115 Mass. 592.

In the case of Woodruff v. Wentworth, 133 Mass. 309, this court held that the agreement of a stockholder in a private business corporation, to vote for a certain person as manager, and to vote to increase the salaries of the officers including that of the manager, was void as against public policy, unless it was consented to by all the stockholders of the corporation.

In the case at bar the agreement of the defendant to vote to dispose of all the assets of the corporation without the knowledge or assent of Hoffman was a corrupt bargain and unlawful, and cannot be availed of by him as a defense to the note. See West v. Camden, 135 U.S. 507, 10 S.Ct. 838, 34 L.Ed. 254; Old Dominion Copper Mining & Smelting Co. v. Bigelow, 203 Mass. 159, 198, 199, 89 N.E. 193, 40 L.R.A.,N.S., 314; Northwest Transportation Co., Limited, v. Beatty, 12 App.Cas. 589; Costello v. London General Omnibus Co., 107 L.T. 575.

The exceptions should be sustained, and as substantially all the evidence in the case is before us, and as it appears therefrom that there was no defense to the note, judgment should be entered for the plaintiff under St. 1909, c. 236.

So ordered.

STOTT v. STOTT.

Supreme Court of Michigan, 1932. 258 Mich. 547, 242 N.W. 747.

Action by David E. Stott against Arthur F. Stott. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

POTTER, J. Plaintiff sued defendant declaring on all the common counts in assumpsit, giving notice the cause of action was based upon a promissory note given by defendant to plaintiff December 23, 1925, for $3,460 with interest at 6 per cent. per annum. This promissory note constituted plaintiff's sole bill of particulars. Defendant pleaded the general issue and gave notice that for a valuable consideration plaintiff did release defendant from all liability on the note sued upon. Plaintiff moved for summary judgment. Defendant filed an affidavit of merits which set forth in substance that the consideration for the note sued upon was used to take up checks of the Detroit Milling Company in which both plaintiff and defendant were interested, and defendant, in consideration of plaintiff's promise to cancel the note in question and deliver the same to him, agreed to vote in favor of a loan by the Stott Realty Company to the David Stott Flour Mills Corporation of $150,000, so the plaintiff would not lose his interest therein, and defendant did so and plaintiff now refuses to carry out his agreement. The court rendered summary judgment against defendant, who appeals. The only question is whether the agreement set forth in the affidavit of merits is good. If so, plaintiff is not entitled to summary judgment.

The question is, assuming defendant's affidavit of merits is truthful, whether the agreement alleged to have been made by him with plaintiff, whereby in consideration of the release of defendant from liability on his promissory note he agreed as a stockholder to vote in favor of a loan from the Stott Realty Company to the David Stott Flour Mills Corporation in the sum of $150,000, both plaintiff and defendant being stockholders in both said corporations, and plaintiff being fearful unless such loan could be made he would lose his interest in the David Stott Flour Mills Corporation, was a good and sufficient consideration for the release of defendant from liability on his note. Plaintiff contends such an agreement as is alleged in defendant's affidavit of merits is opposed to public policy and void. Defendant contends such an agreement is valid and binding. In order for such a contract as alleged by defendant in his affidavit of merits to be valid and binding, it must be based upon a consideration. There is a consideration if the promisee in return for a promise does anything legal which he is not bound to do or refrains from doing anything which he has a right to do, whether there is any actual loss or detriment to him or actual benefit to the promissor or not. 9 Cyc. 312, 313; 13 C.J. 316.

The contract alleged by defendant is not invalid for want of consideration.

A corporation belongs to its stockholders. They own it. Shares of stock are only proportionate interests therein. Certificates of stock are evidence of fractional ownership. Those who own a corporation not only have a right to control its affairs, but it is their duty to do so. No stockholder or group of stockholders have a right to defraud any other stockholder or group of stockholders, nor will they be permitted to take advantage of the corporation itself for their own personal benefit; but, subject to these restrictions, stockholders have a right to agree between themselves to vote together as a unit, to control and manage the affairs of a corporation, and such agreements are not contrary to public policy. 14 C.J. 913, 914, and cases cited. If such an agreement is founded upon a sufficient consideration and is not opposed to public policy, the question is whether the affidavit of merits of defendant states facts sufficient to constitute a contract. Such affidavit alleges there were parties competent to contract, a subject-matter of the contract, a valid consideration, mutuality of agreement, and mutuality of obligation. These are said to be the essentials of a valid contract. We think the showing of defendant sufficient to entitle him to a trial and the entry of summary judgment was error. Judgment reversed, with costs, and case remanded.

SHARPE, J. (for affirmance). The defense to this action, brought to recover on defendant's promissory note, is based upon the claim that the defendant, at the solicitation of plaintiff, "agreed as a stockholder to vote in favor of a loan from the Stott Realty Company to the David Stott Flour Mills in the sum of $150,000.00," in which corporations both plaintiff and defendant were stockholders, in consideration of "plaintiff's promise to cancel and deliver" to defendant the promissory note in question; that he did so vote; and that plaintiff, although requested to do so, has failed to deliver the note to him.

The stockholders of a corporation have a community of interest in the property owned by it. They can perform valid acts only when lawfully assembled in their representative capacity. When so acting, every stockholder has the right to assume that every other stockholder is exercising an independent and honest judgment on the questions presented, and that none of them has been influenced by a consideration paid to him for voting in a particular manner. As was said in West v. Camden, 135 U.S. 507, 521, 10 S.Ct. 838, 840, 34 L.Ed. 254, it was the right of the other stockholders "to have the defendant's judgment, as an officer of the company, exercised with a sole regard to the interests of the company." A number of stockholders, before a meeting, may agree to combine together to favor any particular policy or lawful action to be considered thereat, and, if they own a majority of the stock, the minority may not, ordinarily, question their right to do so.

But the question here presented is whether one stockholder, in order to obtain a vote of the majority of the stock, may, by the payment of a cash consideration to another, secure the vote of his stock in the manner desired by him. If the defendant believed that the action sought by the plaintiff was in the interest of the corporation, he should have assented to it. He apparently did not so consider it. His vote, cast as plaintiff desired, must be treated as influenced solely by the consideration he claims he was to receive therefor. In my opinion, if the contract, as claimed by him, was entered into, it was against public policy and void.

In Thompson on Corporations (3d Ed.) vol. 2, § 995, the right of stockholders to combine in a voting trust is considered at length. The following from Smith v. San Francisco, etc., R. Co., 115 Cal. 584, 47 P. 582, 590, 35 L.R.A. 309, 56 Am.St.Rep. 119, is quoted with approval: "The stockholder cannot separate the voting power from his stock by selling his right to vote for a consideration personal to himself alone, any more than he could agree, for the same consideration, to cast the vote himself; and an agreement with others to appoint a proxy upon the same considerations would be equally invalid."

"A corporation holds its property in trust for its stockholders. The stockholders have a joint interest in the same property and in the same title. Community of interest in a common property or title imposes a community of duty and a mutual obligation to do nothing to impair either. It creates such a fiducial relation as makes it inequitable for any of those who thus share in the common property to do anything to or with it for their own profit, to the detriment of others who have the same rights." Wheeler v. Abilene Nat. Bank Bldg. Co. (C.C.A.) 159 F. 391, 393, 16 L.R.A.,N.S., 892, 14 Ann.Cas. 917.

The following decisions of this court, while not directly in point, are indicative of the rule which should be applied in this case:

"An agreement by two of the three stockholders of a corporation, who are also directors, that, in consideration of the purchase of stock, the vendee shall be employed as business manager for two years, and if at the end of that time he wishes to retire from the corporation they will repurchase his stock at a stated price, is void as against public policy, unless assented to by the other stockholder." Wilbur v. Stoepel, 82 Mich. 344 (syllabus), 46 N.W. 724, 21 Am.St.Rep. 568.

"The execution of a contract between four of the directors and stockholders of several corporations, holding a majority of the stock in each, without the consent of other stockholders, for purposes of personal gain, containing provisions for the continued employment of one of the contracting parties as manager at a fixed salary, and determining the business policy of the several corporations, is contrary to public policy, and may not be enforced specifically." Scripps v. Sweeney, 160 Mich. 148 (syllabus), 125 N.W. 72.

The judgment should be affirmed.

CONE'S EXECUTORS v. RUSSELL et al.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1891. 48 N.J.Eq. 208, 21 A. 847.

In equity. On order to show cause why injunction should not issue. Heard on bill, answer, and affidavits.

PITNEY, V. C. The complainants, Lorenzo H. Cone and Rebecca C. Cone, executors, etc., of Jonathan Cone, deceased, by their bill ask that the defendants, William F. Russell and Charles H. Mason, be enjoined from voting at any stockholders' meeting of the Upper Delaware River Transportation Company by virtue of a certain power of attorney or proxy, irrevocable, executed by complainants to defendants, authorizing and empowering them to vote upon 477 shares of the stock of said corporation belonging to the complainants as executors; and praying that said power of attorney or proxy, and a certain agreement between the parties, presently to be set out, may be decreed to be null and void, and delivered up to be canceled. * * *

At the date of this instrument the complainants were the owners, as executors, of 477 shares of the stock mentioned, and the complainant Lorenzo H. Cone was the owner of 96 shares, and shortly afterwards became the owner of 10 additional shares thereof, which became subject to the contract, and added to those already owned by the defendants constituted a majority of the stock of the corporation. The power of attorney and proxy was duly executed by the complainants as executors, and also one by L. H. Cone individually; and at the annual meeting of April, 1889, the defendants, by their use, elected themselves and some of their employes directors, and thereby secured a majority of the board. The new board elected the defendant Russell president, with a salary of $1,500 a year; the defendant Mason treasurer, with a like salary; and one Beek, a clerk of the defendants, secretary of the company, with a salary of $500 a year; and appointed L. H. Cone manager thereof, with a salary of $2,500 a year. At the same annual meeting a majority of voices of the stockholders voted in favor of a motion to limit the total expenditure for salaries of officers to $1,000 per year, but the vote by shares given by the defendants refused to sustain the motion. From that date to this the affairs of the corporation have been managed by the defendants, with the actual ownership of 80 out of 1,300 shares of its stock. As might have been expected, differences soon arose between the parties, resulting in three bills in this court prior to the one underlying the present motion. Complainants base their rights to the relief now sought upon three grounds: First. They say they were induced to enter into the agreement and execute the proxies by a fraud practiced upon them by the defendants, the particulars of which are set out in the bill. Ex parte affidavits on both sides, bearing on the question of fraud or no fraud, have been read. I deem it worth while to say, on this point, only that I think the fraud is not made out with sufficient certainty and clearness, and with sufficient weight of evidence, to warrant interposition by interlocutory injunction. The second ground taken by the complainants is that the contract in question is against public policy, and tends to work a fraud on the other stockholders, and is void upon that ground. And the third ground is that the complainants, executors and trustees, had no right to depute their trust to others, as is done by this agreement, and that on that account also it should be decreed void.

The theory upon which the capital of numerous persons is associated in various proportions, in the shape of a trading corporation, to be managed by a committee of the stockholders, is that such committee shall truly represent and be subject to the will of the majority in interest of the stockholders. The security of the small stockholders is found in the natural disposition of each stockholder to promote the best interests of all, in order to promote his individual interests. A member of an ordinary partnership has an additional security in the personal character of each of his partners, and may decline to be associated with any whom he does not know and approve. But a stockholder in a corporation cannot control the personnel of his associates, and must rely upon their self-interest alone. * * * Our legislature has, since the decision in Taylor v. Griswold, authorized the use of proxies, limiting them, however, to three years. But the principle still remains that the proxy is supposed to vote for the principal, and in his interest. If a majority of the stock is owned by one person, he has no right to use his power as such owner to advance his private interests at the expense of the minority. And in like manner he has no right to depute to another, who has little or no interest in the corporation, a power to use his stock for that purpose. Such deputation is the more dangerous because the person intrusted with the power has no such inducement to promote the interests of the corporation as the stock-owner has. Where the majority of the stock is owned by one man, or set of men acting in concert, the minority are, to some extent, protected by the natural interest of the majority to promote the real interest of the corporation; but where a person who has little or no actual ownership has the unrestricted voting power of a majority of the stock, the minority loses this protection, and what may be properly termed the underlying and fundamental understanding and contract upon which the association is founded is abandoned and broken. The motive which may induce the owner of a controlling interest in the corporation to deprive himself of and depute to another the power to use it as he may see fit, during a fixed period, may be of little consequence to his associates, but is usually found in some consideration of personal gain. In the case in hand it is the employment of complainant L. H. Cone as manager for a fixed term, and at a fixed salary, and irrespective of the actual value of his services. The avowed object and purpose of the defendants was to secure to themselves like employment and salaries. The mere statement of the affair seems to me to condemn it. The motive was in itself improper and unlawful. Servants of a corporation should be employed and paid upon their merits; and buying votes for an office in a corporation is of the same objectionable character as buying them for a public office. The same may be said of buying the right to control the business policy and management of the affairs of a corporation. * * * In Foll's Appeal, 91 Pa.St. 434, the supreme court of Pennsylvania went so far as to refuse specific performance of a contract to sell a comparatively few shares of stock in a national bank, where the avowed object was to enable the purchaser to obtain the control of the bank, and who, for that purpose, had already bought up, largely with borrowed money, almost a majority of the stock. The learned judge, speaking for the court, says, (page 437:) "The stock, as now held, is scattered among a variety of people, and held in greater or lesser amounts. It is difficult to see how the small stockholders who have modest earnings invested in it, the depositors who use it for the safe-keeping of their money, or the business public who look to it for accommodation in the way of loans, are to be benefited by the concentration of a majority of its stock in the hands of one man, or in such a way that one man and his friends shall control it. Especially is this so when, as here, an attempt is made to control it by the use of borrowed capital. The temptation to use it for personal ends, in such case, is very strong." For an instance of the abuse of power by an actual majority in ownership of stock in a corporation, see Meeker v. Iron Co., 17 F. 48.

Following the reasoning of these cases, I conclude that the contract complained of in this suit is void as against public policy. This conclusion does not reach so far as to necessarily forbid all pooling or combining of stock, where the object is to carry out a particular policy with the view to promote the best interests of all the stockholders. The propriety of the object validates the means, and must affirmatively appear. * * * For these reasons I am of the opinion that the contract and proxy set out and mentioned in the bill are void, and complainants are entitled to relief against them, and that the injunction prayed for must go. I will advise an order accordingly.

(b) Pooling and Voting Trusts

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 50. Voting trust agreements. A stockholder, by agreement in writing, may transfer his stock to a voting trustee or trustees for the purpose of conferring the right to vote thereon for a period not exceeding ten years upon the terms and conditions therein stated. Every other stockholder may transfer his stock to the same trustee or trustees and thereupon shall be a party to such agreement. The certificates of stock so transferred shall be surrendered and cancelled and new certificates therefor issued to such trustee or trustees in which it shall appear that they are issued pursuant to such agreement, and in the entry of such ownership in the proper books of such corporation that fact shall also be noted, and thereupon such trustee or trustees may vote upon the stock so transferred during the term of such agreement. A duplicate of every such agreement shall be filed in the office of the corporation and at all times during business hours be open to inspection by any stockholder or his attorney. The provisions of this section shall not authorize the transfer of stock of a banking corporation to a voting trustee or trustees. The trustee or trustees shall keep at their office or at a place available to certificate holders correct books of account of all their business and transactions, and a book to be known as the certificate book containing the names, alphabetically arranged, of all persons who are voting trust certificate holders, showing their places of residence, the number of shares of stock represented by the certificates held by them respectively, and the time when they respectively became the owners thereof. The certificate book shall be open daily, during at least three business hours, for inspection by any person who shall have been a certificate holder for at least six months immediately preceding his demand, or by any person holding or thereunto in writing authorized by the holders of at least five per centum of all of the outstanding certificates; provided (a) that such inspection shall not be for the purpose of communicating with certificate holders in the interest of a business or object other than the business of the corporation, and (b) that such certificate holder or other person has not within five years sold or offered for sale any list of stockholders or voting trust certificate holders of such corporation or any other corporation or aided or abetted any person in procuring such list for any such purpose; and provided further that such inspection may be denied to such certificate holder or other person upon refusal to furnish to such voting trustee or trustees a written statement that such inspection is not desired for purpose (a) and that such certificate holder or other person has not been connected with any list as provided in (b). Persons so entitled to inspect the certificate book may make extracts therefrom. Any trustee who shall neglect or refuse to keep or cause to be kept such books or to keep any certificate book open for inspection, as herein required, shall forfeit to the people the sum of fifty dollars for every day he shall so neglect or refuse. If any trustee shall wilfully neglect or refuse to make any proper entry in such book or books or shall neglect or refuse to exhibit any such certificate book or to allow any such certificate book to be inspected and extracts taken therefrom as provided in this section, each such trustee shall forfeit and pay to the party injured a penalty of fifty dollars for every such neglect or refusal, and all damages resulting to him therefrom.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 18. Fiduciary Stockholders; Voting Power of; Voting Trusts:—Persons holding stock in a fiduciary capacity shall be entitled to vote the shares so held, and persons whose stock is pledged shall be entitled to vote, unless in the transfer by the pledgor on the books of the corporation he shall have expressly empowered the pledgee to vote thereon, in which case only the pledgee, or his proxy may represent said stock and vote thereon.

One or more stockholders may by agreement in writing deposit capital stock of an original issue with or transfer capital stock to any person or persons, or corporation or corporations authorized to act as trustee, for the purpose of vesting in said person or persons, corporation or corporations, who may be designated Voting Trustee or Voting Trustees, the right to vote thereon for any period of time determined by such agreement, not exceeding ten years, upon the terms and conditions stated in such agreement. Such agreement may contain any other lawful provisions not inconsistent with said purpose. After the filing of a copy of such agreement in the principal office of the corporation in the State of Delaware, which copy shall be open to the inspection of any stockholder of the corporation or any beneficiary of the trust under said agreement daily during business hours, certificates of stock shall be issued to the Voting Trustees to represent any stock of an original issue so deposited with them, and any certificates of stock so transferred to the Voting Trustees shall be surrendered and cancelled and new certificates therefor shall be issued to the Voting Trustees, and in the certificates so issued it shall appear that they are issued pursuant to such agreement, and in the entry of such Voting Trustees as owners of such stock in the proper books of the issuing corporation that fact shall also be noted. Said Voting Trustees may vote upon the stock so issued or transferred during the period in such agreement specified; stock standing in the names of such Voting Trustees may be voted either in person or by proxy, and in voting said stock, such Voting Trustees shall incur no responsibility as stockholder, trustee or otherwise, except for their own individual malfeasance. In any case where two or more persons are designated as Voting Trustees, and the right and method of voting any stock standing in their names at any meeting of the corporation are not fixed by the agreement appointing said Trustees, the right to vote said stock and the manner of voting the same at such meeting shall be determined by a majority of said Trustees, or if they be equally divided as to the right and manner of voting the same in any particular case, the vote of said stock in such case shall be divided equally among the Trustees.

At any time within one year prior to the time of expiration of any such voting trust agreement as originally fixed or as extended as herein provided, one or more beneficiaries of the trust under such voting trust agreement may, by agreement in writing and with the written consent of such Voting Trustees, extend the duration of such voting trust agreement for an additional period not exceeding ten years. Said Voting Trustees shall, prior to the time of expiration of any such voting trust agreement, as originally fixed or as previously extended, as the case may be, file in the principal office of the corporation in the State of Delaware a copy of such extension agreement and of their consent thereto, and thereupon the duration of such voting trust agreement shall be extended for the period fixed in such extension agreement; provided, however, that no such extension agreement shall affect the right or obligations of persons not parties thereto.

WARREN et al. v. PIM et al.

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, 1904. 66 N.J.Eq. 353, 59 A. 773.

Appeal from Court of Chancery.

Bill by Lyman E. Warren and others against J. Harold Pim and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

DIXON, J. The bill of complaint in this cause was filed in January, 1903, by Lyman E. Warren against the Fisheries Company, a corporation of this state, J. Harold Pim, Langley Archer West, and Montgomery Horne-Payne, constituting what is called the "Pim Committee," and the Association of Foreign Shareholders of the Fisheries Company of

New Jersey, Limited, a corporation of Great Britain. Subsequently Nathaniel B. Church, Adolph Hirsh, James E. Heller, the American Net & Twine Company, William B. M. Chace, and John Shepard were admitted as complainants in the suit. The objects of the bill are, first, to compel a transfer to the complainants, upon the books of the Fisheries Company, of certain shares of stock in that company now standing on its books in the names of the Pim Committee, but claimed by the complainants as their property; second, to restrain the Fisheries Company from holding any election of directors until such transfer shall have been made; and, third, to have it decreed that a certain "voting trust," under which the Pim Committee and the British Association claim some control over shares of stock in the Fisheries Company, is against public policy, fraudulent, inoperative, null, and void. The bill was accompanied by affidavits and exhibits. The members of the Pim Committee and the British Association filed an answer, which was also accompanied by affidavits and exhibits. The Fisheries Company filed a separate answer, adopting substantially the views of the complainants. The bill and the answer of the Pim Committee and the British Association disclose the grounds of litigation. The cause being submitted on bill and answers, the Chancellor on November 10, 1903, made final decree in conformity with the prayer of the bill, and from that decree the appeal now to be decided was taken.

It appears that when the Fisheries Company was organized, on May 25, 1900, a majority of the shares of its stock was taken by persons residing in Great Britain and Ireland, and, in order that a combination called a "voting trust" might be formed, enabling some representative of these shareholders to control the Fisheries Company, the British Association was incorporated. As a preliminary to the formation of the voting trust, most of the shares of these foreign holders (being a majority of the stock of the Fisheries Company) were transferred to the Pim Committee. Afterwards, on November 12, 1900, a deed poll was executed by that committee and the British Association, which recites the authority of the Pim Committee to create a voting trust of the shares of the Fisheries Company, and that the British Association is the proposed voting trust, and then, to complete the constitution of the trust, declares as follows: "The said shares in the Fisheries Company now held by the said J. H. Pim, L. A. West and R. M. Horne-Payne * * * shall be held by the Association with all rights and powers against third persons as if it were the absolute owner and holder thereof, but as between the Association and the owners of the deposited shares the certificates of the Association issued to such owners shall carry all rights and benefits except that of voting, subject nevertheless to the provisions hereof. * * * The Association will recognize the registered owner of any deposited share as the absolute equitable owner thereof, subject to these presents. * * * The deposited shares shall be held by the Association upon trust that they may and shall according to the best of their discretion do the things following, that is to say: Exercise all voting rights incident to the ownership of shares as and when the Association shall think it expedient to exercise the same; receive all dividends and bonuses and other moneys receivable in respect of the deposited shares; raise or borrow on the security of the deposited shares any money required for the purposes of the execution of the trust; take all such actions and proceedings as they think expedient from time to time to protect the interests of the owners of the deposited shares. * * * Dividends received * * * shall be paid over to the respective owners of the deposited shares, but the Association may retain * * * any sum which the Association may deem it advisable to set aside to meet contingencies and anything due * * * for expenses. * * * The Trust shall be closed * * * when and so soon as the Association shall by deed declare that it is to be closed, or when the owners of three-fourths of the deposited shares of each class by notice in writing to the Association declare the trust to be closed, or when the last survivor of the now existing descendants of Her Majesty shall have been dead for 20 years, or when fifty years from the execution hereof shall have elapsed." These excerpts denote the character of the voting trust now in question, and, it may be added, the corporate powers of the association are such as would enable it to execute the trust, but the owners of the deposited stock, as such, have no voice in its management. * * *

Keeping in mind the legal principles and statutes above mentioned, I come to the question to be decided in the present case: Is it lawful for a corporation organized under the laws of a foreign country to vote upon the stock of a New Jersey corporation which it does not own? An affirmative answer is, I think, rationally impossible. On the doctrine established for this state by the case of Taylor v. Griswold, ubi supra, such an answer must be based on the clear intent of some statute, and no such statute can be found. But it is said the policy indicated by our statutes is such that on the principle of comity the courts must answer the question affirmatively, in order to concede to foreign corporations such privileges in domestic corporations as the Legislature has designed that our corporations should enjoy in foreign corporations. In my view, the utmost demands of comity are inadequate for the end sought. The Legislature has given its sanction to the exercise by New Jersey corporations of the right to own and (while owners) to vote upon the stock of corporations created by the laws of sister states. The corporation of a sister state, whose laws permitted the right thus sanctioned to be exercised, might invoke the doctrine of comity to support them in exercising a similar right in our corporations, but the claim could fairly go no further. That falls far short of the present exigency. The corporation to be favored comes not from a sister state, but from a foreign country. It is not shown that the laws of that country would extend a like favor to our corporations, and, even if they would, our corporations are not empowered to enjoy it; and the stock to be voted on is not owned by the corporation desiring to vote upon it, while ownership is made a condition essential to the exercise of the voting power by our own corporations either within or without the state. The question as to who shall exercise the voting power in our corporations is not one of mere private concern. It involves matters of public interest. Whether the laws of the state shall be faithfully observed in the management of these bodies depends primarily on the parties voting upon the stock. Even if, on principles of comity, such voting power should be conceded by the courts to corporations of sister states, which are subject to the federal Constitution and laws, and to state Constitutions of which we take judicial cognizance, it would by no means follow that a like concession ought to be made to corporations organized under laws wholly unknown to us, and over which our courts, either federal or state, cannot acquire personal jurisdiction without their consent. A public policy having so wide a sweep ought, I think, to be supported by a clear expression of legislative purpose.

I therefore conclude that the British Association cannot lawfully exercise the voting power which it was the design of the deed poll to confer upon it. Consequently, as the object of the proposed trust wholly fails, the complainants are entitled to have the stock which they own restored to them, whether the trust was concurred in or not, and also to enjoin the association from voting on stock belonging to the stockholders in the Fisheries Company. * * *

PITNEY, J. I shall vote for an unqualified affirmance of the decree made by the Court of Chancery herein. The grave importance of the legal and equitable questions involved, and the fact that a majority of this court is not agreed upon the grounds of decision, justify an extended discussion of the case.

I agree with MR. JUSTICE DIXON that the plain object of the deed poll, and its necessary effect if it be valid, are to separate the voting power from the ownership of the stock covered thereby, and to lodge that power in the "trustees" named in the deed poll. By the terms of the deed, this arrangement continues for a term of 50 years, unless the "trustees" shall sooner declare the trust to be closed, or unless the owners of three-fourths of the deposited shares of each class declare it to be closed. I do not think, however, that this situation necessarily or even properly presents the question whether a foreign corporation, as distinguished from a domestic one, can lawfully exercise such a power upon stock of a New Jersey corporation not owned by it. In my opinion, such a power—a practically irrevocable voting power, uncoupled with any ownership or interest in the stock itself—is obnoxious to the plain terms and spirit of our general corporation act; and this equally whether the donee of the power be citizen or alien, domestic corporation or foreign. * * *

The general trend of decisions throughout the country condemns the irrevocable voting trust. Some of these decisions are cited in Cone v. Russell and White v. Thomas Inflatable Tire Co. See, also, Shepaug Voting Trust Cases, 60 Conn. 576, 24 Atl. 34; Harvey v. Linville Imp. Co., 118 N.C. 693, 24 S.E. 489, 32 L.R.A. 265, 54 Am.St.Rep. 749; and an article in 38 Am.Law.Reg. (New Series) 1899, p. 50. Brightman v. Bates, 175 Mass. 105, 55 N.E. 809, is cited as an authority to the contrary. It is true that Chief Justice Holmes in that case entered into some discussion of the validity of pooling agreements among stockholders, with the result that he found no reason to disapprove of them in toto and under all circumstances. Such a total disapproval would have been necessary to overthrow the covenant there sued on. But he based the decision largely upon the fact that the plaintiff had a general finding in his favor in the trial court. In that part of the opinion which deals with the validity of pooling agreements and voting trusts, the learned Chief Justice, as I take it, employed inaccurate reasoning, when he declared: "A stockholder has a right to put his shares in trust whatever his motive. If the trust is an active one he cannot terminate it at will," etc. But in truth and in essence, and for all purposes of a court of equity, a voting trust that has for its sole object the permanent separation of the voting power from the substantial ownership of the shares is not a putting of the shares in trust. It is a putting of false evidence of share ownership into the hands of the trustee, for the purpose of enabling the trustee to represent himself as a shareholder at the stockholders' meetings, and thereupon be admitted to the election. * * *

Any arrangement that permanently separates the voting power from stock ownership nullifies, to the extent of the stock involved, the annual submission of the question of the management of the company to the stockholders. Where, as here, the arrangement includes a majority of the stock, and extends for a period of 50 years, it renders all annual elections in the meantime a hollow form. If I am correct in the view that such an arrangement is wholly prohibited by the act, the deed poll is void as contravening public policy in this respect. If the prohibition of the act is not absolute, but intended solely for the benefit of the corporators, and subject to be waived by their unanimous consent, yet the deed poll violates the substantial rights of the nonassenting stockholders, and is for that reason contrary to public policy. For, of course, the plan of corporate management prescribed by the act, and the method of corporate control therein provided for, form an essential part of the constitution of the corporation, to the enforcement of which every stockholder is equally entitled. Public policy is as much concerned in overthrowing contracts that involve or contemplate the commission of a civil injury, the deprivation of civil rights, or the perpetration of a fraud upon third parties, as in nullifying contracts that violate a statutory prohibition. * * *

It follows, of course, that the nonassenting stockholders, being the very class against whose civil rights the scheme attempted to be established by the deed poll most directly and injuriously operates, are entitled to an injunction against its operation. All the complainants are in this class, and in this aspect are entitled to exclude the association from voting upon the trusteed stock, because the persons who constitute the association have no interest, as trustees or otherwise, in the deposited stock, and hold it solely under an arrangement for the irrevocable divorcement of the voting power from the ownership. As I read the decree under review, it confines the injunction to so much of the deposited stock as is now owned by certain of the complainants herein. If the British depositors had been before the court, the injunction might have been extended to all the deposited stock. The interest of the nonassenting stockholders, even considering them merely as lawful voters asking that unlawful voting by others be prohibited, is sufficiently obvious, and entirely settled by authority. In re St. Lawrence Steamboat Co., 44 N.J.L. 529; In re Leslie, 58 N.J.L. 609, 33 A. 954; State v. Wrightson, 56 N.J.L. 126, 28 A. 56, 22 L.R.A. 548; Smith v. Wanser, 68 N.J.L. 249, 253, 52 A. 309.

Those of the complainants who hold by purchase shares of stock that were placed in the so-called trust are not debarred by the action of their assignors in so doing. They do not claim any right or remedy by virtue of the illegal agreement, but in repudiation of it. In such a case, depending on grounds of public policy, these complainants are not debarred by the maxim, "in pari delicto." So it was held in Cone v. Russell, 48 N.J.Eq., at page 217, 21 A. 847, and ought to be held in every similar case. * * *

I concede, of course, that each stockholder may at each election vote as he chooses, provided he vote honestly. But from this it by no means follows that he may make an agreement that shall bind his vote for a term of years, as intimated by Chief Justice Holmes in Brightman v. Bates, 175 Mass., at page 110, 55 N.E. 809. The pith and essence of the annual election of directors established by the corporation act is the periodical appeal to the self-interest of the proprietors, with the current experience of the company—its success or nonsuccess—to guide them. It is based upon the notion that experience is a safer reliance than prevision, or, in homely phrase, that "hindsight is better than foresight."

It is said that stockholders, in exercising their voting rights, do not stand in a fiduciary relation to each other. But this does not properly apply at all to ultra vires acts amounting to a breach of the agreement of incorporation, nor does it give any countenance to the notion that those who are not stockholders may vote. Nor can I concede that a stockholder, in voting, has a right to disregard entirely the interests of his fellow stockholders. The ethical notion that underlies the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas," forbids.

There is a close analogy between corporate elections and the governmental elections after which they are modeled. The practical difference lies chiefly in the number of persons affected. In Montclair Military Academy v. North Jersey Street Railway Co., 65 N.J.L. 328, 47 A. 890, the Supreme Court took the view that votes conferred upon abutting property owners, entitling them, by the voice of a majority in interest, to consent to the laying of a street railway, being conferred for the protection of their property, might be sold for considerations of advantage personal to the voter. But this court unanimously rejected that view. S. c., 70 N.J.L. 229, 232, 57 A. 1050, 1051. Justice Dixon, who delivered the opinion here, used the following language: "For the decision of the matter thus contemplated, the Legislature treated these owners as a class, every member of which had similar interests to subserve—interests that in some degree were common to all. Properly to meet the confidence thus reposed, it was incumbent to each member to bear in mind and be influenced by those common interests only, so that his judgment would be as fair toward his neighbor as it was toward himself. To permit any one of the class to barter for private and exclusive gain this power over the concerns of his fellows would be subversive of the benign purpose of the Legislature in delegating it."

All the arguments adduced in support of the deed poll are not only based upon a view of the corporation act quite different from that which I have endeavored to express, but they also proceed upon the theory that the deed poll does in truth establish some sort of trust for the benefit at least of the British stockholders who were subscribers thereto. I confess that a somewhat careful examination of the instrument fails to disclose to me what the trust may be, beyond the mere untrammeled exercise by the individual "trustees" and their successors, and their irresponsible delegates and subdelegates, of a limitless discretion about using or not using the voting power normally incident to a majority of the shares of the Fisheries Company. If there were no other valid objection to the instrument, it seems to me that, as a trust deed, it is void for indefiniteness and uncertainty.

For all these reasons, I shall vote for the affirmance of the decree, without qualification. * * *

SMITH et al. v. SAN FRANCISCO & NORTH PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

Supreme Court of California, 1897. 115 Cal. 584, 47 P. 582.

Action by Smith and others against the San Francisco & North Pacific Railway Company and others. Judgment for plantiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

HARRISON, J. At the election for directors of the San Francisco & North Pacific Railway Company, which was had at the annual meeting of the stockholders held February 25, 1896, the votes offered by Peter Gundecker, G. E. Wagner, and Sidney V. Smith, in whose names certain shares of stock stood on the books of the corporation, were rejected, and at the close of the election the chairman of the meeting announced that Antoine Borel, A. W. Foster, Andrew Markham, P. N. Lilienthal, George A. Newhall, James B. Stetson, and John L. Howard had been duly elected directors of said corporation for the year then next ensuing. The votes of Gundecker and Wagner were rejected upon the ground that they were not bona fide stockholders in the corporation, and the vote of Smith was rejected upon the ground that by virtue of a certain agreement between him and two other stockholders —Foster and Markham—the stock of the three had been pooled for the term of five years, to be voted as a unit, and was cast in pursuance of that agreement. If the votes thus rejected had been received, the election would have resulted in the choice of Smith as one of the directors instead of Lilienthal. The present action was brought under section 315 of the Civil Code, for the purpose of having it declared that Smith instead of Lilienthal was elected a director at said election. The superior court found that Gundecker and Wagner were bona fide stockholders, and that their vote should have been received, and that the agreement by Smith with the other stockholders did not preclude him from the right to vote the stock standing in his own name as he might choose, and that the vote by the other stockholders for his stock was unauthorized and his own vote should have been received. Judgment was thereupon rendered that Lilienthal had not been chosen as a director, and was not entitled to exercise the office, and that at the said election Smith was chosen one of the directors and was entitled to be so recognized. A motion for a new trial on behalf of the defendants was denied, and from both the judgment and the order denying the new trial appeals have been taken. * * *

2. The Smith Stock. The exclusion of the vote tendered by Smith upon the stock standing in his name was by reason of the following facts: In February, 1893, the estate of James M. Donahue, deceased, was the owner of 42,000 shares, or thereabouts, of the capital stock of the defendant railway company, which the superior court of Marin county had ordered to be sold in the course of the administration of his estate. Prior to the sale, an agreement was entered into between Smith, Foster, and Markham for the purchase of this stock as an entirety, upon the representations of Smith that upon acquiring the shares an agreement would be made by them whereby, in order to secure the control of the management and business policy of the railway company, and for its prudent and economical management in the interest of all of its stockholders, the said 42,000 shares should for the term of five years thereafter be voted as a unit in the election of directors of said railway company. In pursuance of this agreement, Smith and Foster, on the 24th of February, made their joint bid for the shares, offering to purchase them as an entirety for the sum of $800,000 and upwards, and by order of court their bid was accepted, and on March 23d the sale was completed, and the price paid. After the making of the bid, and before the consummation of the purchase and completion of the sale, Smith prepared the agreement for the voting of the shares as a unit that had been contemplated by the parties to the purchase; and on the 22d of March the same was executed in triplicate between Smith, Markham, and Foster. By this instrument, after reciting therein that the parties thereto had purchased the 42,000 shares of stock, and had agreed to retain the power of voting the stock for five years, "so as to keep the control of the corporation from passing to persons other than themselves," it was "mutually agreed between said Foster, Markham, and Smith that they will, during said period, retain the power to vote said shares in one body; and that the vote which shall be cast by said shares, whether for directors or for any other purpose, shall be determined by ballot between them or their survivors." It was in the contemplation of the parties to the agreement that they might sell or otherwise dispose of some of the shares, and accordingly they made provision in this instrument for retaining the right to vote the stock so sold by them, and annexed thereto the form of an agreement to be taken by them from their vendees. This form or draft recited the purchase of the 42,000 shares by Foster, Smith, and Markham, and that "for the purpose of keeping control of said road in the interest of themselves and of all persons who shall buy any portion of the stock from them," they have agreed that for the period of five years "they shall vote the said stock in one block" at all elections for officers. The purchase of the stock by Foster, Smith, and Markham was completed, and the price therefor paid on the 23d of March, and 12,336 shares of the stock were transferred on the books to each of them; 5,000 shares being left in the name of the Mercantile Trust Company, subject to some prior trust. Prior to the day for the election in 1896, a conference was called to be held between Foster, Smith, and Markham, upon proper notice therefor, to determine by ballot how the vote of the shares should be cast at the next annual meeting for directors, and in accordance with said notice said conference was held, at which Foster and Markham were present, and upon a ballot had thereat it was determined that said shares should be voted for Foster, Markham, Newhall, and Lilienthal as directors. The foregoing matters are alleged in the answers of the defendants, and at the trial the defendants sought to introduce in evidence the agreement of March 22d, and offered to prove in connection therewith the matters set forth in their answer relative thereto; but upon the objection by the plaintiffs to this offer, "on the ground that said agreement was not a proxy, and did not provide that any of the parties thereto should vote the stock belonging to the other, and that it was revoked before the election, and was invalid as against public policy," the evidence was excluded; the court saying: "I will assume, for the purpose of my ruling, that it was a valid agreement, but that it was not an agreement which gave any authority to any other person to cast the vote of Mr. Smith." * * * No particular form of words is requisite to constitute a proxy. Mor.Priv.Corp. § 486. Like any other agency, the instrument by which it is created may be informal; but if, in order to give effect to its language in view of the purpose for which it is executed, it is necessary to construe the instrument as creating an agency, such construction will be given. The instrument executed between the parties must, therefore, be held to be a proxy, and to authorize the vote of the 42,000 shares of stock to be cast in accordance with the determination of the majority of the parties thereto; and, if it was made upon a consideration sufficient to bind the parties to its enforcement, it must be regarded as still operative. One of the inducements for the purchase of the stock, and under which the parties entered into the agreement, was that the shares should be voted in one body, and held for five years as a unit. It is immaterial that the voting agreement was not reduced to writing and executed until after the bid had been made for the stock. It was so executed before the parties thereto had completed the purchase, and become the owners of the stock by paying the purchase price. * * * There was thus a sufficient consideration for the agreement granting the right to vote the stock. It was in the nature of a power coupled with an interest, and, being given for a valuable consideration, could not be revoked at the pleasure of either. Hey v. Dolphin, 92 Hun, 230, 36 N.Y.S. 627.

Although the court, in excluding this evidence, assumed that the instrument was valid, counsel for respondents have presented an argument in support of their further objection thereto that the instrument is invalid by reason of being against public policy; and it therefore becomes necessary to consider this objection, inasmuch as the action of the court, rather than its reason for so acting, is to be reviewed; for, if the instrument is invalid, the refusal of the court to allow any effect to be gained from its exercise was proper. "Public policy" is a term of vague and uncertain meaning, which it pertains to the law-making power to define, and courts are apt to encroach upon the domain of that branch of the government if they characterize a transaction as invalid because it is contrary to public policy, unless the transaction contravenes some positive statute or some well-established rule of law. Sir George Jessel, as master of the rolls, said in Besant

v. Wood, 12 Ch.Div. 605, that public policy is "to a great extent a matter of individual opinion, because what one man or one judge might think against public policy another might think altogether excellent public policy." And in another case (Registering Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 465) the same jurist said: "If there is one thing which, more than another, public policy requires, it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into freely and voluntarily, shall be held sacred, and shall be enforced by courts of justice." It is not in violation of any rule or principle of law for stockholders who own a majority of the stock in a corporation to cause its affairs to be managed in such way as they may think best calculated to further the ends of the corporation, and for this purpose to appoint one or more proxies, who shall vote in such a way as will carry out their plan. Nor is it against public policy for two or more stockholders to agree upon a course of corporate action, or upon the officers whom they will elect; and they may do this either by themselves or through their proxies, or they may unite in the appointment of a single proxy to effect their purpose. Any plan of procedure they may agree upon implies a previous comparison of views, and there is nothing illegal in an agreement to be bound by the will of the majority as to the means by which the result shall be reached. If they are in accord as to the ultimate purpose, it is but reasonable that the will of the majority should prevail as to the mode by which it may be accomplished. It would not be an illegal agreement if articles of partnership should provide that stock in a corporation owned by the partnership, though standing in the individual names of the partners, should be voted by one of its members; and it is no more against public policy for such an agreement to be entered into between stockholders whose interests in the stock are separate than where their interests are joint. Viewed from considerations of public policy merely, it is immaterial whether such an agreement is made by the members of an existing partnership, which owns the shares, or in pursuance of an agreement by two or more persons to form a partnership for their purchase, or to purchase them for their joint account, or as one of the terms of an agreement for their purchase by persons who contemplate no relation to each other, other than that of owning stock in the same corporation. Such agreement would in any case be outside of the corporation, and disconnected with the interest of every other stockholder, and in either case the same rules would control. Whether such an agreement is illegal, so that any action or vote under it can be set aside, or is of such a character that it will not be enforced, will depend upon the object with which it is made, or the acts that are done under it, and will be governed by other rules of law. * * *

Neither is it illegal or against public policy to separate the voting power of the stock from its ownership. The statute authorizes the stockholder to vote by proxy, and it was held in People's Home Sav. Bank v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 104 Cal. 649, 38 P. 452, that a by-law restricting the selection of proxies to stockholders was invalid, that the statute placed no limitation upon the right of selection, and that a stockholder may appoint as his proxy one who is an entire stranger to the corporation. The right to appear by proxy implies, of itself, that the voting power may be separated from the ownership of the stock; and, unless the authority of the proxy is limited by the terms of his appointment, he is necessarily required to use his own discretion in any vote that he gives. Being the agent of the stockholder, he is required to exercise this discretion in behalf of his principal; but he is at liberty to use his own discretion as to the means by which his principal's interest will be best subserved. The cases in which it has been said that the stockholder could not divest himself of the voting power of his stock, and that it should not be separated from the ownership of the stock, were cases which involved either the sufficiency of the agreement by which the voting power was transferred, or the validity of the purpose for which the power was to be exercised. The proxy must exercise a discretion of the same nature as that which the stockholder is authorized to exercise, and an authority to do otherwise would be invalid; but the authority to exercise a discretion differs from an authority to perform a particular act. Under an appointment without words of limitation, the proxy may act against the interests of the stockholder, or even against the interests of the corporation, and the corporation, as well as the stockholder, will be bound by his act as fully as if the stockholder had acted in person; while, if the authority had been directed in terms to that act, it might have been invalid. The distinction is that between an unlawful exercise of a lawful power and the attempt to authorize the exercise of an unlawful power.

The question has been presented in cases of voting trusts, but an examination of these cases will show that the question has arisen either when the authority was expressly given to carry out some illegal purpose, or when, having been given without any consideration, though purporting to be for a definite term, subsequent owners of the stock have sought to revoke it before the expiration of the term. Shepaug Voting-Trust Cases, 60 Conn. 553, 24 A. 32, sometimes reported under the name of Bostwick v. Chapman; White v. Tire Co., 52 N.J.Eq. 178, 28 A. 75. We have been cited to no instance where the purpose of a proxy given upon a sufficient consideration was lawful, and the person by whom the proxy was created continued to be the owner of the stock, in which the agreement has been held invalid. The stockholder cannot separate the voting power from his stock by selling his right to vote for a consideration personal to himself alone, any more than he could agree, for the same consideration, to cast the vote himself; and an agreement with others to appoint a proxy upon the same considerations would be equally invalid. In Cone v. Russell, 48 N.J.Eq. 208, 21 A. 847, an agreement by the purchaser of stock to give to other stockholders his irrevocable proxy, for the purpose of securing and maintaining the control of the company, was held invalid, for the reason that it was one of the terms of the agreement that the directors to be elected under its provisions should employ the one giving the proxy at a fixed salary during its existence. Such an agreement was held to operate as an inducement to elect directors who would not act disinterestedly for the benefit of all of the stockholders, but rather to promote the interest of the parties to the agreement alone, and was therefore void, as being against public policy. The court, however, said: "This conclusion does not reach so far as to necessarily forbid all pooling or combining of stock, where the object is to carry out a particular policy with the view to promote the best interests of all the stockholders." * * *

From the foregoing considerations it follows that the superior court erred in finding that Gundecker and Wagner were bona fide stockholders in the defendant railway company, and also in refusing to receive in evidence the instrument of March 22d, and the evidence offered by the defendants in connection therewith, for the purpose of sustaining the averments of their answer. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

RINGLING BROS.-BARNUM & BAILEY COMBINED SHOWS INC., et al. v. RINGLING.

Supreme Court of Delaware, 1947. 53 A.2d 441.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Chancery for New Castle County. The appellee instituted a proceeding under Section 31 of the Delaware Corporation Law (Rev. Code of Del., 1935, § 2063) to determine the validity of an election of directors at the 1946 annual stockholders meeting of the corporate appellant (a Delaware corporation) and to determine the right of the individual appellants to hold office as directors or officers of the corporation. The Vice Chancellor decided that no valid meeting of stockholders had been held and that a meeting should be held before a master to be appointed by the Court of Chancery pursuant to Section 31. Ringling v. Ringling Bros.-Barnum & Bailey Comb. Shows, 49 A.2d 603. (Del.Ch.) From the order entered in conformity with the Vice Chancellor's opinion, the appellants brought this appeal. The parties will be referred to by their designations in the court below.

PEARSON, J., delivering the opinion of the court:

The Court of Chancery was called upon to review an attempted election of directors at the 1946 annual stockholders meeting of the corporate defendant. The pivotal questions concern an agreement between two of the three present stockholders, and particularly the effect of this agreement with relation to the exercise of voting rights by these two stockholders. At the time of the meeting, the corporation had outstanding 1000 shares of capital stock held as follows: 315 by petitioner Edith Conway Ringling; 315 by defendant Aubrey B. Ringling Haley (individually or as executrix and legatee of a deceased husband); and 370 by defendant John Ringling North. The purpose of the meeting was to elect the entire board of seven directors. The shares could be voted cumulatively. Mrs. Ringling asserts that by virtue of the operation of an agreement between her and Mrs. Haley, the latter was bound to vote her shares for an adjournment of the meeting, or in the alternative, for a certain slate of directors. Mrs. Haley contends that she was not so bound for reason that the agreement was invalid, or at least revocable.

The two ladies entered into the agreement in 1941. It makes like provisions concerning stock of the corporate defendant and of another corporation, but in this case, we are concerned solely with the agreement as it affects the voting of stock of the corporate defendant. The agreement recites that each party was the owner "subject only to possible claims of creditors of the estates of Charles Ringling and Richard Ringling, respectively", (deceased husbands of the parties) of 300 shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation; that in 1938 these shares had been deposited under a voting trust agreement which would terminate in 1947, or earlier, upon the elimination of certain liability of the corporation; that each party also owned 15 shares individually; that the parties had "entered into an agreement in April 1934 providing for joint action by them in matters affecting their ownership of stock and interest in" the corporate defendant; that the parties desired "to continue to act jointly in all matters relating to their stock ownership or interest in" the corporate defendant (and the other corporation). The agreement then provides as follows:

"Now, Therefore, in consideration of the mutual covenants and agreements hereinafter contained the parties hereto agree as follows:

"1. Neither party will sell any shares of stock or any voting trust certificates in either of said corporations to any other person whosoever, without first making a written offer to the other party hereto of all of the shares or voting trust certificates proposed to be sold, for the same price and upon the same terms and conditions as in such proposed sale, and allowing such other party a time of not less than 180 days from the date of such written offer within which to accept same.

"2. In exercising any voting rights to which either party may be entitled by virtue of ownership of stock or voting trust certificates held by them in either of said corporations, each party will consult and confer with the other and the parties will act jointly in exercising such voting rights in accordance with such agreement as they may reach with respect to any matter calling for the exercise of such voting rights.

"3. In the event the parties fail to agree with respect to any matter covered by paragraph 2 above, the question in disagreement shall be submitted for arbitration to Karl D. Loos, of Washington, D. C., as arbitrator and his decision thereon shall be binding upon the parties hereto. Such arbitration shall be exercised to the end of assuring for the respective corporations good management and such participation therein by the members of the Ringling family as the experience, capacity and ability of each may warrant. The parties may at any time by written agreement designate any other individual to act as arbitrator in lieu of said Loos.

"4. Each of the parties hereto will enter into and execute such voting trust agreement or agreements and such other instruments as, from time to time they may deem advisable and as they may be advised by counsel are appropriate to effectuate the purposes and objects of this agreement.

"5. This agreement shall be in effect from the date hereof and shall continue in effect for a period of ten years unless sooner terminated by mutual agreement in writing by the parties hereto.

"6. The agreement of April 1934 is hereby terminated.

"7. This agreement shall be binding upon and inure to the benefit of the heirs, executors, administrators and assigns of the parties hereto respectively." * * *

Having examined what the parties sought to provide by the agreement, we come now to defendants' contention that the voting provisions are illegal and revocable. They say that the courts of this state have definitely established the doctrine "that there can be no agreement, or any device whatsoever, by which the voting power of stock of a Delaware corporation may be irrevocably separated from the ownership of the stock, except by an agreement which complies with Section 18" of the Corporation Law, and except by a proxy coupled with an interest. They rely on Perry v. Missouri-Kansas P. L. Co., 22 Del.Ch. 33, 191 A. 823; In re Public Industrials Corporation, 19 Del. Ch. 398, reported as In re Chilson, 168 A. 82, 19 Del.Ch. 398; Aldridge v. Franco Wyoming Oil Co., 24 Del.Ch. 126, 7 A.2d 753, affirmed in 24 Del.Ch. 349, 14 A.2d 380; Belle Isle Corporation v. Corcoran, 49 A.2d 1; and contend that the doctrine is derived from Section 18 itself (Rev. Code of Del., 1935, § 2050).

In our view, neither the cases nor the statute sustain the rule for which the defendants contend. Their sweeping formulation would impugn well-recognized means by which a shareholder may effectively confer his voting rights upon others while retaining various other rights. For example, defendants' rule would apparently not permit holders of voting stock to confer upon stockholders of another class, by the device of an amendment of the certificate of incorporation, the exclusive right to vote during periods when dividends are not paid on stock of the lattter class. The broad prohibitory meaning which defendants find in Section 18 seems inconsistent with their concession that proxies coupled with an interest may be irrevocable, for the statute contains nothing about such proxies. The statute authorizes, among other things, the deposit or transfer of stock in trust for a specified purpose, namely, "vesting" in the transferee "the right to vote thereon" for a limited period; and prescribes numerous requirements in this connection. Accordingly, it seems reasonable to infer that to establish the relationship and accomplish the purpose which the statute authorizes, its requirements must be complied with. But the statute does not purport to deal with agreements whereby shareholders attempt to bind each other as to how they shall vote their shares. Various forms of such pooling agreements, as they are sometimes called, have been held valid and have been distinguished from voting trusts. [Citing cases.]

We think the particular agreement before us does not violate Section 18 or constitute an attempted evasion of its requirements, and is not illegal for any other reason. Generally speaking, a shareholder may exercise wide liberality of judgment in the matter of voting, and it is not objectionable that his motives may be for personal profit, or determined by whims or caprice, so long as he violates no duty owed his fellow shareholders. Heil v. Standard G. & E. Co., 17 Del.Ch. 214, 151 A. 303. The ownership of voting stock imposes no legal duty to vote at all. A group of shareholders may, without impropriety, vote their respective shares so as to obtain advantages of concerted action. They may lawfully contract with each other to vote in the future in such way as they, or a majority of their group, from time to time determine. Reasonable provisions for cases of failure of the group to reach a determination because of an even division in their ranks seem unobjectionable. The provision here for submission to the arbitrator is plainly designed as a deadlock-breaking measure, and the arbitrator's decision cannot be enforced unless at least one of the parties (entitled to cast one-half of their combined votes) is willing that it be enforced. We find the provision reasonable. It does not appear that the agreement enables the parties to take any unlawful advantage of the outside shareholder, or of any other person. It offends no rule of law or public policy of this state of which we are aware.

Legal consideration for the promises of each party is supplied by the mutual promises of the other party. The undertaking to vote in accordance with the arbitrator's decision is a valid contract. The good faith of the arbitrator's action has not been challenged and, indeed, the record indicates that no such challenge could be supported. Accordingly, the failure of Mrs. Haley to exercise her voting rights in accordance with his decision was a breach of her contract. It is no extenuation of the breach that her votes were cast for two of the three candidates directed by the arbitrator. His directions to her were part of a single plan or course of action for the voting of the shares of both parties to the agreement, calculated to utilize an advantage of joint action by them which would bring about the election of an additional director. The actual voting of Mrs. Haley's shares frustrates that plan to such an extent that it should not be treated as a partial performance of her contract.

Throughout their argument, defendants make much of the fact that all votes cast at the meeting were by the registered shareholders. The Court of Chancery may, in a review of an election, reject votes of a registered shareholder where his voting of them is found to be in violation of rights of another person. Compare: In re Giant Portland Cement Co., 21 A.2d 697 (Del.Ch.); In re Canal Construction Co., 21 Del.Ch. 135, 182 A. 545. It seems to us that upon the application of Mrs. Ringling, the injured party, the votes representing Mrs. Haley's shares should not be counted. Since no infirmity in Mr. North's voting has been demonstrated, his right to recognition of what he did at the meeting should be considered in granting any relief to Mrs. Ringling; for her rights arose under a contract to which Mr. North was not a party. With this in mind, we have concluded that the election should not be declared invalid, but that effect should be given to a rejection of the votes representing Mrs. Haley's shares. No other relief seems appropriate in this proceeding. Mr. North's vote against the motion for adjournment was sufficient to defeat it. With respect to the election of directors, the return of the inspectors should be corrected to show a rejection of Mrs. Haley's votes, and to declare the election of the six persons for whom Mr. North and Mrs. Ringling voted.

This leaves one vacancy in the directorate. The question of what to do about such a vacancy was not considered by the court below and has not been argued here. For this reason, and because an election of directors at the 1947 annual meeting (which presumably will be held in the near future) may make a determination of the question unimportant, we shall not decide it on this appeal. If a decision of the point appears important to the parties, any of them may apply to raise it in the Court of Chancery, after the mandate of this court is received there.

An order should be entered directing a modification of the order of the Court of Chancery in accordance with this opinion.

MANSON v. CURTIS.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1918. 223 N.Y. 313, 119 N.E. 559.

Action by Philip Manson against F. Kingsbury Curtis. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (171 App.Div. 954, 155 N.Y.Supp. 1123), affirming a judgment of the Special Term which overruled demurrers to defenses contained in the answer, and dismissed the complaint on the merits, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

COLLIN, J. The action is to recover the damages arising to the plaintiff by reason of the acts of the defendant. The Special Term decided, under demurrers of the plaintiff to certain defenses alleged in the answer, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and should be dismissed. The consequent judgment was affirmed by the Appellate Division.

The determinative allegations of the complaint are: In November, 1911, there existed a domestic corporation, the Bermuda-Atlantic Steamship Company. It was formed in December, 1910, as the successor of a corporation with the same name. The corporate business was operating a steamship, the Oceana, between the city of New York and the islands of Bermuda. The plaintiff had through 1911 controlled and managed the corporate business, which had been highly successful and profitable. The total outstanding shares of the capital stock were of the aggregate amount of $186,000, of which each of the plaintiff and the defendant owned in the amount of $55,000, Abel I. Culver owned in the amount of $40,000, and eight others, who became stockholders at the solicitation of the plaintiff, who "was able to control same for voting purposes," owned in the amount of $36,000. The plaintiff was a director. The defendant was a director, a lawyer, and the general counsel to the corporation, and at all the times involved had full knowledge of the corporate affairs and financial condition. An agreement, known to the defendant, existed between the plaintiff and Culver that they would act as a unit in the management of the corporate affairs, "to the end that such policy as the plaintiff might in his good judgment promulgate in the conduct and management of the said company's affairs would be acquiesced in and followed by said Culver"; that neither would dispose of any of his shares without first giving to the other a first option to buy all or any part of the shares, and that if occasion arose Culver would vote his shares as the plaintiff voted his. The defendant requested plaintiff's permission to purchase Culver's shares, which, added to those held by the defendant, would constitute the defendant the holder of more than one-half of the outstanding shares. The plaintiff and defendant thereupon agreed, for a good and valuable consideration, as follows:

"(1) That for one year thereafter there should be no change in the business management of the business of the corporation to that theretofore carried out by plaintiff, and that the management thereof should continue in the same manner that it had in the past, and that plaintiff should continue as general manager of the corporation and shape its policy.

"(2) That any president of the corporation to be thereafter elected should be only a nominal head as president, and be no more active in conducting the affairs of the corporation than the then president, Abel I. Culver, had been, and that such president should not change, alter, molest, or interfere with plaintiff's methods of managing the corporate business affairs nor interfere with plaintiff as such general manager for said one year.

"(3) That out of defendant's stockholdings he would sell to the plaintiff and plaintiff would buy 20 shares or $2,000 thereof at par value after defendant had acquired Culver's said stock.

"(4) That the defendant and the plaintiff should each name three directors of the corporation for immediate future election (making six) and that a seventh director to be elected should be a disinterested party to be mutually agreed upon by plaintiff and defendant with whom should be deposited, and who should be the custodian of $10,000 of stock, $5,000 thereof to be carved out of the plaintiff's holdings and $5,000 out of the defendant's holdings, said $10,000 of stock to be used and voted on by such disinterested person at stockholders' meetings according to his judgment.

"(5) That the said defendant would loan to the company such fund as it immediately required to pay the expense of certain overhauling and repair charges for work which was then about to be made on the steamer Oceana, the total cost of which work was estimated at approximately twelve thousand dollars ($12,000).

"(6) The plaintiff on his part agreed to act as general manager of the corporation for one year and to conduct and manage the practical business end of the corporation according to his best ability, and to shape its policy, as he had in the past, and to purchase 20 shares of defendant's total holdings and pay defendant $2,000 therefor, and that plaintiff would name three directors of said corporation for immediate future election, and that he would cooperate with defendant in the selection of a seventh or disinterested person to be a seventh director, and carve out of this plaintiff's total holdings of stock $5,000 thereof for deposit with such disinterested person for voting purposes."

It was upon the express condition that the agreement be executed, and, in consideration of it, executed and delivered, that the plaintiff consented to the sale which was made by Culver of his shares to the defendant.

The obligations of the plaintiff under the agreement were performed by him, in so far as performance was permitted. The defendant violated the agreement, in that he refused to sell the 20 shares of the stock to plaintiff. He, through his control of dummy directors elected by his majority votes, placed all control and management of the corporate affairs in charge of a person unfit and other than plaintiff. He refused to carve out of his stockholdings $5,000 in amount for use by a disinterested party for voting purposes or to co-operate with the plaintiff in the designation of a disinterested party. The business and affairs of the corporation were consequently negligently and inefficiently carried on in particulars alleged, with the result that in June, 1912, the corporation was adjudicated a bankrupt. The defendant when making the agreement did not intend to carry it out, and intended to use his voting power in so injuring the corporate business and reducing the value of the stock that he could purchase it at a nominal price, and then sell the steamship at a large price to parties with whom he was, when the agreement was made, secretly negotiating the sale. When the agreement was made the shares of plaintiff had a market value of the sum of $215,000, and by reason of the acts of the defendant became valueless; the corporation was indebted to the plaintiff for moneys advanced in the sum of $19,582.53 and interest, which said moneys were never paid to plaintiff. Judgment in the sum of $234,-582.53 is demanded. * * *

The primal question is, Is the agreement of November, 1911, illegal and void? It does not constitute a voting trust agreement, because under it each party retains the voting power of the shares owned or to be owned by him. The right of voting is with the legal and beneficial ownership. A voting trust agreement accumulates in the hands of a person or persons shares of several owners, in trust for the purpose of voting them, in order, through the selection and election of directors, to control the corporate business and affairs. The agreement does not constitute a proxy or reciprocal proxies because it does not make either party the agent of the other. A proxy is an authority by one, having the right to do a certain thing, to another to do it. The statutes regulating voting trust agreements and the use of proxies (General Corporation Law [Consol. Laws, c. 23] §§ 23, 25, 26, 27), are therefore not applicable to the agreement.

It is not illegal or against public policy for two or more stockholders owning the majority of the shares of stock to unite upon a course of corporate policy or action, or upon the officers whom they will elect. An ordinary agreement, among a minority in number, but a majority in shares, for the purpose of obtaining control of the corporation by the election of particular persons as directors is not illegal. Shareholders have the right to combine their interests and voting powers to secure such control of the corporation and the adoption of and adhesion by it to a specific policy and course of business. Agreements upon a sufficient consideration between them, of such intendment and effect, are valid and binding, if they do not contravene any express charter or statutory provision or contemplate any fraud, oppression, or wrong against other stockholders or other illegal object. * * *

The respondent asserts and argues that the agreement before us contravenes a statutory provision and the policy of the state, because in intent and effect it withdraws from the directors of the corporation that control and direction of the corporate affairs and business which the statutes and the law vest in and confine to them. This assertion we will now consider. The ascertainment of the substantial intent of the parties, as expressed, is the fundamental rule in the interpretation of all contracts. We must look to the agreement as a whole, to the matters with which it deals, to the circumstances under which it was made, and thereby determine the true intent and purpose of the parties; and, if such intent and purpose is reasonably within the scope of the language used, it must be taken to be a part of the agreement the same as if it were plainly expressed. People ex rel. New York Central & Hudson River R. R. Co. v. Walsh, 211 N.Y. 90, 105 N.E. 136. The fundamental and dominant intent and purpose of the agreement was that through its fulfillment there should be vested in or continue to be vested in the plaintiff solely and exclusively, for the period named, the executive administration of the affairs of the corporation. The parties agreed that through the period of one year after the making of the agreement the plaintiff should manage the corporate business and shape and control the corporate policy; that the president of the corporation should be only a nominal head and be inattentive to and noninterfering with the business or the policy or the plaintiff. Such is the clear and certain intent and effect of the paragraphs 1, 2, and 6 of the agreement. Certain allegations of the complaint are confirmatory. The prior agreement between the plaintiff and Culver, the president of the corporation, provided that:

"They act as a unit in the management of the company's affairs, to the end that such policy as the plaintiff might in his good judgment promulgate in the conduct and management of the said company's affairs would be acquiesced in and followed by said Culver."

Prior to the transfer by Culver of his stock to the defendant, the plaintiff had shaped the policy and controlled and managed the business of the corporation, and thereafter the defendant by his appointee "superseded and set aside the policy previously established and outlined by this plaintiff, and set aside and revoked his orders and his contemplated measures theretofore installed, and arranged for the future, and changed the policy theretofore established by plaintiff in all the departments of the business of said corporation." The exclusive administration by the plaintiff of the affairs of the corporation the agreement provided should continue. The plaintiff and defendant agreed by paragraph "4" of the agreement that they would unite in the choice and election of six of the seven directors, a stipulation standing alone innocent and legal. They did not intend in so stipulating to destroy or affect the purpose and intent which induced the agreement as a whole. Manifestly, the agreement would not have been made for the purpose of effecting that stipulation alone. That stipulation was subordinate. The fundamental and dominant purpose and intent of the parties which necessitated and provided for a passive president of the board of directors necessitated likewise passive directors. The conditions which the parties wished to meet and their intent necessitated and contemplated the selecting of directors who should remain passive or mechanical to the will and word of the plaintiff. The management of the affairs of the corporation by its board of directors and the management of them by the plaintiff as contemplated by the agreement are irreconcilable and mutually destructive.

The prerogatives and functions of the directors of a stock corporation are sufficiently defined and established. The affairs of every corporation shall be managed by its board of directors (General Corporation Law, [Consol. Laws, c. 23] § 34), subject, however, to the valid by-laws adopted by the stockholders (section 11, subd. 5; Stock Corporation Law [Consol. Laws, c. 59] § 30). In corporate bodies, the powers of the board of directors are, in a very important sense, original and undelegated. The stockholders do not confer, nor can they revoke, those powers. They are derivative only in the sense of being received from the state in the act of incorporation. The directors convened as a board are the primary possessors of all the powers which the charter confers, and like private principals they may delegate to agents of their own appointment the performance of any acts which they themselves can perform. The recognition of this principle is absolutely necessary in the affairs of every corporation whose powers are vested in a board of directors. Hoyt v. Thompson's Executor, 19 N.Y. 207, 216. All powers directly conferred by statute, or impliedly granted, of necessity, must be exercised by the directors who are constituted by the law as the agency for the doing of corporate acts. In the management of the affairs of the corporation, they are dependent solely upon their own knowledge of its business and their own judgment as to what its interests require. Beveridge v. New York Elevated R. R. Co., 112 N.Y. 1, 19 N.E. 489, 2 L.R.A. 648. While the ordinary rules of law relating to an agent are applicable in considering the acts of a board of directors in behalf of a corporation when dealing with third persons, the individual directors making up the board are not mere employés, but a part of an elected body of officers constituting the executive agents of the corporation. They hold such office charged with the duty to act for the corporation according to their best judgment, and in so doing they cannot be controlled in the reasonable exercise and performance of such duty. As a general rule, the stockholders cannot act in relation to the ordinary business of the corporation, nor can they control the directors in the exercise of the judgment vested in them by virtue of their office. The relation of the directors to the stockholders is essentially that of trustee and cestui que trust. The peculiar relation that they bear to the corporation and the owners of its stock grows out of the inability of the corporation to act except through such managing officers and agents. The corporation is the owner of the property, but the directors in the performance of their duty possess it, and act in every way as if they owned it. People ex rel. Manice v. Powell, 201 N.Y. 194, 94 N.E. 634. Directors are the exclusive, executive representatives of the corporation, and are charged with the administration of its internal affairs and the management and use of its assets. Pollitz v. Wabash R. R. Co., 207 N.Y. 113, 100 N.E. 721. Clearly the law does not permit the stockholders to create a sterilized board of directors. Corporations are the creatures of the state, and must comply with the exactions and regulations it imposes. We conclude that the agreement here is illegal and void, and its violation is not a basis for a cause of action. Jackson v. Hooper, 76 N.J.Eq. 592, 75 Atl. 568, 27 L.R.A.,N.S., 658. This conclusion is not affected by the allegation that the defendant when making the agreement did not intend to carry it out. The illegality of the agreement was, the law holds, known by both parties. There is no deceit in the intention of the defendant to refrain from performing the agreement, performance of which would violate the law. * * *

The good faith or intention of the parties, or of the plaintiff, in entering into the agreement, does not purge it of the illegality. The doctrine that an advantageous or desirable end justifies unlawful means to its accomplishment has neither foothold nor recognition in the law. The rule that all the stockholders by their universal consent may do as they choose with the corporate concerns and assets, provided the interests of creditors are not affected, because they are the complete owners of the corporation, cannot be invoked here. The fact that the plaintiff was able to control for voting purposes the eight minority stockholders, who were not parties to the agreement, if proved, would not make them parties or establish their consent to the agreement. They might vote in electing directors as the plaintiff requested without affecting their rights as stockholders. They could thereafter insist that the directors so chosen should assume and perform the duties and responsibilities which the law imposes.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

McQUADE v. STONEHAM et al.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1934. 263 N.Y. 323, 189 N.E. 234.

Action by Francis X. McQuade against Charles A. Stoneham and another. Judgment for plaintiff for $42,827,38, and other relief (142 Misc. 842, 256 N.Y.S. 431) was unanimously affirmed by the Appellate Division (238 App.Div. 827, 262 N.Y.S. 966), and plaintiff appeals by permission.

Reversed and complaint dismissed.

POUND, CHIEF JUDGE. The action is brought to compel specific performance of an agreement between the parties, entered into to secure the control of National Exhibition Company, also called the Baseball Club (New York Nationals or "Giants"). This was one of Stoneham's enterprises which used the New York polo grounds for its home games. McGraw was manager of the Giants. McQuade was at the time the contract was entered into a city magistrate. He resigned December 8, 1930.

Defendant Stoneham became the owner of 1,306 shares, or a majority of the stock of National Exhibition Company. Plaintiff and defendant McGraw each purchased 70 shares of his stock. Plaintiff paid Stoneham $50,338.10 for the stock he purchased. As a part of the transaction, the agreement in question was entered into. It was dated May 21, 1919. Some of its pertinent provisions are

"VIII. The parties hereto will use their best endeavors for the purpose of continuing as directors of said Company and as officers thereof the following:

"Directors:

"Charles A. Stoneham,
"John J. McGraw,
"Francis X. McQuade

"—with the right to the party of the first part [Stoneham] to name all additional directors as he sees fit:

"Officers:

"Charles A. Stoneham, President,
"John J. McGraw, Vice-President,
"Francis X. McQuade, Treasurer.

"IX. No salaries are to be paid to any of the above officers or directors, except as follows:

"President	$45,000
"Vice-President	7,500
"Treasurer	7,500

"X. There shall be no change in said salaries, no change in the amount of capital, or the number of shares, no change or amendment of the by-laws of the corporation or any matters regarding the policy of the business of the corporation or any matters which may in anywise affect, endanger or interfere with the rights of minority stockholders, excepting upon the mutual and unanimous consent of all of the parties hereto. * * *

"XIV. This agreement shall continue and remain in force so long as the parties or any of them or the representative of any, own the stock referred to in this agreement, to wit, the party of the first part, 1,166 shares, the party of the second part 70 shares and the party of the third part 70 shares, except as may otherwise appear by this agreement. * * *"

In pursuance of this contract Stoneham became president and McGraw vice president of the corporation. McQuade became treasurer. In June, 1925, his salary was increased to $10,000 a year. He continued to act until May 2, 1928, when Leo J. Bondy was elected to succeed him. The board of directors consisted of seven men. The four outside of the parties hereto were selected by Stoneham and he had complete control over them. At the meeting of May 2, 1928, Stoneham and McGraw refrained from voting, McQuade voted for himself, and the other four voted for Bondy. Defendants did not keep their agreement with McQuade to use their best efforts to continue him as treasurer. On the contrary, he was dropped with their entire acquiescence. At the next stockholders' meeting he was dropped as a director although they might have elected him.

The courts below have refused to order the reinstatement of McQuade, but have given him damages for wrongful discharge, with a right to sue for future damages.

The cause for dropping McQuade was due to the falling out of friends. McQuade and Stoneham had disagreed. The trial court has found in substance that their numerous quarrels and disputes did not affect the orderly and efficient administration of the business of the corporation; that plaintiff was removed because he had antagonized the dominant Stoneham by persisting in challenging his power over the corporate treasury and for no misconduct on his part. The court also finds that plaintiff was removed by Stoneham for protecting the corporation and its minority stockholders. We will assume that Stoneham put him out when he might have retained him, merely in order of get rid of him.

Defendants say that the contract in suit was void because the directors held their office charged with the duty to act for the corporation according to their best judgment and that any contract which compels a director to vote to keep any particular person in office and at a stated salary is illegal. Directors are the exclusive executive representatives of the corporation, charged with administration of its internal affairs and the management and use of its assets. They manage the business of the corporation. (General Corporation Law, Consol.Laws c. 23, § 27.) "An agreement to continue a man as president is dependent upon his continued loyalty to the interests of the corporation." Fells v. Katz, 256 N.Y. 67, 72, 175 N.E. 516, 517. So much is undisputed.

Plaintiff contends that the converse of this proposition is true and that an agreement among directors to continue a man as an officer of a corporation is not to be broken so long as such officer is loyal to the interests of the corporation and that, as plaintiff has been found loyal to the corporation, the agreement of defendants is enforceable.

Although it has been held that an agreement among stockholders whereby it is attempted to divest the directors of their power to discharge an unfaithful employee of the corporation is illegal as against public policy (Fells v. Katz, supra), it must be equally true that the stockholders may not, by agreement among themselves, control the directors in the exercise of the judgment vested in them by virtue of of their office to elect officers and fix salaries. Their motives may not be questioned so long as their acts are legal. The bad faith or the improper motives of the parties does not change the rule. Manson v. Curtis, 223 N.Y. 313, 324, 119 N.E. 559, Ann.Cas.1918E, 247. Directors may not by agreements entered into as stockholders abrogate their independent judgment. Creed v. Copps, 103 Vt. 164, 152 A. 369, 71 A.L.R. 1287, annotated.

Stockholders may, of course, combine to elect directors. That rule is well settled. As Holmes, C. J., pointedly said (Brightman v. Bates, 175 Mass. 105, 111, 55 N.E. 809, 811): "If stockholders want to make their power felt, they must unite. There is no reason why a majority should not agree to keep together." The power to unite is, however, limited to the election of directors and is not extended to contracts whereby limitations are placed on the power of directors to manage the business of the corporation by the selection of agents at defined salaries.

The minority shareholders whose interests McQuade says he has been punished for protecting, are not, aside from himself, complaining about his discharge. He is not acting for the corporation or for them in this action. It is impossible to see how the corporation has been injured by the substitution of Bondy as treasurer in place of Mc-

Quade. As McQuade represents himself in this action and seeks redress for his own wrongs, "we prefer to listen to [the corporation and the minority stockholders] before any decision as to their wrongs." Faulds v. Yates, 57 Ill. 416, 417, 11 Am.Rep. 24.

It is urged that we should pay heed to the morals and manners of the market place to sustain this agreement and that we should hold that its violation gives rise to a cause of action for damages rather than base our decision on any outworn notions of public policy. Public policy is a dangerous guide in determining the validity of a contract and courts should not interfere lightly with the freedom of competent parties to make their own contracts. We do not close our eyes to the fact that such agreements, tacitly or openly arrived at, are not uncommon, especially in close corporations where the stockholders are doing business for convenience under a corporate organization. We know that majority stockholders, united in voting trusts, effectively manage the business of a corporation by choosing trustworthy directors to reflect their policies in the corporate management. Nor are we unmindful that McQuade has, so the court has found, been shabbily treated as a purchaser of stock from Stoneham. We have said: "A trustee is held to something stricter than the morals of the market place" (Meinhard v. Salmon, 249 N.Y. 458, 464, 164 N.E. 545, 546, 62 A.L.R. 1), but Stoneham and McGraw were not trustees for McQuade as an individual. Their duty was to the corporation and its stockholders, to be exercised according to their unrestricted lawful judgment. They were under no legal obligation to deal righteously with McQuade if it was against public policy to do so.

The courts do not enforce mere moral obligations, nor legal ones either, unless some one seeks to establish rights which may be waived by custom and for convenience. We are constrained by authority to hold that a contract is illegal and void so far as it precludes the board of directors, at the risk of incurring legal liability, from changing officers, salaries, or policies or retaining individuals in office, except by consent of the contracting parties. On the whole, such a holding is probably preferable to one which would open the courts to pass on the motives of directors in the lawful exercise of their trust. * * *

The judgment of the Appellate Division and that of the Trial Term should be reversed and the complaint dismissed, with costs in all courts.

CLARK v. DODGE

Court of Appeals of New York, 1936. 269 N.Y. 410, 199 N.E. 641.

Action by David H. Clark against John L. Dodge and others, wherein defendants filed a counterclaim. From an order of the Appellate Division, Second Department, entered on October 10, 1934, dismissing the complaint (242 App.Div. 728, 274 N.Y.S. 677), plaintiff appeals.

Judgment of Appellate Division reversed and order of Special Term affirmed.

CROUCH, JUDGE. The action is for the specific performance of a contract between the plaintiff, Clark, and the defendant Dodge, relating to the affairs of the two defendant corporations. To the complaint a joint answer by the three defendants was interposed, consisting of denials and a separate defense and counterclaim. To the separate defense and counterclaim a reply was made. The defendant then moved under rule 112 of the Rules of Civil Practice, and under sections 476, 96, and 279 of the Civil Practice Act, to dismiss the complaint. The motion was made "on the pleadings in this action and the admissions of the plaintiff" in two affidavits submitted by him on a prior motion in the action. The alleged admissions are equivocal at best, and clearly were not "intended to be treated as a part of a pleading or made to avoid some question arising on the pleadings." Lloyd v. R. S. M. Corporation, 251 N.Y. 318, 320, 167 N.E. 456. We shall deal therefore, with the questions here presented in the light of the facts most favorable to plaintiff appearing in the pleadings only.

Those facts, briefly stated, are as follows: The two corporate defendants are New Jersey corporations manufacturing medicinal preparations by secret formulæ. The main office, factory, and assets of both corporations are located in the state of New York. In 1921, and at all times since, Clark owned 25 per cent. and Dodge 75 per cent. of the stock of each corporation. Dodge took no active part in the business, although he was a director, and through ownership of their qualifying shares, controlled the other directors of both corporations. He was the president of Bell & Co., Inc., and nominally general manager of Hollings-Smith Company, Inc. The plaintiff, Clark, was a director and held the offices of treasurer and general manager of Bell & Co., Inc., and also had charge of the major portion of the business of Hollings-Smith Company, Inc. The formulæ and methods of manufacture of the medicinal preparations were known to him alone. Under date of February 15, 1921, Dodge and Clark, the sole owners of the stock of both corporations, entered into a written agreement under seal, which after reciting the stock ownership of both parties, the desire of Dodge that Clark should continue in the efficient management and control of the business of Bell & Co., Inc., so long as he should "remain faithful, efficient and competent to so manage and control the said business"; and his further desire that Clark should not be the sole custodian of a specified formula, but should share his knowledge thereof and of the method of manufacture with a son of Dodge, provided, in substance, as follows: That Dodge during his lifetime and, after his death, a trustee to be appointed by his will, would so vote his stock and so vote as a director that the plaintiff (a) should continue to be a director of Bell & Co., Inc.; and (b) should continue as its general manager so long as he should be "faithful, efficient and competent"; (c) should during his life receive one-fourth of the net income of the corporations either by way of salary or dividends; and (d) that no unreasonable or incommensurate salaries should be paid to other officers or agents which would so reduce the net income as materially to affect Clark's profits. Clark on his part agreed to disclose the specified formula to the son and to instruct him in the details and methods of manufacture; and, further, at the end of his life to bequeath his stock—if no issue survived him—to the wife and children of Dodge.

It was further provided that the provisions in regard to the division of net profits and the regulation of salaries should also apply to the Hollings-Smith Company.

The complaint alleges due performance of the contract by Clark and breach thereof by Dodge in that he has failed to use his stock control to continue Clark as a director and as general manager, and has prevented Clark from receiving his proportion of the income, while taking his own, by causing the employment of incompetent persons at excessive salaries, and otherwise.

The relief sought is reinstatement as director and general manager and an accounting by Dodge and by the corporations for waste and for the proportion of net income due plaintiff, with an injunction against further violations.

The only question which need be discussed is whether the contract is illegal as against public policy within the decision in McQuade v. Stoneham, 263 N.Y. 323, 189 N.E. 234, upon the authority of which the complaint was dismissed by the Appellate Division.

"The business of a corporation shall be managed by its board of directors." General Corporation Law (Consol.Laws, c. 23) § 27. That is the statutory norm. Are we committed by the McQuade Case to the doctrine that there may be no variation, however slight or innocuous, from that norm, where salaries or policies or the retention of individuals in office are concerned? There is ample authority supporting that doctrine. E. g., West v. Camden, 135 U.S. 507, 10 S.Ct. 838, 34 L.Ed. 254; Jackson v. Hooper, 76 N.J.Eq. 592, 75 A. 568, 27 L.R.A., N.S., 658. But cf. Salomon v. Salomon & Co., [1897] A.C. 22, 44, and something may be said for it, since it furnishes a simple, if arbitrary, test. Apart from its practical administrative convenience, the reasons upon which it is said to rest are more or less nebulous. Public policy, the intention of the Legislature, detriment to the corporation, are phrases which in this connection mean little. Possible harm to bona fide purchasers of stock or to creditors or to stockholding minorities have more substance; but such harms are absent in many instances. If the enforcement of a particular contract damages nobody—not even, in any perceptible degree, the public—one sees no reason for holding it illegal, even though it impinges slightly upon the broad provision of section 27. Damage suffered or threatened is a logical and practical test, and has come to be the one generally adopted by the courts. See 28 Columbia Law Review 366, 372. Where the directors are the sole stockholders, there seems to be no objection to enforcing an agreement among them to vote for certain people as officers. There is no direct decision to that effect in this court, yet there are strong indications that such a rule has long been recognized. The opinion in Manson v. Curtis, 223 N.Y. 313, 325, 119 N.E. 559, 562, Ann.Cas.1918E, 247, closed its discussion by saying: "The rule that all the stockholders by their universal consent may do as they choose with the corporate concerns and assets, provided the interests of creditors are not affected, because they are the complete owners of the corporation, cannot be invoked here." That was because all the stockholders were not parties to the agreement there in question. So, where the public was not affected, "the parties in interest, might, by their original agreement of incorporation, limit their respective rights and powers," even where there was a conflicting statutory standard. * * *

Except for the broad dicta in the McQuade opinion, we think there can be no doubt that the agreement here in question was legal and that the complaint states a cause of action. There was no attempt to sterilize the board of directors, as in the Manson and McQuade Cases. The only restrictions on Dodge were (a) that as a stockholder he should vote for Clark as a director—a perfectly legal contract; (b) that as director he should continue Clark as general manager, so long as he proved faithful, efficient, and competent—an agreement which could harm nobody; (c) that Clark should always receive as salary or dividends one-fourth of the "net income." For the purposes of this motion, it is only just to construe that phrase as meaning whatever was left for distribution after the directors had in good faith set aside whatever they deemed wise; (d) that no salaries to other officers should be paid, unreasonable in amount or incommensurate with services rendered—a beneficial and not a harmful agreement.

If there was any invasion of the powers of the directorate under that agreement, it is so slight as to be negligible; and certainly there is no damage suffered by or threatened to anybody. The broad statements in the McQuade opinion, applicable to the facts there, should be confined to those facts.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should be reversed and the order of the Special Term affirmed, with costs in this court and in the Appellate Division.

Judgment accordingly.

ODMAN v. OLESON et al.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1946. 319 Mass. 24, 64 N.E.2d 439.

Action of tort by Nelson Odman against Olaf E. Oleson and others to recover damages for alleged fraud of defendants in depriving plaintiff of valuable property rights in a corporation that were allegedly his under a certain contract. Demurrers of the defendants to the declaration were sustained, and plaintiff appeals under G.L. (Ter.Ed.) c. 231, § 96.

Order sustaining demurrers affirmed, and judgment for defendants.

LUMMUS, JUSTICE. The plaintiff in this action of tort alleges in a single count that by fraud he was deprived of valuable rights in The Framanco Company, a Massachusetts corporation, that were his under a contract executed by all the parties except the defendants Epstein and Ramsey on August 21, 1942. After that contract was made, the defendants Olaf E. Oleson and his wife Mary E. Oleson owned four hundred seventy-five shares, the plaintiff owned three hundred forty-two shares, the defendant Edward T. Edmands owned one hundred thirty-three shares, and the defendant J. Haller Ramsey owned fifty shares, the entire capital stock being one thousand shares.

The contract of August 21, 1942, which was signed by all the stockholders except Ramsey, was an attempt to control the future action of the stockholders and directors through the agreement of the parties to it to vote in favor of an elaborate program therein set forth. Edmands and Oleson were to be two of four directors, and the plaintiff and a nominee of his were to be the other two. The plaintiff was to be clerk vice-president and assistant treasurer at an annual salary of $9,360. The rights of the parties under the agreement were to continue as long as they should remain connected with the company.

The declaration alleges that the defendants conspired to defraud him of his contract rights by purchasing in the name of Olaf E. Oleson the fifty shares of stock owned by Ramsey. Then the defendants caused the by-laws to be amended by increasing the number of directors to five, and elected Mary E. Oleson as the fifth director. The plaintiff was induced not to take legal action to prevent the change by the false representations of Oleson and Edmands that nothing would be done in derogation of the plaintiff's contract rights. The plaintiff was afterwards displaced as clerk and vice-president and assistant treasurer of the corporation, and was not paid the salary promised him in the contract.

Demurrers of the defendants were sustained, and the plaintiff appealed to this court under G.L. (Ter.Ed.) c. 231, § 96. Keljikian v. Star Brewing Co., 303 Mass. 53, 61, 20 N.E.2d 465.

The demurrers were rightly sustained. There was one stockholder not a party to the contract who might be injuriously affected by it. That distinguishes the case from Hayden v. Beane, 293 Mass. 347, 199 N.E. 755. The contract was not restricted as to time, in which respect if not in others the case differs from Mansfield v. Lang, 293 Mass. 386, 200 N.E. 110. The contract by its terms purported to control the conduct of some of the parties as directors, in which capacity they were in all respects fiduciaries for the corporation (Spiegel v. Beacon Participations, Inc., 297 Mass. 398, 410, 411, 8 N.E.2d 895), and not merely their conduct as stockholders, differing in that respect from Brightman v. Bates, 175 Mass. 105, 55 N.E. 809, and Sagalyn v. Meekins, Packard & Wheat, Inc., 290 Mass. 434, 440, 195 N.E. 769, to say nothing of the difference in the contracts which was pointed out in Hellier v. Achorn, 255 Mass. 273, 281, 151 N.E. 305, 45 A.L.R. 788.

Although a stockholder is not in general a fiduciary in his relations to the corporation (Bell v. Fred T. Ley & Co., Inc., 278 Mass. 60, 75, 179 N.E. 294; Mairs v. Madden, 307 Mass. 378, 30 N.E.2d 242, 132 A.L.R. 256; Eno Systems, Inc., v. Eno, 311 Mass. 334, 341, 41 N.E.2d 17), a contract is void as against public policy which takes away even from stockholders freedom to use their judgment as to the best interests of the corporation. [Citing cases.]

Other possible objections to the declaration need not be considered.

Order sustaining demurrers affirmed.

Judgment for the defendants.

5. STOCKHOLDERS RESPONSIBILITY TO CORPORATION AND EACH OTHER

NOTE

Almost all that is left of the stockholder's "ownership" is his right to dividends if as and when declared; and his right to vote. This voting right is his only direct connection with the aggregate of property and operations and personalities which makes up a corporation.

And is his vote entirely his own? May he cast it or alienate it in complete disregard of his fellows—or must he be a "good citizen" in the corporate community?

Courts talk the language of complete freedom of action—up to a point. Faced with certain abuses, they depart from the rule that a stockholder need consult only his self-interest, and impose responsibilities on him. The cases trace the range of limitation or responsibility marked out as situations have arisen.

WINDMULLER v. STANDARD DISTILLING & DISTRIBUTING CO.

Circuit Court of the United States, D. New Jersey, 1902. 114 F. 491.

KIRKPATRICK, DISTRICT JUDGE. The complainants are the holders of certain shares of the first and second preferred stock of the Spirits Distributing Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, upon which the Standard Distilling & Distributing Company have guaranteed a dividend of 6 per cent. upon the first preferred, and 2 per cent. upon the second preferred, stock, during the existence of the said Spirits Distributing Company. * * *

In June, 1899, the Distilling Company of America was organized, and it became the owner of $22,742,750, par value, of the $24,000,000, par value, of the stock of the Standard Company, above referred to. It also became the owner, by purchase, of $2,592,650, par value, of the first and second preferred stock of the Spirits Distributing Company; so that at the time of the filing of this bill the stock of the Spirits Distributing Company was held as follows: By the Distilling Company of America, first and second preferred, $2,592,650; by the Standard Company (of which the Distilling Company, as has been said, owned nearly all the stock), $3,675,000 common stock; leaving outstanding stock of all kinds to the amount of $232,350, of which the complainants hold but 1,524 shares, 324 of which is first preferred, and 1,200 second preferred.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Distributing Company it was resolved that, in the judgment of the directors, it was most advisable and for the benefit of the corporation that it should be dissolved. In accordance with the general corporation act of New Jersey, a meeting of the stockholders was called to vote upon the propriety of adopting such a course. The prayer of the complainants' bill is that the Standard Company may be enjoined from voting upon its $3,675,000, par value, common stock in favor of said proposition, because it has guaranteed the dividends on the stock of the Distributing Company as aforesaid, and that the Distilling Company be enjoined from voting upon its $2,592,650, par value, of first and second preferred stock, which it has purchased and owns, because it also owns a majority of the stock of the Standard Company, which is the guarantor thereof. That is to say, however advisable and for the benefit of the corporation it may be that the same should be dissolved, yet it cannot be done because two-thirds of the stockholders whose votes are necessary to accomplish such result are disqualified from voting by reason of their interest in the cancellation of a guaranty which the complainants now conceive to be adverse to their interests. To carry the doctrine to its logical conclusion would be to hold that, if the guarantor's company and those who own a majority of the stock in the guarantor's company should also be the owners of all the stock in the guaranteed company except one share, the owner of that one share could prevent the dissolution of the company forever, if its charter were perpetual, or compel its operation at a loss until all its assets were wasted or consumed. Section 51 of the general corporation act of New Jersey provides that any corporation organized under it "may hold the shares of any other corporation of that or any other state," and while the owner thereof, "may exercise all rights, powers, and privileges of ownership, including the right to vote thereon." In respect to the voting power, the rights of a corporation are identical with the rights of an individual, and only those reasons would operate to prevent a corporation from voting on its stock which would effect the same object if the stock was held by an individual.

I have not been referred to any authority which holds that one stockholder is in any sense a trustee for other stockholders, or that he is debarred from voting on his stock according to what he may conceive to be his interest, or in a way which may result in a benefit to himself, and which other stockholders may not enjoy. Directors by whomsoever elected, are the representatives of all the stockholders, and, as such, are charged with the duty of administering the affairs of the company for the equal benefit of their cestuis que trustent. But the doctrine is new that the stockholders are trustees one for another, or that an interest of one stockholder, which in the judgment of another stockholder may seem to be adverse to his own, can operate to prevent him from voting on his own stock as he sees fit.

In the case of Transportation Co. v. Beatty, 12 App.Cas. 589, one of the directors owned a majority of the stock of the corporation, and at a meeting of the shareholders, by reason of his majority, he caused to be passed a resolution ratifying a contract to sell to the company, upon advantageous terms, a vessel belonging to himself. In passing upon the propriety of his right to vote, the court said:

"Unless some provision to the contrary is to be found in the charter or other instrument by which the company is incorporated, the resolution of a majority of the shareholders, duly convened, upon any question with which the company is legally competent to deal, is binding upon the minority, and consequently upon the company; and every shareholder has a perfect right to vote upon any such question, although he may have a personal interest in the subject-matter opposed to or different from the general or particular interests of the company. A shareholder has a perfect right to exercise his voting power in such manner as to secure the election of directors whose views on policy agree with his own, and to support those views at any shareholders' meeting."

The court cannot be called upon to manage the internal affairs of corporations, or to determine whether this or that stockholder is disqualified from voting upon one or another question which may be presented to the stockholders for their consideration by reason of his own interest. If the directors, who are the trustees of all, conspire with a few or some of the stockholders to deprive the others of their property, the court will interfere to see that justice is done. The court will not permit the directors to divert the business of the corporation so that a sale and sacrifice of its assets will become obligatory, and the distribution of the proceeds unequal among its shareholders. This is the doctrine which is at the foundation of the opinion in the case of Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. New York & N. R. Co., 150 N.Y. 410, 44 N.E. 1043, 34 L.R.A. 76, 55 Am.St.Rep. 689, and Ervin v. Navigation Co. (C.C.) 27 F. 625.

No case has been brought to the attention of the court where any stockholder has been deprived of his right to vote on his stock in such a way as may, in his opinion, best subserve his own interests. He may vote his stock as he pleases for the purpose of his own interest, but he may not sell, or cause to be sold, assets and keep the consideration. Menier v. Telegraph Works, 9 Ch.App. 350. In Gamble v. Water Co. (N.Y.) 25 N.E. 201, a stockholder's right to vote was questioned because of interest, and the court of appeals reversing the decision of the lower court, said:

"A shareholder has a legal right, at a meeting of shareholders, to vote upon a measure, even though he has a personal interest therein separate from other shareholders. At such a meeting each shareholder represents himself and his own interests, and he in no sense acts as the representative of others. The law of self-interest has at such time very great and proper sway. There can be little doubt, too, that at such meetings those who do vote on their own stock vote upon it in the light solely of their own interest, or at least in what they conceive to be their own interest."

In the case at bar the court is not in possession of facts which would enable them to determine whether the interests of the corporation, as distinct from the interests of the individual shareholders, require that it should be dissolved. Under the general corporation act of the state of New Jersey, any corporation may be dissolved whenever in the judgment of the board of directors it shall be deemed advisable and most for the benefit of such corporation that it should be dissolved; provided that, at a meeting of the stockholders called for the purpose of passing upon the propriety of such dissolution, two-thirds in interest of all the stockholders shall consent thereto. Laws 1896, c. 185. There is no provision in the law which authorizes the court to review the judgment of the directors as to the advisability of dissolution. And in 4 Thomp.Corp. § 4443, it is said:

"It is believed that no case can be found in which a court of equity has granted an injunction at the suit of a minority stockholder against the majority to prevent them from discontinuing the business of the corporation and winding up its affairs."

It is urged in behalf of the complainants that it would be inequitable to allow the Standard Company, after having received a valuable consideration for their guaranty, by their own act to dissolve the corporation, and thereby cancel its said obligation. But it must be remembered that, in the proposition made to the stockholders of the Distributing Company by Mr. Eicks, Mr. Eicks said that, if such stockholders would consent to a reduction of the rate of their dividends, he would procure the Standard Company to guaranty and pay, during the existence of the company, dividends at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on the first preferred, and 2 per cent. per annum on the second preferred stock of the Distributing Company. To that proposition the complainants assented, and they did so with the knowledge that at any time, under the laws of the state of New Jersey, two-thirds in interest of the shareholders of the Distributing Company could dissolve the company, and thereby put it out of existence. They are in no position to complain if, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, the Standard Company and the Distilling Company, who are the stockholders of the Distributing Company, propose to put an end to their liability thereunder.

Other reasons are urged in behalf of the defendant company why this injunction should not be granted, but, having come to the conclusion that the Standard Company and the Distilling Company of America are not prohibited from exercising their right to vote at the stockholders' meeting upon the question of dissolution submitted by the board of directors, it is not necessary to enter into any discussion of them.

For the reasons already stated, therefore, the rule to show cause in this case must be discharged.

WHEELER v. ABILENE NAT. BANK BLDG. CO.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, 1908.
159 F. 391, 16 L.R.A.,N.S., 892, 14 Ann.Cas. 1917.

SANBORN, CIRCUIT JUDGE. Two holders of the minority of the stock of the Abilene National Bank Building Company, a corporation, brought a suit in the court below to avoid a sale of all the property of the corporation to Hiland Southworth, who was the president of the corporation, its creditor, one of its board of directors, and the holder of the majority of its stock. * * *

The following facts appear from the pleadings and the finding of the master: The only property of the corporation was a lot and building in Abilene, which was sold to Southworth, the holder of the majority of stock of the company, in June, 1904. The fair value of this property was $2,500. The corporation had power to buy, sell, and deal in real estate, and it had issued 173 shares of stock. The complainants, who lived in the state of Vermont, owned 46 shares. The defendant Southworth, who resided in Abilene, in the state of Kansas, owned 101 shares. The defendants Humphrey, Malott, Ella M. Southworth, the wife of Southworth, and Stella Duckworth, his stenographer, held 1 share each which Southworth had transferred to them to qualify them to act as directors. Southworth was the president. Stella Duckworth was the secretary. Southworth, Mrs. Southworth, Stella Duckworth, Humphrey, and Malott constituted the board of directors. The corporation owed Southworth, but its property was of greater value than the amount of its debts. Malott and Humphrey inquired, and found that $2,500 was a fair price for the property, and the board sold and the corporation conveyed it to Southworth for that amount, paid the debts of the corporation, declared a dividend on its stock, and remitted the proper amount to each stockholder; but the complainants refused to accept their dividends. In July, 1904, Wheeler, one of the complainants, objected to this sale and told Southworth he would give $3,500 for the property. In August, 1904, Southworth and wife conveyed the lot and building to the corporation. On August 29, 1904, Wheeler sent a letter to Stella Duckworth, the secretary of the corporation, which she received, wherein he wrote that if the property was offered for sale he desired an opportunity to bid upon it; but this letter was never brought to the attention of any meeting of the stockholders or of any meeting of the directors. On November 10, 1904, the board of directors accepted the reconveyance of the property. Malott said he had made diligent inquiry regarding its value, and that he could find no one who would place a higher value than $2,500 upon it. Southworth offered $2,500, the board unanimously voted to sell it to him for that price and the corporation again conveyed it to him. Legal notice that there would be an annual meeting of the stockholders on December 6, 1904, to elect a board of directors and to transact such other business as might come before the meeting, was given. There were present at that meeting Hurd, Humphrey, Malott, Stella Duckworth, and Southworth, who together represented 111 shares of stock, and they voted unanimously to confirm the sale to Southworth for $2,500. Southworth and the other directors acted in good faith. Upon these facts the court below dismissed the bill, and the complainants appealed.

The question which this case presents is: May the holder of the majority of the stock of a corporation make a sale to himself, unassailable in equity, of all the property of the corporation for its fair value, when he knows that that value is only five-sevenths of the amount which the corporation can obtain for it. It is not material to the determination of this issue whether the notice of the stockholders' meeting specified, or failed to state, that the question of the confirmation of the sale to Southworth would be there considered, or whether or not the other proceedings of the defendants complied with the requirements of the law; and for the purposes of this decision it will be conceded, but it is not decided, that all the proceedings of the parties and of the corporation were in strict accordance with the forms of law. The objection to this sale lies deeper. It is that it was violative of the duty of a fiduciary.

A corporation holds its property in trust for its stockholders. The stockholders have a joint interest in the same property and in the same title. Community of interest in a common property or title imposes a community of duty and a mutual obligation to do nothing to impair either. It creates such a fiducial relation as makes it inequitable for any of those who thus share in the common property to do anything to or with it for their own profit, to the detriment of others who have the same rights. Jackson v. Ludeling, 21 Wall. 616, 622, 22 L.Ed. 492; Jones v. Missouri Edison Electric Co., 144 F. 765, 771, 75 C.C.A. 631, 637; Booker v. Crocker, 132 F. 7, 8, 65 C.C.A. 627, 628.

The holder of the majority of the stock of a corporation has the power, by the election of biddable directors and by the vote of his stock, to do everything that the corporation can do. His power to control and direct the action of the corporation places him in its shoes, and constitutes him the actual, if not the technical, trustee for the holders of the minority of the stock. He draws to himself and uses all the powers of the corporation. In effect he holds an irrevocable power of attorney from the minority stockholders to manage and to sell the property of the corporation, for himself and for them. Times, places, and notices of meetings of the directors and of meetings of stockholders become of secondary importance, because the presence, the vote, and the protest of holders of the minority of the stock are unavailing against the will of the holder of the majority. They can act and contract regarding the corporate property, they can preserve and protect their interests in it, only through him and through the courts.

This devolution of unlimited power imposes on a single holder of the majority of the stock a correlative duty, the duty of a fiduciary or agent, to the holders of the minority of the stock, who can act only through him, the duty to exercise good faith, care, and diligence to make the property of the corporation produce the largest possible amount, to protect the interests of the holders of the minority of the stock, and to secure and pay over to them their just proportion of the income and of the proceeds of the corporate property. Any sale of the property of the corporation by him to himself for less than he could obtain for it from another, or any other act in his interest to the detriment of the holders of the minority of the stock, becomes a breach of duty and of trust, renders the sale or act voidable at the election of the minority stockholders, and invokes plenary relief from a court of chancery. * * *

It is the duty of the master of the corporation who sells its property to procure the highest possible price for it (Jackson v. Ludeling, 21 Wall. 616, 625, 22 L.Ed. 492); and, if he sells it to himself for less, the sale is voidable by the holders of the minority of the stock at their option, although he paid the fair market value for it. Miller v. Brown, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 754, 95 N.W. 797.

The principles which have been briefly reviewed and the decisions which have been cited in support of them spring from the law's jealous care of the fiduciary relations, from its persistent endeavor to prevent a conflict of duty and interest by removing from every person in such a relation every possible temptation to advance his own welfare in disregard of his duty to his correlate, by avoiding every transaction in which he has endeavored to do so. They have been repeatedly discussed and affirmed in the Supreme Court and in this court, and a more extended consideration of them is now unnecessary. Suffice it to say that one of the familiar rules they sustain and illustrate is that one may not be an agent to sell for another and a purchaser at the same time, that such a sale is voidable at the election of the principal, and that under this rule, and under the equitable principles to which reference has been made, the sale to Southworth cannot be sustained in a court of chancery. He grasped and held all the powers of the corporation. It could act and contract only through him. He was the agent through whom, and through whom alone, under the law, the corporation and the holders of the minority of its stock could sell its property. He sold it to himself by his use of the powers of the company. If that sale had been fair and open, after full opportunity to all interested to bid, for the highest amount that could be obtained for the property, it might have been sustained. But it was made for $2,500 to the holder of the majority of the stock, who was one of the members of the board of directors and the president of the company, and to whom one of its stockholders had offered $3,500 for the property only about four months before the sale, and who had written the secretary that, if it was offered for sale, he desired to bid.

The president of the corporation and the members of the board of directors may have acted in good faith, in the sense that they had no intent to inflict injury upon the holders of the minority of the stock. They may have believed that if they procured for the corporation the fair value of the property they discharged their whole duty. In this they were in error. If they could have obtained for the property by an open and honest sale $1,000 more than it was worth, it was their duty to the stockholders of the corporation to do so, and the holder of the majority of the stock could not be permitted to sell it to himself for less. * * *

(a) Manipulation and Sale of Control

ROBOTHAM v. PRUDENTIAL INS. CO. OF AMERICA

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1903. 64 N.J.Eq. 673, 53 A. 842.

[On motion for injunction on order to show cause. Heard on bill, affidavits and answering affidavits.]

The bill is filed by the complainants, as stockholders of the Prudential Insurance Company of America, hereinafter termed the "Prudential Company," on behalf of themselves and all other stockholders who may come into the suit, and it sets forth the following case: * * *

The transactions which are subjected to judicial scrutiny in this case may be outlined as follows: The capital stock of the Prudential Company now consists of 40,000 shares, of $50 each, par value. The Prudential directors apparently hold or control a majority of these shares, and thus in the usual way may secure their own election from year to year, and appoint a successor when a vacancy occurs by death. There are at present 91 different stockholders. The president of the Prudential Company in his affidavit states as follows: "A considerable amount of the stock is still held in large blocks by persons who are getting well on in life, so that in the comparatively near future it will inevitably result that said stock will become far more scattered than it is at present. * * *

"It was with these conditions in mind, and with a full realization on the part of the principal stockholders of the insurance company of the vital importance of safe-guarding the interests of over four and one-half million of its policy holders, that the stockholders of the insurance company set about the consideration of some plan that would accomplish this result, conserve the interests of the stockholders as well, and put the assets of the company forever beyond the reach of reckless speculators, who, when the stock has become scattered, might acquire it, even at fancy prices, for the purpose of manipulating its assets, as has been the case in the past in many instances known to all insurance men.

"The plan adopted by the majority of the stockholders of the insurance company was to negotiate a sale to the Fidelity Trust Company of a controlling interest in the shares of the insurance company; that company to double its present capital of $1,500,000, and put out the new stock at $750 per share."

The president's affidavit further sets forth that:

"Concurrently with the plan of the trust company to acquire a controlling interest in the stock of the insurance company, the principal stockholders of the insurance company consider it highly desirable that the insurance company shall acquire a like interest in stock of the trust company, and, at our instance the directors of the trust company have made such contracts with their stockholders that they can tender to the insurance company, at $750 per share, a sufficient number of shares of the new issue to give the insurance company, with their present holding, such control."

There is no dispute about the general nature or any essential details of the scheme for the permanent control of the affairs of the Prudential Company, which its "principal stockholders" have formed, and which its directors have proposed to carry into effect by the exercise of their fiduciary powers.

The Fidelity Company has already entered into a written contract with stockholders of the Prudential Company, by which these stockholders agree to sell enough of their holdings of Prudential stock at $600 for every $100 of par value to give the Fidelity Company one share more than one-half of the total outstanding Prudential capital stock. There is no favoritism or discrimination among the stockholders of the Prudential Company with respect to this contract. Each stockholder is permitted to sell one-half his holdings at the price above stated, and those who sign agree to contribute pro rata enough stock to make up any shortage which may arise by reason of the failure or refusal of any of the Prudential stockholders to sign the agreement. The Fidelity Company, in pursuance of the plan, having doubled its present capital, will give the new stock to subscribers at $750 per share, thus realizing $11,250,000, which will leave the Fidelity Company with a capital of $3,000,000, and a surplus of $13,000,000, and a considerable amount of undivided profits in addition. Of this new stock of the Fidelity Company the Prudential directors propose to take for their company enough of the new shares, at $750 per share, to give their company, with its present holdings, a majority of the capital stock of the Fidelity Company, as the same will stand after the increase has been effected. How much Fidelity stock the Prudential Company now holds is not disclosed, but the president of the Prudential Company states in his affidavit that such holding is large, but less than one-third of the total amount. The acquisition of a majority of the Fidelity stock, as increased, will therefore involve the expenditure by the Prudential Company of over $7,500,000. The book value of the Fidelity stock at present is a little less than $350 per share of $100 each. The result of the above arrangement will be to give the Prudential Company the absolute power to appoint the directors of the Fidelity Company and to give the Fidelity Company the absolute power to appoint the directors of the Prudential Company. Inasmuch as such an arrangement practically places the corporation whose election of directors comes first within the absolute control of the directors of the other corporation, the president of the Prudential Company announces that—

"The annual meetings of the two companies will be so arranged and other arrangements will be so made that the Prudential Company will forever be the dominant factor, as, of course, it should be."

The Fidelity Company during the past year has paid dividends to its stockholders at the rate of $16 on each $100 of par value. The Prudential Company has uniformly paid annual dividends during recent years at the rate of $10 on each $100 of par value, and has never paid a higher rate of dividends during its existence, and has no present intention to increase the dividends in the future.

Although the above plan has been formed and is approved by the directors of both of these companies, the only complaint in this case is on the part of stockholders of the Prudential Company. The bill prays for discovery against both corporations, and prays that the Prudential Company and its officers and directors may be enjoined, among other things, from voting in favor of the proposed increase of the capital stock of the Fidelity Company, and from subscribing for or purchasing any shares of such increased capital, and that the Fidelity Company may be enjoined from receiving the vote of the Prudential Company in favor of said increase of stock. The defendants consist of the two corporations and the directors of the Prudential Company.

STEVENSON, V. C. (after stating the facts). The basis of any preliminary injunction in this case must be found in some legal or equitable right of the complainants, as stockholders of the Prudential Insurance Company, to prevent their trustees, the Prudential directors, from injuring them by a violation of fiduciary duty. The interesting scheme above set forth for the exercise of all the powers of these two great corporations by a perpetual and self-perpetuating syndicate has received the approbation of the boards of directors of both companies. But no stockholder of the Fidelity Company is before this court with any complaint. In applying legal tests to the scheme as a whole, and to its various parts, as distinct corporate acts, we are confined to the consideration of the rights and remedies of these two dissenting stockholders of the Prudential Company. * * *

(3) It is impossible, within the reasonable limits of this opinion, to discuss the question of the disqualification of these directors by reason of their self-interest in its application to their scheme as a whole, and to each of its constituent parts.

The most serious question of this kind, relating to the separate parts of the scheme, is raised by the fact that the Prudential directors are proposing to add eight or ten million dollars to the capital of the Fidelity Company by a subscription for new stock, although one-half of the entire Prudential board are directors of the Fidelity Company, and consequently stockholders of that company. I prefer to avoid the discussion of this question of disqualification in its relation to any of the details of this scheme as independent transactions. Upon the argument, as I understood the statements of counsel for complainants, they admitted most amply that, as a matter of fact, these Prudential directors are not actuated by a selfish desire to sell a portion of their holdings of Prudential stock to the Fidelity Company in order to receive therefor a sum of money coming from funds in a large part contributed by the Prudential Company under their control and direction; nor are they in fact supplying to the Fidelity Company this large increase of capital from the funds of the Prudential Company in order to benefit the former company at the expense of the latter.

But the question of the capacity or incapacity of this particular board of Prudential directors to adjudicate upon the advisability of this proposed scheme as a whole is a very different matter, and one which alone, in my opinion, would control the decision of this motion. This is the last question which I shall undertake to discuss.

How far self-interest of a director in opposition to the interest of his corporation disqualifies him from acting as a director, or exposes corporate action to injunction at the arbitrary election of a dissenting stockholder, or exposes such action to review by the courts at the instance of such stockholder, are matters about which the authorities are not entirely in accord. 2 Cook, Corp. (4th Ed.) § 658; 3 Thomp. Corp. §§ 4059, 4063, 5650; 7 Thomp. Corp. § 8502; Stewart v. Railroad Co., 38 N.J.L. 505, 522; Metropolitan Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Domestic Tel. & Tel. Co., 44 N.J.Eq. 568, 573, 14 A. 907.

On the one hand, it may be urged with great force that a minority stockholder has a right to repose upon impartial, unbiased action on the part of the directors who are his trustees, and that he ought not to be obliged, where directors have been acting on both sides of a transaction, or are proposing so to act, to come into court with proofs of actual injury to himself or to the corporation. On the other hand, theoretical rules have to give way to the practical necessities of business. Business eventually is not extended, and great departments of human activity are not developed, by means which are fraudulent. The use of such means in the end is suicidal. In these days the relations of corporations to each other are exceedingly complex. Common directors abound, and common directors are better than dummies. Whether a transaction between two corporations has been accomplished or remains executory, I incline strongly to believe that the safe rule in most cases, in the end, will be found to be that the presence of a director or directors on both sides of the transaction under investigation does not give the dissenting stockholder an arbitrary right to an injunction, but may give him a most ample right to subject the transaction to the scrutiny of the court, and may cast upon the corporations or directors concerned the burden of disclosing and justifying the transaction.

To give the dissenting stockholder the arbitrary right to an injunction in this class of cases often will put a deadly weapon in the hands of the blackmailer and the corporation "striker." Such a rule tends to drive the actual wrongdoers to cover,—to induce them to seek concealment while the corporate action is accomplished through apparently impartial directors, who are in fact only agents or "dummies." In several recent cases before this court where the existence of common directors was relied on for injunctive relief, these common directors while the motion was pending were made to disappear, and apparently impartial directors took their place, who proceeded solemnly to approve of the action of the old boards which the injunction was designed to restrain.

The fiction of corporate existence goes down in many cases before a charge of fraud, but I incline to think that this fiction in most cases belonging to the class under consideration should be rigidly maintained to defeat a mere arbitrary demand on the part of a stockholder that a corporate transaction should be enjoined, even though all the impartial directors of the corporation and nine-tenths of the stockholders come into court with a demonstration that the transaction was advantageous in all respects to their corporation, and that an injunction upon it would cause great loss.

But whether in this case dissenting stockholders can arbitrarily prevent corporate action on the ground of the presence of directors or a majority of directors having a hostile interest, I do not intend to consider. I propose to apply, not to the details of this scheme but to the scheme as a whole, what certainly is a safe rule, viz., that where all the directors of a corporation have a direct, valuable interest in the action which they propose to take, in which interest their stockholders do not participate, these stockholders may compel them, before they will be allowed to carry out their scheme, to prove before the court that it is advantageous to the corporation.

It seems to me that the disqualification of these 14 directors to adjudicate finally that their scheme for exchange of control is advantageous to the Prudential Company is clear and absolute.

That the proposed scheme, if carried into effect, will directly and necessarily benefit these 14 directors, and secure to them great emoluments and great influence and power, seems to be a fact beyond dispute. The salaries and other advantages controlled by the directors of an insurance company holding to-day nearly $60,000,000 of assets, and contemplating in the near future the possession of a hundred or even two hundred million dollars of assets, constitute a personal prize of very great magnitude.

It is not an answer to this proposition to say that these directors already hold this prize in their possession. They do not hold it in perpetuity for themselves and those successors whom they will personally select from time to time as death makes vacancies in their board. The effect of the scheme is to prevent them and their chosen successors from losing the prize after they have ceased to own beneficially the majority interest in the stock which now keeps the prize in their possession.

These 14 directors have never made an independent and unselfish adjudication that this scheme will be beneficial to the Prudential Company. They do not exclude themselves from the charmed circle which their scheme contemplates. They propose to sit therein to the exclusion of the other stockholders. That this is their plan is evident, and is not denied. The Prudential directors are to "dominate," and, if any change in the membership of the Prudential board were contemplated before the scheme is to go into effect, the defendants ought to have proved, and could easily have proved, such fact. If these directors had merely feared that in the future a combination of a majority of stockholders owning eight or ten million dollars worth of Prudential stock might commit a "depredation" not merely upon the salaries and perquisites of the managers of the company, but upon the assets of the company which belong to its policy holders and stockholders, they could easily have arranged their scheme so that in effecting its adoption they would be free from any disqualification arising from selfish interests. If, for instance, they had planned to select 14 men of high character and standing in the business world, and then to see that each of these men was duly qualified with at least one share of Prudential stock to act as a director, and then to make these 14 independent men the personal syndicate for perpetual control, while they themselves unselfishly retired forever from the scene of their labors and the possession of their emoluments as managers, they would then have presented a scheme which would not be open to the particular objection now under consideration. They have not done this, nor have they apparently considered such a possible situation,—much less, given it their approval as directors.

Applying to the situation the very moderate and safe rule above mentioned, the result is that the favorable judgment of these 14 directors, when challenged by a dissenting stockholder, is to be practically excluded from consideration, and the burden is placed upon these directors of making full disclosure of their scheme to the court, and of presenting clear and satisfactory proof that it will in fact be advantageous to the Prudential Company. In the absence of such proof, the scheme cannot receive the commendation of a court of equity; and, as it has not received the commendation of an impartial board of directors, it must be interdicted.

Could a single equity judge, or even a bench of such judges, unaided by experience in the management of insurance companies, and unaided by the favorable judgment of a board of insurance managers and experts qualified to express an impartial opinion, find in the evidence so far produced in this case safe grounds for the affirmative conclusion that this startling novelty in corporation law and corporation business is a safe and prudent thing for the Prudential Insurance Company to adopt and establish? I think not, and on this ground alone, in my opinion, an injunction should go.

I do not wish to be misunderstood upon this point. The situation in which this court is asked to give its approval to this novel scheme must be kept distinctly in view. A court of equity, if it had the power to review the honest acts of the Prudential directors within the scope of their powers, which it has not, might well in any case repose upon the deliberate judgment of these directors, sanctioning any scheme as beneficial to their company, in view of their commanding position as expert insurance managers, and their conceded freedom from any intention to violate their fiduciary duty. But the difficulty is that under the rule above defined, and applied to this situation, the official judgment of these directors cannot be resorted to in order to aid the judgment of the court. Their testimony as individuals, of course, can be accepted for what it may be worth. It is from all the testimony in the cause on both sides that this court is asked to find affirmatively that the establishment and maintenance of this self-perpetuating syndicate for the perpetual control of the Prudential Insurance Company will be advantageous at least to the stockholders of that company, including the complainants.

The evidence produced on this motion, bearing upon the sharp question whether the establishment of this novel and ingenious scheme for the control of a great insurance company with $60,000,000 of assets,—a scheme which has not been intentionally created by the insurance statutes of the state,—would be wise, safe, and advantageous to the Prudential Insurance Company, is extremely meager. This evidence, in my opinion, not only fails to justify a judgment of this court in approval of the scheme, but raises the gravest apprehensions that the scheme, if carried out, would be a continuous menace to the policy holders and the stockholders of the Prudential Company, which would grow more and more portentous as the years go by, and these faithful and experienced men, one by one, vacate their seats of power and give place to other men who are now unknown; that after all or almost all of the present board of directors have passed away, and the majority of the board has undergone several changes, this scheme might even destroy this great insurance company, which these present directors have created, and which now stands as a monument to their integrity, wisdom, and skill.

My conclusion upon the whole case presented on this motion is that the Prudential Company and its directors should be enjoined from subscribing for the new issue of Fidelity stock as a specific act, which, without reference to its connection with the scheme for exchange of control, is unauthorized by the laws which define the manner in which the funds of the Prudential Company are to be invested. The Prudential directors should also be enjoined from doing any act in the exercise of their power as directors with intent or with the effect to carry out the scheme of lodging perpetual control of the two companies in the directors of either or both of the companies. The injunction will not interfere with the power of these directors to cause the vote of the Prudential Company upon its stock in the Fidelity Company to be cast in favor of increasing the capital stock of the latter company, either at the present time, or at any time hereafter when, independently of the scheme which this court has condemned, they may impartially adjudge such increase to be beneficial to the Prudential Company as a stockholder of the Fidelity Company, provided the effect of such increase, as a separate act, or in connection with other acts, facts, or conditions, will not result in, or be the means of, creating the combination of conditions under which the above-mentioned scheme may go into effect. In dealing with any and all separate lawful acts within their power and within the power of their corporation, these directors must see to it that they do not, by such acts as they may separately consider advantageous to their corporation, establish the condition of corporate control which this court has found to be injurious to the complainants and the other stockholders of the Prudential Company.

INSURANSHARES CORPORATION OF DELAWARE v. NORTHERN FISCAL CORPORATION, Limited, et al.

District Court of the United States, D. Pennsylvania, 1940. 35 F.Supp. 22.

In Equity. Suit by the Insuranshares Corporation of Delaware against the Northern Fiscal Corporation, Limited, and others, to recover damages incurred by the plaintiff as the result of the sale of control of plaintiff corporation to a group who deprived it of most of its assets.

Judgment for plaintiff.

KIRKPATRICK, DISTRICT JUDGE. This is a suit brought by a corporation against its former officers, directors, certain of its former stockholders, and others, to recover damages incurred by the corporation as a result of the sale of its control to a group who proceeded to rob it of most of its assets. The plaintiff is an investment trust, specializing in shares of small life insurance companies.

A number of the defendants have not been served with process. Those before the Court are three Philadelphia banks, formerly stockholders, and William W. Hepburn, their representative on the board of directors.

Certain of the defendants were, prior to December 21, 1937, the owners of 75,933 of the corporation's total outstanding 284,032 shares. These defendants will be referred to collectively as the management group. This group consisted of the Philadelphia banks, with 23,106 shares, and their agent, Hepburn; Blair (the president of the corporation) and his associates, Simmons, Moore and Burnell (all former directors), and Ogden, with 24,111 shares; the Continental Bank, with 26,569 shares (subsequently taken over by Fahnestock & Co.); and Logan, receiver of the Seaboard Continental Corporation, with 6,647 shares. The board of directors of the corporation was composed entirely of this management group or their nominees. The defendants, Robb, Morris and Solomont, who bought control and who, with their satellites Quint, Stanton, Tracy and Hansell, looted the corporation, constitute the Boston group.

There is little dispute about the main facts. On December 21, 1937, the management group transferred the control of the corporation to the Boston group, none of whom had ever had any interest of any kind in it. With the control, as that term is here used, went plenary power under the by-laws to sell, exchange or transfer all of the securities in the corporation's portfolio, as well as access to and physical possession of them. In this case, acquisition of control was the indispensible first step of a scheme, planned by Robb, Morris and Solomont with the connivance of Paine, Webber & Co., brokers, the purpose of which was to strip the corporation of its valuable assets, leaving its mere shell to the remaining stockholders. The project was carried out with thoroughness and dispatch, but its subsequent steps and its disastrous results to the corporation are not in dispute and need not be detailed here.

The actual transfer was made in accordance with a program to which the Philadelphia group assented and the steps of which they followed. Immediate and complete passing of control was ensured by the successive resignation of the old directors, each resignation being followed by the election of a new member of the board, on the nomination of the Boston group. At the same time, the management group sold and delivered their stock to the Boston group.

The defendants have insisted throughout the case that the transfer of December 21, 1937, was simply a sale of stock, the passing of control being merely a normal concomitant, and most of their argument was based upon this premise. This view, however, I think is fundamentally wrong. If the whole record be read, I do not see how the transaction can be considered as anything other than a sale of control, to which the stock sale was requisite, but nevertheless a secondary matter. The fact is that the Boston group were interested in only one thing, namely, to have a free hand with the corporation's portfolio for a few weeks, and all they needed for that purpose was to be able to name and control the officers and directors. Perhaps there would have had to have been some modifications in their procedure, but practically everything they did could have been done without their owning more than directors' qualifying shares. As a matter of fact, they bought only about 27% of the outstanding issue, and, throughout their operations, they were never anything but minority stockholders. Of course, I am not suggesting that the purchase of the stock was not a sine qua non for the success of their plans. It assured them, temporarily, of noninterference from stockholders, since the majority, who had bought for investment, could be counted on to remain inert. It would have been absurd to expect such acquiescence from the management group, had they retained any stock interest, and equally absurd to expect them to part with control, without at the same time getting out of their investment in the corporation. Hence the necessity for the purchase of the stock. The buyers were primarily interested in getting control of the corporation together with such stock ownership as would make that control secure and untrammelled, and the sellers were primarily interested in getting as much money as possible for what they had to sell—both the control and their interest in the assets.

The price is strongly indicative of the true nature of the transaction. The sellers obtained $3.60 a share at a time when the price of the stock in the over-the-counter market was $1 to $1.25, and when the book value was $2.25—a figure substantially higher than could have been realized on actual liquidation. The history of the bitter dispute between the Continental Bank and the rest of the management group, beginning in June of 1937, shows that the latter, although they had no desire (and most of them no special capacity) to operate the corporation, were not content to liquidate and take the cash and actual market value of the securities represented by their shares, but were determined to obtain the additional premium which a sale, carrying with it control of the corporation, would bring. Confirmation is given by the fact that from June 1937 the principal activities of the managers consisted of negotiations for the sale of their stock. The facts that the first of the potential purchasers turned out to be irresponsible and that they had only the vaguest notion as to the identity of the second (who withdrew at the last minute) were apparently no discouragement.

Assuming then, as I think we must, that what is involved here is primarily a sale of control, it is an incontrovertable fact that the act of the management group in selling control to the Boston group was the thing which made possible the latter's criminal operations.

Those who control a corporation, either through majority stock ownership, ownership of large blocks of stock less than a majority, officeholding, management contracts, or otherwise, owe some duty to the corporation in respect of the transfer of the control to outsiders. The law has long ago reached the point where it is recognized that such persons may not be wholly oblivious of the interests of everyone but themselves, even in the act of parting with control, and that, under certain circumstances, they may be held liable for whatever injury to the corporation made possible by the transfer. Without attempting any general definition, and stating the duty in minimum terms as applicable to the facts of this case, it may be said that the owners of control are under a duty not to transfer it to outsiders if the circumstances surrounding the proposed transfer are such as to awaken suspicion and put a prudent man on his guard—unless a reasonably adequate investigation discloses such facts as would convince a reasonable person that no fraud is intended or likely to result. Thus, whatever the extent of the primary duty may be, circumstances may be sufficient to call into being the duty of active vigilence and inquiry. If, after such investigation, the sellers are deceived by false representations, there might not be liability, but if the circumstances put the seller on notice and if no adequate investigation is made and harm follows, then liability also follows.

From a careful reading of the voluminous evidence in this case, I have become convinced that facts and circumstances leading up to this sale, as known to Hepburn, the agent of the banks, and as largely relayed by him to Hardt, his immediate principal, were sufficient to indicate to any reasonable man in his position that the Boston group were acquiring the control of the corporation by improper means and for an improper purpose.

I have just referred to acquisition by improper means. What happened was that the buyers had arranged with Paine, Webber & Co. that the latter would advance the price of the purchase (some $310,000) on an unsecured loan, and that, immediately after they had obtained control, the portfolio, or as much of it as was necessary, would be pledged with Paine, Webber & Co. as collateral, sold by them from time to time, the proceeds applied to liquidating the note, and the balance turned over. Comment as to the legality and ethics of this procedure is unnecessary, but the point is that if Hepburn had good reason to suspect that the purchase was to be financed in toto with the corporation's assets, it would be fair warning of the fraudulent nature of the whole thing. So, in considering whether the circumstances of this sale called for a real investigation, one matter of importance is what was known or to be inferred as to the manner in which the purchase was to be financed.

On turning to the record, one learns, with some surprise, that this same corporation had been systematically looted some five years before by a different group who bought control, using exactly the same means of financing the deal, and who stole the assets of the corporation in much the same general way. This episode was known in all of its details to Hepburn. In fact, the banks had become stockholders, unwillingly, as a result of the wreckage caused by it. In June, 1937, the persons responsible for the loss had settled their liability from some $650,000, of which perhaps half had come into the treasury of the corporation. This, of course, is not proof that a new group would do the same thing, but it certainly was a vivid reminder of the special dangers to which these small and helpless investment trusts were constantly exposed.

In the second place, by December, if not before, Hepburn knew perfectly well that in arranging for the sale of the banks' interests he had, in Blair, a collaborator who was entirely willing that the corporation's assets should be used to finance the deal. Even accepting at its face value Hepburn's testimony as to his own limited role in the negotiations, it is a fact that he was in frequent consultation with Blair, the corporation's president and the most active figure in promoting the various attempts to sell. Hepburn, Blair and Simmons constituted the executive committee of the board. During the entire summer of 1937 Blair had been busily engaged in conducting negotiations for the sale of the interest of the management group to another financially irresponsible syndicate, headed by a promoter named Johnston. This sale aborted but, previous to that and for the purpose of getting rid of the determined opposition of the Continental Bank with its 26,569 shares, it had been arranged that Johnston should buy out the Continental Bank and that he should obtain the money on a loan from Fahnestock & Co. upon a promise that he would put up securities from the corporation's portfolio as collateral security after he obtained control of the corporation. This was exactly like the Paine, Webber financing of the Boston group later on in December. The sale to Johnston failed to go through, and Fahnestock, who had advanced the money to the Continental Bank and acquired its shares for the account of Johnston, was thus left holding the bag, with plenty of recrimination against Blair, who, they said, had arranged the whole thing and who, no doubt, had. It is undisputed that Hepburn got the whole story from Fahnestock & Co.'s attorney not later than October 15, and though he testified that he "never got to the bottom of the matter" and though Blair denied his part in the transaction, it is impossible that Hepburn could have been under any misapprehension as to what had occurred or as to the fact that Blair had actively participated in it.

Thirdly, Hepburn had fair notice that, whatever the plans of the purchasers might be, one part of their program was to have a large part of the corporation's assets converted into cash and available in that form the minute they took over control. It appears that the corporation had invested some $400,000 of its assets (including the cash received from the settlement of the suit against its earlier looters) in certificates of New England Fund—another investment trust of a somewhat different type. The terms of this trust provided that holders of these certificates could obtain either the cash value of the purchase or the underlying securities which they represented upon five days notice to the New England Fund. A special meeting of the board of directors of Insuranshares was called for December 16, five days before the date fixed for closing. The directors were advised that the purchasers wanted a resolution passed apparently authorizing Solomont without any restrictions to get the money from the New England Fund on December 21—the day to which the closing had been postponed (the five days' notice had already been given by Blair on the morning of the 16th). They balked at this, but finally did pass a resolution directing the New England Fund to transfer the certificates to Solomont upon his being elected and qualified as treasurer of Insuranshares. As a matter of fact, immediately after the consummation of the deal, Solomont flew to Boston with the certificates and succeeded in turning them into cash.

Fourthly, the inflated price paid by the Boston group for the banks' shares has already been considered as evidence that they were primarily interested in buying control, but I do not think it can be disregarded as being also some indication that they had an improper purpose in view. Why were the purchasers willing to pay so much for control? I should think this question might well have occurred to one who was selling it. No doubt if this corporation had been an industrial, mining, or commercial enterprise, whose physical assets and business might have potentialities which a purchaser might believe he could develop if given control, the price would not mean very much. It was, however, merely an investment company, and the ultimate assets—what was really being sold—were nothing but the ready equivalent of cash in marketable securities.

Fifthly, Hepburn and the banks were specifically warned at least twice of the danger of carrying out the deal with parties about whom they knew so little. Simmons, the corporation's lawyer, discussed the matter at length at a conference at which Hepburn was present, and embodied his thought in a memorandum, which Hepburn may or may not have received and brought to Hardt's attention. He "pointed out the possible consequences to you individually should Insuranshares suffer a loss through the operations of a group of men to whom you made possible the acquisition of the stock of the company." Johnston followed this on the same day by writing a letter to Hardt. Whether or not Hardt actually ever saw this letter, Hepburn was familiar with its subject matter and discussed it with Hardt.

There were other things of less importance, and they must all be read in the setting of the transaction, beginning as far back as June or July, 1937. There was simply too much of the sort of thing described for this transaction to pass as a perfectly normal stock sale. I think that the circumstances were such as to indicate to any reasonable person to whom Hepburn's knowledge of what was going on could be imputed, that there was more than a possibility of fraud and consequent injury to the corporation in the sale. That being so, there plainly was a duty upon the sellers to make a genuine effort to obtain and verify such information as they reasonably could get about the means by which the purchase was to be financed and the character, aims and responsibility of the purchasers, or, in the absence of adequate information, to refrain from making the sale.

The Philadelphia banks made no adequate investigation. One or two desultory inquiries were made to who the purchasers were. Naturally, with a sale of this magnitude in the offing, anyone will make sufficient inquiry to satisfy himself that it is worth the trouble of further negotiations and that, if terms can be arranged, he is likely to get his money. That, it seems to me, is about the sum of what the banks did; and the sum of the affirmative information they obtained was that the purchasers were three Boston attorneys, one of whom (Solomont) had been local attorney for the Paine, Webber & Co., and that Morris was a reputable attorney. Of course, they had Blair's recommendation—a matter of somewhat equivocal force. In addition, Maloney, a friend of Hardt's and the president of the Philadelphia Life Insurance Company, reported to Hardt that he could discover nothing about Morris which would make him unsuitable as a director for the Philadelphia Life Insurance Company. Jackson and Curtis, brokers, reported to Hardt that "they knew of them (the buyers); they had no knowledge of their financial responsibility and knew nothing to their detriment." Surely, no one would suggest that the banks would have accepted this as satisfactory if they had been retaining any substantial stake in the corporation.

Specifically, the banks, with all their credit facilities made absolutely no investigation of the financial standing and resources of the purchasers and at no time received any information to indicate to them that the purchasers had any money whatever. They knew that money to pay for the stock would be somehow forthcoming through Paine, Webber. In spite of their knowledge of the methods in which at least two previous fraudulent purchases of investment trusts had been financed by brokerage houses with the trusts' portfolios, they made no effort to find out what was to be behind Paine, Webber's certified check. As to the first of these points there can be no question that any sort of investigation would have revealed that the purchasers were not remotely able to finance a $300,000 deal from their own resources. As to the second, the performance of Paine, Webber & Co. throughout was so naive as to make it quite likely that, if any inquiry had been made, the whole method of financing would have been cheerfully disclosed. At any rate, it is not necessary to speculate as to what would have been the result if the duty of reasonable investigation had been performed. If, after inquiry, facts had been refused or misrepresented, a different question would be presented. The fact is that no genuine investigation was made.

I realize that it is expecting a great deal of businessmen, or anyone else, for that matter, to say that they should make searching inquiries which might result in disclosing facts which would upset an advantageous and apparently perfectly legal piece of business. And, by the same token, it takes no stretch of the imagination to conclude that Hepburn was not making any great effort to inform himself about the means which these three Boston lawyers were going to adopt to enable them to buy an investment trust for $300,000.

It is not proposed to make an analysis of the many authorities cited by the parties in this case. The complexities of cases involving liability for transfer of corporate management are so great and the facts so diverse that excerpts from court opinions are of comparatively little value. The facts of each decision must be known to fully appreciate the rule which it lays down. Cases more or less in point are: Field v. Western Life Indemnity Co., C.C., 166 F. 607; Id., 7 Cir., 179 F. 673; Oil Shares, Inc. v. Kahn, 3 Cir., 94 F.2d 751, reversed on other grounds, Oil Shares v. Commercial Trust Co., 304 U.S. 551, 58 S.Ct. 1059, 82 L.Ed. 1522; and Bosworth v. Allen, 168 N.Y. 157, 61 N.E. 163, 55 L.R.A. 751, 85 Am.St.Rep. 667.

The defendants do not deny the force of the authorities but take the position that in the present case, the banks at least owed absolutely no duty of any kind to the plaintiff corporation or its remaining stockholders. The point at which they draw the line is that the duty does not come into existence as to mere stockholders "except when those stockholders do not content themselves with the ordinary functions of stockholders, but take upon themselves the powers and prerogatives of directors." As a corollary to this proposition, the defendants contend that in cases where a duty does exist it is only in respect of direct dealings with the corporate property, and can never attach to dealings in its stock.

The fundamental difficulty with the defendants' position is that it fails to recognize that this case involves more than a question of liability—even that of majority stockholders, which these defendants were not—in respect of the sale of corporate stock. What is involved here, as has been pointed out, is a sale of control by a minority, but controlling, interest. The duties and liabilities in such case may be more than I have assumed them to be for the purposes of this case, but they are certainly not less. I have stated them as narrowly as possible, and I think that as so stated they are well grounded in the law.

Several minor and more or less technical questions raised by the defendants remain to be considered.

The bill in equity filed in this case might, under the old practice, have been open to the objection that it pleads two distinct causes of action, first, conspiracy to defraud, and, second, negligence. I have held that the owners of control of a corporation occupy a fiduciary relationship to the corporation and its stockholders in respect of the transfer of control and that they owe a duty of due care—a duty in which these defendants failed, with consequent loss to the corporation. This cause of action is sufficiently pleaded, and the charge of knowingly participating in a fraudulent conspiracy may be dismissed as surplusage. It was not established by the evidence, but the testimony directed to it has a bearing upon the alternative charge. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 28 U.S.C.A. following section 723c, are fully applicable, and Rule 8(e) (2) provides that: "A party may set forth two or more statements of a claim * * * alternately or hypothetically, either in one count * * * or in separate counts * * *."

It appears that Paine, Webber & Co. have settled their liability to the corporation and that an instrument was delivered to them which, the defendants contend, operates as a general release and extinguishes the plaintiff's right of action against the remaining defendants. The instrument in question in words: (1) released Paine, Webber & Co.; (2) expressly reserved the plaintiff's rights against all other parties, including specifically Hepburn and the Philadelphia banks; (3) declared it to be the intent of the parties thereto that it should be construed and given effect as and only as a covenant not to sue; (4) expressed the plaintiff's covenant not to sue Paine, Webber & Co.; (5) declared that such covenant was not to affect or prejudice plaintiff's expressly reserved rights against any other parties.

The defendant invokes what has been called "one of those harsh, although strictly logical common-law, rules which has had to make way for the modern tendency to substitute justice for technicality." Walsh v. New York C., etc., R. Co., 204 N.Y. 58, 63, 97 N.E. 408, 410, 37 L.R.A.,N.S., 1137. Although the instrument at its beginning uses technical words of release, if read as a whole in the light of its plainly expressed and dominant intention to reserve the plaintiff's rights against all other parties, I think it must be construed as a covenant not to sue—particularly as the parties provide, "it being the intent of the parties that this instrument be construed and given effect as and only as a covenant by the party of the first part not to sue the parties of the second part." Even if these words were not present, I am of the opinion that a release coupled with an express reservation of the rights of the releasor against another joint tort feasors would not destroy those rights in any of the three possible jurisdictions (New York, New Jersey or Delaware) the law of which might apply. However, it is the law everywhere that a covenant not to sue does not affect the covenantor's rights against other joint tort feasors, and I think this instrument is plainly to be so construed.

The judgment to be entered here will be for the plaintiff generally. Further proceedings for the purpose of assessing damages and including the amount in the judgment may be taken unless an agreement can be reached upon that point.

LEVY et al. v. AMERICAN BEVERAGE CORPORATION et al.

Supreme Court of New York, Appellate Division, First Department, 1942.
265 App.Div. 208, 38 N.Y.S.2d 517.

Action by Samuel N. Levy and others against the American Beverage Corporation, Edwin C. McCullough, the McCullough Corporation, the Manufacturers Trust Company, as executor under the will of Benjamin B. Avery, deceased, Theodore W. Stemmler, the Ronaldo Realty Corporation, and others for the amount of financial losses sustained by defendant beverage corporation and an alleged profit illicitly made by defendants McCullough and McCullough Corporation on sale of their stock in defendant beverage corporation. From an interlocutory judgment on a decision directing an accounting before a referee, except so far as such judgment dismisses the complaint against defendants executor, Stemmler and realty corporation, defendants McCullough and McCullough Corporation appeal, and from so much of the judgment as provides that the costs of stenographic minutes of the reference and the referee's fees be paid by defendant beverage corporation in the first instance and added to any judgment in its favor, such corporation appeals.

Judgment, so far as appealed from, reversed, and complaint dismissed on the merits.

CALLAHAN, JUSTICE. The defendants-appellants, former owners of a majority of the voting stock of American Beverage Corporation, have been held liable for financial losses sustained by that corporation. All of these losses occurred after appellants ceased their connection with the company, and were due to the misconduct or mismanagement of persons to whom said appellants sold their corporate stock.

In addition, appellants have been compelled to pay over to American Beverage Corporation an alleged profit in the sum of $169,000, which it has been found was illicitly made by them on the sale of their stock, although in fact they sold it for less than they paid for it.

The theory on which this drastic judgment rests is that appellants held controlling stock interest in the American Beverage Corporation and that by reason of such control they owed the duty of fiduciaries to the corporation, and to the minority stockholders thereof; that, as such fiduciaries, they were bound to make proper investigation of the moral and financial responsibility of the purchasers of the stock, as well as to the source of the funds used to acquire the stock. Breach of these duties was found here, based on the holding of the trial court that circumstances had occurred in connection with the sale conveying knowledge or notice to the sellers that the purchasers were morally and financially irresponsible; that they planned to use the credit of American Beverage Corporation to secure the funds to pay for the stock; and that they intended to mismanage the company, and to convert its assets to their own use.

We find that the evidence adduced upon the trial did not warrant the inferences drawn by the trial court from the facts established, and that an erroneous rule of law was applied in fixing the duty and liability of the appellants.

Plaintiffs, who were minority stockholders suing in a representative capacity, attempted to prove their contentions largely from testimony extracted from defendants and other persons connected with the sale of the stock. There is no doubt from the proof that sale of stock control of American Beverage Corporation by appellants resulted disastrously to American Beverage Corporation. Nor is there any doubt that the purchasers used fraudulent methods which, in effect, used the funds of American Beverage Corporation to reimburse themselves for the purchase price of the stock acquired. The real issue here was whether appellants by reason of any dereliction of duty on their part are to be charged with liability for the misconduct of the purchasers.

A statement of the essential facts is necessary in order to point out the errors which require reversal.

Appellant, Edwin C. McCullough, was president and director of American Beverage Corporation, placed there by a board of directors selected by him through control of fifty-three per centum (53%) of the voting stock of the corporation. This controlling stock was owned by the McCullough Corporation, co-defendant, the stock of which, in turn, was owned by members of the family of Edwin C. McCullough. McCullough was president, and in active charge of the affairs of both corporations. He was entrusted with the voting rights of the stock, and took entire charge of the sale of said stock. Under the circumstances we shall treat the liability of both appellants as the same, without attempting to make any nice distinctions as to their obligations.

Edwin C. McCullough had been the directing spirit of American Beverage Corporation for several years prior to the occurrences herein. Under his guidance the corporation which dealt in soft drinks, and later in wines and liquors, had been built up into a sound and prosperous concern. He had selected as fellow directors men of large business interests. One of them was Theodore W. Stemmler, an investment banker. Another was Benjamin B. Avery, who was attorney for and secretary of the corporation. The appellants owned approximately 72,000 shares of the common stock, which had a par value of one dollar. As heretofore stated, the 72,000 shares represented fifty-three per centum (53%) of the voting stock. This stock had cost the McCullough Corporation upwards of $400,000, or about $5.60 a share. The stock was listed on the New York Curb Exchange, but was inactive. At the time of the sale involved it had a book value of about $4.31 a share, and the books were kept on a very conservative basis. The common stock however, sold on the exchange at very much less than the book, or liquidating value, and at times as low as one and one-eighth ($1.12½) a share.

American Beverage Corporation occupied a plant in New York City which was owned by a corporation controlled by the McCullough family. A very favorable long term lease was held by the landlord.

In June or July, 1938, through Stemmler, a proposal was made by defendant, Irving Feinberg, to merge a company, known as Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd., controlled by him, which was in the wine and liquor business, with American Beverage Corporation. Edwin C. McCullough rejected this proposition, but offered to buy the assets of Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd., if their existence and value as stated on a balance sheet shown to him could be verified. That balance sheet showed Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd., had net assets of $120,000. The deal fell through when Feinberg insisted on receiving a contract of employment with American Beverage Corporation. McCullough admitted that he knew that Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd., had at one time been controlled by a man connected with the illegal sale of liquor, and that Feinberg had bought control from that man.

In October, or November, 1938, again through Stemmler, one H. Vaughan Clark, a Philadelphia banker, apparently of good repute, proposed merging American Beverage Corporation with a distillery controlled by him. Clark told a rather convincing tale of his intention to merge a number of beverage and liquor companies into a larger company. McCullough would have nothing to do with this merger, but offered to sell his 72,000 shares of stock for cash. After considerable negotiations, an option was given by McCullough to Clark, in which Stemmler was nominated as the buyer, whereby the 72,000 shares were to be sold for $250,000, or approximately $3.50 a share. This option expired on December 16, 1938. On December 15, Clark advised McCullough that he could not close the deal, and desired a further option of thirty days. When Clark agreed to pay $10,000 for this further option, McCullough consented. Thereupon a lawyer, George J. Mintzer, appeared on the scene, and it was made known that Prendergast-Davies

Co., Ltd., and Feinberg were interested in the deal for acquiring the stock. The $10,000 was produced by Mintzer, and the second option ran to Feinberg. Statements continued to be made, however, as to the larger merger. In fact it was stated that Feinberg was to be employed as selling agent of the new company in New York.

This second option was to expire on January 14, 1939. The regular annual meeting of stockholders of American Beverage Corporation was set for January 17, 1939. On January 7, 1939, in accordance with a custom of long standing, requests for proxies were sent out to minority stockholders, which, in substance, stated that the old board of directors would be continued. The second option was exercised on January 14, 1939, the sale was consummated, and a proxy given to Feinberg to vote the 72,000 shares being sold by the McCulloughs. The propriety of notifying the minority stockholders of the change in control was discussed among the McCulloughs, Avery, and others. A letter of notification was prepared, but never sent, Avery advising that insufficient time existed for these letters to reach stockholders so as to be of any avail before the meeting. However, an account of the change in control of American Beverage Corporation was published in the newspapers of January 18, 1939. A new board of directors nominated by Feinberg was elected at the meeting of January 17. That board included Clark. Stemmler, though not elected in January, was re-elected to the Board in March, 1939, in place of Clark. The proxies received from minority stockholders were voted for the old board in accordance with the statements contained in the letter soliciting them. No proof was adduced to show that McCullough knew, even at that time, that the larger merger which had been discussed was not to go through. From the 14th day of January, 1939, McCullough was actually out of control of American Beverage Corporation, although he received his salary for the balance of the month of January. On January 18, under Feinberg's direction, an agreement was entered into whereby Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd., sold its assets (other than its 72,000 shares of American Beverage Corporation stock) to American Beverage Corporation, and, in return, American Beverage Corporation assumed the debts and liabilities of Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd. Almost immediately after this agreement was signed, drafts totaling $115,000 were drawn at Feinberg's direction on the bank account of American Beverage Corporation to pay merchandise creditors of Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd. McCullough happened to be in the office at the time these drafts were drawn, and the treasurer, who had been asked to sign the checks told McCullough of the transaction. His response was to the effect that the treasurer should be careful that he was not doing anything criminal. As all transactions after January 14th occurred under Feinberg's directions, and at a time when McCullough was no longer in control, it would be improper to ascribe liability to appellants for anything occurring after that date, unless they were occasioned by some misconduct occurring before the date of sale. Many things occurred after Feinberg obtained control which contributed to the financial difficulties of American Beverage Corporation. Among these were the cutting off of credit by banks from which American Beverage Corporation had previously obtained commercial loans, the cancellation of the basic liquor permit held by American Beverage Corporation, market conditions in the sale of beverages, and financial difficulties of subsidiary companies controlled by Feinberg, the stock of which companies had been used by Feinberg in connection with the completion of the merger.

The trial court found, on the facts above outlined, that McCullough had been placed on notice of the moral and financial irresponsibility of the purchasers of the stock, and the financial insecurity of Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd., of the intention to merge and to loot American Beverage Corporation and then held them liable for events which occurred after January 14th. In substance, the trial court found fraud, lack of good faith, and negligence on the part of appellants. There was no basis in the record for any finding of actual fraud, and any finding of constructive fraud or of lack of good faith could only rest on the existence of a fiduciary relationship. The finding of negligence was likewise based on a conception that appellants' duties as controlling stockholders were those of a fiduciary. Upon the findings of fact the court concluded that appellants were liable to account for any profits, and to compensate American Beverage Corporation for all the acts of mismanagement after Feinberg obtained control. Upon the trial Feinberg was permitted to settle his liability on the basis of a reconveyance of the American Beverage Corporation stock so as to permit the reorganization of American Beverage Corporation.

Even if we were to assume for the moment that the court applied the proper rules of law as to the liability of controlling stockholders, under the present circumstances we would be compelled to make findings of fact different from those of the trial court, because, in our view, the inferences which the trial court drew from the facts proved are unwarranted. We fail to find any sufficient evidence of a warning to McCullough of a contemplated looting or how any investigation which McCullough could have made would have revealed the improper intentions and machinations of Feinberg. Undoubtedly the latter went to great length to hide from McCullough his real intentions by putting Clark into the forefront of the negotiations, and having Clark paint a picture of a new and larger company. The trial court stated in its opinion that there was no direct evidence that McCullough knew of Feinberg's intention to have American Beverage Corporation assume the liabilities of Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd., and, thus, indirectly pay for the stock. The basis of the court's decision of breach of duty was that there were sufficient circumstances to put McCullough on guard as to Feinberg's wrongful intentions. To infer that McCullough was warned of an intention to loot American Beverage Corporation, and render it financially worthless, was to infer that he disregarded the effect that this would have had on the long and lucrative lease held by his family on the building occupied by American Beverage Corporation. If McCullough could have known of an intention to loot, then Stemmler was in even a better position to learn of this, yet Stemmler's family held considerable of the preferred stock of American Beverage Corporation, which would have been rendered valueless. While McCullough received a price for the 72,000 shares in excess of the price at which small lots of the stock sold in the open market, he was receiving less than the book, or liquidating value of the stock, and he knew the very conservative basis on which the books of American Beverage Corporation were kept.

We think that the evidence discloses that McCullough believed up to the time his stock was actually sold that a larger merger was intended. In fact the trial court indicated in its opinion that this intention of forming a larger corporation by merger of American Beverage Corporation with several other companies might have been abandoned after the sale. If the real intentions of Feinberg were unknown to McCullough, or if the latter had no substantial warning thereof or of the intention to abandon the larger merger, then the whole theory on which the trial court placed liability fails. That there was no disclosure of abandonment, if in fact such a plan ever existed, is evidenced by the actions of Feinberg in placing Clark on the new board of directors. Doing this would lead McCullough to believe in the continuation of the grandiose scheme. The existence of new interests would, of course, have led McCullough to believe that there were sources available for the payment of the purchase price of $250,000 other than the treasury of Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd. We think that the test of common sense and sound business judgment applied to this transaction would show that McCullough had no warning that American Beverage Corporation was in danger of being looted. He had substantial financial reasons because of the existing lease for not desiring to see any such result accomplished.

Under the circumstances we must reverse the findings of fact made, and conclusions drawn, which are inconsistent with our views as to the notice conveyed to McCullough. In the absence of such findings, reversal of the judgment would necessarily follow. This is so for in the absence of knowledge or notice there would be no basis for a holding that there was any breach of duty on McCullough's part or intention by him to act in hostility to the interests of American Beverage Corporation, or its minority stockholders. A holding that such a breach or intention to injure existed would be a prerequisite to any liability such as was imposed here. There was no evidence that McCullough conspired fraudulently to turn over control to a purchaser in order to enable him to loot the corporation. The trial court found no such conspiracy. It placed liability on the existence of a fiduciary relationship and breach of duties imposed thereby.

We doubt that the status of one owning a controlling block of stock can be said to be that of a fiduciary as to the sale of his holdings.

A stockholder, in selling his stock to a stranger, is not a trustee for other stockholders. This would seem to be so though a stockholder sold a majority of the stock.

In Gamble v. Queens County Water Co., 123 N.Y. 91, 25 N.E. 201, 9 L.R.A. 527, it was held that a stockholder in voting his stock is in no sense a trustee or representative of other stockholders. Corporate stock, it was said, might be voted in the light of what the owner considers his own interest. The court said that it is only where the stockholder's interest is detrimental to the interests of the corporation and the action taken is a wanton and fraudulent destruction of the rights of the minority that the stockholder may be held to account. If this is so as to the voting of stock, it would seem to apply with equal, if not greater force to a sale of stock. By analogy, only a wanton and fraudulent destruction of the rights of the minority would seem to be actionable in the present situation. But even if we assume that the more rigid requirements of good faith or reasonable care are applicable, we find no breach of these requirements here.

Persons holding a majority of the stock of a corporation have the right and power to control the corporation within the limits of its charter powers. A sale of such controlling interest, of itself, perpetrates no wrong on anyone. Barnes v. Brown, 80 N.Y. 527, 537.

Stockholders are not ipso facto trustees for each other. Blaustein v. Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co., 263 App.Div. 97, at page 119, 31 N.Y.S.2d 934; Gamble v. Queens County Water Co., supra; Bell v. Fred T. Ley & Co., Inc., 278 Mass. 60, 75, 179 N. E. 294.

A majority stockholder does not become a fiduciary for other stockholders by reason merely of ownership of his stock. It is only where he steps out of his role as a stockholder, and acts in the management and conduct of the corporation, with disregard of the interests of the corporation and of the minority stockholders that he is said actually to become a fiduciary instead of a mere stockholder. Kavanaugh v. Kavanaugh Knitting Co., 226 N.Y. 185, 123 N.E. 148; Blaustein v. Pan American & Transport Co., supra. We may assume that he may be held as fiduciary when he is in active charge of corporate affairs, and induces a minority stockholder to sell his holdings, concealing the true condition of corporate finances for the purpose of making a personal profit. See Sautter v. Fulmer, 258 N.Y. 107, 179 N.E. 310. Such a state of facts would not be analogous to the present one.

The New York cases relied on by the trial court in its opinion, as supporting its holding there, would seem to have no application, for the reason that they involved the improper conduct of corporate affairs by those controlling a majority of the stock.

In Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. New York & N. R. Co., 150 N. Y. 410, 44 N.E. 1043, 34 L.R.A. 76, 55 Am.St.Rep. 689, the majority stockholder (another corporation) actually took over the management of the subsidiary, and diverted income from it, refusing business which would have been sufficient to pay interest on its obligations. Having thus permitted a default in interest, the majority stockholder instituted an action to foreclose, so as to obtain the property at less than its true value.

Bosworth v. Allen, 168 N.Y. 157, 61 N.E. 163, 55 L.R.A. 751, 85 Am.St.Rep. 667, involved misconduct by directors, and presented the question of their liability in such capacity.

In Kavanaugh v. Kavanaugh Knitting Co., supra, a dissolution of a prosperous corporation was involved at the instance of the majority stockholders. The court held that the determination of the question whether the dissolution was wise was part of the corporate affairs, and the majority stockholders occupied a position of trust to the corporation, and were burdened with fiduciary obligations in making such decision. It was only in taking corporate action as to dissolution that the stockholders were held to be acting for each other, and thus prevented from acting for their individual advantage. In that case the Court of Appeals stated (226 N.Y. at page 194, 123 N.E. at page 151): "Undoubtedly no trust relation ordinarily exists between the stockholders themselves."

In the present case no claim was made that any of the affairs of American Beverage Corporation were mismanaged by appellants; nor was it claimed that the conduct of corporate affairs was directly involved in the sale of the stock.

The trial court relied largely on the decision in Insuranshares Corporation of Delaware v. Northern Fiscal Corporation, D.C., 35 F. Supp. 22. We think the case referred to is distinguishable upon the facts. There the sale of corporate control involved the transfer of the stock of an investment trust, the assets of which consisted entirely of readily saleable securities. Plenary power to sell the assets went with control. In the present case the company is a going mercantile concern, possessing plant, equipment, trademarks, good will, etc. In the Insuranshares case, supra, the transferors received a price beyond the intrinsic, or book value of their shares, which were capable of accurate measurement by consideration of the market value of the securities owned by the investment trust. Here the contrary appears. The controlling stockholders there agreed to convert part of the company's assets into cash before delivering control, and to secure the resignation of directors. No such agreements existed here. In addition, in the cited case the transferors were cognizant of the fact that a short time before the company had suffered a loss of many millions of dollars through a transfer of control to dishonest persons, and it was shown that the danger of a recurrence of this situation had been specifically called to the transferors' attention.

The present case does involve a charge that the majority stockholders benefited at the expense of the minority. That charge, however, rests solely on the claim that more was received by appellants for their stock than it was bringing in the open market. The difference between market price and liquidating value would indicate that the market price of small lots of stock did not reflect its intrinsic worth, especially of controlling stock. Realization of more than the market price would not, under such circumstances, be indicative of fraud, nor afford the minority stockholders any right of action. Nor would the fact that purchasers were willing to pay a larger price to one holding control necessarily make the receipt of an increased price improper or indicate any unlawful intention on the part of the purchasers. Control might have lawful advantages. For instance, if corporate control for the purpose of merger, or some similar object, was desired by the purchasers for legitimate purposes, undoubtedly they would pay more for a controlling interest. We see no reason why the value of control would not be a lawful property right of the controlling stockholders, at least to the extent that it is reflected in the price they may obtain for their stock in an honest sale. In any event, in view of the liquidation value of the stock involved in the present case, the sum realized here could not be said to be so excessive as to indicate any danger signal.

Of course, a majority stockholder may not knowingly use his position to wrongfully injure one who holds a minority interest, and will incur liability when he does so. The test of common honesty would seem to be a sufficient one to apply in order to determine when a wrong is being done. To apply the rigid rules limiting a fiduciary, and to say further that the failure to investigate the moral character, or financial ability of the purchaser of one's stock is an actionable wrong, is to place an unwarranted burden upon the ownership of stock. Knowledge that the purchasers were about to loot the corporate treasury, or were persons who had previously engaged in such practices would be one thing. Concluding on the basis of mere lack of knowledge concerning the business integrity of the purchaser that the seller assumes the risk that the buyer has an intention to loot the company would be quite another. The law does not require one to act on the assumption that a person with whom a business transaction, even of large amount, is had, will commit a fraudulent or criminal act if given the opportunity to do so. Quite the contrary may be assumed, in the absence of actual notice.

In the present case there is no evidence that McCullough had any intimation that Feinberg was a man of bad repute. In fact, that Feinberg was such a person is not claimed. The theory of respondents in this case, seems to be that the person from whom Feinberg bought control of Prendergast-Davies Co., Ltd., was a man of such reputation. To say that a circumstance of this remote nature should prevent or deter the sale of one's stock, or create the duty of investigation, seems unwarranted in reason.

As we find no basis in fact or in law for the judgment appealed from, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the question of damages and other points raised.

The judgment so far as appealed from should be reversed with costs, and the complaint dismissed on the merits with costs.

All concur.

Judgment, so far as appealed from, unanimously reversed with costs, and the complaint dismissed on the merits with costs.

Settle order on notice, reversing the findings inconsistent with this determination, and containing such new findings of fact proved upon the trial as are necessary to sustain the judgment hereby awarded.

(b) Use of Control

HEIMBAUCH v. HITCHCOCK.

Supreme Court of Kansas, 1924. 115 Kan. 182, 222 P. 114.

MARSHALL, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,100 in an accounting between the plaintiff and the defendant, stockholders in the Hutchinson Implement Company, a corporation organized under the laws of this state.

The corporation was organized with a capital stock of $10,000, consisting of 50 shares of common stock of the par value of $100 each and 50 shares of preferred stock valued at $100 each. C. O. Hitchcock owned all of the preferred stock and 46 shares of the common stock and controlled all the remainder of the common stock except 1 share owned by the plaintiff. In the course of time, the common stock reached a value of $1,100, while the preferred stock remained at par. In February, 1920, at a meeting of the stockholders, not attended by the plaintiff, it was voted to retire the preferred stock, held by the defendant, and to issue to him 50 shares of common stock in lieu thereof. A resolution to amend the charter of the corporation to that effect was then adopted. The preferred stock was canceled, and common stock was issued in its place. The effect of retiring the preferred stock held by the defendant Hitchcock and issuing to him common stock in lieu thereof was to increase greatly the value of the preferred stock and to decrease the value of the common stock from $1,100 to about $600 for each share. Afterward, C. O. Hitchcock contracted to sell to T. R. Withroder 100 shares of the common stock of the corporation. This included the share held by the plaintiff.

The journal entry of judgment contains findings of fact as follows:

"The court finds that the plaintiff is the owner of one certificate of stock in the Hutchinson Implement Company, said certificate of stock being No. 7, and dated the 28th day of December, 1916; that the value of said certificate of stock at this time is the sum of $1,100.

"The court further finds that the defendant C. O. Hitchcock sold the assets and stock of the Hutchinson Implement Company for $60,000; that there should be deducted from said sale the sum of $5,000, being the preferred stock in said company; and that the balance should be proportioned among the original stockholders of the common stock of 50 shares of said company, plaintiff's share amounting to $1,100."

The court rendered judgment—

"That the plaintiff do have and recover of and from the defendant the sum of $1,100, with interest at 6 per cent. from this date and for costs of this action taxes at $17.80; that plaintiff be required to deposit with the clerk of the district court his certificate of stock in the Hutchinson Implement Company, the same being certificate No. 7, to be delivered to plaintiff [defendant] upon the payment of said judgment."

In commenting on this case, the trial court said:

"It does not appear right and I do not think the law authorizes or will permit a transaction of the kind shown by the testimony in this case; that is, a transaction by which perferred stock worth $100 a share is converted into common stock worth $600 a share and reducing the then outstanding value of common stock at least one-half. I believe such a transaction is absolutely void. Especially is this true where it took the active co-operation and vote of the party owning the preferred stock as a director, officer, and stockholder to carry out such a scheme, and I, therefore, find for the plaintiff and hold that upon his surrendering his share of stock he would be entitled to onefiftieth of all·the other assets of the corporation whatever they may be, if any.

"I take it this suit is in effect a confirmance and ratification of the sale and transfer of Withroder by Hitchcock, and it is therefore in the nature of an accounting, and as he has in effect affirmed the sale he should upon payment of his proportion of the proceeds, deliver the stock if requested."

We quote from Fletcher, Cyclopedia Corporations, vol. 6. Section 3997, in part, is as follows:

"The right of the majority stockholders to control the corporation is subject to the qualification that they must act in good faith and for the interests of the corporation. Acts of a majority, whether a ratification of acts of corporate officers or original transactions, are not binding on the minority where fraudulent. * * *

"Fraud need not be shown as a fact nor need the individual stockholders be actuated by any fraudulent intent, but it is sufficient that the existence of fraud is the necessary legal inference from facts found."

Section 3998, in part, reads as follows:

"Of course, a majority of the stockholders, no matter how large, has no right to divert to itself assets of the company to the detriment of minority stockholders."

Section 3999 reads:

"The majority stockholders cannot divide the assets among themselves to the exclusion of the minority. This is so apparent that exhaustive citation of authority is useless."

In 3 Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) § 662, subd. 3, is found a résumé of the law which governs the conduct of majority toward minority stockholders in corporations and which fully supports the rules stated by Fletcher.

Hitchcock, who controlled this corporation, could not, by the stock transaction in which he engaged, increase the value of the preferred stock held by him at the expense of the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY v. BOGERT et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1919. 250 U.S. 483, 39 S.Ct. 533.

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

Suit by Henry L. Bogert and others, as executors under the last will and testament of Walter B. Lawrence, deceased, and others, against the Southern Pacific Company. A decree for complainants (226 F. 500) was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals (244 F. 61, 15 C.C.A. 489), and defendant brings certiorari. Henry J. Chase and others filed separate petitions in the Supreme Court praying leave to intervene. Decree modified, and cause remanded for further proceedings; the petitions to intervene being denied without prejudice.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

In 1888, and for some years prior thereto, the Southern Pacific Company dominated the Houston & Texas Central Railway Company, electing directors and officers through one of its subsidiaries, which owned a majority of the Houston Company stock. In 1888, pursuant to a reorganization agreement, mortgages upon the Houston Company properties were foreclosed, and these were acquired by the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company; the old company's outstanding bonds were exchanged for bonds of the new; all the new company's stock was delivered to the Southern Pacific; its lines of railroad were incorporated in the transcontinental system of that corporation; and the minority stockholders of the old Houston Company received nothing. In 1913 the appellees, suing on behalf of themselves and other minority stockholders, brought this suit in the Supreme Court of New York to have the Southern Pacific declared trustee for them of stock in the new Houston Company and for an accounting. The plaintiffs below being citizens and residents of New York, and the Southern Pacific, a Kentucky corporation, it removed the case to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York; and that court, after a hearing on the evidence, entered a decree for the plaintiffs. Bogert v. Southern Pacific Co., 226 Fed. 500. See, also, Bogert v. Southern Pac. Co. (D.C.) 215 F. 218, and Id. (D.C.) 211 F. 776. There had been issued by the old Houston Company 77,269 shares of stock, and by the new 100,000 shares. The decree declared that the Southern Pacific held for plaintiffs and other stockholders who intervened 24,347.9 shares in the new Houston Company, directed that it should deliver to them these shares and also in cash the sum of $702,336.61 (being the aggregate of all dividends paid thereon) and interest thereon from the times the several dividends were received, upon receiving from them 18,816 shares in the old Houston Company and also with each share of old stock delivered $26 in cash and interest thereon from February 10, 1891. This decree was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals (Bogert v. Southern Pac. Co., 244 F. 61, 156 C.C.A. 489); and the case comes here on certiorari (245 U.S. 668, 38 S.Ct. 190, 62 L.Ed. 539).

In considering the many objections urged against the decree, it is important to bear constantly in mind the exact nature of the equity invoked by the bill and recognized by the lower courts. The minority stockholders do not complain of a wrong done the corporation or of any wrong done by it to them. They complain of the wrong done them directly by the Southern Pacific and by it alone. The wrong consists in its failure to share with them, the minority, the proceeds of the common property of which it, through majority stockholdings, had rightfully taken control. In other words, the minority assert the right to a pro rata share of the common property; and equity enforces the right by declaring the trust on which the Southern Pacific holds it and ordering distribution or compensation. The rule of corporation law and of equity invoked is well settled and has been often applied. The majority has the right to control; but when it does so, it occupies a fiduciary relation toward the minority, as much so as the corporation itself or its officers and directors. If through that control a sale of the corporate property is made and the property acquired by the majority, the minority may not be excluded from a fair participation in the fruits of the sale. * * *

Third. The Southern Pacific challenges the claim for relief on the ground that it took the new Houston Company stock, not as majority stockholder, but as underwriter or banker under the reorganization agreement. The essential facts are these: While dominating the old company through control of a majority of its stock, the Southern Pacific entered into its reorganization, under an agreement by which the minority stockholders of the old company could obtain stock in the new only upon payment in cash of a prohibitive assessment of $71.40 per share (said to be required to satisfy the floating debt and reorganization expenses and charges), while the Southern Pacific was enabled to acquire all the stock in the new company upon paying an assessment of $26 per share (said to be the amount required to satisfy reorganization expenses and charges). The Southern Pacific asserts that, unlike the minority stockholders, it assumed an underwriter's obligation to take the new company's stock not subscribed for by the minority, and also guaranteed part of the principal and all the interest on the new company's bonds, which were given in exchange for those of the old company. But the purpose of the Southern Pacific in assuming these obligations was in no sense to perform the function of banker. It was to secure the incorporation of the Houston Railroad into its own transcontinental system. And it was never called upon to pay anything under its guaranty.

Fourth. The Southern Pacific contends that the doctrine under which majority stockholders exercising control are deemed trustees for the minority should not be applied here, because it did not itself own directly any stock in the old Houston Company; its control being exerted through a subsidiary, Morgan's Louisiana & Texas Railroad & Steamship Company, which was the majority stockholder in the old Houston Company. But the doctrine by which the holders of a majority of the stock of a corporation who dominate its affairs are held to act as trustee for the minority does not rest upon such technical distinctions. It is the fact of control of the common property held and exercised, not the particular means by which or manner in which the control is exercised, that creates the fiduciary obligation.

Fifth. Equally unfounded is the contention that the Southern Pacific cannot be held liable because it was not guilty of fraud or mismanagement. The essential of the liability to account sought to be enforced in this suit lies, not in fraud or mismanagement, but in the fact that, having become a fiduciary through taking control of the old Houston Company, the Southern Pacific has secured fruits which it has not shared with the minority. The wrong lay, not in acquiring the stock, but in refusing to make a pro rata distribution on equal terms among the old Houston Company shareholders. * * *

Seventh. The Southern Pacific also contends that the decree is erroneous because the effect is to give to the minority their pro rata share in the new Houston Company without their having made any contribution towards satisfying the floating indebtedness of the old; whereas the floating debt creditors had a claim against the property prior in interest to that of the old company's stockholders. Kansas City Southern Ry. Co. v. Guardian Trust Co., 240 U.S. 166, 36 S.Ct. 334, 60 L.Ed. 579; Northern Pacific Ry. Co. v. Boyd, 228 U.S. 482, 33 S.Ct. 554, 57 L.Ed. 931. The fact that no provision was made for the floating indebtedness is not a bar to the minority obtaining relief. They did not come into court with unclean hands because there were floating debt creditors unpaid. If any floating debts creditors have been illegally deprived of rights, it was not by the minority's acts. Whether the terms on which relief should be granted the minority should be affected by the fact that the Southern Pacific had, through a subsidiary, a large interest in the unpaid floating debt, presents a more serious question, which will be considered later. * * *

Ninth. The Southern Pacific objects to the terms of the decree also on the ground that, if the minority stockholders are held entitled to a pro rata share of the new company stock, it should be upon payment, not merely of the $26 per share required to meet reorganization expenses and charges, but also of the additional sum required to discharge the floating indebtedness. At the time of the reorganization there was outstanding a large floating indebtedness for which on May 17, 1889, judgments were recovered: by the Lackawanna Iron & Coal Company in the sum of $555,914.25; by Morgan's Louisiana & Texas Railroad & Steamship Company in the sum of $1,795,570.81; and by the Southern Development Company in the sum of $858,133.15. The last two companies held as collateral for their claims $880,000 of bonds of the old Houston Company, for which they later received in exchange bonds of a new company to be applied at their par value toward payment of the debts for which judgment had been recovered. The reorganization agreement provided in substance that the whole $10,000,000 of stock of the new company, if not taken by the old company's stockholders, should be divided pro rata among such of the floating debt creditors as should provide the cash required to pay the floating indebtedness and reorganization expenses and charges; but no floating debt creditor took advantage of this provision, and all were thus wiped out in the reorganization.

The Southern Pacific asserts that the Morgan Company was and still is its subsidiary; that it owned and now owns a large part of the stock of that corporation; and that through such stock ownership it is, in effect, a large floating debt creditor of the old Houston Company. It suggests also that it has paid out moneys to protect the property of the new company from other floating indebtedness. If the Southern Pacific had been allowed to retain all the stock in the new Houston Company, it would obviously lose nothing by the wiping out of its interest in the floating indebtedness of the old company; and any money expended by it in protecting the property of the new company would be fully reflected in the increased value of the stock therein, if it owned all. But, if part of the new company stock is taken from it and distributed among the minority stockholders, the Southern Pacific will lose and the minority stockholders will gain the pro rata increase in value of the new company stock, due to wiping out of the Southern Pacific's share in the floating debt and to its expenditures made for wiping out other indebtedness.

The Circuit Court of Appeals recognized that there was great force in this contention of the Southern Pacific, but overruled it because it "was never raised in the case by pleading or otherwise until an exception was taken to the report of the special master" and because "there is nothing in the record to show what, if anything, the Southern Pacific Company did give up." The memorandum filed by the district judge on settlement of the interlocutory decree indicates that some such contention was made then. At all events it was clearly made before entry of the final decree; and it does not appear that the minority stockholders were in any way prejudiced by the failure to make the exact contention earlier. There is no reason to believe that the parties cannot determine now, as easily as they might have done a few years ago, to what extent the floating indebtedness due the Morgan Company represents money in effect expended by the Southern Pacific for the benefit of the old Houston Company and to what extent the wiping out of any indebtedness and any expenditure made by the Southern Pacific in connection therewith will inure to the benefit of such of the minority stockholders of the old company as receive stock in the new. Some adjustment should obviously be made so as to compensate the Southern Pacific for any contribution made at its expense to the value of the stock in the new company of which the minority stockholders may get the benefit. The purpose of this proceeding is not to punish the Southern Pacific, but to declare and enforce its obligation as trustee. The minority stockholders who seek equity should do equity; and a court of chancery has power in granting relief to prevent unjust enrichment of the minority stockholders at the expense of the Southern Pacific. To determine the amount of such contribution by the Southern Pacific and of such benefit to the minority stockholders further investigation by the trial court will be necessary; and the judgments on the floating indebtedness entered in 1889 against the old company should not be held a bar to any inquiry into relevant facts. Whether this compensation shall be made by way of addition to the assessment of $26 per share provided for in the decree, or whether it can and should be made by requiring the minority stockholders to consent to the creation in favor of the Southern Pacific of some charge against or interest in the new company which would have priority over the 100,000 shares of stock outstanding, as, for instance, an income bond or preferred stock, or whether the compensation should be made in some other manner, should also be determined in the first instance by the District Court where all the relevant facts can be ascertained. The final decree must be set aside and the interlocutory decree be modified so as to provide for the necessary inquiry; and, when all the relevant facts shall have been ascertained, a final decree should be entered which will embody such terms as shall be found to be appropriate to afford to the Southern Pacific appropriate compensation for its contribution. * * *

Decree modified, and cause remanded to the District Court, for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion; the costs in this court to be equally divided between the parties.

WABASH RAILWAY COMPANY v. AMERICAN REFRIGERATOR TRANSIT COMPANY et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Eighth Circuit, 1925. 7 F.2d 335.

Suit in equity by the Wabash Railway Company against the American Refrigerator Transit Company and another. From a decree of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

This is an appeal from an order and decree of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri, dismissing, upon motions of the American Refrigerator Transit Company and the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company, appellees, appellant's amended bill of complaint.

For the purpose of passing on the assignments of error, the facts, well pleaded in the amended bill of complaint, must be accepted by us as true. They may be summarized as follows:

On or about February 14, 1881, the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company (predecessors of the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company), and the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Company (predecessor of appellant), organized under the laws of the state of Illinois, a corporation known as American Refrigerator Transit Company, with an authorized capital stock of $500,000, divided into 5,000 shares of the par value of $100 each; the said railroad companies at that time owning, or operating under leases, lines of railroad in Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, and other states. The capital stock of the refrigerator company was issued to said three railroads in equal proportions, viz. one-third to each. Nothing was paid for said stock.

The said refrigerator company was organized for the purpose of creating therein a joint instrumentality or agency of the three railroad companies for carrying on the business affairs incident to the solicitation of perishable freight for transportation over the various lines of railroads owned and operated by said railroad companies, and for the operation and management of what was commonly known as refrigerator cars for the conserving in transportation of perishable freight.

The refrigerator company, owning no cars or other property, and, having no funds with which to carry on its operations, the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company, and the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Company contributed to it in equal proportions $50,000 to be used as a working fund, and turned over to it 100 refrigerator cars from each of said railroad companies, for the use of which the refrigerator company was to pay a rental of $5 per month per car. In 1887 the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company and the Missouri Pacific Railway Company placed 469 additional refrigerator cars with the refrigerator company for the same purpose and on the same terms as the original contribution.

A written contract was entered into July 1, 1881, between said refrigerator company and said railroad companies, which provided that the refrigerator company was to furnish to said railroad companies refrigerator cars to transport over the lines of railroad operated by said companies goods requiring refrigeration, and in consideration thereof the refrigerator company was to receive one cent per mile for every mile that any refrigerator car furnished by it should be run over the respective lines of railroad, and further was to receive a commission of 12½ per cent. of the freight revenues which each railroad company should receive for the transportation of said goods over its lines.

On the same date, viz. July 1, 1881, the railroad companies entered into another contract (called a stockholders' contract) with each other and with the refrigerator company, in which it was agreed that, in order to provide a fair, just, and equal distribution among themselves of the profits arising from the business of said refrigerator company, there should first be paid from the earnings of said refrigerator company all the operating and other necessary expenses of every kind, including in said expenses rentals paid on leased cars, and that the sum remaining after payment of these expenses should be distributed among the railroad companies "in the proportion which the business done and money earned over the roads or lines of each party shall bear to the whole earnings of said first party during the period for which such distribution is made; the several parties hereto hereby agreeing to the payment of dividends in that proportion of their stock."

It was further provided by the contract that "all certificates of stock in the American Refrigerator Transit Company shall contain full reference to this agreement and be expressly subject to all of its provisions." * * *

During the years when the Missouri Pacific and Iron Mountain Companies were receiving the larger share of surplus earnings by reason of larger contributions thereto, the railroad companies and the refrigerator companies construed the original stockholders' contract and the stockholders' contract of January 1, 1894, as constituting an assignment to the railroad companies, respectively, of the surplus earnings of the refrigerator companies.

Each of said parties to said operating and stockholders' contract, and their successors in interest, acted upon the construction so given to said stockholders' contracts, by refunding and paying over to the three railroad companies the accumulated surplus earnings from year to year in the respective proportions that said three railroad companies contributed to the earnings of the refrigerator companies under the terms of the operating contracts.

This construction of the original stockholders' contract of 1881 and of the stockholders' contract of January 1, 1894, was not questioned until the time that the contributions of the Wabash Railroad Company to the earnings exceeded the combined contributions of the Missouri Pacific and Iron Mountain Companies.

In 1911 the appellee refrigerator company and the Missouri Pacific and Iron Mountain Companies for the first time asserted that the surplus earnings of the refrigerator company did not belong, either in law or equity, to the said three railroad companies in the proportion that said railroad companies contributed to such earnings, as provided for by the terms of the operating contract of January 1, 1894, or in any other proportion, but that the surplus earnings of the refrigerator companies, which had been invested in refrigerator cars and other properties, had lost their character as surplus, and were no longer distributable to the stockholders on the basis of the stockholders' contract of January 1, 1894; that such cars or other property purchased in the name of the refrigerator companies, and wholly or partially paid for from surplus earnings, were owned and held by the refrigerator company, free and clear of any claim of title or interest, either legal or equitable, of the appellant or its predecessor, except such interest as appellant might have as a stockholder of appellee refrigerator company, without regard to, and independent of, the provisions of said stockholders' contract; and that, in any event, so much of the surplus as was derived by appellee refrigerator company, from earnings on railroad lines other than those of the stockholding railroad companies, should be distributed among the stockholding railroad companies on the basis of their respective stock ownership, and not upon the basis of the stockholders' contract of January 1, 1894.

The matter of controversy was in the year 1911 submitted by the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company, and the Wabash Railroad Company, owners of all the capital stock of the American Refrigerator Transit Company, to one Lawrence Greer, Esq., as arbitrator, together with the statements of the respective claims and contentions of the parties to the controversy, "with the understanding and agreement that all parties would accept and abide by the facts and decision of said arbitrator."

We do not find in the record the arbitration agreement. The opinion of the arbitrator appears, however, as an exhibit to the amended bill. The arbitrator decided that the stockholding railroad companies were entitled to interest in the cars of the refrigerator company purchased by it out of the surplus revenues, which otherwise might have been distributed in payment of dividends, upon the same basis and in the same proportion as provided in the stockholders' contract of January 1, 1894, with respect to the distribution of surplus of the refrigerator company, and irrespective of whether such surplus was derived from business done over the lines of the stockholding railroad companies or of other railroad companies. * * *

KENYON, CIRCUIT JUDGE (after stating the facts as above). Wide divergence exists in the theories of the respective parties.

Appellees contend the suit is an attempt of a minority stockholder to recover against the corporation a definite portion of the corporate assets, on the theory that such assets represent deferred dividends which the board of directors should have declared but did not.

Appellant's theory is that the suit is not one to review corporate acts, or to bring about a dissolution of the refrigerator company, or to secure control of said corporation; that the question of discretionary power in the board of directors of said company is not involved, as the terms of the stockholders' contract of January 1, 1894, make mandatory the distribution of surplus earnings to the parties thereto in proportions there provided; that the action is one to declare and define a trust relationship of the refrigerator company to the appellant and appellee Missouri Pacific Company and to compel the refrigerator company to carry on its business as such trustee according to the terms of the stockholders' contract of January 1, 1894, and the purposes of its creators. * * *

The contracts here were not only between the corporation and the stockholders, but were likewise contracts between the stockholders themselves. It is the general voice of authority that the stockholders of a corporation may contract with each other, and that such contracts will be valid, provided they do not involve the rights of creditors, violate statutes, or contravene public policy. Manson v. Curtis, 223 N.Y. 313, 119 N.E. 559, Ann.Cas. 1918E, 247; Powers-Buchanan Co. v. Powers, 269 Pa. 388, 112 A. 541; Kantzler v. Benzinger et al., 214 Ill. 589, 73 N.E. 874; Hladovec v. Paul et al., 222 Ill. 254, 78 N.E. 619; Jones v. Brown, 171 Mass. 318, 50 N.E. 648; State ex rel. Frank et al. v. Swanger, 190 Mo. 561, 89 S.W. 872, 2 L.R.A.,N.S., 121, 4 Ann.Cas. 563; Fletcher's Cyc. of Corporations, vol. II, § 3673; Cook on Corporations, vol. 2 (6th Ed.) § 622, subds. a, b, and c. The contracts under consideration do not fall within any of these inhibitions. They were valid agreements, binding on the parties, their successors or assigns. * * * The amended bill states that, since January 1, 1894, the surplus revenues of the two refrigerator companies, except as applied to the payment of cars and other properties, have been distributed and paid over to the three railroad companies or their successors in the proportions that the contributions by each of said railroad companies to the gross revenues of the refrigerator companies bore to the total amount of the surplus revenues then to be distributed. The construction given a contract by both parties through a long term of years is persuasive in arriving at the intention and purpose of the contracting parties.

We reach the conclusion that the provision of the stockholders' contract of January 1, 1894, with reference to the distribution of surplus from all sources, was intended to include the earnings from foreign lines and any other outside sources, in addition to revenues derived from the business done over the lines of the railroad companies, signatories to the contract. If the expression, "surplus accruing from all sources," was not so intended, it would have been easy and natural to have so stated in the contract. It seems to us the expression used, in view of all the surrounding circumstances, is susceptible of no other construction. * * *

We are satisfied the amended bill of complaint states sufficient facts to give appellant a standing in a court of equity and to require an answer on the part of appellees. Its dismissal upon motion was error.

The case is therefore reversed and remanded, with directions to permit appellees to answer the amended bill of complaint, in default of which a decree should be entered for appellant substantially as prayed.

PART VI

STOCKHOLDERS' REMEDIES FOR MISMANAGEMENT

NEW YORK GENERAL CORPORATION LAW.

§ 60. Action against directors or officers of corporation for misconduct. An action may be brought against one or more of the directors or officers of a corporation to procure judgment for the following relief or any part thereof:

1. To compel the defendants to account for their official conduct, including any neglect of or failure to perform their duties, in the management and disposition of the funds and property, committed to their charge.

2. To compel them to pay to the corporation, or to its creditors, any money and the value of any property, which they have acquired to themselves, or transferred to others, or lost, or wasted, by or through any neglect of or failure to perform or other violation of their duties.

3. To suspend a defendant from exercising his office, for an abuse of his trust.

4. To remove a defendant from office and to direct the filling of the vacancy in accordance with the charter and by-laws of the corporation, or, if they contain no provision therefor, in such manner as the court shall direct.

5. To set aside a transfer of property, made by one or more directors or officers of a corporation, contrary to a provision of law, where the transferee knew the purpose of the transfer.

6. To enjoin such a transfer where there is good reason to apprehend that it will be made.

§ 61. Who may bring such action. An action may be brought for the relief prescribed in section sixty of this chapter, by the attorney-general in behalf of the people of the state, or except for the relief specified in the third and fourth subdivisions of said section by the corporation or a creditor, receiver or trustee in bankruptcy thereof, or by a director or officer of the corporation.

Upon the application of either party the court shall make an order directing the trial by jury of the issue of negligence, and for that purpose the questions to be tried must be prepared and settled as prescribed in section four hundred and twenty-nine of the civil practice act.

In any action brought by a shareholder in the right of a foreign or domestic corporation it must be made to appear that the plaintiff was a stockholder at the time of the transaction of which he complains or that his stock thereafter devolved upon him by operation of law.

§ 61-b. Security for expenses. In any action instituted or maintained in the right of any foreign or domestic corporation by the holder or holders of less than five percentum of the outstanding shares of any class of such corporation's stock or voting trust certificates, unless the shares or voting trust certificates held by such holder or holders have a market value in excess of fifty thousand dollars, the corporation in whose right such action is brought shall be entitled at any stage of the proceedings before final judgment to require the plaintiff or plaintiffs to give security for the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, which may be incurred by it in connection with such action and by the other parties defendant in connection therewith for which it may become subject pursuant to section sixty-four of this chapter, to which the corporation shall have recourse in such amount as the court having jurisdiction shall determine upon the termination of such action. The amount of such security may thereafter from time to time be increased or decreased in the discretion of the court having jurisdiction of such action upon showing that the security provided has or may become inadequate or is excessive.

NOTE

In Singer et al. v. State Laundry, Inc., et al., 188 Misc. 583, 68 N.Y.S.2d 808, 811 (Supreme Court, Special Term, New York County, 1947) Mr. Justice Shientag, commenting on § 61 of the General Corporation Law, said: "It will be noticed that the section does not require * * * that the stockholder must be a stockholder of record at the time of the transaction of which he complains. Under the Federal decisions on which the statute is modeled, it has been held that it is sufficient if the stockholder is equitably entitled to be such * * *" at the time of the transaction complained of.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 51A. In any derivative suit hereafter instituted by a stockholder of a corporation organized under the laws of this State, it shall be averred in the Bill of Complaint that the Complainant was a stockholder of the corporation at the time of the transaction of which he complains or that his stock thereafter devolved upon him by operation of law.

FEDERAL RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

Rule 23. Class Actions. * * *

(b) SECONDARY ACTION BY SHAREHOLDERS. In an action brought to enforce a secondary right on the part of one or more shareholders in an association, incorporated or unincorporated, because the association refuses to enforce rights which may properly be asserted by it, the complaint shall be verified by oath and shall aver (1) that the plaintiff was a shareholder at the time of the transaction of which he complains or that his share thereafter devolved on him by operation of law and (2) that the action is not a collusive one to confer on a court of the United States jurisdiction of any action of which it would not otherwise have jurisdiction. The complaint shall also set forth with particularity the efforts of the plaintiff to secure from the managing directors or trustees and, if necessary, from the shareholders such action as he desires, and the reasons for his failure to obtain such action or the reasons for not making such effort.

(c) DISMISSAL OR COMPROMISE. A class action shall not be dismissed or compromised without the approval of the court. If the right sought to be enforced is one defined in paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of this rule notice of the proposed dismissal or compromise shall be given to all members of the class in such manner as the court directs. If the right is one defined in paragraphs (2) or (3) of subdivision (a) notice shall be given only if the court requires it.

A. STOCKHOLDERS' DERIVATIVE ACTIONS

1. WHAT STOCKHOLDERS MAY MAINTAIN SUCH ACTIONS

POLLITZ v. GOULD et al.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1911. 202 N.Y. 11, 94 N.E. 1088.

Action by James Pollitz against George J. Gould and others. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (127 N.Y.S. 1140), affirming an order denying a motion made on the pleadings to dismiss the complaint, defendants George J. Gould and others appeal by permission on certified questions. Affirmed, and questions answered.

HISCOCK, J. This action was brought by plaintiff as a stockholder in the Wabash Railroad Company in behalf of said company, for the benefit of himself and all other stockholders, to set aside as fraudulent a transfer and exchange of several millions of dollars par value of its stock for an equivalent amount of the capital stock of the Wabash Pittsburg Terminal Railway Company. It is unnecessary to go into the details of the transaction which is being attacked by the plaintiff through and in behalf of the company, for the sole question presented for our consideration may be discussed without doing this. This question is whether a stockholder may bring an action of this character for the purpose of avoiding an improper transaction consummated at the expense of the corporation before he acquired his stock, and as presented here the question is unembarrassed by any incidental considerations, such as that the prior holder of the stock consented to the transaction, or that plaintiff's subsequent acquisition of the stock was accompanied by any circumstances which render it inequitable for him to seek relief.

While somewhat strangely this question does not appear to have been decided by this court, it has been passed on by the lower courts of this state, and by those of many other states, and by the Supreme Court of the United States. It has also been somewhat considered by the courts of England. Conflicting conclusions have been reached by these decisions. Without reviewing the English authorities, which so far as cited do not seem to be very decisive, reference may be made to the decisions in this country.

The question was presented in Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U.S. 450, 26 L.Ed. 827, and it was there held that a stockholder might not bring an action in behalf of the corporation to avoid a fraudulent transaction consummated before he acquired his stock. While the question was directly passed on, it is fair to state that it was not considered at any great length, and that the court seems to have been more concerned with establishing this rule as one of practice than of substantive law. The decision resulted in the adoption of a rule of practice requiring the plaintiff in such an action to show, before bringing suit, that he owned the stock on which it was brought at the time the transaction complained of occurred, and, whether it be regarded as establishing a principle of law or a rule of practice, this authority has been subsequently followed in the United States courts. In addition, this requirement of the plaintiff in such a stockholder's action has been approved in the following cases: Alexander v. Searcy, 81 Ga. 536, 8 S.E. 630, 12 Am.St.Rep. 337; Boldenweck v. Bullis, 40 Colo. 253, 90 P. 634; Rankin v. S. W. B. & I. Co., 12 N. M. 54, 73 P. 614; Moore v. Silver Valley Co., 104 N.C. 534, 10 S.E. 679; Clark v. American Coal Co., 86 Iowa 436, 53 N.W. 291, 17 L.R.A. 557; Home Fire Ins. Co. v. Barber, 67 Neb. 644, 93 N.W. 1024, 60 L.R.A. 927, 108 Am.St.Rep. 716.

The contrary doctrine that a stockholder acquiring his stock subsequent to the occurrence complained of may maintain this character of an action has been affirmed in the following cases outside of this state: Winsor v. Bailey, 55 N.H. 218; City of Chicago v. Cameron, 22 Ill.App. 104, affirmed 120 Ill. 447, 11 N.E. 899; Montgomery Light Co. v. Lakey, 121 Ala. 131, 25 So. 1006; Forrester v. B. & M., etc., Co., 21 Mont. 544, 565, 55 P. 229, 353; Just v. Idaho, etc., Co., 16 Idaho 639, 102 P. 381, 133 Am.St.Rep. 140; Rafferty v. Donnelly, 197 Pa. 423, 47 A. 202; Appleton v. Am. Malting Co., 65 N.J.Eq. 375, 54 A. 454. It has also been approved in this state, directly or indirectly, in the following cases: Ramsey v. Gould, 57 Barb. 398; Young v. Drake, 8 Hun 61; Ervin v. Oregon Ry. & N. Co., 35 Hun, 544; Frothingham v. Broadway & Seventh Ave. R. R. Co., 9 N.Y.Civ. Proc.R. 304; Sayles v. Central Nat. Bank, 18 Misc.Rep. 155, 41 N.Y.S. 1063; O'Connor v. Virginia P. & P. Co., 46 Misc.Rep. 530, 535, 92 N.Y.S. 525.

Assuming this question to be an open one in this court, we have no hesitation in approving the rule, which has heretofore prevailed in this state, that in the absence of special circumstances this character of action may be maintained by a stockholder acquiring his stock subsequent to the transaction which is challenged, rather than the contrary one prevailing elsewhere. We do this, not only because a long and uniform line of decisions by our own courts ought to have weight, but because the rule established by these decisions seems to be the sounder one.

A stockholder has an indivisible interest in the property and assets of a corporation, subject to the discharge of its obligations. This indivisible interest, generally speaking, is represented by certificates of stock, and is transferred by their transfer. The general character of these certificates, and the effect of their transfer in passing the interest of the holder, is too well established and understood to require any discussion. As an original proposition it would seem to be clear that a right of action by or in behalf of the corporation for fraud, to set aside a conveyance of its assets, or to avoid obligations imposed upon it, is part of its rights, property, and assets, in which a stockholder has this indivisible interest, transferable by the transfer of his certificates. I am unable to see any real or substantial distinction by virtue of which a stockholder, transferring his certificates, would transfer all of his indivisible interest in bonds or real estate on hand, but would not transfer his interest in a right of action to recover bonds or real estate which had been fraudulently withdrawn from the possession of the corporation, and which it was entitled to recover; and if the subsequent holder, by acquiring the certificates, does acquire such latter interest, it seems to follow that he may, if necessary, in behalf of the corporation, assert and prosecute an action to protect and enforce the same.

Brief reference may be made to some of the reasons advanced in opposition to this view. Counsel points out practical inconvenience which he says will result from its application, owing to the difficulties in tracing stock and distinguishing that which has not assented to the transaction from that which has, or from that which perhaps has been issued since its consummation. These arguments, however, are so counterbalanced by corresponding claims from the opposite standpoint as to be of little weight.

Again, it is argued that, if one buys stock subsequent to the transaction, he should be regarded as buying subject to it, and not be permitted to question it. If the prior holder should give binding consent to the transaction, this under certain circumstances undoubtedly would prevent the subsequent purchaser from questioning it. But, in the absence of special circumstances, I fail to see any principle of estoppel or logic which makes a subsequent purchase of stock so subject to a fraudulent corporate transaction that the purchaser may not insist upon its being set aside. There is scarcely any analogy between the situation of one who buys from an individual property which has been subjected to a transaction which has not been disaffirmed, and that of one who purchases stock in a corporation which has the continuing right, both before and after the purchase, to disaffirm a wrong which has been perpetrated on it by its agents. There is little or no basis for the practical consideration that one who buys stock should be deemed to have adjusted his price to an existing transaction, even though voidable. If he knows of it, he may just as properly be assumed to have adjusted his price to the knowledge that the transaction may still be disaffirmed and avoided.

Then, lastly, an argument is made which seems to be founded on the idea that, in order to bring an action of this nature, the stockholder must in effect disaffirm the corporate transaction, and that this disaffirmance involves a personal right of election, which vests in the one holding the stock when the transaction is consummated, and which cannot be transferred. It is said "the right to question a fraud is not a purchasable commodity," and is not "capable of assignment and transfer," and does not pass "as an implied incident to every sale of corporate stock," and this view seems to be supported by some of the many cases which have been collected and reviewed by counsel with manifest industry and care.

So far as this argument means to assert that a mere naked right to question a corporate transaction could not be transferred to a stranger, if such an attempt can be conceived of, it may be assumed to be true. But the assertion that the right to protect stock by procuring an improper corporate transaction to be vacated does not pass on a transfer of the stock is a very different proposition. The election to disaffirm a fraudulent corporate transaction belongs to and is exercised in the right and name of the corporation, and not of the stockholder. The stockholder demands that the right shall be exercised and the cause of action be prosecuted by the corporation, or does it himself for the corporation. It is conceded that the one holding the stock when the fraud is consummated has this right. When he transfers his certificates, the transaction still stands, a continuing wrong, impairing the surplus of the company and affecting the stock. If the transferee has the right to have it avoided, this will protect and increase the value of his stock. If he has not acquired this right, it is the only one held by his predecessor in or through the corporation, which has been thought of, which has not been transferred by the transfer of the stock. It will be an anomalous exception if the prior holder retains the right to maintain or have maintained this action, while he passes all of his other rights by the transfer of his stock.

The only justification pleaded for this is the idea suggested of a personal and non-transferable right of election to disaffirm vested in the original holder. But this theory is entirely unsubstantial. Such prior holder does not acquire this right to object to the transaction and bring an action to set it aside as a power conferred upon him by reason of any personal qualities, but because of his character as a stockholder, and when he loses this character, and transfers it to another with his stock, there is no reason why the latter should not exercise the right as a proper and necessary incident to and for the benefit of his stock ownership.

The order should be affirmed, with costs, and both questions certified to us answered in the negative.

Order affirmed.

NOTE

The common-law rule in New York was subsequently changed by statute (see supra N. Y. General Corporations Law, § 61). Judge Hiscock's opinion nevertheless states the case for the classic conception. Why should sale of a share of stock transfer to the purchaser a smaller bundle of rights than was included in the share while it remained in the hands of the seller?

The so-called Federal Rule (requiring that the complainant in a derivative action shall have been a shareholder at time of the transaction attacked) is now, nevertheless probably the prevailing rule. See, for the best statement in favor of this rule the opinion of Dean Pound, then sitting on the Nebraska bench, in Home Fire Insurance Company v. Barber et al., 67 Neb. 644, 93 N.E. 1024 (Nebraska, 1903.)

PARSON et al. v. JOSEPH.

Supreme Court of Alabama, 1891. 92 Ala. 403, 8 So. 788.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Jefferson County.

COLEMAN, J. The purpose of the bill is to have certain certificates of stock issued by the Birmingham, Powderly & Bessemer Street Railroad Company to defendant Parson canceled, on the ground that the stock is fictitious, and was issued in violation of the constitution and statute law of the state. The bill prayed an injunction, and the writ was awarded by the chancellor. A demurrer was interposed, and also an answer by the defendant Parson. The cause was submitted for decree on the demurrer, and upon motion to dissolve the injunction. The court overruled the demurrer, and denied the motion to dissolve the injunction, and from this interlocutory decree the appeal is taken. Among other averments, the bill substantially alleges that plaintiff is a bona fide stockholder in said company; that shortly after the organization of the company the defendant subscribed for 107 shares of the capital stock of the company, of the par value of $50 each, and paid for the same in full by conveying to the company 39 acres of land, (describing the land,) at an agreed price and valuation of $137 per acre, when the land was not worth more than $25 per acre, and for this land Parson was to receive 107 shares of the stock; that shortly thereafter the capital stock of the company was doubled, and, without further consideration than the 39 acres of land, Parson's stock was doubled, and he received 214 shares of the capital stock. The bill, as amended, charges that the excessive valuation of the land was made knowingly, willfully, and with the fraudulent intent of having issued to Parson the fictitious stock, in violation of law. * * *

The answer denied that plaintiff was a bona fide stockholder, and set up that plaintiff was the transferee of one E. Lesser. The answer admits that defendants' stock was doubled without the payment of any additional consideration than that of the land; but, by way of explanation and defense, avers the lands were not truly and properly valued at first, and the increased valuation of the lands only raised them to their real and true value, and the additional issue of stock was for property at its fair valuation. The answer continues, however, as follows: That if said transaction had been illegal and fraudulent, and not done in good faith, complainant is estopped from setting up fraud in said transaction, or seeking to cancel said stock, because E. Lesser, who was complainant's transferrer, participated in all of said transactions, and himself fixed the value of said lands, with full knowledge of, and after full investigation of, the value of said land. A transferee of stock is not necessarily disqualified as a suitor in all cases, because the prior holders were personally disqualified. If the transferee purchased the shares in good faith, and without notice of the fact that the prior holder had precluded himself from suing, he would have as just a title to relief as if he had purchased from a shareholder who was under no disability; but if the purchaser was aware that the prior holder had barred his right to relief, neither justice nor public policy would require that the transferee, under these circumstances, should be accorded any greater rights than his transferrer. Id. § 267. The same rule prevails in this state in favor of derivative purchasers. A claimant who was a bona fide purchaser, without notice of a fraud, or of facts which the law considers sufficient to establish it, or from which it is inferable, then he could not be affected by a notice to his vendor. Horton v. Smith, 8 Ala. 78; Fenno v. Sayre, 3 Ala. 458; Wier v. Davis, 4 Ala. 442; Martinez v. Lindsay, ante, 787; Wait, Insolv. Corp. §§ 628, 630. If a stockholder participates in a wrongful or fraudulent contract, or silently acquiesces until the contract becomes executed, he cannot then come into a court of equity to cancel the contract, and more especially if the company or himself as a stockholder has reaped a benefit from the contract; and this rule holds good, although the consideration of the contract may be one expressly prohibited by statute. The same disability would attach to the transferee of his stock who bought with notice. We consider this general rule of equity abundantly sustained. Mor. Priv. Corp. §§ 261, 262; Cook, Stocks, §§ 39, 40, 735; Wright v. Hughes, (Ind.) 21 N.E.Rep. 907. It is sustained by the familiar rule that he who invokes the aid of a court of equity must have clean hands. Mr. Cook states the conditions upon which a stockholder can sustain a suit to remedy the frauds, ultra vires acts, or negligence of directors to be—First, the acts complained of must be such as to amount to a breach of trust, and such as neither a majority of the directors nor of the stockholders can ratify or condone; second, that the complaining stockholder himself is free from laches, or acquiescence in the acts to remedy which the suit is brought; third, that the corporation has been requested, and refused or neglected, to institute the suit, that the suit is instituted by bona fide stockholders as complainants, and that the corporation and the guilty parties, and other proper parties, have been made defendants. Cook, Stocks, § 646. If the averments of the bill are sustained by proof, the stock issued to the defendants was in violation of section 1662 of the Code, and of section 6, art. 14, of the constitution. On the contrary, if the proof shows that the property was received in payment of stock, at a fair valuation, such would not be the result. Davis v. Chemical Co., (Ala.) ante, 496. In cases where the stockholders or the company, by any laches, acquiescence, or participation in the unlawful and fictitious issue of stock, or for any other sufficient cause, are precluded from instituting the proper proceedings to remedy the wrong, the remedy is still open to the state to institute all necessary and proper proceedings to vacate and dissolve the corporation, or have such other proper judgments and decree rendered as the proof and justice may demand. It may be that stockholders who knowingly and intentionally have subscribed and paid for stock with property upon a fictitious valuation are liable as stockholders who have not paid up in full for their stock, within the meaning of the statute, to creditors who have not precluded themselves from maintaining the suit. Wait, Insolv. Corp. § 593; Douglas v. Ireland, 73 N.Y. 100; Boynton v. Andrews, 63 N.Y. 93. Applying the rule of law applicable when a motion to dissolve an injunction is submitted upon bill, exhibits, and answer, and considering only so much of the answer as is responsive to the bill, we are of opinion that the decretal order, overruling the demurrers and motion to dissolve the injunction, is free from error.

Affirmed.

BOLDENWECK v. BULLIS et al.

Supreme Court of Colorado, 1907. 40 Colo. 253, 90 P. 634.

GABBERT, J. * * * The boards of the respective companies authorized the defendant King to make the contract he did and execute the conveyances attacked. Plaintiff purchased his stock in the Consolidated Stanley Mining Company subsequent to the meeting of the stockholders of that company which authorized King to dispose of its property. It appears to be stock which participated in that meeting, and voted in favor of the transaction which he now seeks to have set aside. Stockholders who vote in favor of a transaction and their transferees cannot maintain a suit on behalf of the corporation and other stockholders to avoid such transaction. Gumaer v. Cripple Creek T., T. & M. Co. (Colo.Sup.) 90 P. 81; 1 Cook on Stockholders, § 40; 2 Cook on Stockholders, § 735. It does not appear from the record that the stock of plaintiff in the Salisbury Mining & Milling Company voted to authorize King to dispose of the property of that company. It does appear, however, that he purchased this stock and his stock in the Consolidated Stanley Mining Company after the transactions attacked were consummated. Inasmuch as his ownership of the stock in both companies was not vested in him at the time of the transactions which he now seeks to avoid, and such ownership did not result by operation of law, he is not in a position to successfully attack them. Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U.S. 450, 26 L. Ed. 827; United El. S. Co. v. La. E. L. Co. (C.C.) 68 F. 673; 2 Beach on Corp. § 437; Alexander v. Searcy, 81 Ga. 536, 8 S.E. 630, 12 Am. St.Rep. 337; Dimpfel v. O. & M. R. Co., 110 U.S. 209, 3 S.Ct. 573, 28 L.Ed. 121. Purchasing stock in a corporation for the purpose of making it the basis of litigation with respect to past transactions ought not to be encouraged.

There are additional reasons why he should be estopped from questioning the transactions under consideration. Very shortly after the deal with the Stanley Consolidated Mining & Milling Company was consummated he knew of the fact. He was present at a meeting of the stockholders of the Consolidated Stanley Mining Company at which a report was submitted by the defendant King of the deal with the Stanley Consolidated Mining & Milling Company. He made no objection to the report, but refused to vote his stock. It appears that Reidel and Torrey have disposed of some of the stock of the Stanley Consolidated Mining & Milling Company. It also appears that this company has incurred obligations. If the transactions with this company were now avoided, the result would be that its stock and obligations would be worthless. To entitle stockholders to relief against the action of a corporation, they must bring suit within such time after the doing of the acts complained of that the court may stop, or undo, the wrong of which they complain, without doing wrong to some other person; or, in other words, if a stockholder wants protection against the consequences of an act of the corporation, he must ask for it with sufficient promptness to enable the court to do justice to him, without doing injustice to innocent third parties. MATTHEWS et al. v. HEADLEY CHOCOLATE CO.

Court of Appeals of Maryland, 1917. 130 Md. 523, 100 A. 645.

Bill by the Headley Chocolate Company against Henry W. Matthews and others. From an order overruling defendants' demurrers, they appeal. Order affirmed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

BOYD, C. J. * * * The bill is peculiar in several respects, but particularly in the fact that it is not shown how many shares of stock were owned by the defendants, or how many by minority stockholders, or indeed how many Matthews sold, except that it was a controlling interest. It is not in terms alleged that there were any minority stockholders, outside of some of the defendants, but it does in several places speak of "minority stockholders," and it may be inferred that there were some, other than the defendants, who held shares, although, as far as the bill shows, they may have had 2,200, or more. As it is not alleged that the books of the company are not in its possession, the court should have been informed as to how the stock was held, for although the authorities are not uniform on the subject, we can have no doubt that if the holders of all the shares of stock assented to such payments to the officers as are here complained of, and a controlling interest in the company was afterwards transferred, the corporation could not recover the same, or any part thereof—at least unless it was shown that creditors were or might be affected by the payments. If the owners of most of the stock took part in or gave their assent to such payments, it is difficult to understand upon what principle a court of equity should give its aid to any other than minority stockholders, who had no part in the payments or had not acquiesced therein, unless there are creditors or other innocent parties to be protected through proceedings by the corporation. * * *

UNITED STATES LINES, Inc., et al. v. UNITED STATES LINES CO. et al.

CHAPMAN v. INTERNATIONAL MERCANTILE MARINE CO. et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Second Circuit, 1938. 96 F.2d 148.

Suit by the United States Lines, Inc., on behalf of itself and all other stockholders of the United States Lines Company similarly situated, against the latter company and others to assert claims of defendant corporation against the International Mercantile Marine Company and others, compel accounting by various defendants for certain payments and charges, and allow a dividend on complainant's junior preferred stock in the United States Lines Company. From orders denying petitions by Theodore S. Chapman for leave to prosecute the suit on behalf of complainant, denying his motion to enjoin discontinuance of the suit and discontinuing it, petitioner appeals.

Order of discontinuance reversed, appeals from order denying petition for leave to prosecute suit, and motion to enjoin discontinuance thereof dismissed, orders denying second petition for leave to prosecute and discontinuing suit reversed, and suit remanded to the District Court, with directions.

AUGUSTUS N. HAND, CIRCUIT JUDGE. The defendant United States Lines Company has been engaged since on or about December 8, 1931, in the business of owning and operating a transatlantic line of steamers which had been operated prior to that date by the complainant United States Lines, Inc. In February, 1934, United States Lines, Inc., brought a derivative stockholders' suit against United States Lines Company to assert claims that the latter corporation is said to have had against International Mercantile Marine Company, the American Lines Company, and the Roosevelt Steamship Company, Inc. (corporations which International controlled through stock ownership), against the Tide Water Oil Company, and also against various officers and directors of the corporate defendants other than Tide Water Oil Company. The derivative suit was based upon the ownership by United States Lines, Inc., of 600,000 shares of convertible junior preferred stock of United States Lines Company, which was the sole asset of United States Lines, Inc.

The complainant in the derivative suit by United States Lines, Inc., alleged the right of the United States Lines Company to recover several millions of dollars from the International Mercantile Marine Company and the corporations which it controlled, as well as from the individual defendants. The interests which obtained control of the United States Lines, Inc., made an attempt (hereinafter described) to have the derivative suit abandoned. In opposition to this attempt one of the counsel who had filed the bill and had been prosecuting the suit submitted an affidavit setting forth the nature and extent of the claims of the United States Lines Company against the other defendants herein. He stated that by means of the control of International Mercantile Marine Company over United States Lines Company (1) the latter had improperly agreed to pay the Roosevelt Steamship Company, Inc., an excessive management commission of 7-1/2 per cent., amounting to $696,429.78 for the year 1932 and to larger sums for each of the succeeding years; (2) that the United States Lines Company had entered into a contract with the Tide Water Oil Company to purchase quantities of oil from the latter at a cost of $75,000 more per year (amounting altogether to $600,000) than the price offered for similar oil by the Gulf Refining Company and had paid such excessive amounts to Tide Water; (3) that the United States Lines Company had made payments aggregating $300,- 000 for services not properly chargeable to it; (4) that excessive depreciation had been charged against the property of United States Lines Company to the amount of $800,000 per annum, thus impairing the dividend possibilities of the convertible junior preferred stock owned by United States Lines, Inc. The complaint prayed that the various defendants connected with the above payments and charges should account for the same and that a dividend of 37-1/2 cents should be decreed to the holder of the junior preferred stock. Answers were interposed by the defendants denying all liability. * * *

It is evident from the foregoing that the International Mercantile Marine Company in the year 1935 became in control of United States Lines, Inc., through the transfer of the latter's stock by the Chemical Bank, and had prior to that time come into control of United States Lines Company.

On October 5, 1935, the board of directors of United States Lines, Inc., instructed its attorneys in the derivative stockholders' suit to take no action and to incur no further expense in connection with the prosecution of the suit until receiving further instructions. J. V. Bendus, one of the directors of United States Lines, Inc., who was not a defendant in the suit or a director of any of the corporate defendants sued therein, but a holder of preference stock of United States Lines, Inc., notified the attorneys to disregard the instructions of its board of directors and to proceed vigorously with the prosecution of the suit. At about the same time the petitioner, Theodore S. Chapman, a brother of P. W. Chapman and an owner of 2,000 shares of preference stock of United States Lines, Inc. filed a petition, setting forth the attempt of those in control of the latter company to prevent the prosecution of the suit against them and their corporations and praying that he might be authorized to prosecute the suit at his own expense in the name of United States Lines, Inc., and that its directors should be enjoined from interfering with such prosecution and for other and further relief. Upon the petition and the affidavits submitted in support of and in opposition to the same, Judge Knox denied the application with leave to renew.

On June 12, 1936, Theodore S. Chapman renewed his application for leave to continue the derivative suit of United States Lines, Inc. The defendants opposed his petition by showing that on March 10, 1936, the stockholders of United States Lines, Inc., had held an annual meeting at which Mr. Bendus was appointed chairman of a committee to examine and report to the stockholders at an adjourned meeting regarding the disposition of the derivative suit. He was, by resolution, authorized to appoint two associates as members of such committee from among the minority preference stockholders who were not interested as defendants in the suit. The committee thus constituted consisted of three disinterested preference stockholders. After the investigation of the Bendus committee, and in conformity with its recommendation, the stockholders voted at an adjourned meeting of the corporation held on June 5, 1936, that the derivative suit should be discontinued and that, upon such discontinuance, the United States Lines, Inc., should give to each of the holders of the 600,000 shares of preference stock of that company the opportunity to exchange their preference stock, share for share, with an equal number of shares of the junior preferred stock of United States Lines Company; that such exchange should be without expense to the stockholders (other than International Mercantile Marine Company) of United States Lines, Inc., for state and federal transfer taxes, or for corporate fees, counsel fees, and costs of notification to the stockholders, such expense to be borne by one or more of the defendants in the derivative suit. The expenses for corporate fees and counsel fees were stated by appellees to amount to about $40,000. The further expenses connected with the proposed exchange of stock were estimated by them at some $24,000 more.

The second application of Theodore S. Chapman for leave to prosecute the derivative suit at his own expense and to enjoin discontinuance was denied by Judge Bondy on October 5, 1936, who on April 8, 1937, made an order discontinuing the suit.

The vote of the stockholders' meeting which approved the settlement of the derivative suit recommended by the Bendus committee was as follows:

Vote for the settlement: 915,000 shares of the common stock, of which the total issue was 1,000,000 shares; 347,586 shares of the preference stock, of which the total issue was 600,000 shares.

Vote against the settlement: 3,550 shares of the preference stock.

Theodore S. Chapman contends that the votes upon the 915,000 shares of common and the 330,442 shares of preference stock of United States Lines, Inc., owned by International Mercantile Marine Company, the votes upon the 4,571 shares of preference owned by United States Lines Company, upon the 1,000 shares of preference owned by P. A. S. Franklin, upon the 3,500 shares of preference owned by Cletus Keating, upon the 3,460 shares of preference owned by or represented by A. P. Palmer, the secretary of International as proxy, and upon the 25 shares of preference owned by R. M. Hicks, the treasurer of International, ought not to be counted in determining whether the report of the Bendus committee was properly adopted for the reason that they were within the control of International Mercantile Marine Company against which the suit was brought, or in any event belonged to persons closely connected with it or its affiliates. But, if the votes of preference stock which are challenged be disregarded, nevertheless those of owners of that stock who were in no way connected with the defendants against whom charges were made in the suit would stand 4,456 in favor of the settlement recommended by the disinterested committee and 3,550 only against it. On no theory can we see any objection to counting the votes of 1,670 shares cast for the settlement by members of the Bendus committee when tabulating the votes.

The justification for allowing a double derivative suit like the present to be maintained is that both the original corporation that is said to have suffered wrong and its shareholder corporation which had the right to bring a derivative suit were in the control of those charged with inflicting the corporate injury. No attempt was made to extinguish any claim which United States Lines Company had against the alleged wrongdoers but only to abate the derivative suit and to bar Theodore S. Chapman from prosecuting it even though he offered to do so at his own expense. There is no way of estimating the value of the claims and no attempt has been made to settle them but only to settle the derivative suit by paying the debts of the United States Lines, Inc., estimated at $40,000 at most and by paying the expense of distributing the assets of the latter corporation; namely, 600,000 shares of junior preferred stock of United States Lines, Inc. The proposal of the defendants to pay the expenses of exchanging the preference stock of United States Lines, Inc., for the junior preferred shares of United States Lines Company would benefit neither corporation but only eliminate a holding company from the picture. There is no showing that the creditors of United States Lines, Inc., propose to seize its only asset on execution or that the 600,000 shares of junior preferred stock will have any value unless the assets of United States Lines Company can be augmented by some realization upon the claims against the defendants. While the suit which has been brought seems highly speculative, yet the claims asserted run into millions and we are not satisfied that the value of the consideration offered for the discontinuance is sufficient to justify the order of the court below, especially when the discontinuance would apparently still leave Chapman free to institute another derivative suit as soon as he became a stockholder of United States Lines Company. Inasmuch as there are charges, however unjust they may be, that the corporate defendants appropriated moneys which should inure to the benefit of United States Lines Company, we think Chapman ought to be given his day in court, provided he conducts the proceeding at his own expense and shall receive indemnity only from any recovery realized through the suit and only then to a reasonable amount. As we have said, no consideration was offered to the United States Lines Company for the abandonment of the suit and its claims have not been extinguished. Under the circumstances, to require the discontinuance of the derivative suit for a relatively small consideration, when the claims sought to be asserted through it are enormous, does not seem justifiable. The settlement recommended by the committee did not involve any consideration moving to the company wronged, nor did their report indicate that they had investigated the claims for appropriation of assets arising out of the alleged overcharges and found them worthless or unsubstantial. The settlement accomplished little more than to block a proceeding by a persistent stockholder who sought to have claims of United States Lines Company against the defendants asserted when both it and United States Lines, Inc., were under their control.

We do not say that the stock owned by the defendants could not be voted in favor of the settlement, but hold that the settlement effected by a majority consisting mainly of the defendants who were in control of the corporation should not be sanctioned without clear proof that it was advantageus to the corporation and its stockholders. We are not satisfied that such proof has been furnished by the defendants. Heim v. Jobes, 8 Cir., 14 F.2d 29, 32; Geddes v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., D.C., 197 F. 860, 865; Eagle Iron Co. v.

Colyar, 5 Cir., 156 F. 954; Mumford v. Ecuador Development Co., C.C., 111 F. 639, 643.

The order of discontinuance should be reversed and vacated and the intervener Chapman should be authorized to prosecute the suit in the name of United States Lines, Inc., but at his own expense, with a right to reasonable indemnity out of any recoveries which may be realized by the United States Lines Company through the prosecution of the suit, and other stockholders of United States Lines, Inc., should have the right to apply to the District Court for leave to join Chapman in such prosecution provided they are willing to contribute. The District Court may dismiss the suit at any time if it is shown that Chapman is not prosecuting it diligently.

The appeals from the order of Judge Knox denying Chapman's right to prosecute with leave to renew, and from the order of Judge Bondy denying the motion to enjoin the discontinuance of the suit, are dismissed because the decisions are now moot. The appeals from the orders of Judge Bondy denying leave to prosecute and discontinuing the suit are reversed. The suit is remanded to the District Court, with directions to proceed therein in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion. The appellant is allowed costs of the appeal.

2. WHERE DIRECTORS OR CORPORATION DEEM ACTION INEXPEDIENT

CONTINENTAL SECURITIES COMPANY et al. v. BELMONT et al.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1912. 206 N.Y. 7, 99 N.E. 138.

Action by the Continental Securities Company and Clarence H. Venner, stockholders in the Interborough Rapid Transit Company, on behalf of themselves and of other stockholders similarly situated, and on behalf of the company against August Belmont and others, impleaded with the Interborough Rapid Transit Company. From an order of the Appellate Division (134 N.Y.S. 635) affirming an order denying a motion by certain of the defendants for judgment upon the pleadings, defendants, other than the Interborough Rapid Transit Company, appeal by permission. Order affirmed, and certified questions answered in the affirmative.

CHASE, J. This is a representative action derived from the Interborough Rapid Transit Company. It is brought in behalf of the plaintiffs and all others similarly interested, as stockholders of said company, against the directors of said company and said company to require said individual defendants to account to said company for fifteen thousand shares of its capital stock, alleged to have been issued fraudulently and illegally, and without any valid or adequate consideration therefor, but upon an alleged consideration that was a pretense and subterfuge and intended to cover a gift or bonus to the defendants Belmont and Luttgen, and their nominees, and also to require said individual defendants to account for the dividends which have been paid on said stock. It is alleged that by reason of the facts set forth in the complaint the defendant corporation has suffered damage to an amount exceeding $4,500,000. Each of the defendants answered the complaint, and, after the answers were interposed, a motion was made for judgment upon the pleadings dismissing the complaint pursuant to section 547 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which motion was denied. An appeal was taken therefrom to the Appellate Division, where the order denying said motion was unanimously affirmed. Leave was granted by the Appellate Division to the defendants, other than the defendant company, to appeal to this court, and the following questions were certified:

"(1) Does the complaint state a cause of action?

"(2) Was the motion of the defendants for judgment against the plaintiffs on the pleadings rightfully denied?" * * * It appears from the complaint that each of the plaintiffs purchased his stock subsequently to the transactions complained of in the complaint. This court in the recent case of Pollitz v. Gould, 202 N.Y. 11, 94 N.E. 1088, has definitely determined that a stockholder may bring an action in behalf of the corporation for the benefit of himself and all other stockholders to set aside as fraudulent an improper transaction consummated at the expense of the corporation before he acquired his stock. * * *

It was not necessary for the plaintiffs to allege in the complaint that their predecessors in title did not assent to or acquiesce in the alleged fraudulent issue of said 15,000 shares of stock. It is not necessary to negative such assent or acquiescence in a fraud, unless it is otherwise to be presumed from the delay in bringing the action or generally from the allegations of the complaint. If it exists, it is a matter of defense. Sage v. Culver, 147 N.Y. 241, 41 N.E. 513; Pollitz v. Gould, supra. If the rule were otherwise, the objection to the complaint would not avail the defendants in this case because the allegations of the complaint amount to a negative of any assent by the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title to the transactions alleged in the complaint.

It is also claimed by the appellants that it does not appear from the complaint that the defendant corporation and its board of directors were requested to bring suit to recover said fifteen thousand shares of stock or the value thereof, or that said corporation or said board of directors neglected or refused to bring such action. It appears from the complaint that on the 12th day of March, 1910, the plaintiff corporation, then being the owner of the stock now owned by the two plaintiffs, delivered to the defendant corporation and to its officers and directors a written communication directed to said defendant corporation and its president and directors, calling attention to the fact of the issue and delivery of said 15,000 shares of capital stock for a grossly inadequate and illegal consideration, and requesting and demanding that suit be brought in behalf of the corporation and in good faith prosecuted against the incorporators of said company and members of its board of directors during the year 1902 and said firm of August Belmont & Co. to recover the damages suffered by reason of the action of the said incorporators and directors.

Said written communication also stated and provided as follows: "We hereby offer to properly indemnify the Interborough Rapid Transit Company against any damage or costs it may sustain as a result of bringing and prosecuting such suit. A copy of this letter is mailed to each director of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company. Unless within ten days from date you advise us that the request and demand herein will be complied with we shall conclude that you refuse." Thereafter the plaintiffs waited until May 4, 1910, when, no action having been commenced and no response having been made to said written communication, this action was commenced.

Upon the facts so alleged the plaintiffs treated the defendant corporation and its board of directors as having refused and neglected to bring such action and the allegations relating thereto are sufficient to sustain the complaint. Kavanaugh v. Commonwealth Trust Co., 103 App.Div. 95, 92 N.Y.S. 543.

On this appeal as on the motion at the Special Term and on the hearing of the appeal in the Appellate Division the allegations of the complaint are taken as true.

It is conceded that an action in equity cannot be maintained by the plaintiffs as individual stockholders for themselves and all others similarly interested, unless it is necessary because of the neglect and refusal of the corporate body to act.

It is necessary, therefore, in an action by the plaintiffs to set forth two things: First, a cause of action in favor of the corporation with the same detail of facts as would be proper in case the corporation itself had brought the action; second, the facts which entitle the plaintiff to maintain the action in place of the corporation. Kavanaugh v. Commonwealth Trust Co., 181 N.Y. 121, 73 N.E. 562; O'Connor v. Virginia Passenger & Power Co., 184 N.Y. 46, 76 N.E. 1082. It is not seriously contended that the complaint does not state a good cause of action in favor of the defendant corporation. It is insisted by the defendants that it was necessary for the plaintiffs, in addition to alleging a demand upon the defendant corporation and its board of directors to bring the action and their neglect and refusal to do so, to allege that they had given notice of the alleged fraud to the body of stockholders of the defendant corporation, and had demanded of said stockholders that some action be taken by them to redress the wrong, and that such body of stockholders had neglected and refused to take any action relating thereto. The cause of action belongs to the corporate body and not to the plaintiffs and other stockholders individually, nor to the body of stockholders collectively.

The board of directors represents the corporate body. It is provided by statute in this state that the affairs of every corporation shall be managed by its board of directors. * * *

The claim of the appellants that the body of stockholders has some immediate or direct authority to act for the corporation or to control the board of directors in the matters set forth in the complaint is based upon an erroneous conception of the duties and powers of the body of stockholders in this state.

As a general rule, stockholders cannot act in relation to the ordinary business of a corporation. The body of stockholders have certain authority conferred by statute which must be exercised to enable the corporation to act in specific cases, but except for certain authority conferred by statute, which is mainly permissive or confirmatory, such as consenting to the mortgage, lease, or sale of real property of the corporation, they have no express power given by statute. They are not by any statute in this state given general power of initiative in corporate affairs. Any action by them relating to the details of the corporate business is necessarily in the form of an assent, request, or recommendation. Recommendations by a body of stockholders can only be enforced through the board of directors, and indirectly by the authority of the stockholders to change the personnel of the directors at a meeting for the election of directors. * * * Some of the reasons why the power vested in stockholders to elect directors is inadequate as a remedy for specific fraudulent acts are stated by Cook in his work on Stock and Stockholders, § 740, in which he says: "There has been considerable discussion as to whether the stockholder in addition to his request to the corporate officers to institute the suit should not also be required to attempt to induce the stockholders in meeting assembled to take action by directing the directors to bring suit, or by refusing to re-elect them at the next election. The facts, however, that the stockholders in meeting assembled cannot control the discretion of the directors in bringing such a suit, that the remedy of refusing to re-elect them involves delay, and the assumption that a minority of the stockholders can by the election control such a suit, that irreparable injury or the vesting of great financial interests may occur in the meantime, and that laches may arise as a bar to the stockholder's suit, have settled the rule that the stockholder's request to the corporate directors to institute the suit is sufficient. He need not also apply to a stockholder's meeting. * * * Although it is said that the authority of stockholders in the management of business corporations is exhausted when they elect the directors (Thompson on Corporations [2d Ed.] § 1178), nevertheless it is generally recognized that certain acts of boards of directors that are legal, but voidable, can be ratified and confirmed by a majority of the body of stockholders as the ultimate parties in interest and thus make them binding upon the corporation. Morawetz on Corporations (2d Ed.) §§ 625, 626. Such recognized authority in stockholders to ratify and confirm the acts of boards of directors is confined to acts voidable by reason of irregularities in the make-up of the board or otherwise or by reason of the directors or some of them being personally interested in the subject-matter of the contract or act, or for some other similar reason which makes the action of the directors voidable. No such authority exists in case of an act of the board of directors which is prohibited by law or which is against public policy. Kent v. Quicksilver Mining Co., 78 N.Y. 159.'

In any case where action is taken by stockholders confirming and ratifying a fraud and misapplication of the funds of the corporation by the directors or others the action is binding only by way of estoppel upon such stockholders as vote in favor of such approval. Morawetz on Corporations (2d Ed.) § 625. The distinction between acts that can and those that cannot be confirmed and ratified is shown in the report of two frequently cited English decisions, namely, Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461, and Bagshaw v. Eastern Union Railway Co., 7 Hare, 114. The former of these cases was limited to the approval of a legal but voidable act. In the Bagshaw Case, where the directors of a corporation had misapplied or were about to misapply certain moneys of the corporation, the court say: "No majority of the shareholders, however large, could sanction the misapplication of this portion of the capital. A single dissenting voice would frustrate the wishes of the majority. Indeed, in strictness, even unanimity would not make the act lawful. This appears to me to take it out of the case of Foss v. Harbottle, to which I was referred. That case does not, I apprehend, upon this point, go further than this: That if the act, though it be the act of the directors only, be one which a general meeting of the company could sanction, a bill by some of the shareholders on behalf of themselves and others, to impeach that act, cannot be sustained, because a general meeting of the company might immediately confirm and give validity to the act of which the bill complains."

It is the governing body or bodies of a corporation with power to enforce a remedy to whom complaining stockholders must go with their demand for relief. The governing body of corporations in this state, as we have seen, is the board of directors. A complaining stockholder must go to such board for relief before he can bring an action, unless it clearly appears by the complaint that such application is useless. If the subject-matter of the stockholder's complaint is for any reason within the immediate control, direction, or power of confirmation of the body of stockholders, it should be brought to the attention of such stockholders for action, before an action is commenced by a stockholder unless it clearly appears by the complaint that such application is useless. The decision reported in Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U.S. 450, 26 L.Ed. 827, and other similar decisions in the federal and state courts are not in conflict with the decision about to be rendered herein. In such cases, as in this case, it is asserted that an application to the body of stockholders is unnecessary when it is unreasonable to require it. If the body of stockholders has no adequate power or authority to remedy the wrong asserted by the individual stockholders, it is unreasonable and unnecessary to require an application to it to redress the wrong before bringing a representative action. See opinion of Carr, J., in the Appellate Division herein (Sup.) 134 N.Y.S. 635. See, also, Delaware & H. Co. v. Albany & S. R. R. Co., 213 U.S. 435, 29 S.Ct. 540, 53 L.Ed. 862. In this case, where the plaintiff alleges fraud and a substantial misappropriation of 15,000 shares of the stock of the corporation through a nominal purchase of property and the payment of a pretended claim for services, application to the body of stockholders was not necessary. * * *

Order affirmed.

GROEL v. UNITED ELECTRIC COMPANY OF NEW JERSEY et al.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1905. 70 N.J.Eq. 616, 61 A. 1061.

Suit by Adam H. Groel against the United Electric Company of New Jersey and others for an accounting by the United Gas Improvement Company, as promoter of the United Electric Company, etc. Plea overruled.

GARRISON, V. C. * * * The single point is whether a board of directors may prohibit a stockholder from bringing a suit in behalf of the corporation to recover moneys secretly made by a promoter out of the incorporation of the company, if in the judgment of the board it is inexpedient to bring such a suit.

There can be no question that promoters are liable to the corporation for profits secretly made by them in its promotion, and that such liability arises in cases where future allottees of stock are concerned. Knoop v. Bohmrich, 49 N.J.Eq. 82, 23 A. 118 (Van Fleet, V. C.; 1891); Plaquemines Trop. Fruit Co. v. Buck, 52 N.J.Eq. 219, 27 A. 1094 (Green, V. C.; 1893); Loudenslager v. Woodbury Heights Land Imp. Co. (Err. & App. 1899) 58 N.J.Eq. 556, 43 A. 671, affirming the principle established in the Court of Chancery in 55 N.J.Eq. 78, 35 A. 436 (Pitney, V. C.; 1896). There can be likewise no question that, where the corporation refuses to bring a suit, stockholders may sue in its behalf, joining it as a defendant. It is true that courts will not interfere, as a rule, with the management of corporations by the directors thereof, when they are acting within their powers and in good faith. But whether the directors are acting in good faith and as honest, diligent trustees, or not, will be inquired into by the courts at the instance of stockholders in cases like the present. "A stockholder has no standing in the court to prosecute such an action, except on the refusal of the directors, either actual or presumptive, to prosecute. But such refusal of the directors to prosecute must be an unjustifiable refusal." Willoughby v. Chicago Junc. Railways Co., 50 N.J.Eq., at page 667, 25 A. 280 (Green, V. C.; 1892).

In discussing those cases in which no application need be made, our Court of Errors and Appeals has held that the suit may be maintained without any application where the interest or bias of the directors makes it certain that, if it was made, it would be denied. Appleton v. American Malting Co. (Err. & App. 1903) 65 N.J.Eq., at page 377, 54 A. 455. In the case of Kessler v. Ensley (C. C.) 129 F. 397, at page 400, the court said: "Of necessity, then, the governing body in every intra vires matter has a discretion to determine what action to take on the stockholder's request to sue; and when the stockholder comes into court the first question it must determine is whether that discretion has been properly or improperly exercised." The Supreme Court of the United States reviewed the previous decisions concerning this matter, and announced the true rule, in the case of Corbus v. Alaska Treadwell Gold Mining Co., 187 U.S. 455, 23 S.Ct. 157, 47 L.Ed. 256. "This court will examine the bill in its entirety and determine whether, under all the circumstances, the plaintiff has made such a showing of wrong on the part of the corporation or its officers and injury to himself as will justify the suit." And it likewise quoted with approval the following language: "The circumstances of each case must determine the jurisdiction of a court of equity to give the relief sought."

Viewing this case in the light of the principles which must be applied to it, and of the authorities which have been quoted, can it be said that the directors have shown justification for refusing to bring a suit to recover approximately $20,000,000 of stock improperly obtained by a promoter? Would it not clearly be held by any court to be a breach of trust for directors to neglect or refuse to recover, or seek to recover, such an amount of stock improperly obtained from it by a promoter? It is perfectly clear that, if the complainant sets forth a good cause of action and there is a right in the corporation to recover $20,000,000 of stock from the promoter, it is a clear breach of trust on the part of the directors not to proceed to recover the same. For them to reply that it is by them deemed inexpedient to do so is only to emphasize the breach of trust they are committing by not doing so. I am aware that counsel for the defendant argues that their unwillingness to bring the suit, and that which in their judgment makes it inexpedient to bring the suit, proceeds from their view that the suit cannot succeed. I think I have sufficiently expressed my idea that this issue is not present before me for determination. If, on the face of the bill, it appears that the complainant cannot succeed, then demurrer is the proper remedy. If the bill, however, does set up a good cause of action, then, as I have already pointed out, the plea does not set up any other facts excepting the passage by the directors of a resolution refusing to bring the suit because in their judgment inexpedient.

There was much argument before me upon issues which I do not find in the case; the defendant contending that it had sufficiently shown that the suit ought not to be brought because it could not be successful, and the complainant replying that the statements in the report of the committee, as incorporated into the plea, show clearly that there is a cause of action, and that the defendant has not, on the merits, shown any reason why the suit should not be brought. I do not stop to consider these questions for the reasons given. I find that the complainant sets out a cause of action, and that the defendant replies by plea that it deems it inexpedient to bring a suit for this cause of action, and that the complainant, its stockholder, is precluded by reason of this fact. I find that the principle to be applied is that the stockholder may appeal to the discretion of the court in this respect; and, upon considering the whole case, I do not think it appears that the defendant was justified in refusing to bring the suit, with the result that the complainant may proceed, and the plea must be overruled. * * * I will advise an order overruling the plea.

3. EQUITABLE CONTROL OF DERIVATIVE AND CLASS ACTIONS

(a) Settlement

CLARKE v. GREENBERG et al.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1947. 296 N.Y. 146, 71 N.E.2d 443.

Action by Stanley Clarke, as trustee of Associated Gas & Electric Company, against Adolph Greenberg and others to recover amount received by defendants in settlement of a stockholder's derivative action brought by defendants. From a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, 270 App.Div. 923, 62 N.Y.S.2d 609, entered May 17, 1946, unanimously affirming a judgment of the Supreme Court for defendants entered upon an order of the court at Special Term (Levy J.) which granted a motion by defendants for dismissal of the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed in accordance with the opinion.

DYE, JUDGE. The challenge to the within complaint, for failure to state a cause of action, raises the question of whether a plaintiff in a stockholder's derivative action may be required to account to the corporation for moneys received in private settlement for discontinuance of the action.

The complaint alleges that the defendants commenced a stockholder's derivative action in behalf of the Associated Gas & Electric Company (called AGECO) entitled "Greenberg v. Mange et al." in which it was alleged that the defendants, as officers and directors, had so mismanaged its affairs that the company and its stockholders were damaged and prayed that an accounting be had, and that the court "impress a trust in favor of the Company (AGECO) upon all secret profits and gains obtained by any of the defendant directors," etc. No individual relief was asked except reimbursement for expenses. Later and before trial, a stipulation was made settling and discontinuing the action without notice to other stockholders and without approval of the court, by the terms of which Greenberg excuted releases in his individual and representative capacity and transferred and delivered his stock, having a market value of $51.88, to the defendant directors and defendants herein received from them the sum of $9,000.

The complaint in this action alleges that the defendants received the money "to the use of, and in trust for AGECO"; that they had failed to account to it or its trustee, the plaintiff herein, and had accordingly unjustly enriched themselves in the sum of $8,948.12 which, in equity, should be paid over to the plaintiff, and prayed judgment accordingly.

The Appellate Division unanimously affirmed the dismissal of the complaint by the Special Term which relied upon Manufacturers Mutual Fire Ins. Co. of Rhode Island v. Hopson, 176 Misc. 220, 25 N.Y.S.2d 502, affirmed 262 App.Div. 731, 29 N.Y.S.2d 139, affirmed 288 N.Y. 668, 43 N.E.2d 71 in which we refused to set aside a stipulation settling a stockholder's derivative suit and revive the action. That case was limited to the right to discontinue and it did not consider whether the moneys received in settlement were impressed with a trust in favor of the corporation for which an accounting should be made.

The very nature of the derivative suit by a stockholder-plaintiff suing in the corporation's behalf suggests the application of the fiduciary principle to the proceeds realized from such litigation whether received by way of judgment, by settlement with approval of the court, which presupposes stockholders approval, or by private settlement and discontinuance of the action at any stage of the proceeding. Such action, we have held, belongs primarily to the corporation, the real party in interest [Citing cases.] and a judgment so obtained, as well as the proceeds of a settlement with court approval belongs to it and not the individual stockholder plaintiffs. [Citing cases.] While the stockholder-plaintiff, with such others as join with him, controls the course of the litigation at all stages of the proceeding before final judgment, he does not bind the nonparticipating stockholders by his action, or deprive them of their own right of action against the unfaithful directors, nor is he subject to their interference. [Citing cases.] When, however, success crowns his effort, the amount received is in behalf and for the account of the corporation. This is so because the action belongs primarily to it. The manner and method by which such success is accomplished whether by way of judgment, settlement with court approval or by stipulation of the parties, makes no substantial difference in the interest of the corporation upon distribution of the proceeds. Requiring an accounting for moneys received in a private settlement introduces no new element. It simply amounts to a logical application of a fundamental principle inherent in the representative relation. When one assumes to act for another, regardless of the manner or method used in accomplishing a successful termination, he should willingly account for his stewardship. The plaintiff-stockholder, in good conscience, should not be allowed to retain the proceeds of a derivative suit discontinued by stipulation, to his individual use, in opposition to the corporation, any more than the proceeds of a judgment or a settlement with court approval.

The complaint, we believe, states a cause of action.

The judgments should be reversed and the motion to dismiss the complaint denied, with costs in all courts.

MAY v. MIDWEST REFINING COMPANY et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, First Circuit, 1941. 121 F.2d 431.

[This is a suit in equity brought by a minority stockholder. Plaintiff owned 50 shares in the Midwest Refining Company, a Maine corporation, owned and controlled by Standard Oil Company of Indiana, who held 99.96% of all its outstanding shares. In 1932, at a stockholders meeting of Midwest all but 102 shares, of which 50 were owned by plaintiff, voted to sell its properties and assets to Standard Oil and Stanolind Oil and Gas Company, a Delaware subsidiary of Standard Oil. The conveyances were made and shortly thereafter plaintiff filed his bill for rescission and an accounting on the ground that Standard Oil, as majority stockholder of Midwest, was its trustee, rendering the sale void under Maine law, which prohibits a trustee from buying property he holds in trust. In answer to plaintiff's demand for relief, defendant Standard Oil filed a special motion, which stated: it had bought all but 62 of the 102 shares voting against the sale; of these 62 shares, 12 were owned by a stockholder who had his stock valued under the Maine valuation statute; since plaintiff failed to comply with that statute he is not entitled to have the sale set aside; his interest amounts to $80.12 for each million dollars which might be found due under plaintiff's bill. Therefore, as he is the sole stockholder seeking any relief, they offer to pay plaintiff his full share of any amounts he might recover under his bill plus costs and counsel fees. The District Court granted defendants' motion and plaintiff appeals on the ground that he is entitled to have the sale rescinded because (a) it was void, (b) it was in breach of trust.]

WOODBURY, CIRCUIT JUDGE. * * * We come now to a consideration of the plaintiff's allegations with respect to the transactions of the Standard Oil Company with the Midwest Refining Company before the sale of the latter's property and assets. The defendants contend that they are entitled to have the plaintiff's bill dismissed upon payment to him in money of all that he personally would be able to recover in the event that in a trial upon the merits he should succeed in establishing all of the above allegations of his bill. The amount of his maximum possible recovery under these allegations has been agreed upon, and that sum has been paid into court for his benefit. The plaintiff takes the position that, since suits of this sort are in behalf of or in the right of the corporation, relief or payment should not run to him personally but to the corporation so that he and all other stockholders similarly situated may share therein derivatively.

While it is true that the plaintiff's suit is derivative, and while it is true that it is also representative in that other stockholders similarly situated are entitled to share in the proceeds thereof, (for this reason relief in suits of this sort ordinarily, although not universally (Joyce v. Congdon, 114 Wash. 239, 195 P. 29; 41 Col. Law Rev., 405, 416 and cases cited in footnote 78), runs to the corporation in whose behalf suit is brought) it is also true "that every suit in a derivative capacity necessarily includes a suit in an individual capacity as well." Col. Law Rev., supra. Thus the plaintiff is acting a dual role. He is suing on behalf of his corporation to redress a wrong allegedly done to it, and he is also suing on his own right as a stockholder to redress a wrong which he alleges that he, himself, has sustained by reason of his stock ownership. In the latter role he "may continue, compromise, abandon or discontinue it (the suit) at his pleasure until a stockholder similarly situated has procured an order to be made a party". 3 Cook on Corporations, 8th Ed., § 748, cited with approval in Johnson v. King-Richardson Co., 1 Cir., 36 F.2d 675, 67 A.L.R. 1465. See also, 41 Col. Law Rev., supra. But no other stockholder has sought to intervene, if there are any still in a position to do so, and thus the plaintiff's control over the litigation remains unimpaired and he can still at any time he wishes settle the case and dismiss his bill. In view of this and of the fact that, as appears above, equitable relief is inappropriate, we see no reason why the plaintiff's bill should not be ordered dismissed upon a voluntary payment to him in money of all the damages which he admits that he could possibly recover under the allegations contained therein. In short, from the plaintiff's power to dismiss his suit at will, follows the power of the court under the circumstances of this particular case, to decree a dismissal of the plaintiff's bill upon payment in full of all of his individual damages.[1] * * *

KEENAN v. ESHLEMAN et al.

Supreme Court of Delaware, 1938. 23 Del.Ch. 234, 2 A.2d 904.

LAYTON, CHIEF JUSTICE. * * * Finally the appellants contend that the recovery decreed by the Court below should have been limited to those stockholders who had not acquiesced in, ratified, approved and confirmed the wrongful acts complained of. The question was first suggested by the Chancellor in his opinion reported in Del.Ch., 187 A. 25: whether ratification by a majority of the stockholders, while not sufficient to bar a remedy to the minority, may yet be shown for the purpose of confining the relief of the decree to the dissentients only. In his opinion reported in Del.Ch., 194 A. 40, the question was posed as follows [page 42]: "should the defendants pay to the corporation the full amount of restitution, or should they only pay to the complainants individually the pro rata amount of the recoverable sum which the proportion of their shares bears to the total number of shares outstanding?" He observed that the bill was filed on behalf of the corporation; that the relief sought was in redress of a wrong to the corporation; and that if the recoverable amount should be reduced to a sum sufficient to recompense only the dissentient stockholders and should be decreed to be paid to those of them asserting their claim, the suit would be transformed by the decree to one seeking an individual redress from one asserting a corporate claim; that the only theory upon which this case could be justified was that as the corporation's claim against the officers was a part of its assets, and that as the assets were derivatively the property of the stockholders, it must follow that if the complainants and others in like situations should be paid this aliquot part of the recovery, they would be fully compensated; that this view treats the recovery as an asset available for dividends immediately to be distributed; and that as some of the stockholders had by their votes waived their rights to their share of the dividends, payment should be decreed only to the dissenting stockholders. After reviewing the cases, the court below disapproved entirely of the theory of such decree in the circumstances presented, and ordered restitution in full to be made to the corporation. The appellants assign this as error, and urge that, within the principles of remedial equity, adequate redress of the wrong would be accomplished by a decree awarding to the dissentients an aliquot part of the recovery; and they offer certain authorities in support of their contention. * * *

The question is whether ratification of fraudulent acts by a majority of the stockholders enures to the benefit of the defendants to the extent that the decree against them should be in such amount as to redress the wrong suffered by the dissenting stockholders by causing to be paid to them a dividend of the recoverable amount measured by their stock holdings. The answer must be in the negative. In the first place, it does not appear that the financial position of the company was such as to permit the disbursement of the recoverable amount as a dividend. The misappropriations were a fraud on Sanitary, acts which the directors could not have authorized, and which the stockholders could not ratify. To allow the defendants to retain a part of the misappropriations in proportion to the stock interest of the ratifying stockholders would be to permit ratification of illegal acts to that extent. In the circumstances it was ultra vires the corporation, its directors and stockholders, to make donations of corporate assets. In effect, to allow the defendants to retain a part of their unlawful gains would constitute a gift. The action here was a derivative one, brought on behalf of the corporation, and the complaint and the defenses are to be considered as though the corporation itself were suing the defendants. If such were the action, releases to the individual defendants by one or more stockholders would be without legal effect, and in a derivative suit, such as this, releases, ratifications or waivers are equally ineffective. To permit the recovery to be diminished by an amount in proportion to the stock holdings of the ratifying stockholders would tend to encourage fraud; the effect would be to transform, by molding the decree, a derivative action into one for the benefit of the individual; and would not accord with the theory of the complaint, the prayer for relief, or the inherent nature of the wrong sought to be redressed. It would tend to weaken, if not to destroy, the efficacy of a stockholder's action to correct a corporate wrong; and would compel the complaining stockholder to accept that for which he had not sued.

It is true that the benefit of an action brought by a corporation, or a derivative action on its behalf, necessarily results to all of the shareholders equally, even when some of them have been wrongdoers, or have by acquiescence, or ratification, forfeited their equitable claims to redress; but the best method to work out the rights of the parties in a case of this kind is to preserve the fiction of corporate entity. If the misappropriation is to be regarded as a fund for a dividend in which the dissenting stockholders are to share, the result is a subterfuge, and in most cases, violative of equity. It is an old saying that one should be just before being generous, and this common sense truth is especially applicable to stockholders who, for one reason or another, are willing to condone a wrong done to their corporation and themselves. They cannot be generous with the corporation's money. They, of course, may be as generous as they please when the money has become their own.

While there may be exceptional cases, as for example, Bailey v. Jacobs, supra, and Matthews v. Headley Chocolate Co., supra, where remedial equity is satisfied by allowing a recovery in an amount sufficient to satisfy non-assenting stockholders measured by their stock holdings, we are of opinion that, generally, where the action is a derivative one, brought for the benefit of a going corporation, equitable principles demand that the theory of the action be recognized and that the whole recoverable amount be decreed to be paid to the corporation, notwithstanding releases, ratifications or waivers after the event.

The decree of the Court below entered on July 14, 1937, is sustained.

KARASIK v. PACIFIC EASTERN CORPORATION (SACHS et al, INTERVENORS).

Court of Chancery of Delaware, 1935. 21 Del.Ch. 81, 180 A. 604.

Bill by Tillie Karasik against the Pacific Eastern Corporation, formerly known as the Goldman Sachs Trading Corporation, in which Walter E. Sachs and others, executors of the estate of Harry Sachs, deceased, and others intervened, for an injunction restraining the settlement of certain suits. On exceptions to the report of a special master to whom the cause was referred.

Bill dismissed.

THE CHANCELLOR. * * * All the suits which the settlements propose to compromise involve the same subject matter. They are suits filed by stockholders of a Delaware corporation formerly known as The Goldman Sachs Trading Corporation and now known by the name of Pacific Eastern Corporation (herein called Pacific Eastern). The suits may be referred to as the "primary suits." The defendants in those suits are the officers and directors of Pacific Eastern, the members of a partnership called Goldman Sachs and Company, a firm of bankers and investment bankers which had a management contract with the corporation, and certain other individuals. The primary suits were filed by the complaining stockholders in their derivative right, and the bills asserted a ground of action for large damages in behalf of the defendant company. The gist of the complaint in each case was that the individual defendants and the partnership had so managed the assets of the corporation that the same were wilfully and recklessly squandered and wasted in the amount of many millions of dollars, for which an accounting to the corporation was prayed. * * *

While the primary suits were pending, negotiations for settlement were opened. On August 8, 1933, the defendants in the primary suits, all except Jonas, arrived at a basis of compromise with the directors of Pacific Eastern. Only one of the defendants, Walter Sachs, was a director when the settlements were negotiated. He took no part in them on the corporation's side. Jonas was left out of the settlement of August 8, 1933. He had before him the prospect of remaining the sole defendant. He felt aggrieved that he should have been thus abandoned and left to defend the suits alone, especially since he had had far less contact with the matters charged as grievances in the primary suits than his settling co-defendants had had. Jonas expressed his resentment. Certain remarks of Judge Hofstadter in one of the suits in the Supreme Court of New York fortified his feeling that his resentment was justified. Negotiations were opened with Jonas on about August 10, 1933. He made a final offer of settlement on August 24, 1933, solely, it appears, as a peace-buying proposition. On the next day, viz., August 25, 1933, the directors considered the Jonas offer and resolved upon its acceptance.

The offers of settlement were submitted to the stockholders of Pacific Eastern for approval or rejection. While there was no legal requirement that the stockholders should be called upon to express their desires in the matter, yet the directors, acting upon the advice of their attorney, deemed it best, under all the circumstances, that the stockholders should pronounce the final word of approval or disapproval. There were 5,765,081 shares of Pacific Eastern outstanding and entitled to vote. Of these shares 3,691,963 were present at the stockholders' meeting. Of the shares which voted 3,041,517 voted in favor of the settlements and 10,178 voted in opposition thereto. Stock held by the defendants in the primary suits did not vote.

The compromises thus arrived at involve the granting of general releases to the defendants in the primary suits. The settlement reached with the defendants other than Jonas provides for the receipt by Pacific Eastern of one hundred thousand shares of its stock and eighty-five thousand dollars in cash, which, allowing three dollars per share as the market value of the stock, makes the equivalent of three hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars. Of this amount Pacific Eastern would receive a net of not less than two hundred and ten thousand dollars, the balance going for costs and fees. From the Jonas settlement, Pacific Eastern will receive forty thousand dollars net. The total of net yield to Pacific Eastern, if the settlements go through, will therefore be two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. If book-value of the stock be the measure of its worth, the net to the corporation would be four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The gross would be three hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars or five hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars, according as the stock is appraised at market value or book value.

It is these settlements in compromise of pending litigation which the pending bill seeks to enjoin.

The solicitors for the complainant take the view that the transfer to the corporation of one hundred thousand shares of its own stock yields nothing to the corporation. Both before the master and in their argument at the bar and on their briefs, they rather derided the suggestion that the corporation in receiving one hundred thousand shares of its own stock, gained anything. Their view is that all that the ownership of the shares results in is a reducing of outstanding capital liability. This, they say, gives the corporation nothing. They are plainly in error—so plainly so that if it were not for their tenacious insistence upon the contention, I would not deem it a point meriting an answer. The answer is that the stock when acquired becomes treasury stock which may be sold by the corporation and realized upon as any other asset; or, if it is desired not to sell the stock, its retention by the corporation increases pro tanto the asset value underneath the stock held by the general body of the stockholders who are in a material though not technical sense the corporation, so to speak.

The bill attacks the settlements as fraudulent. It charges first that the amount of the claim for which a decree can be secured in any one of the primary suits is as much as one hundred million dollars, and that any settlement which yields to the corporation a net of only two hundred and fifty thousand dollars (or even four hundred and fifty thousand dollars) is so grossly inadequate as to be a fraud on dissenting stockholders. It charges next that the directors and dominant stockholders of Pacific Eastern in approving of the settlement were under the control and domination of the defendants in the primary suits or some of them. The answers deny that the settlement is an improvident one and deny that the action of the directors and stockholders of Pacific Eastern was in any wise induced or controlled by the defendants in the primary suits or any of them. The answers insist that under all the circumstances the settlements were in the best interests of the Pacific Eastern Corporation and that the directors and stockholders were actuated by good faith in approving of them.

That a great disparity in value between what a corporation receives in exchange for what it gives up, may be a prima facie badge of fraud on the dissenting minority was held in Allied Chemical & Dye Corp. v. Steel & Tube Co., of America, 14 Del.Ch. 1, 120 A. 486. This principle is relied on by the complainant here. If, however, the disparity notwithstanding its magnitude is consistent with honesty of intent in accepting it, the appearance of fraud is removed. There is a presumption, rebuttable of course, that the directors of a corporation are actuated in their conduct of the business of the corporation by a bona fide regard for the interests of the corporation. Mercantile Trading Corp. v. Rosenbaum Grain Corp., 17 Del.Ch. 325, 154 A. 457; Davis v. Louisville Gas & Electric Co., 16 Del.Ch. 157, 142 A. 654; Finch v. Warrior Cement Corp., 16 Del.Ch. 44, 141 A. 54; Robinson v. Pittsburgh Oil Refining Corp., 14 Del.Ch. 193, 126 A. 46. An honest mistake of business judgment on the part of directors is not reviewable by courts. This is the general rule and it is supported by the decision of the Supreme Court of this State in Bodell v. General Gas & Electric Corp., 15 Del.Ch. 420, 140 A. 264.

The master found, after a careful and what appears to me to be an exceedingly intelligent review of the testimony and the arguments based thereon, that the decision of the directors and stockholders to accept the settlements was arrived at in the light of what seemed to them an adequately full investigation and in the exercise of their honest business judgment that the best interests of the corporation would be served by making the settlements. He has summarized his conclusions as follows:

"(1) The adverse interest in a director voting upon a corporate matter, which will vitiate the action of his corporation therein, is a direct adverse personal interest in the transaction itself and not an incidental or collateral personal interest, which may be subserved, or advantage, which may be gained, by reason of the effect of the contract or other transaction upon matters not directly connected therewith.

"(2) That, even taking as true the allegations in complainant's brief, the alleged 'dual positions and inconsistent relationships' of the directors of Pacific Eastern Corp., who voted to accept the proposed settlement, were not such as to create in them a legally recognizable 'adverse interest'; that the personal interests to be subserved and the personal advantages to be gained, if any, were purely incidental and collateral, 'wholly unconnected with the contract before the board,' and that the agreement of settlement, authorized by them, was not thereby rendered voidable.

"(3) That Guggenheimer's employment, as attorney for Pacific Eastern Corp. in the settlement, did not legally vitiate the settlement, nor cast any doubt on its bona fides.

"(4) That the value of the consideration to be received in settlement was $385,000. (unless it be taken at 'asset value' $585,000.) and the probably realizable value of the assets of the firm and the individual members thereof, under judgments in the stockholders' suits, if and when obtained, would not exceed $2,000,000.

"(5) That in any contract for the sale of a corporation's assets, or similar transaction authorized by the directors, the inadequacy of the consideration to be received by the corporation may be so great, so 'gross,' as to be a 'badge of fraud,' that is to say, such prima facie evidence of fraud on the part of the directors or on the part of the other party to the contract, or of their reckless indifference to the rights of the corporation and its stockholders, as to prompt judicial investigation to ascertain whether, in fact, it was tainted by such actual fraud or authorized in such reckless indifference; that if the evidence adduced in such investigation convincingly prove the presence in the transaction of either of these invalidating elements, a court of equity may afford appropriate relief; that a 'badge of fraud,' in its legal meaning, is a 'sign or indicium of fraud,' but does not in itself per se constitute fraud nor is it conclusive evidence of fraud.

"(6) That the right of a stockholder to have any action of the directors of a corporation set aside is dependent upon proof that such action was ultra vires or fraudulent and seriously injurious to the corporation, or that the directors acted for their own interest in a manner destructive to the interests of the corporation or the other stockholders, or that a majority of the stockholders are oppressively and illegally pursuing, in the name of the company, a course in violation of the rights of the other stockholders, which is restrainable by a court of equity.

"(7) That there is not in this settlement a 'gross inadequacy' of consideration; that the consideration is, in fact, adequate.

"(8) That, even if the consideration were found to be 'inadequate,' there is no proof of fraud on the part of the directors.

"(9) That the alleged 'mutual, material mistakes of fact, underlying the judgment of the directors in this matter (as to the value of the firm's assets and in not marshalling the unpledged assets and the unsecured liabilities in making their estimate of the amount of the firm's assets recoverable in judgments in the stockholders' suits) were neither mutual, nor material, nor mistakes and therefore cannot be held to vitiate the settlement.

"(10) That the agreement to give a general release, to the members of the firm and to R. Jonas, was a matter resting in the sound discretion of the directors and that their decision must be accepted, unless the giving of such a release was ultra vires of the corporation.

"(11) That, while the giving of a general release by a corporation is a matter to be carefully considered and to be capable of justification under all the circumstances, it is not ultra vires of the corporation or its directors.

"(12) That the contention of the complainant that the votes of certain directors were invalidated, because they based them on a belief of absence of merit in the stockholders' suits, which is contrary to the 'assumption' in this reference, is fallacious.

"(13) That, while the research and inquiry, into the merits in the stockholders' suits and into the financial condition of the firm and its individual members by the directors and their attorney, were not absolutely and completely exhaustive, they were sufficiently thorough to give the directors a sufficient knowledge to enable them to decide, with all due regard to the interests of the corporation, whether the settlement offered was properly acceptable.

"(14) That the directors exercised an 'informed, independent judgment' unaffected by the advice, opinions, requests or other sorts of influence given, made or exerted by anyone, other than their legal counsel.

"(15) That the settlement was not 'improvident' in any sense that justifies the interference of the court.

"(16) That, because of the membership of W. E. Sachs, one of the defendants to be released, in the board of directors of Pacific Eastern Corporation at the time the offer of settlement was accepted, the burden of proving that the transaction was fair and just to the corporation, with respect to the adequacy of the consideration, rests on him.

"(17) That the usual presumption against fraud, with respect to the alleged collusive agreement, exists in favor of the defendants and that the burden of proof thereof is on complainant.

"(18) That the evidence in the case * * * does not prove the existence of the alleged collusive agreement, but, on the contrary, satisfies me that there was, in fact, no such agreement.

"(19) That the 'assumption' of a recoverable judgment, for a very large amount, in the stockholders' suits was merely an hypothesis intended to raise the question of the adequacy of the consideration for the settlement and was created only for its procedural effect in defining the order of proof, and that the 'burden' thus placed on the defendants, insofar as the alleged collusive agreement is concerned, was not the technical 'burden of proof,' but merely the 'burden of going forward with the evidence,' of which they were subsequently relieved by the Chancellor's direction to the complainant to 'go forward' with her proof.

"(20) That where a compromise, settlement and release of any claim in litigation, actually and sincerely contested by the other party (especially when the claim is for unliquidated damages) is made by a corporation's directors, acting honestly, in bona fides, without fraud, without vitiation by reason of legally recognizable adverse interest of the directors, without reckless or careless indifference to the rights of the corporation or its stockholders, neither inadequacy of consideration, or mistake of judgment, nor mistake of fact (except 'mutual mistake' as recognized by the courts), will avail as a ground for its avoidance at the suit of a stockholder and that, in such case, the courts will not inquire into the merits of the controversy so settled, nor attempt to set up their own judgment as to the propriety of such settlement, its adequacy, or the validity of the judgment of the directors in acting thereon.

"(21) That the action of the stockholders, taken at the meeting of September 25–26, 1933, effectually established the validity of the agreement of settlement, if such establishment was necessary.

"(22) My further and final conclusion is that, the contract of settlement having been ratified by an overwhelming majority of the stockholders, all questions of inconsistent relationships of the directors and their counsel, disparity, improvidence and other alleged objectionable features have been completely answered and removed from further contention and that, no fraud having been found in the directors' consideration and acceptance of the offer of settlement and no collusive agreement between Atlas Corporation and the firm of Goldman, Sachs & Co. having been proven, but rather disproven, the action of the stockholders is final and conclusive. Wherefore, I recommend that the bill be dismissed as to all parties defendant, with costs on complainant."

The complainant has filed thirty-five exceptions to the report, which in substance amount to an exception to every one of the master's findings as above set out. One or two matters are excepted to by the complainant which are not apparent from the quoted findings and which will be presently noticed. The defendants excepted to the finding above designated as (16). It is unnecessary, however, to notice that exception, because as the recommendation that the bill be dismissed will be accepted, the question raised by the sixteenth finding, so far as the excepting defendants are concerned, becomes moot.

In adopting the recommendation of the master, I conceive it to be unnecessary to review the evidence. To do so, would serve no useful purpose. It is sufficient for me to say that the master's treatment of the evidence and the views he has expressed upon the reasonable interpretation and legal effect thereof, on the whole appeal to me as sound. If at any point I should be in disagreement with the master, it would be with respect to matters which can have no effect upon the result.

There is one point in the line of the master's reasoning which the solicitors for the complainant assail with considerable vigor. Its attempted confutation is so forcefully presented that justice to the complainant's argumnent requires me to take notice of it. The point has to do with the disparity between the amount claimed in the primary suits and the amount yielded by the settlements. As before stated the amount claimed is one hundred million dollars and the amount received in settlement is a minimum of three hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars. Now that is a wide disparity. But it is one thing to assert a claim and another thing to prove the claim to judgment. Furthermore, it is one thing to obtain a judgment, and quite another thing to collect it. Figures, however imposing, should not compel practical considerations to yield place to visions.

When the cause was referred to the master, it was with the understanding (except as to Jonas) that for the momentary purposes of the reference, the merits of the claims in the primary suits should not be gone into. Of course whether those suits possessed merit to the extent claimed for them, was not only a material but it was a fundamental question in the pending suit, for if they lacked the probability of a decree in a large amount, there could be no controversy over the honesty of the settlements. Now to try the matters charged in the primary suits would involve an exceedingly lengthy inquiry into some fifty or more transactions each of which would be the equivalent of a suit by itself. In order to avoid an extensive inquiry into those matters, an inquiry that would involve the expenditure of a great length of time and of much money by all the parties, it was determined agreeably to the wishes of both sides, that the hearing before the master should proceed on the assumption, for the time being, that the charges in the primary suits would, if any one of them proceeded, yield a decree for a very large sum of money, for as much, we will say, as the full amount of one hundred million dollars which was claimed. On that assumption, the master was then to proceed to inquire into the question of whether fraud could be found in settlements which yielded to the corporation only a gross for certain of three hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars.

Now in the course of that inquiry the defendants (except Jonas) took the position that even if a decree could be obtained in one of the primary suits in the large sum claimed, an amount could not be realized therefrom beyond the ability of the defendants to pay. Hence it became pertinent to inquire—how much could be realized from the assumed decree? This inquiry was directed primarily to the financial ability of the partnership of Goldman Sachs and Company and of its individual members. The directors engaged Mr. Guggenheimer, of the firm of Guggenheimer and Untermeyer of New York City, to examine and report to them upon this phase of the matter. Mr. Guggenheimer made such an examination and laid before the directors what he had found. His investigation was far from cursory. There is no reason in assailing it as unreliable. At all events it cannot be fairly said that the directors acted in bad faith in accepting and acting upon Mr. Guggenheimer's report. The evidence shows, as the master finds, that the available assets of the firm and its members, as of the settlement date, would not exceed two million dollars. There was a great amount of evidence before the master bearing on this question of available assets of the firm and its partners. It was a subject of rather searching examination. I shall not review it. The master analyzed it in his report and reached the conclusion just stated. I am in accord with his finding.

Assuming then that the available assets as of the settlement date amounted to two million dollars, the question was whether the directors were justified in accepting from the owners of present assets in that amount, the minimum sum of three hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars, or the maximum possibly of five hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars, in gross settlement.

The action of the master in admitting evidence of facts which posited the problem before the directors in that manner, is vigorously not to say violently assailed by the solicitors for the complainant. In my judgment, however, the master was entirely correct in his views touching that aspect of the case. The chief complaint against his position in that regard appears to be that it is said to amount to a complete repudiation of an obtainable decree in the sum of one hundred million dollars, an assumption upon which the master was to proceed. The master did not repudiate the assumption. It was never assumed that one hundred million dollars would or could be collected on a decree in that amount. If that had been the assumption, there would have been no occasion to inquire further into the question of fraud. The solicitors for the complainant confuse a future judgment with its future collectibility. No judgment is worth more than it can be made to yield. Many men can be found, putting an extreme case, with whom it would be wise to settle for five hundred dollars a present judgment against them for five hundred thousand dollars.

And this, if it is not the more true is not the less so, when it is said with respect to a future judgment. The master so thought and I agree with him. He took into account the fact that the assumed judgment was in futuro, that the process of trial leading up to its rendition would be long drawn out, that, because of the nature of the business of the partnership, the publicity of the trial might well destroy its worth and visit damaging financial consequences not alone upon itself but as well upon its members, and that, therefore, the present assets available to respond to a present decree might be very considerably reduced if not altogether lost when sometime in the future at the end of such a trial, a decree would be obtained. The directors took this view into consideration in forming their judgment. The master held they were justified in doing so, and I agree. * * *

When it comes to the compromise of highly controverted disputes, the field is a peculiarly appropriate one for the exercise of the honest business discretion of a corporation's duly accredited managers. Mere mistake in the manner in which they honestly act in such matters does not justify judicial interference nor the substitution of a court's opinion for theirs. If it were not so, courts would be clogged with the pure business problems of corporations concerning which individual stockholders were in disagreement with the officers and directors chosen by the majority to think and decide for the corporate creature.

Of course if the error in judgment is contaminated by fraud, collusion or other vitiating circumstance, a case arises which calls for judicial correction. The master heard considerable testimony on the question of whether any sort of vitiating circumstance corrupted the judgment of the directors and stockholders in the matter of the settlement with Jonas. He found no evidence whatever justifying the conclusion that any circumstance of that character existed. I agree entirely with his conclusion. The fact that we are for the moment assuming that there was a great disparity between what Jonas paid and the amount for which a decree could be rendered against him in the primary suits, is the only particular in which it can possibly be said that a circumstance appears which denounces the judgment of the directors and stockholders as prima facie fraudulent. But that circumstance loses all weight when it is remembered that in the mind of the settling directors it was non-existent. There is nothing on which to justify the belief that the directors were not wholly honest in that belief. The solicitors for the complainant sought diligently for some evidence by which they hoped to raise a reasonable suggestion that somewhere under the surface of the Jonas settlement there lurked the infection of some fraudulent influence. They failed utterly to discover it. So the master concluded. I accept his finding as fully justified.

Something is sought to be made of the fees which the corporation has agreed to pay to the lawyers who represented the complaining stockholders in the primary suits as though the size of those fees has something to do with what the settling defendants ought to pay. I agree with the master in the view that the amount paid by the corporation to the lawyers who brought suits in its behalf is a matter that is irrelevant to whether the defendants are paying to the corporation enough in settlement. The question of fees is one between the corporation and its attorneys. On that question this court has held that it will not review the action of directors in agreeing to pay an attorney's fee except for fraud. Haas v. Sinaloa Exploration & Development Co., 17 Del.Ch. 334, 155 A. 4. The bill does not seek relief against the fees as fraudulently fixed. * * *

The bill will be dismissed.

YOUNG v. HIGBEE COMPANY et al.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1945. 324 U.S. 204, 65 S.Ct. 594.

Proceeding in the matter of petition by Robert R. Young against the Higbee Company and others for authority to employ counsel to compel stockholders to account to The Higbee Company, as debtor in corporate reorganization proceeding, for the difference between what stockholders received from sale of stock and of rights under appeal from decree confirming reorganization plan and the fair value of their stock, or in the alternative that stockholders be required to pay over that amount to preferred stockholders. To review a judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals, 142 F.2d 1004, affirming a judgment dismissing the petition, the petitioner brings certiorari.

Reversed.

MR. JUSTICE BLACK delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case presents the question of the accountability of stockholders who objected to the confirmation of a plan of reorganization under the Bankruptcy Act, and abandoned their appeal for a consideration to themselves, where the basis of the appeal was that, if successful, it would benefit the entire class.

The Higbee Company, a department store with assets of more than six million dollars, filed a voluntary petition for reorganization. It had three types of stocks, common, and first and second preferred. Two of its directors, Bradley and Murphy, claimed that they had acquired by purchase a junior debt against the company of $1,952,000.00. A plan for reorganization was presented under which the owners of this junior debt were to be awarded $600,000.00 in new notes and a large block of common stock. Potts and Boag, respondents here, and owners of some shares of first preferred, objected to confirmation of the plan. They contended, on several grounds, that unless the junior debt was subordinated to the preferred stock claims, the plan allotted that indebtedness too great a share in the distribution of the bankrupt's assets. When the stockholders' committee of which they were members approved the plan, Potts and Boag resigned and announced the formation of a new committee to press their objections to the junior debt allowance. Notwithstanding these objections, the Securities & Exchange Commission recommended the plan's acceptance, 8 S.E.C. 777, and the District Court confirmed it. 50 F.Supp. 114. Potts and Boag appealed from the District Court's decree confirming the plan. Although appealing as individuals, their appeal was based almost entirely on objections to allowances for the junior indebtedness which left less for distribution among all the preferred stockholders. Their appeal sought no separate individual relief for themselves; they appealed only to have the confirmation set aside. Had their appeal succeeded, the District Court would have been required to reduce the value of junior claims asserted by Bradley and Murphy, thereby increasing the value of the claims of the preferred stockholders as a class.

In this situation, Potts and Boag sold their stock and their appeal to Bradley and Murphy, claimants under the junior debt; the consideration paid was $115,000.00. The par value of this stock was $26,-000.00. Its admitted market value at the time, as the court below found, was $17,000.00. Pursuant to this contract for sale of the appeal a stipulation for dismissal was filed in the Circuit Court of Appeals. Petitioner Young, a preferred stockholder of the same class, sought to intervene and prosecute the appeal. His petition was denied and the case was dismissed without opinion. Young then, on behalf of himself and all other preferred stockholders, filed a petition in the District Court setting up these facts and praying that he be authorized to employ counsel to compel Potts and Boag to account to the debtor for the difference between what they received and the fair value of their stock, or praying in the alternative that Potts and Boag be required to pay over that amount to the preferred stockholders. After a hearing, a special master found as a fact that Potts and Boag had appealed in behalf of themselves only and had not acted as representatives of a class. The District Court approved this finding, thought it determinative of the case, and dismissed Young's petition. The Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. 6 Cir., 142 F.2d 1004, 1005. Because considerations of substantial importance to the effective administration of corporate reorganizations are involved, we granted certiorari, 323 U.S. 689, 65 S.Ct. 71. * * * Second: It is argued that since Potts and Boag did not expressly specify that they appealed in the interest of the whole class of preferred stockholders, but appealed only in their own names, they owed no duty to any stockholders but themselves. The appeal here, however, was not from a denial of any individual claim of Potts and Boag. Its basis was that every other preferred stockholder, as well as themselves, would be injured by confirmation. So far as the issues raised by the appeal are concerned, the rights of Potts and Boag and the other preferred stockholders were inseparable. Thus, even though their objection to confirmation contained no formal class suit allegations, the success or failure of the appeal was bound to have a substantial effect on the interests of all other preferred stockholders. The liability of one who assumes a determining position over the rights of others must turn on something more substantial than mere formal allegations in a complaint. Equity looks to the substance and not merely to the form.

Furthermore, the right of appeal granted by a statute should not be interpreted in such way as to defeat rights clearly granted in other parts of the same Act. Peck v. Jennes et al., 7 How. 612, 623, 12 L. Ed. 841. Potts and Boag appealed under Sec. 206 of the Chandler Act, which, contrary to the general bankruptcy procedure, grants any stockholder or creditor the right to be heard on all matters relating to corporate reorganizations. Courts have liberally construed this language as authorizing appeals. We are now asked to say that the privilege of appeal granted to Potts and Boag by the Act vested them with an indefeasible right to sell the privilege to the disadvantage of all other stockholders in their class. But, historically one of the prime purposes of the bankruptcy law has been to bring about a ratable distribution among creditors of a bankrupt's assets; to protect the creditors from one another. And the corporate reorganization statutes look to a ratable distribution of assets among classes of stockholders as well as creditors. There would be no ratable distribution of this bankrupt estate if Potts and Boag could utilize their statutory right of appeal to get for their preferred stock $7.00 for every $1.00 paid to other preferred stockholders. We are asked to say that Congress intended such a consequence, and to construe the right of a stockholder to be heard on a plan of reorganization as carrying with it the right to "sell" the very appeal which the Act grants him.

Potts and Boag, by appealing from a judgment which affected a whole class of stockholders owed an obligation to them, the full extent of which we need not now delineate. Certainly, at the very least they owed them an obligation to act in good faith. * * * The situation which enabled them to traffic in the interests of others was created by a statute passed to protect the interests of all of them. The statute neither compels them to appeal nor to prosecute an appeal already taken contrary to their own interests; it does impose upon them the duty of good faith to all other stockholders whose interests they temporarily control because they are necessarily involved in the appeal. This control of the common rights of all the preferred stockholders imposed on Potts and Boag a duty fairly to represent those common rights. This representative responsibility is emphasized by the fact that they might have been awarded compensation for their services had they succeeded in reducing the claim of the junior indebtedness to the advantage of all the preferred stockholders. Sec. 243; cf. Sec. 249. In re Keystone Realty Holding Co., 3 Cir., 117 F.2d 1003, 1006, 133 A.L.R. 1378. They cannot avail themselves of the statutory privilege of litigating for the interest of a class and then shake off their self-assumed responsibilities to others by a simple announcement that henceforth they will trade in the rights of others for their own aggrandizement. To hold that the Chandler Act permits this, would be to say that Congress, which sought more effectively to accomplish fair and equitable treatment of investors, had by granting a right of appeal to stockholders, defeated its purpose, and had substantially modified the whole body of law imposing the most rigorous responsibilities for fair dealing upon those who represent the rights of others.

The money Potts and Boag received in excess of their own interest as stockholders was not paid for anything they owned. It came to them in settlement of litigation which if carried to a successful conclusion would have added to the value of other preferred stockholders of the common debtor. That the suit was settled and dismissed does not alter the rights of parties as to distribution of the fruits of the settlement. A distinction as to rights arising from litigation, which rests upon the difference between a judgment and a settlement of a lawsuit, under these circumstances, as in others, is "too formal to be sound." Lyeth v. Hoey, 305 U.S. 188, 195, 196, 59 S.Ct. 155, 159, 83 L.Ed. 119, 119 A.L.R. 410; Helvering v. Safe Deposit and T. Co., 316 U.S. 56, 63–67, 62 S.Ct. 925, 929, 930, 86 L.Ed. 1266, 139 A.L.R. 1513. The appeal of Potts and Boag was alleged to be for the benefit of all preferred stockholders. In the contemplation of the statute which authorized the appeal, its fruit properly belongs to all the preferred stockholders. One creditor, therefore, cannot make that fruit his own by a simple appropriation of it. Cf. Terry v. Little, 101 U.S. 216, 218, 25 L.Ed. 864.

Third: It is argued that even though the money paid in excess of the stock value does in equity and good conscience belong to the stockholders, the bankruptcy court is without power to award the relief prayed. Courts of bankruptcy are courts of equity and exercise all equitable powers unless prohibited by the Bankruptcy Act.

Nor can we sustain the contention that relief should be denied on the allegations that Young's motive in bringing the proceeding is an unworthy one. His petition sought relief for the benefit of all the stockholders. The rights of these stockholders are not to be ignored because of some motive attributable to Young.

(b) Procedure

DRESDNER et al. v. GOLDMAN SACHS TRADING CORPORATION et al.

Appellate Division of New York, Second Department, 1934.
240 App.Div. 242, 269 N.Y.S. 360.

Action by Anna Dresdner and another, individually and in behalf of all other stockholders of the Goldman Sachs Trading Corporation, now known as the Pacific Eastern Corporation, similarly situated, against the Goldman Sachs Trading Corporation, now known as the Pacific Eastern Corporation, and others. From orders of Special Term dismissing the complaint (148 Misc. 541, 265 N.Y.S. 913), and from the judgment entered thereon, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed on the law and facts with directions, and motions to dismiss denied upon condition.

DAVIS, JUSTICE. The motions by separate defendants to dismiss the the complaint under rule 107, subd. 4, Rules of Civil Practice, have been granted. The grounds of the dismissal were that there was another action pending—not literally "between the same parties for the same cause," but on the theory that the cause of action was derivative, and that basically it was the same as in a prior action, although the nominal parties plaintiff were different.

The complaint alleges, in brief, that the plaintiffs are stockholders of the defendant corporation; that the individual defendants are directors who have been and are in control of the corporation; that they have been guilty of gross mismanagement, misconduct, and wrongful acts as such directors whereby the assets of the corporation have been wasted and dissipated; that the defendants (or some of them) have profited personally by such transactions; and the purpose of the action is to recover from the alleged wrongdoers, for the benefit of the stockholders, the value of the property alleged to have been unlawfully converted and wasted. Specific acts are alleged as constituting such misconduct.

This action was commenced April 29, 1933. Prior thereto, two similar actions had been commenced by other stockholders in this state for the same general purpose; * * *

The defendants have based their motions on an absolute legal right to have the complaint dismissed, and that right was sustained at Special Term. 148 Misc. 541, 265 N.Y.S. 913. We reach a different conclusion. Counsel differ little on the legal principles that the cause of action is that of the corporation, and whatever recovery is had will belong to it; that the derivative right of a stockholder to maintain the action arises when the corporation cannot or will not commence an action to recover assets belonging to its stockholders from those who have confiscated or wasted them; and therefore a stockholder is permitted to sue and set in motion the judicial machinery to the end that the value of the property may be recovered. Continental Securities Co. v. Belmont, 206 N.Y. 7, 13, 99 N.E. 138, 51 L.R.A.,N.S., 112, Ann.Cas.1914A, 177; Civil Practice Act, § 195. The parties also agree on the principle that, when a judgment is obtained by one stockholder, it binds all other stockholders, on the principle of res judicata.

The action may be called a "class action." The jurisdiction is of ancient origin in equity—independent of remedies given by statute under somewhat similar circumstances by sections 60, 61, of the General Corporation Law. Isaac v. Marcus, 258 N.Y. 257, 263, 179 N.E. 487; Cross v. Bishop Oil Corporation, No. 1, 218 App.Div. 632, 634, 219 N.Y.S. 181; Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U.S. 450, 460, 26 L. Ed. 827; 3 Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) § 1095.

Courts of equity have always exercised broad powers. The fact that several parties brought separate actions for the same general relief did not present a distressing situation. The right to consolidate suits in equity existing long before the present section 96 of the Civil Practice Act developed in the minds of the reformers of civil practice. Actions might be stayed pending the determination of other actions, and in some instances vexatious suits resulting in multiplicity might be dismissed summarily. Stewart v. Butler, 27 Misc. 708, 709, 59 N.Y.S. 573; Wells v. Bushe (Sup.) 118 N.Y.S. 486; Keeler v. King, 1 Barb. 390; Patterson v. Northern Trust Co., 286 Ill. 564, 122 N.E. 55.

The defendants do not claim that there is any controlling authority on the precise question presented here—that a suit like this must be dismissed as of right, for the reason that another similar action has been earlier brought by a different stockholder. Nor do plaintiffs cite controlling authority to the contrary. Both sides rest their claims on certain expressions in opinions of the courts which are admitted to be dicta, and on text authorities based exclusively on such dicta. See Fletcher, Cyclopedia of Corporations, vol. 13, § 5860, Permanent Ed.; 4 Cook, Corporations (8th Ed.) § 748. In Seagrist v. Reid, 171 App.Div. 755, 760, 769, 157 N.Y.S. 979 there are statements in both the prevailing and dissenting opinions to the effect that the action first brought is a bar to the second. It is said in the opinion in Goodbody v. Delaney, 80 N.J.Eq. 417, 419, 83 A. 988, 989, that "* * * it is quite possible that if such similar suit were brought in the same court with the prior suit a plea of former action pending would be sustained." This is all that industry of counsel or our own research can produce on the proposition that a complaint in the second action should be dismissed.

The dictum relied on by appellants' counsel is found in the opinion in Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, 99 N.Y. 185, where it is said at page 194, 1 N.E. 663, 668: "The bringing of the action by the original plaintiff did not prevent the other stockholders from bringing similar actions. But the moment a judgment should be recovered in one action for the benefit of all the stockholders, the proceedings in all the others would be stayed." This statement of the rule was later quoted with apparent approval in Hirshfeld v. Fitzgerald, 157 N.Y. 166, 181, 51 N.E. 997, 46 L.R.A. 839—a representative, not a derivative, action.

There are many actions, representative in character, where the principle is applied that a suit by one will not bar a later suit by another similarly situated. It is argued by respondents that the rule is different in derivative actions, and it was so held by the learned court at Special Term. We doubt that very much distinction can be made in principle; but to limit discussion we will assume that such distinction exists. Likewise the plaintiffs claim that in this complaint new facts are alleged; but for the purposes of this appeal we will assume, as was held at Special Term, that the differences between the complaints are only in immaterial details.

The absence of direct authority on the question here presented may indicate that for a long period of years the right of any stockholder to invoke the aid of the courts in his individual action has gone unchallenged. However, stockholders in large corporations are, as a matter of common knowledge, generally uninformed, and in a measure indifferent concerning the management of the corporation. Generally, without inquiry, they sign proxies as a matter of course so that directors and officers may be re-elected and their policies may be continued. When dividends cease and the stock becomes comparatively worthless, they may complain and grumble, but rarely will they resort to the courts for a remedy. The reason for such inertia is readily found. Stockholders are widely scattered and have no definite method of contact with each other. They usually know that the evidence is almost exclusively in the control of those who are charged with delinquency; that those same individuals are likewise in control of the funds of the corporation and may apply them in defense of their acts, whether those acts are innocent or wrongful; that in seeking a remedy the stockholder will be met with every obstacle and procedural delay that the ingenuity of skilled counsel can devise, as is illustrated in the present case; and that the litigation must entail on their part a great expense with the eventual result in doubt. So, unless a group is organized by ambitious counsel, or one or more stockholders have great courage and ample means to maintain a long-continued litigation, the stockholders remain quiescent, accepting their misfortunes as a decree of relentless fate. It is only in times of general cataclysm or great stress, like those of the present, that indignation will flare up into some decisive action. Common experience tells us that, when officers and directors of a wrecked corporation are called to account, they are not eager to go to an early trial on the merits—whatever the merits may be. There is great reluctance to furnish the evidence of their acts of management and make disclosure of books and records. The way of the inquiring stockholder is beset with difficulties and discouragements created chiefly by those whose acts are attacked. Such, in brief, is the background of the average stockholder's action as we view it.

We hesitate, therefore, to take a narrow view of the principle of another action pending whereby as an absolute right the defendants are entitled to dismissal—relegating plaintiffs, as defendants suggest, to the doubtful remedy of intervention in the existing consolidated action. Permitting a party to intervene is always a matter of judicial discretion depending on a variety of circumstances. It is easy for defendants now to suggest such a policy to plaintiffs. But the latter may be reasonably certain that, when they may attempt to intervene, they will be met with the same strong opposition they are now encountering; and if eventually they are successful, there will be the question frequently raised as to their right of any sort of control over the action brought by others, with the argument that they must remain passive on the theory that their rights will be preserved when, if ever, a judgment may be obtained. If intervention will furnish plaintiffs a proper remedy, why is such circuity necessary, when in the exercise of its equity powers the court may grant consolidation? That procedure seemed satisfactory to defendants when on their own motion the two prior actions were consolidated. The discovery of the right to dismiss seems somewhat belated.

The procedural remedy given in rule 107, subd. 4, is not new. It was taken literally from section 488, subd. 4, Code of Civil Procedure, and was theretofore contained in section 144, Code of Procedure. It was intended to apply principally to actions at law where the parties and the cause were actually or substantially the same, and not to restrict the broad powers of a court of equity in suits of this nature, as the dictum in the Brinckerhoff Case indicates. As we have already stated, the independent right of any stockholder to sue has not been directly challenged during the period of our judicial history by a motion of this nature. The wrong is common to all stockholders. The right to sue is, we think, alike common to them.

We adopt the dictum of the Brinckerhoff Case, supra, as stating the proper doctrine to be applied; and hold that defendants have no absolute right to a dismissal. We speak of an absolute right in contradistinction to a right based on judicial discretion. The rights of defendants, if there be consolidation instead of dismissal, will not be impaired or be subject to any substantial prejudice, except as to a possible delay in the trial. They have not urged that they are eager for an early trial; in fact, everything indicates that they have no anxiety or zeal in favor of it.

The evident purpose of the plaintiffs, whether they proceed by an independent action or as parties to the one consolidated, is that they may have some control over the litigation, and thus be present on any trial to protect and secure their rights and prevent a discontinuance of the action by the original plaintiffs. Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, supra, page 195 of 99 N.Y., 1 N.E. 663. This is a highly legitimate purpose. There is nothing to prevent the defendants, before judgment, from buying their peace with the plaintiffs in the consolidated action by means of a private settlement (Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, supra, page 194 of 99 N.Y., 1 N.E. 663; Handford v. Storie, 2 Simons & Stuart, 196, 198), leaving other stockholders to seek their remedy by a new action, if the statute of limitations has not run against them.

Speaking generally, and not in relation to this particular case, the first action brought by a stockholder furnishes no adequate security that other stockholders will be assured of a complete remedy. The one first in the field of action may not be possessed of all the facts. He may omit from his complaint material allegations of facts which have been discovered by another more vigilant and industrious. His efforts may be thwarted by lack of funds, courage, or determination, or lack of skill and initiative on the part of his counsel. There is always, as we have said, the strong possibility of a private settlement. There is no requirement that the stockholder who sues or the defendants shall give notice of the suit to other stockholders. It is left to chance for the latter to discover it. If in good faith other stockholders are unaware of the prior action and after much expense bring an action of their own, it is a harsh and drastic doctrine which compels dismissal solely on a rule of chronology, regardless of merit. There is little fundamental virtue in such a rule.

Beyond all that, the door is open to collusive actions. It would be very easy for offending officers and directors to obtain a friendly stockholder to begin an action and to suppress all information on the subject. The defendants and not stockholders would then be in control of the litigation. If the doctrine here advocated by the defendants prevails, all other stockholders are prevented from bringing actions in good faith, unless to their already great difficulties, to which we have referred, they must have added the duty of establishing by proof that the first action is in fact collusive. If other stockholders without intervention rely on the first action to furnish a remedy to all, then it may be permitted to drag along until the statute of limitations has run and be discontinued on a private settlement or otherwise; and other stockholders will be left remediless. There should be some measure of certainty that the original action will be prosecuted to judgment, or at least that all diligent stockholders will share in a settlement, before a second action is stayed or dismissed in the exercise of judicial discretion.

Stockholders' actions (not collusive) may be brought for three distinct purposes: (1) For the genuine purpose of benefit to all stockholders with a determination to pursue the suit to judgment, with all stockholders invited in good faith to join in labor and expense; (2) for the purpose of individual benefit by private settlement, with the fact of the bringing of the suit kept secret; (3) a suit brought purely for "strike" purposes. We are concerned chiefly with the one denominated 2.

Still speaking generally, parties and counsel may not apply the same degree of skill, diligence, and good faith to the prosecution of an action. If it be left to the one who by the sheer rule of chronology is the only one entitled to prosecute, then the other stockholders who have had the temerity to sue may be left comparatively without remedy. The judgment, when obtained, is a bar to other actions, no matter what the result may be. Further than that, it is a bar not only as to the questions decided but as to those which might have been presented and tried, but were not. Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U.S. 351, 352, 24 L.Ed. 195; Hull v. Hull, 225 N.Y. 342, 353, 354, 122 N.E. 252. That rule is necessary in order to have a finality to litigation. No one doubts that it often results in injustice to individuals. We think that, before judgment, courts should not be eager to prevent presentation of all issues by parties sufficiently interested to begin suit, but should pursue a liberal policy in permitting them freely to participate in the trial, where the judgment will eventually become binding upon them. They should not be barred or their way made difficult by a narrow interpretation of the rule of another action pending.

The defendants argue that the plaintiffs here have not shown that there was any collusion, lack of skill or good faith, or a proposed private settlement. We have practically no information about it one way or the other. It is not necessary, for, as we have said, the defendants have moved for dismissal as an absolute right. We are attempting to formulate a rule that may apply to any case in the future, and are discussing a general principle in the light of possibilities. We believe there is not much virtue in the claim that the one who first brings suit is by that fact alone in such an advantageous position that all others must give way, regardless of the purposes of the one first on the field, his relations with the defendants, and the skill he brings to the conduct of the suit, ostensibly for the benefit of all others entitled to relief. If the first action is free from collusion and is being prosecuted with skill and in good faith, grounds for a stay of prosecution of the second action may be shown, but not, as we believe, for dismissal.

There is little danger to be apprehended here from a multiplicity of actions by all or many stockholders ranging from 25,000 to 40,000 in number. It is likely that most of them will remain inert. When such trouble actually impends, the defendants will not be unduly harassed, for the remedy by stay or consolidation is simple; and those suits purely vexatious may be summarily dismissed, on grounds, however, more substantial than mere chronology. What is sought by all stockholders acting in good faith is a prompt and efficient determination of their rights. The defendants ought not to be concerned in the question of which particular group of stockholders are engaged in the prosecution if they have meritorious defenses, particularly if all are compelled to unite, and when the judgment obtained will be conclusive on all. An excessive zeal on the part of the defendants to hinder and impede a stockholder in good faith seeking a remedy may promote a suspicion that they have a distaste for a too vigorous prosecution.

We have not in this case reached a stopping point where actions may be discouraged because of multiplicity. We think that they should not run independently, but the parties in all should unite by consolidation. There has been no motion by either side for such a remedy, so we may not order consolidation, but we may make that result simple.

There are recent conflicting decisions at Special Term on the question here presented, and therefore we have been impelled to give our views more at length than ordinarily would be required.

The orders dismissing the complaint and the judgment entered thereon should be reversed on the law and the facts, with costs, and motions denied, with $10 costs on each motion, on condition that plaintiffs offer to stipulate, within ten days after the entry of the order herein, that without formal motion an order may be entered consolidating this action with the prior consolidated actions by stockholders. If such stipulation is given, the defendants have leave to answer within ten days thereafter, or at their option to give notice to plaintiffs that they elect to let their answers in the consolidated action stand as their answers to this complaint, with leave to plaintiffs to move at Special Term for further amplification of the answers as they may be advised; otherwise the orders and judgment should be affirmed, with costs, in the exercise of discretion and not as a strict legal right.

MURPHY v. NORTH AMERICAN LIGHT & POWER CO. et al.

WALTERS et al. v. SAME.

District Court of the United States, S. D. New York, 1940. 33 F.Supp. 567.

Actions by John H. Murphy, on behalf of himself and all other preferred stockholders of the North American Light & Power Company, and by John W. Walters and another, on behalf of themselves, all other such stockholders, and such company, against it and the North American Company to compel the last-named defendant, in compliance with its contract obligations to the Power Company, to surrender notes for funds advanced by it to the power company, accept in lieu thereof shares of the power company's common stock, refund interest received on the notes to the power company, and cancel claims for unpaid accrued interest thereon.

On application by William M. Dederick and Lawrence R. Condon, complainants' attorneys, for allowances of fees after decrees for complainants, 24 F.Supp. 471, were modified by the Circuit Court of Appeals, 106 F.2d 82.

Orders fixing total allowances to applicants at $200,000, to be divided equally between them, and directing defendant power company to pay each applicant $100,000.

WOOLSEY, DISTRICT JUDGE. * * * In all derivative causes like these, it must be remembered that there is not any contractual relationship whatever as to legal services except between the complainant who commences the litigation and his attorneys.

As to any other stockholders, whether common or preferred, the attorneys for the named plaintiffs are pure volunteers and any allowances for fees to which they may be entitled must be estimated principally in the light of the benefit conferred on the corporation and so, by hypothesis, on the other stockholders of all classes, by the activities of counsel on behalf of the stockholders who brought the derivative suit.

As I have stated above, in my opinion the measure of present actual benefit to the Power Company under a most generous method of valuing the results of these causes can be fixed in round figures at $900,000.

This, it will be noted, is less than the amount being asked by the two attorneys for the two sets of plaintiffs.

In approaching the determination of fees properly to be allowed in these causes, one must, as a practical matter, lump the services of attorneys for both complainants together and then see how total appropriate fee thus fixed for those services should be allocated between them. PART VII

SALE, MERGER, CONSOLIDATION AND DISSOLUTION

A. SALE

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 20. Voluntary sale of franchise and property and rights of objecting stockholders. A stock corporation, except a railroad corporation and except as otherwise provided by law, with the consent of the holders of record of two-thirds of its outstanding shares entitled to vote thereon may sell and convey its property, rights, privileges and franchises, or any interest therein or any part thereof; but franchises within the state may be sold only to a domestic corporation. Before such sale or conveyance shall be made such consent shall be obtained at a meeting of the stockholders called pursuant to section forty-five. Any stockholder not voting in favor of such proposed sale and conveyance may at any time prior to the vote thereon—or if notice of the meeting was not mailed to him at least twenty days prior to the taking of such vote, then within twenty days after the mailing of such notice—object to such sale and conveyance and demand payment for his stock, and thereupon such stockholder or the corporation shall have the right, subject to the conditions and provisions of section twenty-one, to have such stock appraised and paid for as provided in said section. Such objection and demand must be in writing and filed with the corporation.

§ 22. New corporation may be formed under same name. Whenever pursuant to section twenty any domestic stock corporation, except a railroad or a moneyed corporation, shall desire to sell and convey its property, rights, privileges and franchises, or any interest therein or any part thereof to a new domestic corporation, the latter may be organized under the same name, provided that:

1. There shall have been included in the stockholders' consent express consent that the good will and right to use the corporate name be sold, that a new domestic corporation be organized with the same name to acquire the property, rights, privileges and franchises, or any interest therein or any part thereof, and the good will and name of such existing corporation, and that such existing corporation be dissolved upon the expiration of the period of fifteen days from the filing of the certificate of incorporation of such new corporation in the proper state office.

2. There shall be annexed to the certificate of incorporation of the new corporation, an affidavit by the president or a vice-president and the secretary or an assistant secretary of the existing corporation stating that the consent of stockholders required by the foregoing subdivision of this section has been duly given.

3. There shall be included in the certificate of incorporation of the new corporation a statement that it is organized to acquire the property, rights, privileges and franchises, or an interest therein or a part thereof, and the good will and name of an existing domestic corporation and a statement of the date of filing of the certificate of incorporation of such existing corporation, the state office where filed, or the special law under which it is organized.

4. The consent of the department of taxation and finance to the filing of such certificate shall be indorsed thereon.

Upon the expiration of the period of fifteen days from the filing of the certificate of incorporation of the new corporation in the proper state office the old corporation shall be deemed dissolved. Its directors shall proceed to settle its affairs pursuant to the provisions of section twenty-nine of the general corporation law and of subdivisions eight and nine of section one hundred and five and of section one hundred and six of this chapter.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 65. Sale of Assets and Franchises:—Every corporation organized under the provisions of this Chapter, may at any meeting of its Board of Directors, sell, lease or exchange all of its property and assets, including its good will and its corporate franchises, upon such terms and conditions and for such consideration, which may be in whole or in part shares of stock in, and/or other securities of, any other corporation or corporations, as its Board of Directors shall deem expedient and for the best interests of the corporation, when and as authorized by the affirmative vote of the holders of a majority of the stock issued and outstanding having voting power given at a stockholders' meeting duly called for that purpose, or when authorized by the written consent of the holders of a majority of the voting stock issued and outstanding, provided, however, that the Certificate of Incorporation may require the vote or written consent of the holders of a larger proportion of the stock issued and outstanding.

Sec. 66. Sale of Franchise; Organization of Corporation to Continue:—If the franchise and property of any corporation formed under the provision of this Chapter, or existing under the laws of this State, is sold, the persons who may become the purchasers, at private sale or under the judgment of the Court, may organize a corporation for the continuation, operation and management of the same; and such corporation, when organized shall have the same rights, privileges and franchises as have been granted to or acquired by the corporation purchased; and shall be subject to all the limitations, restrictions and liabilities imposed upon it, and, in addition thereto, shall be subject to all the provisions of this Chapter. Such corporation shall be formed by Articles of Incorporation executed by the purchaser and his associates, and which shall, in addition to the requirements of the provisions of this Chapter, set forth the description of the property sold and the decree under which the sale was made, if it was sold under judgment, or if not, the deed conveying the property; the amount paid or to be paid, and to whom and by whom, and such other statements as may be deemed necessary. The articles shall be signed by the purchaser and his associates, if any, and shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State, who shall furnish a certified copy of the same under his hand and seal of office, which shall be recorded as hereinbefore provided for certificates of incorporation; and when a certificate of such fact is delivered to the purchaser the corporation shall be deemed to be organized, and shall have all the rights, powers and privileges, and be subject to all restrictions, limitations and liabilities of other similar corporations organized under this Chapter.

TELLER et al. v. W. A. GRISWOLD CO. et al.

Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, Sixth Circuit, 1937. 87 F.2d 603.

Suit by Jacob Teller and others against the W. A. Griswold Company and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

ALLEN, CIRCUIT JUDGE. Appeal by minority stockholders from a decree dismissing a bill in equity praying for receivership, and for a decree setting aside a sale of the assets and surrender of the charter of the W. A. Griswold Company, a Tennessee corporation, and for a retransfer of the assets. Appellants contend (1) that sufficient corporate action authorizing the transfer is lacking, and (2) that the transfer was fraudulent.

At a special meeting of stockholders held on April 10, 1933, a resolution was passed directing the officers and directors of the corporation to sell and convey all of the corporate assets. At that time the corporation owed about $148,000 to the American National Bank of Nashville, $53,000 to Tennessee Enamel Manufacturing Company, and in addition other debts amounting to several thousand dollars, including two years' taxes. There was also outstanding $100,000 of preferred stock on which dividends amounting to $12,000 were in default. As found by the court, the corporation was hopelessly insolvent. The assets were transferred to a new corporation organized for the purpose by the two principal creditors, who held all the stock and agreed to pay all the indebtedness except those debts owing to themselves. This agreement was consummated. The resolution for transfer was passed by more than a three-fourths majority vote of the stockholders, appellants, common stockholders being the only dissenters. Appellants were not rightly entitled to vote, because under the charter and bylaws, the preferred stock had the exclusive voting power, as the dividends thereon were in default. The preferred stock was voted unanimously in favor of the resolution. No objection was raised to the voting of appellants' common stock. The directors took no action, but the president and secretary of the corporation executed the instruments transferring the assets to the new corporation.

Appellants claim that the transfer is null and void because it was not authorized by vote of the directors. They rely upon section 3748 of the Tennessee Code of 1932, which provides for the sale of corporate assets by the directors. An earlier provision of the Tennessee statutes, chapter 437 of the Acts of 1907, which is almost identical with the statute relied on here, was construed in Carrier v. Dixon, 142 Tenn.

122, 218 S.W. 395, where a similar transfer was attacked upon the ground that the directors had not acted. That case held that the statute is permissive but not mandatory upon insolvent corporations. The court at page 125 of 142 Tenn., 218 S.W. 395, says "it has never been questioned that in the case of embarrassed or insolvent concerns the will of a majority of the stockholders, when acting fairly and in good faith, is supreme, and that minority or dissenting stockholders will not be permitted to obstruct or interfere with the conduct of corporate affairs directed by the majority." This is the latest pronouncement of the Supreme Court of Tennessee upon this point, and it decides the legal question squarely in favor of appellees. It is axiomatic that we follow decisions of the highest court of the state interpreting statutes of that state. Kentucky Macaroni Co., v. London & Provincial M. & G. Ins. Co., Ltd., 83 F.2d 126 (C.C.A.6).

Knapp v. Supreme Commandery, United Order of the Golden Cross, 121 Tenn. 212, 118 S.W. 390, relied on by appellants, is inapplicable, for it dealt with a solvent corporation.

We conclude that the action by the officers which complied with the resolution adopted by the majority stockholders constituted a proper transfer. * * *

The decree is affirmed.

NOTE

When a corporation sells its business, the buyer customarily purchases on the basis of a recent audit showing the condition of the concern as of the audit date. The contract of purchase commonly includes a clause similar to the following:

"The vendor corporation represents and warrants and agrees with the purchaser that the balance sheet of the vendor as of June 30, 1947, together with the statements of income and surplus of the vendor for the six months then ended, as certified by the treasurer of the vendor and heretofore furnished to the purchaser, reflect the financial condition of the vendor subject only to changes in the ordinary course of business, since June 30, 1947. There have been no material adverse changes in the financial condition or in the assets and liabilities of the vendor and the vendor agrees with the purchaser that there will have been no such material adverse changes as of the date of closing hereinabove provided for and the vendor agrees to furnish to the purchaser a certificate of its president and treasurer at the closing to that effect."

B. MERGER AND CONSOLIDATION

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 85. Merger. 1. Any domestic stock corporation or any foreign stock corporation authorized to do business in this state owning all the stock of any other domestic stock corporation, authorized to engage in business similar or incidental to the business which the possessor corporation is authorized to engage in, and any domestic stock corporation owning all the stock of any foreign stock corporation authorized to do business in this state and authorized to engage in business similar or incidental to the business which the possessor corporation is authorized to engage in, may file in the office of the secretary of state a certificate of such ownership, in its name and under its corporate seal, signed by its president or a vice-president and its secretary or treasurer and setting forth a copy of the resolution of its board of directors to merge such other corporation, and to assume all of its obligations, and the date of the adoption thereof. * * * Upon the filing of such certificate, all of the estate, property, rights, privileges and franchises of such other corporation, shall vest in and be held and enjoyed by such possessor corporation as fully and entirely and without change or diminution as the same were before held and enjoyed by such other corporation, and be managed and controlled by such possessor corporation, and, except as provided in subdivision three of this section, in its name, but subject to all liabilities and obligations of such other corporation and the rights of all creditors thereof. The possessor corporation shall not thereby acquire power to engage in any business or to exercise any right, privilege or franchise of a kind which it could not lawfully engage in or exercise under the provisions of the law by or pursuant to which such possessor corporation is organized. * * *

2. The possessor corporation shall be deemed to have assumed all the liabilities and obligations of the merged corporation and shall be liable in the same manner as if it had itself incurred such liabilities and obligations.

3. If the possessor is a domestic corporation it may relinquish its corporate name and assume in place thereof the name of the merged corporation by including a provision to that effect in the resolution of merger adopted by the directors and set forth in the certificate of ownership, and upon the filing of such certificate the change of name shall be complete with the same force and effect and subject to the same conditions and consequences as if such change had been accomplished by proceedings under the general corporation law. No corporation shall change its name under this section unless the name assumed contains some word or abbreviation clearly indicating that it is a corporation.

7. In the event all of the stock of the corporation proposed to be merged by a possessor is not owned by such possessor corporation, any stockholder of the corporation so to be merged may, within twenty days after the filing of the certificate with the secretary of state, object to such merger and demand payment for his stock. Such objection and demand must be in writing and filed with the possessor corporation. Thereupon such stockholder and the possessor corporation shall have the right, subject to the conditions and provisions of section twenty-one, to have such stock appraised and paid for as provided in said section.

§ 86. Consolidation. Any two or more domestic business corporations may be consolidated into a single corporation, which may be either a new corporation or any one of the constituent corporations, by the filing of a certificate which shall be entitled and endorsed "Certificate of consolidation of ——— and ——— into ———, pursuant to section eighty-six of the stock corporation law" (the first blank spaces being filled in with the names of the constituent corporations and the last blank space being filled in with the name of the corporation formed by or which is to survive the consolidation) and which shall set forth:

1. The name of each corporation to be included in the consolidation, and the date of filing of its certificate of incorporation in the department of state, or, if any such corporation is created by a special law and has no certificate of incorporation, the chapter number and year of passage of such law.

2. The total number of shares which each of the corporations to be included in the consolidation is authorized to issue, the number thereof which have a par value, if any, together with the par value of each, and the number thereof which are without par value.

3. The name of the consolidated corporation, which name may be that of any of the constituent corporations or an entirely new name permitted under the provisions of section nine of the general corporation law.

4. Either the amount of the capital stock of the corporation and the number and par value of the shares of which it is to consist, or, if the corporation is to issue shares without par value, the statements required by section twelve. If the shares are to be classified, the number of shares to be included in each class and all of the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of each class, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof.

If any class of stock which is preferred as to dividends or assets is to be issued in series as provided by section eleven, either (a) the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of the first series of such class, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof, and that the board of directors is authorized to fix from time to time before issuance the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of each subsequent series of such class, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof, or (b) that the board of directors is authorized to fix from time to time before issuance the designations, preferences, privileges and voting powers of the shares of each series of such class, and the restrictions or qualifications thereof.

5. The city, village or town and the county, within the state, in which the office of the corporation is to be located, and the address within or without the state, to which the secretary of state shall mail a copy of process in any action or proceeding against the corporation which may be served upon him.

6. Its duration.

7. The number of its directors, or that the number of directors shall be not less than a stated minimum nor more than a stated maximum. In either case the number of directors shall be not less than three.

8. If the consolidated corporation is to be a new corporation, the names and post-office addresses of the persons who are to be its directors until the first annual meeting of its stockholders, and if such address shall be in a city, the street and number or other particular description thereof. The number of the directors so named must be the number stated pursuant to the last preceding subdivision of this section if a definite number be stated, or, if an indefinite number be provided for, not less than the minimum number.

9. The terms and conditions of the consolidation, if any; the mode of carrying the same into effect, and the manner of converting the shares of each of the constituent corporations (or, if the consolidated corporation is to be one of the constituent corporations and the outstanding shares of such surviving constituent corporation are not to be changed, the shares of each of the other constituent corporations) into shares or other securities of the consolidated corporation.

10. That the secretary of state is designated as the agent of the corporation upon whom process in any action or proceeding against it may be served.

11. If the consolidated corporation is to be one of the constituent corporations and not a new corporation, a statement to that effect, setting forth the name of such surviving constituent corporation.

In the case of a consolidation of two or more domestic business corporations, such certificate may contain such other provisions as might be included in a certificate of incorporation pursuant to article two of this chapter and such other provisions as are deemed necessary or desirable in connection with the consolidation, but in such case no such certificate may confer on the consolidated corporation any powers, rights, privileges or franchises which may not be exercised by a corporation organized pursuant to article two of this chapter or contain provisions inconsistent with the laws relating to such a corporation. * * *

Upon the filing of such certificate the certificate of incorporation or special law incorporating any constituent corporation surviving the consolidation shall be deemed amended to the extent necessary to bring such certificate of incorporation or special law into conformity with the provisions of the certificate of consolidation.

If such certificate contains a statement in conformity with paragraph (B) of subdivision four of section twelve, the amount of the consideration received by the consolidated corporation for the issuance of such of its shares without par value as are substituted upon conversion for previously issued and outstanding shares with par value of the constituent corporations, shall be deemed to be the amount of the par value of such previously issued and outstanding shares, or if the actual value of such shares be less than their par value, the consideration may be stated to be their actual value, and the amount of the consideration received by the consolidated corporation for the issuance of such of its shares without par value as are substituted upon conversion for previously issued and outstanding shares without par value of the constituent corporations shall be deemed to be the amount of the capital of the constituent corporations represented by such outstanding shares without par value for which the shares of the consolidated corporation without par value are substituted upon conversion, or if the actual value of such shares of the constituent corporations be less than the amount of the capital of the corporations represented by such shares without par value, the consideration may be stated to be their actual value.

The aggregate value of the properties, franchises and rights of the constituent corporations at the date of consolidation shall be at least equal to the liabilities of the consolidated corporation as of said date, including its capital and the aggregate principal amount of any securities representing debt of the consolidated corporation which, under the terms of the consolidation, are substituted for previously issued and outstanding shares of the constituent corporations; and any excess in the aggregate value of such properties, franchises and rights over such liabilities as of said date may be deemed to be surplus of the consolidated corporation.

§ 88. Powers of corporation formed by consolidation. Such consolidated corporation in addition to the general powers of corporations shall enjoy the rights, franchises and privileges possessed by each of the corporations so consolidated, subject to the restrictions, liabilities, duties and provisions contained in this chapter, and may prosecute or carry on any kind of business which any of the consolidating corporations was authorized by law to conduct.

§ 89. Transfer of properties of constituent corporations to corporation formed by consolidation. Upon the filing of such certificate of consolidation in the office of the secretary of state all the rights, privileges, franchises and interests of each of the constituent corporations, and all the property, real, personal and mixed, and all the debts due on whatever account to any of them, as well as all stock subscriptions and other things in action belonging to any of them, shall be taken and deemed to be transferred to and vested in such consolidated corporation, without further act or deed; and all claims, demands, property and every other interest shall be as effectually the property of the consolidated corporation as they were of the constituent corporations, and the title to all real estate, taken by deed or otherwise, under the laws of this state, vested in any of such constituent corporations, shall not be deemed to revert or be in any way impaired by reason of the consolidation, but shall be vested in the consolidated corporation.

§ 90. Rights of creditors of consolidated corporations. The rights of creditors of any constituent corporation shall not in any manner be impaired, nor shall any liability or obligation due or to become due, or any claim or demand for any cause existing against any such corporation or against any stockholder thereof be released or impaired by any such consolidation; but such consolidated corporation shall be deemed to have assumed and shall be liable for all liabilities and obligations of each of the corporations consolidated in the same manner as if such consolidated corporation had itself incurred such liabilities or obligations. The stockholders of the respective constituent corporations shall continue subject to all the liabilities, claims and demands existing against them as such at or before the consolidation; and no action or proceeding then pending before any court or tribunal in which any constituent corporation is a party, or in which any such stockholder is a party, shall abate or be discontinued by reason of such consolidation, but may be prosecuted to final judgment, as though no consolidation had been entered into; or such consolidated corporation may be substituted as a party in place of any constituent corporation, by order of the court in which such action or proceeding may be pending.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 59. Consolidation or Merger; Proceedings for:—Any two or more corporations organized under the provisions of this Chapter, or existing under the laws of this State, for the purpose of carrying on any kind of business, may consolidate or merge into a single corporation which may be any one of said constituent corporations or a new corporation to be formed by means of such consolidation or merger as shall be specified in the agreement hereinafter required; the directors, or a majority of them, of such corporations as desire to consolidate or merge, may enter into an agreement signed by them and under the corporate seals of the respective corporations, prescribing the terms and conditions of consolidation or merger, the mode of carrying the same into effect, and stating such other facts required or permitted by the provisions of this Chapter to be set out in Certificates of Incorporation, as can be stated in the case of a consolidation or merger, stated in such altered form as the circumstances of the case require, as well as the manner of converting the shares of each of the constituent corporations into shares or other securities of the corporation resulting from or surviving such consolidation or merger, with such other details and provisions as are deemed necessary.

Said agreement shall be submitted, to the stockholders of each constituent corporation, at a meeting thereof, called separately for the purpose of taking the same into consideration; of the time, place and object of which meeting due notice shall be given by publication at least once a week for four successive weeks in one or more newspapers published in the county wherein each such corporation either has its principal office or conducts its business, and a copy of such notice shall be mailed to the last known post-office address of each stockholder of each such corporation, at least twenty days prior to the date of such meeting, and at said meeting said agreement shall be considered and a vote by ballot, in person or by proxy, taken for the adoption or rejection of the same, each share entitling the holder thereof to one vote; and if the votes of stockholders of each such corporation representing two-thirds of the total number of shares of its capital stock shall be for the adoption of the said agreement, then that fact shall be certified on said agreement by the Secretary or Assistant Secretary of each such corporation, under the seal thereof; and the agreement so adopted and certified shall be signed by the President or Vice-President and Secretary or Assistant Secretary of each of such corporations under the corporate seals thereof and acknowledged by the President or Vice-President of each such corporations before any officer authorized by the laws of this State to take acknowledgments of deeds to be the respective act, deed and agreement of each of said corporations and the agreement so certified and acknowledged shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State, and shall thence be taken and deemed to be the agreement and act of consolidation or merger of the said corporations; and a copy of said agreement and act of consolidation or merger, duly certified by the Secretary of State under the seal of his office, shall also be recorded in the offices of the Recorders of the Counties of this State in which the respective corporations so consolidating or merging shall have their original Certificates of Incorporation recorded, or if any of the corporations shall have been specially created by a public Act of the Legislature, then said agreement shall be recorded in the county where such corporation shall have had its principal place of business, and such record, or a certified copy thereof, shall be evidence of the agreement and act of consolidation or merger of said corporations, and of the observance and performance of all acts and conditions necessary to have been observed and performed precedent to such consolidation or merger.

Any one or more corporations organized under the provisions of this Chapter, or existing under the laws of this State, may consolidate or merge with one or more other corporations organized under the laws of any other State or States of the United States of America, if the laws under which said other corporation or corporations are formed shall permit such consolidation or merger. The constituent corporations may merge into a single corporation, which may be any one of said constituent corporations, or they may consolidate to form a new corporation, which may be a corporation of the State of incorporation of any one of said constituent corporations as shall be specified in the agreement hereinafter required. All the constituent corporations shall enter into an agreement in writing which shall prescribe the terms and conditions of the consolidation or merger, the mode of carrying the same into effect, the manner of converting the shares of each of said constituent corporations into shares or other securities of the corporation resulting from or surviving such consolidation or merger and such other details and provisions as shall be deemed necessary or proper. There shall also be set forth in said agreement such other facts as shall then be required to be set forth in certificates of incorporation by the Laws of the State, which are stated in said agreement to be the laws that shall govern said resulting or surviving corporation and that can be stated in the case of a consolidation or merger. Said agreement shall be authorized, adopted, approved, signed and acknowledged by each of said constituent corporations in accordance with the laws under which it is formed and, in the case of a Delaware corporation, in the manner provided in the two immediately preceding paragraphs. The agreement so authorized, adopted, approved, signed and acknowledged shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State and said agreement shall thenceforth be taken and deemed to be the agreement and act of consolidation or merger of said constituent corporations for all purposes of the laws of this State. A copy of said agreement, duly certified by the Secretary of State under the seal of his office, shall also be recorded as provided in this Section with respect to the consolidation or merger of corporations of this State.

If the corporation resulting from or surviving such consolidation or merger is to be governed by the Laws of any State other than the laws of this State, it shall agree that it may be served with process in this State in any proceeding for enforcement of any obligation of any constituent corporation of this State, as well as for enforcement of any obligation of the resulting or surviving corporation arising from the merger, including any suit or other proceeding to enforce the right of any stockholder as determined in appraisal proceedings pursuant to the provisions of Section 61 of this Chapter, and shall irrevocably appoint the Secretary of State as its agent to accept service of process in any such suit or other proceeding and shall specify the address to which a copy of such process shall be mailed by the Secretary of State. Service of such process shall be made by personally delivering to and leaving with the Secretary of State duplicate copies of such process. The Secretary of State shall forthwith send by registered mail one of such copies to such resulting or surviving corporation at its address so specified, unless such resulting or surviving corporation shall thereafter have designated in writing to the Secretary of State a different address for such purpose, in which case it shall be mailed to the last address so designated.

Sec. 59A. Merger of Parent Corporation and Wholly Owned Subsidiary; Proceedings for:—Any corporation now or hereafter organized under the provisions of this Chapter or existing under the laws of this State, for the purpose of carrying on any kind of business, owning all the stock of any other corporation now or hereafter organized under the provisions of this Chapter or existing under the laws of this State, or now or hereafter organized under the laws of any other State of the United States of America, if the laws under which said other corporation is formed shall permit a merger as herein provided, may file in the office of the Secretary of State a certificate of such ownership in its name and under its corporate seal, signed by its president or a vice-president, and its secretary or treasurer or assistant secretary or assistant treasurer, and setting forth a copy of the resolution of its board of directors to merge such other corporation, and to assume all of its obligations and the date of the adoption thereof; and a certified copy of said Certificate shall be recorded in the office of the Recorder of Deeds of the County in which the principal place of business of the parent corporation is located, and if the other corporation is also a Delaware corporation and its principal place of business is located in a different County, another certified copy of said Certificate shall be recorded in the office of the Recorder of Deeds of such other County. Thereupon, all of the estate, property, rights, privileges and franchises of such other corporation shall vest in and be held and enjoyed by such parent corporation as fully and entirely and without change or diminution as the same were before held and enjoyed by such other corporation, and be managed and controlled by such parent corporation, and except as hereinafter in this section provided, in its name, but subject to all liabilities and obligations of such other corporation and the rights of all creditors thereof. The parent corporation shall not thereby acquire power to engage in any business, or to exercise any right, privilege or franchise, of a kind which it could not lawfully engage in or exercise under the provisions of the law by or pursuant to which such parent corporation is organized. The parent corporation shall be deemed to have assumed all the liabilities and obligations of the merged corporation, and shall be liable in the same manner as if it had itself incurred such liabilities and obligations. The parent corporation may relinquish its corporate name and assume in place thereof the name of the merged corporation, by including it in a provision to that effect in the Resolution of Merger adopted by the directors and set forth in the Certificate of Ownership, and upon the filing of such Certificate the change of name shall be completed, with the same force and effect and subject to the same conditions and consequences as if such change had been accomplished by proceedings under the appropriate section of this chapter. Any plan of consolidation or merger which requires or contemplates any changes other than those herein specifically authorized with respect to the parent corporation, shall be accomplished under the provisions of Section 59 of this Chapter. The provisions of Section 61 of this Chapter shall not apply to any merger effected under this Section.

MERGER AND CONSOLIDATION

The process of unifying two or more corporations presents combined problems in law and in economics; and no two merger or consolidation statutes are alike. When tested, cases commonly go on their facts. The following materials, therefore, are merely designed to familiarize students with the kind and range of questions which are presented, rather than to suggest a technique.

The power to merge or consolidate must be granted to a corporation by statute. Technically, "merger" is the process of unifying two corporations so that they become one, but the corporation life of both continues in the new corporation. Thus, a "merger" of two railroads results in a single corporation but, because the life of the two component elements continues, franchises granted to the two merging corporations continue to be enjoyed by the merged corporation.

Technically, "consolidation" is the process by which two or more corporations are unified; the component corporations end their corporate life, and a new corporation is formed.

Except where there is some problem of continuing franchise or the like, the technical difference is not of great practical value. The term "merger" is used indiscriminately.

Business or economic merger without corporate repercussion frequently occurs where one corporation buys all or a controlling block of outstanding securities of some other corporation, permitting it to continue in existence but controlling its destinies. This is not, legally, a "merger", but businessmen frequently use the term. Sometimes a holding company may be formed, taking over the stock of two or more corporations and thus unifying the "control". Sometimes, one corporation issues its stock to stockholders of another corporation in exchange for stock of such other corporation, making the second a subsidiary of the first. Sometimes one corporation issues its stock to another corporation in consideration for the sale to it by the other corporation, of its business and assets. There are many possible variants.

In all of these various methods there are different legal problems. The principal ones to be examined are:

(1) Has the corporation a statutory and charter power to merge—or consolidate—or purchase the stock, etc.

(2) Are the terms proposed "fair and equitable" so that the security holders of the component corporations receive securities in the merged or new corporation which equitably represent the interest they had in the component corporation? Many of the contests over mergers and consolidations arise from the conviction that the stockholders of one or other component are being unfairly treated, and are to receive securities in the new corporation of less value than the value represented by their securities in the old.

(3) Are there specific legal restrictions (e.g. prohibition under anti-trust acts)?

(4) Are the statutory procedures required for the operation being fulfilled by the component companies?

Usually to these questions are added a range of other problems, notably problems of taxation. The result of merger may be realized profits for certain shareholders—and therefore they find themselves subject to taxes, which naturally disposes them to object to the merger. Certain other methods may result in taxation to the corporations involved. Obviously the attorneys involved will wish to work out a method involving the least likelihood of tax liability.

It is not possible to anticipate the range of questions in any given case; and most lawyers rightly consider that each merger is a new problem to be worked out in the light of all the circumstances. Almost of necessity, courts are constrained to deal with such mergers in a like spirit.

OUTWATER v. PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATION OF NEW JERSEY.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey, 1928. 103 N.J.Eq. 461, 143 A. 729.

BACKES, VICE CHANCELLOR. This bill is to enjoin a merger of five public utilities companies into the Public Service Electric & Gas Company, viz. Essex & Hudson Gas Company, Hudson County Gas Company, Paterson & Passaic Gas & Electric Company, New Brunswick Light, Heat & Power Company, and Somerset, Union & Middlesex Lighting Company. The Public Service Corporation owns all the capital stock of the Electric & Gas Company. The Electric & Gas Company owns more than two-thirds of the capital stock of the merging companies. Directors of the Public Service Corporation compose the board of directors of the Electric & Gas Company; members of the latter board form the directorate of four of the merging companies. A majority of the board of the fifth company is made up of a director and an officer of the Public Service Corporation and a sympathetic stockholder. The plants of the five merging companies are in the possession of the Electric & Gas Company under 900-year leases at net rentals that insure the stockholders of the two lessor companies first named annual dividends of 8 per cent., the next two 5 per cent., and the fifth 4 per cent.

The avowed object of the Public Service Corporation, in merging its subordinate companies, is to get rid of the leases and to acquire the fee to the plants, and to that end caused its directors, directors in control of the subordinate companies, to resolve upon a merger agreement, and upon submission of the agreement to the stockholders caused it to be approved by the votes it controlled. Under the terms of the agreement the stockholders of the companies to be absorbed are to get, in exchange for their shares, 6 per cent., cumulative, preferred stock (non-voting) of the Electric & Gas Company, redeemable in three years at $110. The basis of exchange is one share of preferred stock, at par, for a share of the stock of the two first named merging companies at a value of $137, the next two at $86, and the fifth at $69. The annual yield on this basis would be slightly in advance of the dividends from the net rentals, viz. on the 8 per cent. stock $8.22, on the 5 per cent. $5.16, and on the 4 per cent. $4.14, and it would appear that the appraisal was influenced by a comparison of annual income, rather than the market value of the stocks, of the merging companies, which were then selling, in a narrow market, at approximately the exchange figures. The complainants, stockholders of four of the merging companies, object to the merger as unfair and inequitable.

The attack upon them, that they are actuated in their objection by ulterior motives, finds no justification in the record; surely not as to Fidelity-Union Trust Company, which, as trustee of the Shanley estate, represents more than 10,000 shares of the merging companies. This trustee, an appointee, of this court, was ordered to intervene to protect the interest of the estate. And the subtle insinuation that the Public Service Corporation, in a measure, was moved to the merger pro bono publico, is equally gratuitous. The merger has not the merit of joining two or more utilities for greater public service. It is solely for greater financial convenience of the corporation, albeit economy in financing a public concern of this magnitude, like savings in purchasing any other commodity, is reflected in the rate making by the state.

The Public Service Corporation originally acquired local producing units upon long-term leases, and, as integral parts, fashioned them into its present unified system of statewide service of light, heat, and power. In recent years this leasehold structure proved undesirable in modern financing. Fee ownership was less complicated and more inviting to investors, and conducive to more conveniently financing this vast organization, involving hundreds of millions of dollars borrowed from or invested by the public. Pursuing a policy which was later employed in the instant case, many leaseholds were vacated and estates in fee acquired by merger, until nine companies were left, the five here involved and four others, referred to as "group B." In 1927 the Public Service Corporation offered to the stockholders of the nine companies, for their shares, three alternative bids, cash, exchange for common stock of the Public Service Corporation, or exchange for preferred stock of the Electric & Gas Company; the latter the same as offered by the merger agreement. More than two-thirds of the stockholdings in the five companies here involved was acquired through some one of these offers and the merger followed. Group B was omitted from the merger because the Public Service had not the vote to put it over as to them.

The merger agreement, procedurally, is in legal form, and the right to merge is in entire harmony with the complainants' corporate contract; but, as the merger is, in reality, an appropriation of corporate property by a majority of stockholders, by force of numbers and the grace of the statute, and, while no valid legal objection can be interposed on that score (Colgate v. U. S. Leather Co., 73 N.J.Eq. 72, 67 A. 657), the agreement calls for careful judicial scrutiny, and the burden is on the majority to show that the consideration is fair and equitable, and judgment, as to fairness, is not to be influenced by the heavy note of approval, as it otherwise would be if the vote were independent, as indicated in Berger v. U. S. Steel Corp., 63 N.

J.Eq. 809, 53 A. 68. The decision must rest on the merits, and to that end it has been shown that, when the merger was in contemplation, it was referred by the Public Service officials to responsible bankers to work out a scheme of conversion, and they recommended the alternative offers, and, in respect of the one now the basis of the merger, supported their recommendation at the hearing and stressed the fact that the marketability of the Electric & Gas Company preferred stock gave it a marked advantage. The conversion prices, as already stated, were about the average ruling prices in the market at the time for the stocks of the merging companies. The market, it is true, was "thin." The stocks were closely held as investments, and there was little activity. Sales were few and intermittent, but they were listed, and the stocks dealt in by brokers, and by two of the complainant firms, which specialize in that type of securities, and sufficiently to be acceptable as a guide in determining the "full market value." 2 Comp.St.1910, p. 1661.

The complainants' objection that sales were infrequent and casual, so that no market value can be said to have existed, and that resort should be had to proof or intrinsic value, might have some degree of persuasion, had they come forward with that line of proof; but they contented themselves with supinely resisting the offer, simply claiming that the shares were worth more. How much more they would not say. They refused to fix a price, demurring that they did not care to part with their holdings. That unreasonable attitude was not helpful to the court in determining the fairness of the exchange, and in that respect that issue is held against them.

Now, in addition to fair exchange values, exchange for relative equality of securities in the merged company is implied in all mergers, and relative permanency is a vital element of the securities. The five companies were originally leased to the Public Service Corporation and it assigned the leases to the Electric & Gas Company, which in turn assumed the rental obligation. With this double undertaking, the payment of dividends on the lessor companies' stock is assured beyond peradventure. This security excels in priority all the outstanding obligations of either company. The preferred stock of the Electric & Gas Company, on the other hand, is the next lowest—common stock being lower—security issued by that company, and of this there is now outstanding more than $71,000,000. It is subordinate to outstanding bonds and certificates of indebtedness of more than $82,000,000 and also to debts and liabilities incurred and to be incurred. As against these liabilities the corporation has abundant assets, far in excess in value. There can be little question of the soundness of the preferred stock at this time. The company has made large annual profits, and the future holds promise of continued prosperity. Though the possibility of adversity is decidedly remote, such things have come to pass, as, for instance, the New York & New Haven Railroad Company and the Georgia Central Railroad & Banking Company. Then the dividends on the preferred stock are payable only if earned, whereas the dividends on the stocks of the complainants' companies are insured in practical perpetuity, underwritten, as they are, by the entire Public Service system.

The complainants' resistance and their contention that they ought not to be compelled to exchange their first lien securities for gilt-edged second lien security is not without appeal, and were the decision to rest here there would be some embarrassment in squaring the merger with fairness. But there is a more serious inequity; the preferred stock lacks permanency. It is redeemable within three years at the option of the Electric & Gas Company. Thus the merger, in effect, is nothing less than a forced sale by the majority stockholders to itself at a price fixed by it and payable at its pleasure. The preferred stock is but the equivalent of a 6 per cent promissory note payable in three years at the option of the buyer. The merger legislation countenances no such perversion of the contractual obligations of stockholders inter sese. Continued membership until dissolution, is an inherent property right in corporate existence. A merger is but a fusion of corporate assets and franchises, and an allocation of stock in the merged company, and works a conversion not a destruction of that right. In the ordinary case of merging going concerns and the conversion of share for share upon parity of value, all rights, including voting rights, are reserved to stockholders.

The right to vote is a property right. Lord v. Equitable Life Assurance Society, 194 N.Y. 212, 87 N.E. 443, 22 L.R.A.,N.S., 420. This is adverted to because the loss of it is complained of. That right, however, has lost importance, for the complainants' companies are not going concerns, and never will be, in that respect having been absorbed, and the exchange for non-voting preferred stock is harmless. That may be dismissed, but not the complainants' right of permanent participation in the merged company relatively as they enjoyed that right in the merging companies. The contingency of elimination after three years is unfair, and the right to exercise the option at that time, given by the merger agreement, is oppressive and inequitable. The unlikelihood of the option being exercised, as suggested by the company, is purely speculative, and the burden of anxiety is not to be put upon the complainants. If money should become cheap, and the Public Service could float a new issue at an appreciably profitable lower percentage of interest, redemption would undoubtedly follow, consistently with its past policy of good business.

The redemption feature at $110 offers no adequate compensation, for the complainants would be obliged to reinvest their capital at a correspondingly low rate of return, and besides suffer loss of interest pending reinvestment. It is true the complainants would encounter the same disadvantages if their stocks were appraised under the compensation provision of the statute; but that is presently subordinate, for before the Electric & Gas Company may resort, or the complainants be driven, to that extreme measure, the fairness of the merger must be vindicated (Colgate v. U. S. Leather Co. supra), and it would then be available to the Electric & Gas Company only if non-voting stockholders dissented therefrom, or refused or neglected to convert their stocks. The purpose of the statutory grant of eminent domain in this limited form is to perfect, not accomplish, a merger. It is not overlooked that under the merger act the merger agreement may provide for "converting the capital stock of each of said merging or consolidating corporations into the stock or obligations of such new or consolidated corporation," thus implying that obligations may be given in exchange. Here obligations are not offered, and the question does not directly arise. On the contrary, the exchange for preferred stock may later become an obligation of the complainants to take. The offer amounts to that. However, fairness in mergers dictates that, when obligations are given in exchange for stocks of the character here involved, they at least should bear a corresponding permanent investment value, such, for instance, as the perpetual interest-bearing certificates of the Electric & Gas Company, or like obligations; otherwise, a merger would be a simple medium for a compulsory sale, and that is not permissible.

The public service corporations contest the right of a court of equity to interfere in the internal affairs of the merging companies, in the absence of fraud, actual or constructive. There is, of course, no suggestion that the majority stockholders entered into the merger agreement with actual intent to defraud the minority. Neither have they earned a decoration for unselfishness. The objection of the defendant corporations is, as an abstract proposition, accepted doctrine, and the principle was recognized in Bingham v. Savings Investment & Trust Co. (N.J.Ch.) 138 A. 659, where dissatisfied stockholders sought to prevent their company from absorbing two others. That case involved purely internal management of a going concern, honestly pursued. Here the situation is different. The complainants' companies are about to be absorbed, and the minority stockholders face the possibility, if not the probability, of being cast into the discard. This by right of might and by means unwarranted and oppressive, and their only appeal for relief is to this court. The merger will be enjoined. * * * [1]

COLE et al. v. NATIONAL CASH CREDIT ASS'N.

JOURNAL SQUARE BANK BUILDING CO. v. NATIONAL CASH CREDIT ASS'N et al.

Court of Chancery of Delaware, 1931. 18 Del.Ch. 47, 156 A. 183.

Two bills, one by Frank H. Cole and others against the National Cash Credit Association, and the other by the Journal Square Bank Building Company against the National Cash Credit Association and another. Rules for preliminary injunction were issued in both causes and were heard together.

Rules discharged.

Bills to enjoin the defendant from proceeding with a merger agreement, by which it, cotemporaneously with Franklin Plan Company, Franklin Thrift and Loan Association and American Cash Credit Corporation, all Delaware corporations, will merge with another existing Delaware corporation called Franklin Plan Corporation.

1 Aff'd. 104 N.J.Eq. 490, 146 A. 916, 1929. For the later history of this case, see, Public Service Electric & Gas Co. v. Federal Power Comm., 1 Fed. Power Comm. 546 (1938).

The Cole bill was filed by a holder of preferred stock of the National Cash Credit Association in behalf of himself and other preferred stockholders. * * * The complainants in the Cole bill object to the merger of their corporation with the Franklin Plan Corporation on the ground that if all the mergers, which are mutually dependent for completion on the carrying through of each, are effected, the asset security underlying the preferred stock of the absorbing company which is to be given in exchange for their present preferred stock will be less in value than that which underlies their present National Cash Credit Association stock; and that this reduction in value is due to the fact that in estimating the asset contribution which each of the merging companies makes to the common pool, the National Cash Credit Association assets are underappraised in comparison with the assets of the other merging companies, whereby the stockholders of the latter are given an advantage over them and other stockholders of the National Cash Credit Association similarly situated. The result, say the complainants, will be that their present stock will, if converted into the proposed new stock, suffer not only in security value but also in market value. * * *

The bill of the Journal Square Bank Building Company assails the proposed merger on the additional ground that if it is consummated as planned, the liabilities of the absorbing company will be greatly increased without any commensurate increase in the quick assets available for debts, that the financial condition of the defendant is more sound than will be that of the corporation into which it is proposed to be merged, and that as a consequence the security which the complainant now has in the assets of its debtor will be greatly impaired.

Rules for preliminary injunction were issued in both causes. They now come on to be heard together upon bills and affidavits.

THE CHANCELLOR. The rules for preliminary injunction in these two cases were heard together. In disposing of the rules, I shall first take notice of the suit filed by the Journal Square Bank Building Company.

Bill of Journal Square Bank Building Company.

The complainant in this suit is a creditor of the defendant. As a general proposition, it is not permitted to a creditor of a corporation to prevent its merger or consolidation with another if the statutory law of its creation authorizes it. 7 Fletcher, Cyc. of Corp. p. 8329; Id. 8411; 8 Thompson on Corporations (3d Ed.) § 6037. * * *

If creditors are in no position to object to a proposed consolidation of their debtor with another corporation because resort to equity against the debtor's assets affords them protection, then a fortiori the express conference upon them by statute of a right of action generally by which not only the assets of their debtor but as well the entire assets of the consolidated company, whether derived from the debtor constituent or not, may be seized in satisfaction, would render less defensible the right of creditors to prevent a consolidation.

The statute of Delaware, under which the corporations here involved were created, expressly provides that in case of merger or consolidation the rights of creditors of the constituent corporations shall be preserved unimpaired, and all debts, etc., of the constituent companies shall thenceforth, after the merger or consolidation, attach to the consolidated corporation and be enforceable against it to the same extent as if said debts, etc., had been incurred or contracted by it. Section 60, General Corporation Law (35 Del. Laws, c. 85, § 19). * * *

The complainant as creditor, as now appears, will have all the security it now has and considerably more besides. It is difficult then to see how the consolidation can possibly injure it.

But the Journal Square Bank Building Company objects further that it now has the right and so long as its claim lives will continue to have the right, by reason of its debtor's having qualified by license to do business in New Jersey, to sue it in that State, a condition on which its license to do business in that State was granted being that, even though it should withdraw from the State, process might still be served upon it through the Secretary of State of New Jersey; and that this remedy of suit in New Jersey will be lost to the complainant if the merger goes through, because in that event the life of the defendant will be terminated (section 60, Delaware General Corporation Law), and hence the complainant could no longer sue it in New Jersey. Thus, argues the complainant, a "remedy" belonging to it as a creditor will be taken from it, in violation of section 63 of the Delaware act (Rev. Code 1915, § 1977) which provides that the "rights or remedies" of creditors of a Delaware corporation "shall not in any way be lessened or impaired * * * by the consolidation of two or more corporations. * * *"

In the first place I very much doubt that the act of merging would deprive the complainant of its right to a remedy in New Jersey. * * *

But, if the consolidated company could not be sued in New Jersey as an alter ego of the defendant, I still think the complainant has no ground of complaint. The "remedy" of suit somewhere will not be taken from it by the merger. It is expressly reserved to it by statute. I conceive that the word "remedies" as used in the statute refers to those recognized forms of redress which law and equity afford for the securing of rights, without regard to the situs of the jurisdictions, in which they may be asserted. The statute makes lawful and authorizes the merger here under contemplation. If as a result of the statute's operation, a preserved remedy could no longer be asserted in a particular foreign jurisdiction, it would be a strange result if by reason of that fact the stautory authority would be nullified. The right to sue the defendant in New Jersey after it has withdrawn therefrom is a right which the New Jersey law attaches to the granting of a license to do business in that State. If that New Jersey right is in a substantial sense lost by reason of Delaware legislation, a question which as before indicated is doubtful, I think nevertheless that so far as the and merger cases, it does not undertake to guarantee to them juris-Delaware law is concerned the remedy in New Jersey is gone. When our statute preserves remedies generally to creditors in consolidation dictions in which to assert the remedies.

Bill of Cole, et al.

I now take up the case of the preferred stockholders who seek to enjoin the merger. The crucial point on which their complaint turns is one of value—whether or not they as stockholders in one of the constituents are to receive in exchange for their present holdings, stock which has a value commensurate with the asset contribution which their company is making to the common pool.

This is a question in the last analysis of what are the fair values to be ascribed to the assets of the defendant company in the merger plan.

The statute under which the contemplated merger is proposed to be put through does not compel an objecting minority of stockholders to submit to the compulsion of the majority to the extent of being forced into the status of stockholders in the consolidated enterprise. The option is given to each dissenting stockholder to elect whether he will take his allotment of stock in the consolidated company. If he prefers to dissociate himself from the consolidation, he may, by following the procedure laid down in section 61 of the General Corporation Law (35 Del. Laws, c. 85, § 20), secure a valuation of his stock in money and collect the same as a debt due.

As a general proposition dissenting stockholders are thus put to an election by the statute. There may be circumstances, however, under which a court of equity will say that the duty to make the election does not arise. For instance where the merger is not authorized by law, a dissenting stockholder is under no duty to make his election. He may enjoin its consummation. Jones v. Rhea, 130 Va. 345, 107 S.E. 814; General Investment Co. v. Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. (C.C.A.) 250 F. 160. Furthermore, if consent to the merger be induced by fraud practiced upon a consenting company, a stockholder is under no duty to elect whether he will abide by a merger so induced or take his money. In such a case equity holds that no just alternatives are presented to him for a choice. See Bailey v. Citizens' Gas Light Co., 27 N.J.Eq. 196; Wilson v. Trenton Pass. Ry. Co., 56 N.J.Eq. 783, 40 A. 597. Where also the merger proposes illegally to wipe out a right to accumulated dividends on preferred stock, a court of equity will enjoin it on the application of a preferred stockholder. In such a case the stockholder's election is invited between two alternatives one of which is highly unfair. See Colgate v. U. S. Leather Co., 73 N.J.Eq. 72, 67 A. 657, reversed on other grounds, 75 N.J.Eq. 229, 72 A. 126, 19 Ann.Cas. 1262. From these and other cases which may be cited it thus appears that the election which is given to the stockholder is one that he is not, under any and all circumstances, required to exercise. The exercise of the statutory right of merger is always subject to nullification for fraud. The cases so hold.

In the instant case fraud on the complainants is the ground on which their claimed right to an injunction is based. The fraud charged however is not actual fraud on the part of the directors and majority stockholders. It is constructive fraud based on an alleged discriminatory undervaluation of assets of the National Cash Credit Association on the one hand and an overvaluation of the assets of Franklin Plan Corporation, the consolidated company, on the other. When the fraud charged is of this nature, it must be so plainly made out as to disclose a breach of trust or such maladministration as works a manifest wrong to the dissentients. Raff v. Darrow, 184 Ind. 353, 111 N.E. 189.

The overvaluation or undervaluation as the case may be must be such as to show a conscious abuse of discretion before fraud in law can be made out. Such is the tenor of the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor in Donald v. American Smelting & Refining Co., 61 N.J.Eq. 458, 48 A. 786, 788, reversed on other grounds, 62 N.J.Eq. 729, 48 A. 771, 1116. In Jones v. Missouri-Edison Electric Co. (C.C.A.) 199 F. 64, relief was granted because it was shown that the distribution of the stock of the merged company among the stockholders of the merging companies was "grossly unjust." This circumstance, combined with the fact that the dominating interests in the merger were the beneficiaries of the inequality, moved the court to grant the relief prayed for by the protesting minority.

In the case sub judice, if there is an inequality as between the merging companies, it is not coupled with any showing, or even intimation, that those who have engineered the merger or whose voting influence is great enough to accomplish it, are themselves beneficiaries of the alleged inequality. The case therefore is one that rests on the sole fact of alleged undervaluation and overvaluation of the assets of two of the merging companies.

Where that is the case the rule adopted by this court as applicable to the sale of corporate assets would seem by analogy to supply a sound basis for guidance. While a consolidation is quite distinct from a sale, yet, from the viewpoint of the constituent companies, a sale of assets is in substance involved. Here it is the sale feature of the merger and that alone with which we are concerned. Looking then at the transaction as one where the stockholders of the defendant are in substance selling its assets to another in exchange for securities issued by the latter, what is the rule by which the value derived in exchange for the assets is to be tested for the purpose of discovering whether or not fraud can be said to have been shown? This question is answered by the case of Allied Chemical & Dye Corp. v. Steel & Tube Co., 14 Del.Ch. 1, 120 A. 486. The rule there laid down was that mere inadequacy of price will not reveal fraud. The inadequacy must be so gross as to lead the court to conclude that it was due not to an honest error of judgment but rather to bad faith, or to a reckless indifference to the rights of others interested. There is a presumption that the judgment of the governing body of a corporation, whether at the time it consists of directors or majority stockholders, is formed in good faith and inspired by a bona fides of purpose. Robinson v. Pittsburgh Oil Refining Corp., 14 Del.Ch. 193, 126 A. 46; Davis v. Louisville Gas & Electric Co., 16 Del.Ch. 157, 142 A. 654. * * *

I come now to the question of fact—viz: was there an undervaluation of the defendant's assets, and if so, was it so gross as to indicate bad faith towards the opposing minority? It is significant, that if there was such a grossly unfair discrimination against the class of stockholders among whom the complainants are numbered, only 40,000 shares out of the total of 327,324 are protesting. Apparently about eighty-eight per cent. of the preferred stock outstanding is satisfied with the terms proposed. I do not mean to speak slightingly of forty thousand shares as a negligible number. The figures are given merely to point out that in the judgment of an overwhelmingly majority of the stock in the interest of which this suit was filed, there is nothing in the situation which warrants a protest. * * *

The complainants speaking for themselves and others, vigorously complain because the stock which they bought has suffered a great market loss. That is unfortunate. It has however nothing to do with the merits or demerits of the proposed merger, which is to be judged in the light of values without reference to prices paid by investors.

After a rather painstaking study of the evidence before me, I fail to see anything in the proposed plan of merger which reveals any fraud, actual or constructive. The complainants therefore are not entitled to be relieved of exercising the election given to them by the statute of choosing whether they will accept stock under the merger or take the necessary steps to secure a valuation and payment in money.

The rules in both cases will be discharged.

BASIS OF MARKET VALUATION—YOUNGSTOWN SHEET & TUBE CO. AND BETHLEHEM STEEL CO. MERGER.

A business precedent (though not a legal precedent) was the case of the merger of Bethlehem Steel Co. and Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. in the spring of 1930. There the book value of Bethlehem Steel was considerably greater than that of Youngstown Sheet & Tube; on the other hand the earning power of the Youngstown stock was considerably greater than that of Bethlehem Steel. Merger terms were arranged by which Bethlehem Steel agreed to issue one and one-third shares of stock for every share of stock of the Youngstown Sheet & Tube. Although hotly contested on many other grounds, the difference in book value was not adduced as a ground for complaint, and the argument as to the fairness of the merger turned principally on parity of earning power.

Merger Terms

To the Shareholders of
The Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company:

The report of Messrs. Price, Waterhouse & Company as to a fair basis of exchange of the stock of Bethlehem for shares of Sheet and Tube having been challenged, we asked three other leading firms of accountants to examine into the facts and report whether in their opinion the terms of the merger were fair to Sheet and Tube. Their report, which speaks for itself, is published herewith.

Bethlehem Steel Corporation
The Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company

April 2, 1930

Report of Accountants:

New York, N. Y.,
March 31, 1930

Bethlehem Steel Corporation,
The Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company.
Dear Sirs:

At your request we have considered the terms of the proposed merger between Bethlehem Steel Corporation and The Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company for the purpose of forming an opinion on the question whether the terms of 1⅓ shares of Bethlehem common stock for each share of Sheet and Tube are fair to the shareholders of The Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company.

In considering the questions presented, we have referred to the published annual reports of the two companies for the last five years, and Messrs. Price, Waterhouse & Co. have put at our disposal various tabulations and computations made by them. The accounting officers of Bethlehem have furnished such additional information as seemed to us requisite and have answered all the questions which we have asked. We have also examined the report addressed by Messrs. Ernst & Ernst to Mr. J. A. Campbell under date of March 24, and various reports which have been issued to the shareholders of Sheet and Tube by a committee opposing the merger.

Our conclusion is that on the basis of relative earnings the proposed terms are fair and favorable to the Sheet and Tube Company.

On the basis of net asset values and on the basis of relative working capital they are even more favorable to the Sheet and Tube shareholders.

We shall state briefly some of the principal grounds for our conclusions.

The relative value of the stocks of the companies concerned, in such cases, is determined, so far as it can be determined by an accounting or statistical approach to the question, by four principal factors, viz.:

1. Relative Fixed Charges
2. Relative Working Capital
3. Relative Book Values
4. Relative Earning Capacity.

Relative earnings are most important, but as the others can be dealt with more briefly we propose to discuss them first, especially as they have a bearing on the method of determining relative earning capacity.

1. Relative Fixed Charges:

The relative fixed charges of the two companies after the retirement of debt recently effected are as follows:

	Bethlehem	Sheet and Tube
Interest on bonds	$ 5,900,000	$3,600,000
Dividends on preferred stock	7,000,000	825,000
Together	$12,900,000	$4,425,000

The fixed charges in the case of Sheet and Tube are relatively more favorable than in the case of Bethlehem, but, on the other hand, Bethlehem's fixed charges are mainly in the form of dividends on stock, while Sheet and Tube's are mainly in the form of interest, and, in our judgment, therefore, no adjustment is required in respect of this situation.

2. Relative Working Capital:

Bethlehem's net working capital as shown by its balance sheet is $179,245,656; that of The Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company is $74,898,139. On the basis of the relative shareholdings in the consolidated company, Bethlehem's net working capital is thus in excess of the relative contribution on a share basis by Sheet and Tube to the extent of $29,449,378. This figure should be adjusted for dividends declared in 1930, shown by Bethlehem as a liability at December 31, 1929, of $6,550,000 and for marketable securities held as reserve fund assets in excess of the relative figure for Youngstown of $5,170,625, making the excess $41,170,003, or $12.87 per share.

In our opinion, even if the merger is to be considered as based primarily on relative earning capacity, Bethlehem is fairly entitled to an allowance over and above the ratio fixed on the earning capacity basis of at least $12.50 per share for excess working capital.

3. Relative Book Values:

The net book value of Bethlehem's common stock, as shown by the common capital stock and surplus (including as surplus its insurance reserve) appearing in its balance sheet at December 31, 1929, is $456,606,409, equivalent on 3,200,000 shares to $142.69 per share. The corresponding net book value of Sheet and Tube is $128,064,081, equivalent on 1,600,000 shares to $80.04 per share.

This comparison is not entirely fair to Bethlehem, inasmuch as Bethlehem has taken up as a liability in its balance sheet of December 31, 1929 dividends not declared until 1930 and not payable until April or May, 1930, amounting altogether to $6,550,000. If adjustment were made for this item, the book value of Bethlehem would be increased to $144.74 per share.

No valuations of the physical assets have been made and it has been suggested that Bethlehem's values are on a relatively higher level than those of Sheet and Tube. Bethlehem's assets could be reduced by $171,000,000 and still leave a book value per share exceeding that contributed per share by Youngstown by the amount already dealt with as excess working capital. As this reduction would be 37% of the total fixed assets, it is abundantly clear that making any reasonable allowance for any differences in methods of figuring book value, Bethlehem's is very much higher than that of Sheet and Tube.

4. Relative Earning Capacity:

It is understood that in 1922 and 1923 both Bethlehem and Youngstown acquired several other properties, the Bethlehem Steel Corporation taking in Midvale and Lackawanna, and The Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company taking in Brier Hill and The Steel & Tube Company of America. On this account the only earnings figures which have any significance are those for the six years period from 1924 to 1929 inclusive.

The first question for consideration is the relative weight to be assigned to the earnings of the several years included within the period under review.

This is a matter of the first importance for the reason that the earnings of Sheet and Tube were relatively better than those of Bethlehem in the first three years of the six-year period, whereas the situation is reversed in the second half of the period. Various methods of weighting are employed. A method employed by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in determining capital stock values is to take a five-year period and to assign five times the weight to the last year that is assigned to the first, the last but one being assigned four times the weight given to the first year, and so on. A somewhat similar method, was we understand, employed in a recent steel merger. The more heavily the later years are weighted the less favorable is the result to Sheet and Tube. We think that a method which assigned to the average of the years 1927 and 1928 double the weight assigned to the average of the two earlier years would be more than generous to Sheet and Tube. The year 1929 we propose to deal with separately because of the large new stock issues in that year.

The Comparability of Figures:

It is essential to a proper conclusion that the earnings of the two companies should be stated on a fairly camparable basis. From the information given to us, it appears that the operating profits after deducting depreciation are fairly comparable. Two adjustments of the financial figures appear to be called for:

In the first place, Bethlehem has carried direct to reserve the profits of its insurance department including the income from the investments held in connection therewith. Secondly, as pointed out by Messrs. Ernst & Ernst in their report to Mr. Campbell, Sheet and Tube was relieved in 1927 of any Federal income tax on its earnings by reason of certain charges properly made by it to surplus account but properly deductible for income tax purposes. We agree with Messrs. Enrst & Ernst that for present purposes the income tax which Sheet and Tube would normally pay on its earnings should be deducted and Sheet and Tube's earnings reduced. Adjustments of Sheet and Tube's profits in 1928 and 1929 are also required. On the other hand, Bethlehem has considerably over-provided for Federal taxes to an aggregate amount in the five years of $2,408,820.

We have given very careful consideration to the question of the relative provisions for maintenance and depreciation and have carefully noted the points raised by Messrs. Ernst & Ernst in this respect. The provisions made by Sheet and Tube for depreciation are relatively higher than those of Bethlehem, whether computed on the basis of property values or tonnage. The comparison on book value is not, in our judgment, relative, so long as Bethlehem is not receiving any credit for excess book value which it is contributing in the amount, as stated above, of $171,000,000. On the tonnage basis, we think the fact that Sheet and Tube has a larger percentage of lighter products calls for a higher tonnage rate. On the other hand, Bethlehem has more property subject to depreciation which is not reflected in the rated ingot capacity, and to this extent its tonnage rate ought, comparably, to exceed Sheet and Tube's. On the whole, we conclude that Sheet and Tube's provisions for depreciation and depletion, considered separately, are relatively higher than those of Bethlehem.

On the other hand, no fair comparison can be properly made, as recognized by Messrs. Ernst & Ernst in their report, without taking into consideration both depreciation and maintenance. This is particularly necessary inasmuch as Bethlehem, as shown by its annual reports, accumulates, through its maintenance accounts, substantial reserves which are in effect depreciation provision. Considering depreciation and maintenance together, Bethlehem's charges are in our judgment as high as, and probably somewhat higher relatively than, those of Youngstown. On the whole, it seems to us equitable to accept the accounts as they stand without adjustment in this respect.

Comparative earnings 1925–1928:

Making the adjustments we have noted, the earnings of the two companies available for the common stock are as follows:

	Bethlehem		Sheet and Tube
	Earnings available for common stock	Per share on 1,800,000 shares	Earnings available for common stock	Per share on 1,200,000 shares
1925	$10,172,541	$5.65	$12,331,180	$10.28
1926	14,069,892	7.82	14,349,762	11.96
1927	9,759,841	5.42	5,358,589	4.47
1928	13,378,664	7.43	9,768,100	8.14
Average:
1925–1926	12,121,216	6.73	13,340,471	11.12
1927–1928	11,569,252	6.43	7,563,344	6.30
Ratio giving double weight to average of last two years	11,753,240	6.53	9,489,053	7.91

On this basis Sheet and Tube would be entitled to 1.211 shares of Bethlehem for 1 share of Sheet and Tube. We consider the year 1929 separately.

Comparative earnings 1929:

In 1929 the question is complicated by the issue by Bethlehem of 1,400,000 shares for which approximately $136,000,000 was received. As controversy may arise as to the best method of allowing for this change, we state the essential figures for the year as follows:

	Bethlehem	Sheet and Tube
Earnings for common stock as reported	$35,242,980	$20,739,174
Adjustments for insurance and excess tax provisions	2,283,191	268,596
	$37,526,171	$21,007,770
Net earnings from new money included therein	1,746,533
Adjusted earnings exclusive of earnings on $136,000,000 new capital in the case of Bethlehem	$35,779,638	$21,007,770
The saving on the application of $86,000,000 to debt reduction is	4,224,320
Making totals of	$40,003,958	$21,007,770

In addition to the adjustments shown above, due weight must be given to plant expenditures which the Sheet and Tube Company had made at its Indiana Harbor plant for additional finishing capacity and which were completed early in 1930 and were not productive of earnings during 1929. The expenditures in question amounted to approximately $10,000,000 and the earnings therefrom are estimated by the management at approximately $2,200,000 on the basis of 90% operation. This situation is of sufficient importance to warrant some special allowance being made therefor, particularly if the earnings of 1929 are to be given heavy weighting. Any adjustment must, of course, deal with the two companies alike. A precise adjustment would involve many assumptions in calculations. A simple calculation will, however, be sufficient to show that no reasonable allowance made would bring Sheet and Tube's earning capacity to a figure which would entitle it to a more favorable basis of exchange than has been agreed upon.

Adding the above estimated earnings of $2,200,000 to the actual Sheet and Tube earnings of $21,000,000 shown above gives a figure of earnings and earnings capacity for Youngstown of $23,200,000. On the basis of an exchange of 1⅓ shares of Bethlehem stock for 1 share of Youngstown, Bethlehem's earnings for 1929 should be double the earnings for Youngstown, shown above, or $46,400,000, leaving a balance over Bethlehem's 1929 earnings, shown in the above table, of $6,400,000 to be derived from additional capital used in expansion. To provide this $6,400,000 Bethlehem will have available the earnings from, first $50,000,000 of new capital, second, $25,000,000 of surplus earnings for 1929—a total of $75,000,000. To produce $6,400,000 this sum would require to yield only about 8½%, and if the conditions are assumed to be such that Sheet and Tube could earn 22% on its new plant, it is reasonable to suppose that under like conditions Bethlehem's new plant would earn considerably more than 8½%.

Summarizing the foregoing, our conclusions are: first, that on the basis of relative earnings (taking into account the years 1925 to 1929, inclusive, and plant under construction at the end of the year) the basis of exchange is favorable to Sheet and Tube; second, that Bethlehem is contributing working capital to the extent of $40,000,000, or $12.50 per share in excess of its rateable contribution on the agreed basis of merger.

We are convinced, therefore, that the terms of the proposed merger are fair and favorable to Sheet and Tube.

Yours very truly,

INVESTMENT COMPANY ACT OF 1940
Release No. 1059

In the Matter of THE CLIFFS CORPORATION and THE CLEVELAND-CLIFFS IRON COMPANY (Investment Company Act of 1940— Section 25 (b))	Advisory Report of the Securities and Exchange Commission in Respect of a Proposed Plan of Consolidation.

TO THE SHAREHOLDERS OF THE CLIFFS CORPORATION:

The Securities and Exchange Commission herewith submits to the shareholders of The Cliffs Corporation, a management investment company registered with the Commission pursuant to the provisions of the Investment Company Act of 1940, an advisory report in respect of a proposed plan to consolidate The Cliffs Corporation (which we shall refer to hereafter as "Cliffs") and The Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Company (which we shall refer to as the "Iron Company") to form a new company to be called The Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Company (which we shall refer to as the "New Company"). This report is submitted pursuant to the request of approximately 2400 shareholders of Cliffs who own in the aggregate approximately 26 percent of the capital stock of The Cliffs Corporation and is made pursuant to the authority conferred upon us by Section 25 (b) of the Investment Company Act of 1940.[3] Information included in this report has been derived from the proxy statements of The Cliffs Corporation and The Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Company used to solicit proxies from the shareholders of such companies in respect of the proposed plan, and from additional information furnished us by the managements of these companies or derived from public information contained in our files. This report should be read in conjunction with The Cliffs Corporation proxy statement dated April 24, 1947.

The purpose of this report is to assist security holders of Cliffs in determining whether or not to approve the plan. The commission has no statutory power to approve or disapprove the plan. Whether or not to accept the plan is a matter to be determined by the individual business judgment of the security holder.

The discussion in this report is arranged in the following order: The history of the formation of The Cliffs Corporation; the capitalization, business and assets of the present Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Company; the provisions of the proposed plan, the effect of the plan upon the shareholders of The Cliffs Corporation; and our conclusion.

Formation of The Cliffs Corporation

The Cliffs Corporation was incorporated in May 1929 as a device for effectuating a liaison between The Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Company and various investment companies which had been organized and sponsored by the former firm of Otis and Company and Cyrus S. Eaton. These investment companies had accumulated substantial blocks of the common stocks of Inland Steel Company, Wheeling Steel Corporation, Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company, and of companies which subsequently were merged to form Republic Steel Corporation, for the purpose of combining such steel companies to form a large midwest steel company which, on the basis of assets and productive capacity, would have been the second largest steel company in the United States. The possibility of the occurrence of such a combination was of some concern to the Iron Company because of the possible adverse effect upon its bargaining position in the sale of iron ore which might occur if the number of its customers were substantially narrowed by the proposed merger.[3] It was the desire of the management of the Iron Company to place the Iron Company in the position of being the ore supplier of the proposed new large steel company.

[3] Nothing in this report should be deemed to create any implications as to the effect of the plan upon the preferred stockholders of the Iron Company. We express no opinion on this point.

To accomplish this purpose Cliffs was formed and one-half of its shares were issued to the investment companies sponsored by Otis and Company and Cyrus S. Eaton in return for substantial blocks of the common stocks of the four steel companies named above. The stockholders of the Iron Company transferred all of the common stock of the Iron Company to Cliffs in return for the other one-half of the common stock of Cliffs. However, immediately prior to such exchange of Iron Company common stock for Cliffs common stock, the Iron Company declared a stock dividend in the form of preferred stock to the holders of its common stock. This stock dividend totalled 500,000 shares of 5% Cumulative Preferred stock entitled on liquidation to a preference in assets of approximately $50,000,000 and entitled to a sinking fund in the amount of $500,000 for each of the first two years, $750,000 for the next two years, and thereafter $1,000,000 per annum.[4]

Within a few months after the creation of Cliffs, its essential purpose as a preliminary step in the proposed plan of combination of the Iron Company and the steel companies we have mentioned, for the purpose of creating the second largest steel company in the country, had failed.[5]

[3] William G. Mather, then a director of the Iron Company, stated in a letter to the stockholders of Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Company in respect of the formation of Cliffs:

"In view of the probability of further mergers among the larger steel companies depending for their ore supplies upon the mines of the Lake Superior Company in which event the market for our products might suffer restriction, it has seemed to your directors desirable that our company place itself in a position to participate in such movements. An alliance has therefore been arranged with a strong finance group headed by Mr. Cyrus S. Eaton of Cleveland which owns large blocks of stock in a number of the stronger companies, which alliance will in case we remain independent help to enlarge our market for iron ore, or place ourselves in a stronger position in connection with the whole industry." Report of the Securities and Exchange Commission on Its Study of Investment Trusts and Investment Companies (1942) Part IV, p. 224.

[4] 487,238 shares of this preferred stock issued by the Iron Company as a stock dividend are presently outstanding.

[5] As Mr. Greene, now president of Cliffs and chairman of the board of directors of the Iron Company, testified in the Hearings before the Temporary National Economic Committee (76th Cong. 2d Sess. (1939) pp. 10248, 10269):

"That steel company never was formed, and the cause, therefore, of the formation Cliffs presently has outstanding 805,734 shares of capital stock owned by approximately 5400 stockholders. Approximately 35% of the outstanding stock of Cliffs is owned by interests affiliated with the management of both companies.

The portfolio of Cliffs has remained virtually static since the company's inception. The company presently owns all of the outstanding 408,296 shares of common stock of the Iron Company and in addition owns: 160,449 shares of the common stock of Republic Steel; 307,500 shares of the common stock of Inland Steel; 30,000 shares of the common stock of Wheeling Steel; and 100,500 shares of the common stock of Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company.[6] The common shares of the Iron Company owned by Cliffs have been valued for several years at $5 per share by Cliffs' management for the purposes of the Investment Company Act of 1940, which requires the board of directors of an investment company to determine the fair value, for the purpose of that Act, of securities having no quoted market value. Upon the basis of this valuation of the Iron Company common stock held by Cliffs and the market value of its holdings of marketable steel stocks, the asset value as of December 31, 1946 of each share of Cliffs common stock, that is the value of the assets which each Cliffs stockholder would have received if on that date Cliffs had been dissolved and its assets distributed in kind, would have been $34.13. As of May 1, 1947, such value would have been approximately $31 per share. The great proportion of this asset value is represented by the steel stocks which at December 31, 1946 had an aggregate market value of approximately $24,000,000; the Iron Company's stock is valued by the management at approximately $2,000,000.

"I would say if the cause of the Cliffs Corporation formation had not existed in 1929 that we would not own those stocks today, or would not purchase them. And I also think that my statement is borne out by this fact, that we have since the formation of the Cliffs Corporation not bought a single share of additional stock in any of these companies, with the exception of a small amount of rights under the market that we were awarded a few years ago. So that we had no intention of carrying on the idea that we bought in '29, or rather—not bought, they were acquired in that merger; and they have continued to be held, even though reason for being so has been done away with."

[6] The percentages of the voting securities of the steel companies represented by the stocks in such companies owned by Cliffs and the Iron Company as at December 31, 1946, are as follows:

Cliffs		% of Voting Securities at 12/31/46
160,449	Republic	2.696

the 1850's. Prior to 1929 it had outstanding only one class of stock. In 1929, as has already been indicated, all the common stock of the Iron Company was conveyed to Cliffs. Immediately prior to this conveyance, a stock dividend was declared in preferred stock to the holders of Cliffs common stock. This is the preferred stock which the Iron Company now has outstanding. The Iron Company presently has outstanding 487,238 shares of 5% cumulative preferred stock entitled on any involuntary liquidation of the company to a preference in assets of $48,723,800, and entitled to a sinking fund presently in the amount of $1,000,000 per annum. The company, because of the depression beginning in 1929, early defaulted in the payment of dividends upon its preferred stock and at December 31, 1946 arrearages on such preferred stock amounted to $12,746,146.08 or $26.16 per share.[7] The accumulated sinking fund deficit on such preferred stock at the same date was $14,500,000. As a result of these defaults, no dividends can be paid on the common stock of the Iron Company, which is owned by Cliffs, and none have been paid since 1931. The preferred stock because of such arrearages is entitled to one vote per share or approximately 55% of the voting power in the Iron Company. In each of the years 1940 to 1946, inclusive, the regular dividend of $5 per share was paid on the preferred stock and in addition an aggregate amount of $3 a share was paid on accrued arrearages.

Interests, associated with the management of Cliffs and the Iron Company, owned as of April 3, 1947, approximately 33.5% of its outstanding preferred stock.

In addition to its outstanding preferred and common stock, the Iron Company and its wholly owned subsidiaries have outstanding notes payable to banks and insurance companies aggregating $7,400,000 of which $750,000 is payable in 1948; $5,000,000 between 1951 and 1955 inclusive; $900,000 between 1949 and 1954 inclusive; and $750,000 between 1955 and 1959 inclusive.

B. Business and Assets

The Iron Company owns, leases or has stock interest in iron mines, located both on the Michigan iron ore ranges and the Mesaba range in Minnesota. In addition, it owns all of the stock of the Cleveland-Cliffs Steamship Company which owns 14 ore carrying vessels and also operates 3 vessels under contract and 5 vessels chartered from the United States Government. It also owns 75% of the outstanding stock of the Lake Superior & Ishpeming Railroad Company, which serves principally iron mines on the Marquette Range in Michigan, and all of the stock of the Cliffs Power and Light Company, which owns and operates hydro-electric plants located in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan. The power company sells power to the Iron Company in connection with its operations and also sells power to other mines and industries and certain communities. In addition the company and its subsidiaries own and operate coal docks and the company owns an undivided one-half interest in the Mather Collieries, a coal mine located in Pennsylvania. The company acts as sales agent for all or part of the production of coal mined by others and makes purchase for resale to others. Also owned by the Iron Company is one of the largest strips of timber in the Great Lakes area. This timber is being sold to wood working plants and to the Cliffs Dow Chemical Company in which the Iron Company owns a substantial stock interest. The timber is also used in connection with the company's mining operations.

All of the vessels of the steamship company are leased to the Iron Company and are used almost exclusively in the transportation of the Iron Company's ore and coal. During the past five years, 50% of the power sold by the Cliffs Power and Light Company has been bought by its parent, the Iron Company. Furthermore, during the past five years 74% of the gross revenues of the Lake Superior & Ishpeming Railroad Company was derived from the transportation of iron ore of which approximately 81% was derived from iron ore carried for the Iron Company itself. It is apparent, therefore, that the steamship company, the railroad company and the power company are, to a substantial extent, merely aspects of the ore business in general and the Iron Company's ore business in particular. The revenues of these subsidiaries will vary directly with the operations of the ore industry in general, and of the Iron Company in particular.

In addition to these assets the Iron Company at December 31, 1946 had net current assets of $18,093,810.38 and owned in its own right 272,867 shares of the common stock of Republic Steel Corporation, 6,461 shares of the preferred and 81,747 shares of the common stock of Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation and 1,839 shares of the preferred and 3,540 shares of the common stock of Wheeling Steel Corporation. As at December 31, 1946 these shares in the three steel companies had an aggregate market value of $11,404,451.49. Thus, at that date the Iron Company had net current assets and listed marketable securities having an aggregate value of $29,498,261.87.

A breakdown upon a precentage basis for the years 1943 to 1946, inclusive, of the sources of the net earnings of the Iron Company is as follows:

From these statistics it is clear that the company's ore operations and operations intimately related to the production and transportation of ore, such as the operations of the railroad, the steamship company and the Cliffs Power and Light Company, accounted for between 66% and 76% of the earnings of the Iron Company for the years covered by the table. Moreover, the item "Other Dividends Received" which accounted for between 11 and 13.7% of the company's earnings for the period covered represents almost exclusively dividends received on the portfolio steel stocks owned by the Iron Company. As we will indicate more fully hereafter, these steel companies represented in the portfolio of the Iron Company and in the portfolio of Cliffs are the primary customers of the Iron Company.

C. Ore Reserves

The Iron Company and about seven principal merchant ore producers in the Lake Superior area compete in the sale of ore to steel companies, the plants of which are located on or near the lower Great Lakes. In connection with its business the Iron Company presently operates sixteen iron ore mines either as owner, lessee, or as a holder of important stock interests. An additional mine with substantial reserves is now in the development stage. As of March 31, 1947 the company's reserves of "assured" and "prospective" high grade ores (including those of one mine under lease to another operator) aggregated approximately 81,350,000 tons, of which approximately 15,600,000 tons represented ore in open pit mines and the remainder represented ore in underground mines. The company also had reserves of low grade ores of approximately 111,000,000 tons and expects, in addition, to discover substantial tonnages of ore. The company estimates that its present "assured" and "prospective" high grade ore reserves are sufficient to enable it to conduct operations for approximately 24 years, based on production rates over the past 10 years. However, the company also indicates that future ore discoveries will enable it to conduct operations for an undetermined additional period of time. The Company's ore reserves are exceeded only by those of United States Steel Corporation which are substantially in excess of those of the Iron Company. In addition, in contrast to the Iron Company's assured and prospective ore reserves, the bulk of which is underground ore, the reserves of United States Steel are to a substantial extent open pit ores.[8]

The management of the Iron Company believes certain competitive advantages will accrue to the company because of the situation of ore reserves in general in the Lake Superior area. Because of the intensive depletion of high grade open pit ores in the last several years induced by the demands of the war effort, it is asserted that the Iron Company in the future will not be as adversely affected competitively as it has been in the past. The company has predominantly produced and sold underground ores and has been at a competitive disadvantage because of the generally higher cost of production of such ores, a cost of production which tends to increase as operations reach greater depths. As open pit ores become more depleted in the future, it is the management's belief that there will tend to be available a greater proportion of underground ore.[9] The company has recently acquired two open pit mines which it estimates will increase the ratio of its future shipments of open pit ore vis-a-vis underground ores. Nevertheless, the Iron Company's "assured" and "prospective" ore reserves are predominantly underground ores so that its future shipments will presumably still include a greater proportion of underground ores than open pit ores. Moreover, against this possible future competitive advantage to the Iron Company, the possibility of future competition from foreign high grade ores, including high grade ore from deposits being investigated in Labrador, cannot be ignored.

D. Customers

Although the Iron Company sells ore to most of the leading steel companies in the United States, its predominant sales have been to the five steel companies whose common stocks will be held by the New Company, namely Republic Steel Corporation, Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, Inland Steel Corporation, Wheeling Steel, and Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company. Approximately 79% of the total sales made by the Iron Company during the past three years have been made to five companies, including three of these companies, Republic Steel, Jones & Laughlin, and Wheeling Steel.[10] By far the greatest part of these sales was made to Republic Steel[11] and Jones & Laughlin. Insignificant amounts of ore have been sold to United States Steel. That company, as we have indicated, has ore reserves substantially in excess of the Iron Company and therefore will presumably not be a large customer of the Iron Company. Although the Iron Company sells ore to Bethlehem Steel Corporation, the second largest steel company in the United States, the amounts sold to such company are much less than the amounts sold in the aggregate by the Iron Company to the steel companies represented in its portfolio and the portfolio of Cliffs.[12] It would appear, therefore, that both the ore operations and the dividends received upon the portfolio investments

[9] In common with other companies in the ore industry in the Lake Superior area the Iron Company has interested itself in experimentation to determine the commercial feasibility of converting low grade taconites into a commercial ore product. To date the company, however, has expended only approximately $200,000 on this effort.

[10] For the last several years Wheeling Steel Corporation has purchased between 11% and 18% of its ore requirements from the Iron Company.

[11] The Iron Company sold ore to Republic Steel pursuant to an agreement entered into on April 15, 1936 with Republic Steel which provided that for a period of 10 years ending April 30, 1946, the Iron Company would sell and deliver to lower lake ports and Republic Steel would buy an amount of iron ore not less than a specified percentage (but in no event more than 1,800,000 tons of 2,040 pounds in any one year) of all iron ore obtained by Republic Steel in the United States in such year for blast furnace consumption at all northern plants of Republic and its subsidiaries.

[12] Bethlehem Steel Corporation owns extensive foreign and domestic ore reserves. In a registration statement filed with the Commission pursuant to the Securities Act of 1933 (File No. 2-6819), Bethlehem Steel Corporation stated that as at January 1, 1946 its domestic and foreign iron ore properties, excluding its properties on the North coast of Cuba, were estimated to contain at least 105,900,000 net tons of iron ore (excluding tonnages applicable to interests not owned directly or indirectly by the company). Bethlehem Steel Corporation ships Cuban and South American iron ore to its Sparrows Point, Maryland, steel plants.

of the proposed New Company will be somewhat dependent upon the prosperity of the portfolio steel companies.

The Plan and Its Effects Upon the Cliffs Shareholders

As we have already stated, the original purpose of the creation of Cliffs had failed within a few months after its organization. Thereafter the management from time to time for a period of many years considered various plans for the combination of the two companies but was unable to agree upon a plan. The management of Cliffs from time to time also considered dissolving Cliffs. Nothing was done however prior to 1946. In letters dated December 23 and December 27, 1946, signed by William G. Mather, then chairman of the board, and by Edward B. Greene, president, the management announced a proposed plan to liquidate Cliffs by a pro rata distribution in kind of its assets to Cliffs shareholders.[13] It further stated that a proxy statement shortly would be sent to shareholders of Cliffs in respect of a meeting of shareholders for the purpose of dissolving the corporation.

However, on February 18, 1847, the board of directors of Cliffs informed its stockholders that they had suspended the consideration of liquidation plans in order to place before the shareholders of both companies the proposed plan of reorganization which is the subject of this report. A meeting of stockholders to vote on acceptance or rejection of the plan called for May 16, 1947, has been recessed to June 9, 1947.

In explanation of this change in position the management has stated in the proxy statement sent to Cliffs stockholders in connection with the proposal made by the Clark Foundation and other stockholders to dissolve Cliffs:[14] "Your directors believe that this plan which provides a permanent investment in a consolidated company is preferable to breaking up the large capital fund now held by Cliffs."

Briefly described, the plan seeks to accomplish two objectives: (1) the combination of the assets of Cliffs and the present Iron Company into a new company to be called The Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Company, and (2) the reduction of the dividend rate, and the elimination of the dividend arrearages and the sinking fund deficits which have accrued in respect of the present preferred stock of the Iron Company thereby releasing earnings for the Common stock. Under the plan, for each share of Cliffs common stock there will be issued 2¼ shares of the New Company common stock. The existing Iron Company common stock held by Cliffs will be eliminated in the consolidation. Each 13 The letter of December 23, 1946, stated in part:

"Such a program has been discussed and considered from time to time over the past few years.

"While definite action on the matter by the Board of Directors is not to be taken until December 27, 1946, the management will then recommend that, since the purpose of the organization of the Corporation no longer exists and the Corporation's large holdings of steel stocks are not important in the operation of the Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Company, the best interests of the Cliffs shareholders will be served by distributing to them all of the common stock of the Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Company as well as the steel stocks and cash now held by the Corporation."

preferred shareholder of the present Iron Company will receive a new share of 4½% cumulative preferred stock with a par value of $100 per share, an involuntary liquidating preference of $100 per share and entitled to one vote per share, irrespective of defaults. In addition each share of the present preferred stock of the Iron Company will be entitled to receive one share of the common stock of the New Company. Accrued dividend arrears of $12,746,146.08 on the present preferred stock and the accrued sinking fund deficit of $14,500,000 at December 31, 1946 will be eliminated and a new annual sinking fund equivalent to 15% of the net earnings of the New Company after deduction of preferred stock dividends will be created for the benefit of the new preferred stock.[15] If the plan is completely consummated, the New Company will have a capital structure consisting of $7,400,000 of funded debt; 487,238 shares of preferred stock having a par value of $100 per share and a liquidating preference of $48,723,800; and 2,300,140 shares of common stock of which approximately 79% will be issued to the present shareholders of Cliffs and approximately 21% to the preferred stockholders of the present Iron Company.

The proposed management of the New Company has stated that it presently intends to maintain the portfolio of steel stocks to be acquired from Cliffs in the form of stock and not to convert them into cash. It states that it has made no specific allocation of the funds to be acquired from Cliffs but that these funds will provide a source of funds for future corporate needs for the production and development of high and low grade ore reserves,[16] although it does not foreclose the possibility of the use of such funds for other purposes. Moreover this management does point out that the liquid assets possessed by the present Iron Company would be sufficient to provide funds for such purposes for several years.

The earnings of Cliffs have been derived from the dividends it receives from its portfolio of common stock of four different steel companies.[17] The Cliffs management points out, in advocating the plan, that the pro forma earnings on the 2¼ shares of the New Company's common stock which will be issued for each share of Cliffs stock would have, in every year but one between 1937 and 1946 inclusive, exceeded these earnings of Cliffs.[18] In fact, this appears to be the basis for its [15] The new sinking fund will take effect after 1956, or at the date all of the New Company's funded debt is retired, whichever date occurs first.

[16] In respect of the development of types of low grade ore, not now considered commercial partially because present beneficiation plants are not suited to the treatment of such types of ore, the company has expended only nominal amounts in investigating their commercial possibilities and at present has only a nominal allocation for this purpose. Although it is indicated that the development of such low grade ores will become increasingly important as high grade ores are exhausted by the ore industry in general, the commercal feasibility of processing low grade ores into a marketable grade has not been proven nor has it been determined that such beneficiation of low grade ores, even if technically feasible, can compete with high grade foreign ores which may be imported to this country in the future.

[17] It should be noted that for the last ten years the steel companies, the stocks of which are contained in the portfolio of Cliffs, have paid out only approximately 47% of their earnings as dividends after the preferred dividends requirements of such companies.

[18] By the term "pro forma earnings" we mean the earnings which would have accrued to the common stock of the New Company if the proposed consolidation had recommendation of the plan to the Cliffs shareholders. However, the management does point out that if the earnings on the present Iron Company common stock now held entirely by Cliffs had been available to Cliffs in such years, the aggregate of such earnings and the dividends received on the steel stocks held in the portfolio of Cliffs per each share of Cliffs would have exceeded in every year except 1938 the pro forma earnings on the 2¼ shares of the common stock of the New Company. These earnings could not have been realized by Cliffs because no dividends can be paid on its common stock of the Iron Company until the dividend arrearages and sinking fund deficits on the outstanding preferred stock are eliminated. However, as we have indicated, the Iron Company presently has net current assets and marketable steel stocks which it owns in its own right having an aggregate value as at December 31, 1946 of approximately $29,500,000. By the terms of the Iron Company's bank loans it must maintain, until such bank loans are paid, a net working capital position of at least $8,500,000. We do not know whether or not the working capital requirements of the company would require the retention of all or part of the remaining $21,000,000 of these assets. However, for the purpose of an analysis and on the assumption that such funds are not required as working capital, they would enable the Iron Company to meet immediately all of its dividend arrearages and to make substantial inroads on its sinking fund deficits. If we further assume, again only for the purpose of analysis, that the earnings for the Iron Company will continue at least at the same rate as for the year 1946 it might be that after several years the company would be able to meet not only its current dividend requirements and current sinking fund requirements, but also be able to eliminate through operations and possible acceleration by additional financing the remaining sinking fund deficit. If the liquid assets of $21,000,000 to which we have referred are needed for investment in been consummated on December 31, 1936. The figures used herein and other figures in this report in respect of the plan are predicated upon an assumed 100% acceptance of the plan.

The following table sets forth for each of the years 1937 to 1946, inclusive, the actual earnings for each share of Cliffs common stock, the earnings which would have accrued on the Iron Company common stock on a per share basis for Cliffs stock if such earnings had been legally available, the pro forma earnings per share of new common stock and the pro forma earnings available for the 2¼ shares of the new common stock.

the company's business, such investment may increase earnings. Furthermore, as all earnings in the future are directed to retirement of preferred stock and payment of current dividends and dividend arrearages, the value of the Iron Company's common stock owned by Cliffs will tend to increase as dividend arrearages and the sinking fund deficit decline. These matters are worthy of consideration by the Cliffs stockholder since they indicate a possibility that Cliffs may ultimately be enabled to obtain all of the earnings of the Iron Company common stock.

As against this possiblity in the indefinite future the proposed plan, if consummated, will make available to him as dividends, to the extent not needed in the business, 79% of future earnings in excess of $2,192,571, the total annual preferred dividend requirement. But this will cause a substantial change in his position.[19] In place of his position as a shareholder in an investment company having one class of securities representing a first claim on a portfolio of common stocks of four steel companies, and the common stock of the present Iron Company, he will become a common stockholder of a single company engaged primarily in the production and sale of iron ore. The common stock in such company will be subordinate to approximately $56,000,000 of funded debt and preferred stock. The steel stocks upon which he presently has a first claim become subject to the prior claims of the funded debt and preferred stock of the New Company.[20]

The question for the Cliffs shareholder to decide is whether the possibility of receiving larger earnings and dividends on the 2¼ shares of the common stock of the New Company than has been available for each share of Cliffs stock in the past, by reason of the lower dividend rate on the new preferred stock and the removal of the dividend arrears and sinking fund deficit as a block on dividends from the earnings of the Iron Company, is sufficient to outweigh the substantial change which occurs in his position.

We now discuss considerations which are important in formulating a judgment on this question.

First: The pro forma earnings of the New Company for the years 1937 to 1946 are useful merely as a guide to an estimate of the amount, regularity, stability and continuity of future earnings and dividends on the New Company's stocks. They should be considered in the light of the fact that most of the years in question were years of high steel production induced to a substantial degree by World War II. Furthermore, during the years in question, overall costs of operations have increased and profit margins have been reduced. It may be questioned that such increased costs can be lowered as rapidly as declines in sales, if such declines should occur.

19 We do not wish to imply that the preferred stockholders are not also making substantial concessions under the plan.

20 As at December 31, 1946, the aggregate of the net current assets of the combined company and its combined portfolio of steel stocks would have been slightly less than the aggregate preferential claim on liquidation of the New Company's funded debt and preferred stock. Dividends received on the combined portfolio for the year 1946 were insufficient to cover the preferred stock dividend requirement of the New Company so that part of such dividends would have had to have been met from earnings resulting from the company's ore operations.

Second: The company's operations depend largely upon the operations of the steel industry, an industry the operations of which are extremely cyclical in character. More particularly the New Company's operations will be dependent on the operations of the steel companies which will be included in the portfolio of the New Company and which will be the principal customers of the New Company. Moreover, ore production and sales in the past at least have tended to be somewhat more cyclical than steel production. Ore sales and production have had a tendency to drop at a somewhat greater pace than declines in steel production, although they also tend to rise at a greater pace than steel production.[31]

Third: The common stock of the New Company is what is known as a "leverage" stock because of the presence of substantial quantities of senior securities in its capitalization which have a prior fixed claim on the earnings of the company. The existence of this fixed claim on earnings operates to cause a greater proportion of change in the earnings applicable to common stock than occurs in the aggregate earnings

[31] Compare the schedule on page 11 of the Cliffs proxy statement indicating tons of ore sold by the Iron Company in typical years with total tons of steel production of ingots and castings in such years. It will be noted that in 1929 the Iron Company sold approximately 4,000,000 tons of ore and that in such year total production of ingots and castings by the steel industry aggregated approximately 63,000,000 tons. By 1932 sales of ore by the Iron Company had declined to 660,000 tons, a decline of approximately 83⅓% as against its sales in 1929 whereas steel production declined from 63,000,000 tons in 1929 to approximately 15,000,000 tons in 1932, a decline of about 76.2%. However, between 1939 and 1942 ore sales by the Iron Company rose much more rapidly than production by the steel industry in the same period and from 1942 to 1946 sales by the Iron Company of iron ore tended to remain around 5,000,000 tons during a period of the highest steel production in history.

The following statistics of ore production as against steel production at various stages in the cycle of such production also illustrate this phenomenon:

available for both preferred and common stock.[22] This leverage factor in the New Company's capital structure is further intensified by the fact that the portfolio of steel stocks to be held by the New Company are also leverage stocks, although not to the same degree as the New Company's common stock, because of the fact that the capitalization of these companies includes a greater proportion of common stock equity. Nevertheless, as we have already indicated, the company's ore operations are at least somewhat related to the operations of the portfolio companies and the leverage of the common stock of the New Company plus the cyclical character of the operations of the company and its customers will intensify the fluctuations in the earnings of the common stock upon increases and decreases in aggregate earnings available for both preferred and common stocks of the New Company.[23] Of course, as preferred stock of the New Company is retired this leverage factor will lessen in its effects.

The stock of Cliffs Corporation is not a "leverage" stock; Cliffs has no senior securities outstanding. Although the portfolio of steel stocks held by Cliffs consists of leverage stocks, such leverage is much less pronounced than that of the New Company's common stock.[24] From 22 For example, on a pro forma basis the New Company would have earned approximately $5,000,000 for the year 1946. The annual fixed dividend requirement on the preferred stock would have been approximately $2,200,000. Pro forma earnings of approximately $2,800,000 would have been available for the new common stock. If the aggregate earnings of $5,000,000 for both the preferred and common stock were to decline to approximately $3,000,000, a decline of approximately 40%, the preferred stock claim of approximately $2,200,000 would remain unchanged and the earnings on the common stock would be reduced to approximately $800,000, a decline of approximately 70%. If earnings increase, the earnings of the common stock would similarly be accelerated. In this connection the dividend restriction on common stock of the New Company should also be considered. Except to the extent new capital is furnished through issuance of new securities junior to the preferred, no dividends may be paid on common stock if after such payments the aggregate dividends on preferred and common, and purchases of common stock would exceed earnings subsequent to the consolidation plus $4,000,000.

23 The effect of the phenomena we have discussed is illustrated by an examination of the pro forma earnings of the New Company for the years 1937 to 1946 inclusive. It will be noted that such earnings for the period, 1937 to 1940 inclusive, fluctuated from a deficit of 51¢ per share in 1938 and an inability to earn the preferred stock dividend on the New Company stock in that year, to a high of $1.59 a share for the year 1937. Average earnings for the four year period were approximately 75¢ per share of the new common stock. Similarly, during the period 1941 to 1946, inclusive, a period of capacity or near capacity steel production, such earnings fluctuated from a low of 99¢ per share for 1943 to a high of $1.36 per share for 1946. Average pro forma earnings for this period were about $1.10 per share. It is to be noted also that the management's proposal to pay an initial dividend of 25¢ on each share of the New Company's common stock represents on an annual basis a dividend rate which could not have been earned in three of the ten years for which pro forma earnings are presented.

24 The following table is presented to indicate the ratio of senior securities existing at December 31, 1946 to the total capitalization of the four steel companies and the New Company.

this point of view, the dividend income of Cliffs will tend to be somewhat more stable and regular than earnings applicable to the New Company's common stock and will also tend to decline less drastically than the earnings applicable to the New Company's common stock.

Finally, an important question which Cliffs shareholders seek to resolve in reaching a judgment on the plan, particularly those who may not want to concentrate their investment in the iron-ore business, is how the immediate market price of the common stock of the New Company will compare with the present asset value of their Cliffs stocks. Obviously no one can forecast with accuracy what the market value of the common stock of the New Company will be. However, the following comments are worthy of consideration on this question. In our opinion, the applicable present value of the Cliffs common stock for the purpose of an analysis of the plan is the asset value of such stock, that is the underlying market value of the steel stocks and the fair value of the Iron Company's common stock (which the management has appraised as of December 31, 1946, for the purposes of compliance with the Investment Company Act of 1940, at $5 per share).[25] This value as at December 31, 1946, was approximately $34 per share and at May 1, 1947, was approximately $31 per share, in each case accepting as the value of the Iron Company common stock the valuation placed upon such stock by the management of Cliffs. This is the value of the assets which will actually be conveyed to the New Company if the requisite vote of the Cliffs stockholders is obtained.[26] Moreover, the management of Cliffs in its proxy statement has not foreclosed the possibility of dissolution if the proposed consolidation fails of consummation.

The average pro forma earnings per share of the New Company's common stock of 96¢ per share for the ten year period, 1937 to 1946 inclusive, would have to be capitalized at a rate of approximately 14 times in order to arrive at a market price for the New Company's 2¼ shares of common stock equal in value to the present asset value of each share of Cliffs stock. The pro forma average earnings of $1.10

25 This does not mean that we believe the management valuation necessarily represents the actual value of such stock. We accept such valuation merely for the purpose of our analysis. The board of directors in its resolution determining such fair value stated that the value of such stock is difficult to determine, being dependent in part on the value of the Iron Company's interest, directly and as a stockholder in other companies, in iron ore deposits of undetermined extent and value, and is subject to substantial differences of opinion.

26 The management of Cliffs has indicated in its proxy statement that the steel stocks owned by Cliffs will be taken on the books of the New Company at their market value at the date the consolidation is declared effective.

per share on the New Company's common stock for the year 1941-1946 inclusive (years of substantial steel production) would have to be capitalized at approximately 13 times such earnings in order to arrive at a market value approximately equivalent to the present asset value of each share of Cliffs stock. Similarly the proforma earnings of the 2¼ shares of the New Company's common stock for the year 1946 ($3.06) would have to be capitalized at a rate of approximately 10 times such earnings in order to arrive at a market price approximately equivalent to the market value of the assets of Cliffs attributable to each share of its stock.

In view of the high leverage and other characteristics of the New Company common stock, it is questionable that the market will at least initially capitalize the New Company's common stock at these rates of capitalization which would be necessary to have the immediate market price of the 2¼ shares of New Company common stock approach in amount the present asset value of each share of Cliffs stock.[27]

However, if the plan is not consummated and Cliffs is not dissolved, the Cliffs shareholder should recognize that the market value of his Cliffs stock has in the past been substantially less than the asset value of such stock.[28]

Conclusion

We have attempted to indicate for the consideration of Cliffs shareholder the more significant factors which he must evaluate in order to form a judgment on whether or not to assent to the plan. His alternatives are—

(1) To vote for the plan, in which case he must make the exchange if the plan is consummated.

(2) To vote against the plan or to refrain from voting, in which case he may make the exchange or exercise his appraisal rights under the Ohio Corporation Law if the plan is consummated.

Whether or not to assent to the plan is a question which the Cliffs stockholder must decide in accordance with his own business judgment. It is to be noted that if the plan does become effective, a non-assenting Cliffs shareholder who does not wish to accept the exchange is not

[27] The management of Cliffs does not contend that the immediate market value of the 2¼ shares of new common stock which each share of Cliffs stock will receive will be equal to the asset value of such stock. Instead, E. B. Greene, president of Cliffs, in a letter to its stockholders dated May 6, 1947, states:

"The management believes that the earnings and dividend possibilities of the new corporation's common stock outweigh any immediate stock market dollar advantage which might be gained through dissolution."

1941	20.59	11-7/8

offered, under the terms of the plan, in recognition of his right under the Ohio law to obtain the "fair cash value" of his shares, the alternative of receiving the asset value of his shares based on the market value of the steel stocks and the management's appraisal of the fair value of the Iron Company stock held by Cliffs.[29] Instead the plan, if ratified, would require such shareholder to follow strictly the statutory procedures prescribed by the Ohio law for asserting and enforcing his right to the "fair cash value" of his shares, a method which requires him to adhere to rather rigorous procedures and dead-lines and which may involve legal proceedings in Ohio courts.[30]

C. DISSOLUTION

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

§ 105. Dissolution without judicial proceedings. Any stock corporation, except a moneyed or railroad corporation (other than a railroad corporation which shall have conveyed all of its property, appurtenances and franchises, pursuant to lawful authority), may be dissolved at any time by the filing in the office of the secretary of state of a certificate which shall be entitled and endorsed "Certificate of 29 See footnote 24, supra.

30 The Ohio appraisal statute gives the Cliffs shareholder who does not vote in favor of the plan the right to the fair cash value of his shares as of the day before the vote on the plan. The procedure is as follows:

(1) Within 20 days after the day of the vote, such shareholder shall object in writing to the action taken and shall demand in writing the payment of the fair cash value of his shares, stating the number and kind of shares held, and the amount he claims is the fair cash value.

(2) Within 10 days after receiving the demand, the corporation shall inform such shareholder in writing whether it will pay the demanded amount, and, if it refuses to pay such amount, it shall offer in writing to pay an amount as and for such fair cash value.

(3) If the corporation shall not agree to pay the amount demanded by the shareholder, or the shareholder shall not agree to accept the amount offered by the corporation, either the corporation or the dissenting shareholder (if he followed the above procedure) may within 6 months from the day of the vote on the plan (and not thereafter) petition the Court of Common Pleas of Cuyahoga County, Ohio, to determine the fair cash value of his shares as of the day before the vote on the plan.

(4) If the petition is not filed within 6 months from the date of the vote, the fair cash value shall conclusively be deemed to be the amount the corporation offered to pay to the shareholder.

(5) If the petition is filed, the statute provides for a procedure involving a hearing on the petition, the appointment of three appraisers, a report by the appraisers, a hearing on the appraisers' report, and the determining of the fair cash value of the shares on the basis of the report.

(6) Payment shall be made within 30 days after the fair cash value is agreed upon or determined.

(7) The costs of the proceeding, including reasonable compensation to the appraisers to be fixed by the court, shall be assessed or apportioned as the court may consider equitable.

In this connection, it should be pointed out that 3,626 shareholders owning approximately 50.8% of the outstanding shares are located in states other than Ohio, the jurisdiction in which appraisal rights must be asserted.

8. Such corporation shall continue for the purpose of paying, satisfying and discharging any existing liabilities or obligations, collecting and distributing its assets and doing all other acts required to adjust and wind up its business and affairs, and may sue and be sued in its corporate name.

9. After paying or adequately providing for the liabilities and obligations of the corporation the directors, with the written consent of the holders of a majority of the outstanding shares of the corporation entitled to vote thereon, may sell the remaining assets or any part thereof to a corporation organized under the laws of this or any other state, and take in payment therefor the stock or bonds or both of such corporation and distribute them among the stockholders, in proportion to their interest therein, but no such sale shall be valid as against any stockholder who, within sixty days after mailing of notice to him of such sale, shall apply to the supreme court in the manner provided by section twenty-one, for an appraisal of the value of his interest in the assets so sold and unless within thirty days after such appraisal the stockholders consenting to such sale, or some of them, shall pay to such objecting stockholder or deposit for his account, in the manner directed by the court, the amount of such appraisal; upon such payment or deposit the interest of such objecting stockholder shall vest in the person or persons making such payment or deposit.

10. At any time after three years from the filing of the certificate of dissolution of a corporation heretofore or hereafter dissolved pursuant to this section, the surviving directors, or a majority of them, may give notice of the time and place for the presentation of all claims and demands against the corporation, which notice may require all creditors of and claimants against the corporation to present in writing and in detail at the place specified their respective accounts and demands to the directors by a day therein specified, which shall not be less than forty days from the first publication of such notice. 12. Notwithstanding the termination of the corporate existence of the corporation, any valid and subsisting claims and demands which shall have been filed as provided in paragraph ten of this section may be prosecuted, and any suits pending at the date of such termination of existence may proceed, against the surviving directors, as trustees, who may continue to be sued in the corporate name. Judgment when obtained in any such suit shall be binding upon all the property and assets of the dissolved corporation to the same extent as if such corporation had not been dissolved and ceased to exist; and the surviving directors, or a majority of them, and their successors, shall continue to have power to pay, compromise, defend and satisfy such claims, demands, suits and judgments, and to administer, sell and distribute the remaining assets of the corporation for the purpose of finally winding up its affairs.

NEW YORK GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

§ 103. Petition in case of deadlock. Unless otherwise provided in the certificate of incorporation, if a corporation has an even number of directors who are equally divided respecting the management of its affairs, or if the votes of its stockholders are so divided that they can not elect a board of directors, the holders of one-half of the stock entitled to vote at an election of directors may present a verified petition for dissolution of the corporation as prescribed in this article.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 39. Dissolution; Proceedings for:—If it should be deemed advisable, in the judgment of the Board of Directors, and most for the benefit of any corporation organized under this Chapter, that it should be dissolved, the said board, within ten days after the adoption of a resolution to that effect by a majority of the whole board at any meeting called for that purpose, of which meeting every director shall have received at least three days' notice, shall cause notice of the adoption of such resolution to be mailed to each stockholder of record having voting power, and also cause a like notice to be inserted in a newspaper published in the county wherein the corporation shall have its principal office in the State of Delaware, at least three weeks successively, once a week, next preceding the time appointed for the same, of a meeting of the stockholders having voting power, to be held at the office of the corporation, to take action upon the resolution so adopted by the Board of Directors, which meeting may, by consent of a majority in interest of the stockholders present in person or by proxy, having voting power, be adjourned or recessed from time to time. At said meeting a vote of the stockholders, having voting power, by ballot in person or by proxy, shall be taken for and against the proposed dissolution, which vote shall be conducted by two Judges appointed for the purpose, either by the directors or by the said meeting. Said judges shall decide upon the qualifications of voters, and accept their votes, and when the voting is completed, count and ascertain the number of shares voted respectively for and against the dissolution, and shall declare whether the persons or bodies corporate holding two-thirds of the voting stock of said corporation have voted for the proposed dissolution; and shall make out a certificate accordingly, stating the number of shares of stock having voting power issued and outstanding and entitled to vote thereon, and the number of shares voted for and the number of shares voted against the dissolution, respectively, and shall subscribe and deliver said certificate to the secretary of the corporation. If it shall appear by said certificate of the judges that the persons or bodies corporate holding two-thirds of the stock of said corporation having voting power have voted in favor of the dissolution, a certificate certifying that such dissolution has been authorized in accordance with the provisions of this section and the names and residences of the directors and officers shall be made under the seal of the corporation and signed by its President or a Vice-President and its Secretary or an Assistant Secretary, and the President or such Vice-President shall acknowledge the said certificate before an officer authorized by the laws of the State of Delaware to take acknowledgments of deeds; and the said certificate so executed and acknowledged shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State, who, upon being satisfied by due proof that the requirements aforesaid have been complied with, shall issue his certificate that such certificate has been filed, and the Secretary of State shall cause his certificate to be published in one issue in a newspaper published in the county wherein was situated the principal office in the State of Delaware of the dissolved corporation. The Secretary of State shall ascertain the charge for publishing the certificate of dissolution as aforesaid, and collect the amount from the corporation before the certificate of dissolution is issued, and upon the filing in the office of the Secretary of State of an affidavit of the manager or publisher of the said newspaper that said certificate has been published one time, in said newspaper, the corporation shall be dissolved.

Whenever all the stockholders, having voting power, shall consent in writing, either in person or by duly authorized attorney, to a dissolution, no meeting of stockholders shall be necessary, but on filing such consent in the office of the Secretary of State, he shall, as above provided, issue a certificate of dissolution, which shall be published as above provided. In the event that such consent is signed by an attorney, the original power of attorney or a photostatic copy thereof shall be attached to and filed with such consent.

Whenever the Secretary of State issues a certificate of dissolution it shall be recorded in the office of the Recorder of the County in which the principal office of the corporation was maintained.

This section shall apply only to proceedings for dissolution in which the resolution by a majority of the whole board of directors is adopted after the date of the approval of this Act. All proceedings for dissolution in which the resolution by a majority of the whole board of directors is adopted on or prior to the date of the approval of this Act shall be governed by the law in force immediately prior to the approval of this Act, which as to such proceedings and only such proceedings is continued in force and effect.

Sec. 42. Continuation of Corporation After Dissolution for Purposes of Suit, Etc.:—All corporations, whether they expire by their own limitation, or are otherwise dissolved, shall nevertheless be continued for the term of three years from such expiration or dissolution bodies corporate for the purpose of prosecuting and defending suits by or against them, and of enabling them gradually to settle and close their business, to dispose of and convey their property, and to divide their capital stock but not for the purpose of continuing the business for which said corporation shall have been established; provided, however, that with respect to any action, suit, or proceeding begun or commenced by or against the corporation prior to such expiration or dissolution and with respect to any action, suit or proceeding begun or commenced by or against the corporation within three years after the date of such expiration or dissolution, such corporation shall only for the purpose of such actions, suits or proceedings so begun or commenced be continued bodies corporate beyond said three-year period and until any judgments, orders, or decrees therein shall be fully executed.

1. EFFECT OF DISSOLUTION

"When a corporation is dissolved by expiration of the time limited in its charter, by a voluntary surrender of its charter, by a judgment forfeiting its charter, or in any other mode, it ceases to exist unless there is some statutory provision continuing its existence. It no longer has capacity or power to enter into contracts, to take, hold, or convey property to sue or be sued, or to exercise any other power. By statutes in most states its existence continues for windup purposes and the directors in office at the time of dissolution as statutory trustees or as directors are empowered to collect the assets, pay liabilities and distribute the surplus to the shareholders. Suits may be brought, continued or defended by them in the corporate name or in their own and other acts may be done so far as necessary for winding up the corporate enterprise." Ballantine, On Corporations, (Rev.Ed., Callaghan & Co., 1946) 722.

2. LIABILITY OF SHAREHOLDERS AND DIRECTORS FOR IMPROPER DISTRIBUTION

PIERCE et al. v. UNITED STATES.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1921. 255 U.S. 398, 41 S.Ct. 365.

Appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of Appeals affirming a decree of the District Court in favor of the United States in a creditor's suit, brought by the Government against stockholders to satisfy a fine recovered from their corporation.

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the court.

In 1907 the Waters Pierce Oil Company, a Missouri corporation, was indicted in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Louisiana under the Elkins Act (February 19, 1903, c. 708, § 2, 32 Stat. 847), for receiving rebates. In 1913 the Company sold and transferred all its property to the Pierce Oil Corporation; all the proceeds were paid to Henry S. Priest and Clay Arthur Pierce as trustees; and they distributed the same among the stockholders. Of these Henry Clay Pierce and the Pierce Investment Company, received millions in cash and stock and Clay Arthur Pierce a small amount. In 1914 the case under the Elkins Act was tried. The Company was convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of $14,000, and in the following year the judgment was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. 222 F. 69. An execution issued thereon to the marshal for that district and was returned nulla bona. Thereafter this bill in equity was brought by the United States in the Federal District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri against the Waters Pierce Oil Company, the trustees, and these three stockholders to obtain satisfaction of the judgment out of the money remaining in the hands of the trustees and that received by these stockholders. The District Court entered a decree dismissing the bill as against the Waters Pierce Company and the trustees, but granted, as against the stockholders named, the relief prayed by the Government. The decree was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, one judge dissenting. The case is brought here by these defendants, under § 241 of the Judicial Code. Reversal is sought on several grounds.

First. The ground for reversal most strongly urged is that the judgment imposing a fine on the Waters Pierce Company is not a debt on which a creditor's bill will lie. * * *

By § 1041 of the Revised Statutes it is provided (in addition to the power existing by general usage to commit a defendant to jail until his fine has been paid, see Ex parte Barclay, 153 F. 669) that judgments for penalties "may be enforced by execution against the property of the defendant in like manner as judgments in civil cases are enforced." The statute applies to all judgments for penalties, whether recovered by civil or criminal proceedings. A judgment creditor's bill is in essence an equitable execution comparable to proceedings supplementary to execution. See Ex parte Boyd, 105 U.S. 647. The law which sends a corporation into the world with the capacity to act imposes upon its assets liability for its acts. The corporation cannot disable itself from responding by distributing its property among its stockholders and leaving remediless those having valid claims. In such a case the claims after being reduced to judgments may be satisfied out of the assets in the hands of the stockholders. There is no good reason why the rule should be limited to judgments arising out of civil proceedings. * * *

Second. It is contended that the right to bring a creditor's bill did not exist, because the judgment against the Company was not entered in the trial court until a year after the company had divested itself of the property sought to be reached in this suit; and the Government did not become a creditor, at all events until after its claim for penalties had ripened into a judgment. But when a corporation divests itself of all its assets by distributing them among the stockholders, those having unsatisfied claims against it may follow the assets, although the claims were contested and unliquidated at the time when the assets were distributed. It is true that the bill to reach and apply the assets distributed among the stockholders cannot, as a matter of equity jurisdiction and procedure, be filed until the claim has been reduced to judgment and the execution thereon has been returned unsatisfied, Hollins v. Brierfield Coal & Iron Co., 150 U.S. 371, 14 S.Ct. 127; but, as a matter of substantive law, the right to follow the distributed assets (see Railroad Co. v. Howard, 7 Wall. 392, 409; Northern Pacific Ry. Co. v. Boyd, 228 U.S. 482, 33 S.Ct. 554; Kansas City Southern Ry. Co. v. Guardian Trust Co., 240 U.S. 166, 36 S.Ct. 334) applies not only to those who are creditors in the commercial sense, but to all who hold unsatisfied claims. A corporation cannot by divesting itself of all property leave remediless the holder of a contingent claim, or the obligee of an executory contract, Baltimore & Ohio Telegraph Co. v. Interstate Telegraph Co., 54 F. 50, or the holder of a claim in tort, Hastings v. Drew, 76 N.Y. 9; Jahn v. Champagne Lumber Co., 157 F. 407; and there is no good reason why the United States with a claim for penalties should be in a worse plight. Here the stockholders receiving the assets are in the position of volunteers; and there is not even the excuse that they were ignorant of the Government's claim. They were officers of the corporation, and the indictment was pending when the transfer of the assets was made. See Baltimore & Ohio Telegraph Co. v. Interstate Telegraph Co., supra. * * *

3. EQUITABLE LIMITATIONS ON THE RIGHT TO DISSOLVE

KAVANAUGH v. KAVANAUGH KNITTING CO., Inc.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1919. 226 N.Y. 185, 123 N.E. 148.

COLLIN, J. The plaintiff a minority stockholder in the defendant corporation, seeks a judgment enjoining the individual defendants, as directors of and majority stockholders in the corporation, from continuing the proceeding instituted, by the resolution of the directors, under section 221 of the General Corporation Law (Consol. Laws, c. 23) to dissolve the corporation and declaring void the resolution. The Special Term, upon the application of the defendants, made upon the pleadings by its order, which the Appellate Division has affirmed, dismissed his complaint. The question certified to this court by the order of the Appellate Division permitting the appeal is: "Does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action?"

The facts alleged in their substance and effect are: In December, 1912, the plaintiff and the defendants Kavanaugh organized, under the laws of this state, the defendant corporation, as a business corporation, with themselves as equal owners of the authorized 3,000 shares of its capital stock, and its sole directors. Such ownership of the stock shares has remained except the defendant Frederick W. Kavanaugh transferred on February 28, 1918, 5 shares to the defendant Button, qualifying him for directorship. The corporation has been exceedingly prosperous. Charles H. Kavanaugh has continuously been its president, Frederick W. Kavanaugh its secretary and treasurer until February, 1918, and, until May, 1917, the plaintiff its vice president. In May, 1917, at a special meeting of the stockholders, caused by the defendants Kavanaugh to be called for the purpose, the by-laws were so amended as to provide that a majority, instead of all, as originally provided, of the directors should constitute a quorum at any meeting of the directors, and the board of directors by a majority vote could remove any officer of the company, either with or without cause, at any regular or special meeting of the board. The last provision was adopted by the votes of the defendants Kavanaugh with the avowed purpose of forcing the plaintiff to resign, under threat of removal, from the office of vice president. The plaintiff thereupon resigned as vice president. At a regular meeting of the board of directors in June, 1917, the defendants Kavanaugh adopted a resolution whereby the compensation of each of the president and the secretary and treasurer was fixed at 20 per cent. of the corporate net earnings to date from January 1, 1917, before charging of any sum for depreciation of corporate property, that is, for the year 1917 at $89,526.20. The plaintiff had no knowledge or notice of the adoption of this resolution until about January 30, 1918. At the annual meeting of the stockholders in January, 1918, the defendants Kavanaugh elected the individual defendants directors. The defendant Button then was not a stockholder in, and for some years previous had been a bookkeeper for, the corporation. Thereupon Frederick W. Kavanaugh was elected vice president and treasurer and Button secretary of the corporation, and the compensation to the president, Charles H. Kavanaugh, and to the treasurer, Frederick W. Kavanaugh, of the year 1917 was continued for the year 1918. Upon the demand of the plaintiff that the resolutions so fixing the compensation be rescinded, the defendants Kavanaugh caused a resolution to be adopted at a special meeting of the stockholders approving the resolutions fixing the compensation to Frederick W. Kavanaugh, except the compensation for 1917 should be calculated from June 11, 1917, instead of from January 1, 1917. Frederick W. Kavanaugh did not vote the 995 shares owned by him. The 5 shares transferred by him to Button and the 1,000 shares owned by Charles H. Kavanaugh were voted in favor of the resolution. The shares of the plaintiff were voted against it. No action was taken concerning the compensation of Charles H. Kavanaugh. The compensation so voted is unfair and unreasonable, and enormously greater than is paid for similar services by similar or greater corporations. On April 15, 1918, the plaintiff began an action in the Supreme Court against those who are the defendants in this action to secure a judgment which, among other things, would declare void the resolutions fixing, and enjoin the payment of, the compensation so voted, or any compensation in excess of such sum as represented the reasonable and fair value of the services rendered by Charles H. Kavanaugh and Frederick W. Kavanaugh respectively. On April 26, 1918, the individual defendants, at a meeting of the board of directors, instituted the proceedings provided by section 221 of the General Corporation Law to dissolve the corporation. The directors then well knew the corporation was exceedingly prosperous and making enormous net profits. The corporation had contracts on hand for the year 1918, the performance of which would call for practically the entire output of its plant, and the net profit would in all likelihood be equal to, if not in excess of, the net profit for the year 1917. The board of directors did not adopt the resolution instituting the dissolution proceeding as the result of or through a bona fide and honest consideration of the facts affecting the general interests of the corporation and its stockholders, but in affirmative bad faith and for the sole purpose of permitting the defendants Charles H. Kavanaugh and Frederick W. Kavanaugh to dissolve the same against the will and desire of the plaintiff and for the purpose of depreciating the value of the corporate property and of the plaintiff's proportional interest therein. * * *

In the case at bar the persons whose votes as directors adopted the resolution advising the dissolution of the corporation are stockholders holding two-thirds of the stock of the corporation. Undoubtedly no trust relation ordinarily exists between the stockholders themselves or between the stockholders and the corporation, because the stockholders ordinarily are strangers to the management and control of the corporation business and affairs. The directors, generally speaking, are the exclusive executive representatives of the corporation, and are charged with the administration of its internal affairs and the management and use of its assets. The ordinary trust relation of the directors to the corporation and stockholders is not a matter of statutory law, or of technical law. It springs from the fact that the directors have the control and guidance of the corporate business, affairs, and property, and hence of the property interests of the stockholders. Equity, at least, recognizes the truth that the stockholders are the proprietors of the corporate interests and are ultimately the only beneficiaries thereof. Those interests are, in virtue of the law, intrusted, through the corporation, to the directors, and from that condition arises the trusteeship of the directors with the concomitant fiduciary obligations. The section 221 imposes upon the stockholders the ultimate determination of the important question whether or not the corporation shall be dissolved forthwith. The stockholders are bound to determine and control this particular part of the corporate affairs, in regard to which they occupy a relation of trust as between themselves and the corporation, and are burdened and restricted by fiduciary obligations. When a number of stockholders constitute themselves, or are by the law constituted, the managers of corporate affairs or interests, they stand in much the same attitude towards the other or minority stockholders that the directors sustain generally towards all the stockholders, and the law requires of them the utmost good faith. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. New York & Northern Railway Co., 150 N.Y. 410, 430, 44 N.E. 1043, 34 L.R.A. 76, 55 Am.St.Rep. 689; White v. Kincaid, 149 N.C. 415, 63 S.E. 109, 23 L.R.A.,N.S., 1177, 128 Am.St.Rep. 663; Ervin v. Oregon Ry. & Nav. Co. (C.C.) 27 F. 625. In taking corporate action under the statute, the stockholders are acting for the corporation and for each other, and they cannot use their corporate power in bad faith or for their individual advantage or purpose. J. H. Lane & Co. v. Maple Cotton Mills, 226 F. 692, 141 C.C.A. 448. In the instant case the consent of those who constitute the board of directors, expressed at the meeting of the stockholders held under the statute in favor of the dissolution will effect it. Ordinary intelligence does not permit the presumption that they hold two contradicting and mutually destructive opinions or that they as stockholders would destroy the proceeding which they as directors had instituted. The trust relation will rest upon them in the meeting of the stockholders and will be violated, in the absence of restraint, by the bad faith, the self-interests, and wrongful intent which the complaint avers induced their action as directors.

A court of equity will protect a minority stockholder against the acts or threatened acts of the board of directors or of the managing stockholders of the corporation, which violate the fiduciary relation and are directly injurious to the stockholders. The statute empowers the directors and stockholders, under the prescribed procedure, to dissolve the corporation. The plaintiff took his stock subject to the provisions of the statute. Judicial authority does not extend to enjoining the exercise of a right conferred by legislative authority. The courts cannot pass upon the question of the expediency of the dissolution; for that is the very question which the Legislature has authorized the board of directors and the stockholders to decide. They can, however, and will, whenever the facts presented to them in the appropriate action demand, inflexibly uphold and enforce, in accordance with established equitable principles, the obligations of the fiduciary relation. The good faith of the individual defendants is a proper and fundamental subject to be adjudged. Bad faith, fraud, or other breach of trust constitutes a foundation for equitable relief. * * *

The orders should be reversed, with costs in all courts, and motion denied, with costs, and the questions certified answered in the affirmative.

NEW YORK STOCK CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 36. Changes in respect to shares, capital stock or capital. A stock corporation may effect one or more of the following purposes:

(A) To increase or reduce the amount of its capital stock where all of the capital stock is divided into shares having a par value;

(B) To increase or reduce the par value of any of its shares that have a par value;

(C) To authorize new shares of any class, with or without par value, and the issuance from time to time in one or more series of the shares of any class which is preferred as to dividends or assets subject to the limitations prescribed in section eleven, or to eliminate any previously authorized shares;

(D) To change all or any of its previously authorized shares with or without par value, issued or unissued, into the same or a different number of shares of any class or classes or any series of any class or classes, either with or without par value, or into the same or a different number of both shares with par value and shares without par value, of any classes or series of any class or classes, and at its option by such change to add, alter or take away such rights as could be added, altered or taken away in a proceeding under paragraph (E) of this section;

(E) To classify or reclassify any shares, whether with or without par value. The creation, alteration or abolition, in whole or in part, of designations, preferences, privileges or voting powers of any shares previously authorized, or the restrictions or qualifications thereof (including the creation, alteration or abolition of any provisions or rights in respect of (a) the redemption of any shares, or (b) any cumulative or non-cumulative dividends, whether or not accrued, which shall not have been declared, or (c) any accumulated but unexpended installment of any sinking fund whether or not set aside for the redemption or purchase of any shares, or (d) any preemptive right to subscribe for shares or other securities of the corporation whether existing at law or contained in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law), shall be deemed to be a classification or reclassification of such shares for the purpose of this section and of sections thirty-seven and fifty-one, if effected under this paragraph (E) or paragraph (D) or by a reduction in the par value of such shares under paragraph (B);

(F) To change the statements respecting its capital, contained in its certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law, if the corporation be authorized to issue shares without par value;

(G) To reduce its capital so as to eliminate therefrom any or all of the amount thereof previously transferred thereto by resolution of the directors; or, if desired, and without limitation of the corporation's power to reduce its capital in any other lawful manner, to reduce such capital to a specified amount in connection with any change, reduction of par value or elimination of shares, or other proceeding to be accomplished by the certificate: * * *

Sec. 37. Subscription and authentication of certificate. A certificate filed pursuant to section thirty-six shall be either:

1. Subscribed and acknowledged by every subscriber of the certificate of incorporation and every subscriber to stock, and shall have annexed an affidavit by one of the subscribers of the certificate of incorporation to the effect that no stock has been issued and that the persons who have executed the certificate constitute all of the subscribers of the certificate of incorporation and all of the subscribers to stock; or

2. Subscribed and acknowledged, in person or by proxy by the holders of record of all of the outstanding shares of the corporation entitled to vote with relation to the proceedings provided for in the certificate, and shall have annexed an affidavit of the secretary or an assistant secretary, or in the case of a banking corporation which does not have a secretary or an assistant secretary, of the cashier or an assistant cashier, that the persons who have executed the certificate, in person or by proxy, constitute the holders of record of all of the outstanding shares of the corporation entitled to vote with relation to the proceedings provided for in the certificate; or

3. Subscribed and acknowledged by the president or a vice-president and the secretary or an assistant secretary, except in the case of a banking corporation which does not have a secretary or an assistant secretary, in which case it shall be subscribed and acknowledged by the president or a vice-president and the cashier or an assistant cashier. Such officers shall make and annex an affidavit stating:

(a) That they have been authorized to execute and file such certificate by the votes, cast in person or by proxy, of the holders of record of a majority of the outstanding shares entitled to vote at the stockholders' meeting at which such votes were cast, with relation to the proceedings provided for in the certificate, if the change be made under subdivision (A), (C) or (G) of section thirty-six, except as provided in the next paragraph;

(b) That they have been authorized to execute and file such certificate by the votes, so cast, of the holders of record of two-thirds of the outstanding shares entitled to vote at the stockholders' meeting at which such votes were cast, with relation to the proceedings provided for in the certificate, if the change is made under subdivision (C) of section thirty-six and authorizes the issuance of shares without par value by a corporation not theretofore authorized to issue shares without par value or authorizes the issuance of shares with par value by a corporation not theretofore authorized to issue shares with par value, or if the change is made under any subdivision of section thirty-six except (A), (C) or (G);

(c) If such certificate classifies or reclassifies outstanding shares of any class, or authorizes shares having preferences which are in any respect superior to the preferences of the outstanding shares of any class having preferences, or provides that shares of any class may be converted into shares of any other class or into shares of any other series of the same class, or alters the terms or conditions of shares of any class which are either convertible or issuable upon conversion, that they have also been authorized to execute and file the same by the votes, cast in person or by proxy, of the holders of record of two-thirds of the outstanding shares of each class which will be adversely affected by the proceedings provided for in the certificate and which was entitled to vote at the stockholders' meeting at which such votes were cast with relation to such proceedings; and

(d) That such votes were cast at a stockholders' meeting held on a date specified, upon notice pursuant to section forty-five of the stock corporation law.

4. [Reduction of capital.] If the amount of the capital be reduced by such certificate, or if issued shares be reduced as to par value or eliminated thereby, there shall be annexed thereto an affidavit of the president or a vice-president and also an affidavit of the treasurer or of a majority of the directors, stating either (a) that no distribution of assets to the stockholders will be made in connection with the proposed reduction, or (b) that the actual value of the assets of the corporation is not less than the total amount of the debts and liabilities of the corporation plus the proposed amount of its capital.

5. [Increase of aggregate par value]. If the aggregate par value of the issued shares having par value be increased by such certificate, there shall be annexed thereto an affidavit of the president or a vice-president and also an affidavit of the treasurer or an assistant treasurer or of a majority of the directors, stating that by resolution of the directors a sum at least equal to the amount of such increase has been transferred from surplus to capital.

Sec. 38. Provisions applicable to one or more proceedings under sections twenty-eight and thirty-six. The following provisions shall be applicable to a certificate under section twenty-eight or section thirty-six. * * *

3. [Filing certificates.] The certificate shall be filed in the office of the secretary of state, * * * and in every case a certified copy thereof or a duplicate original shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the county wherein the office of the corporation is located.

4. [Disposition of reduced capital.] No corporation, except as otherwise provided by law, shall make any distribution of its assets in connection with the reduction of its capital or the reduction of the par value or the elimination of any of its issued shares if the effect of such distribution will be to reduce the actual value of its assets to an amount less than the total amount of its debts and liabilities plus the amount, as reduced, of its capital. * * *

6. [Sale of no par value shares.] Shares without par value authorized pursuant to such section shall be sold for the consideration prescribed by the certificate authorizing the issuance of such shares; but in the absence of such a provision, the corporation, in accordance with section twelve, may sell its authorized shares without par value which are not substituted for outstanding shares.

7. [Statement of capital.] In case of every change of shares the provisions of the certificate of incorporation relating to the capital of the corporation must be complied with. If after the filing of the certificate the corporation is to have the statement respecting capital prescribed in paragraph B of subdivision four of section twelve of this chapter, in computing the capital the amount deemed to have been received for the issuance of shares without par value resulting from a change of previously authorized and issued shares shall be the amount of capital theretofore represented by the shares so changed or, if desired, any less amount stated in the certificate. No corporation which is to have such statement respecting capital shall change previously issued shares into both shares with par value and shares without par value unless the capital represented by the shares so changed exceeds the par value of the shares having par value resulting from such change; and the amount of such excess, or any less sum specified in the certificate, shall be deemed to have been received by the corporation for the issuance of the shares without par value resulting from such change.

8. [Effect on personal liabilities.] Except as any such liability shall be altered, eliminated or abolished by such certificate in accordance with the provisions of section thirty-six, the liability of the corporation, its officers, directors and stockholders for corporate debts contracted or obligations incurred prior to the filing of such certificate, shall be unaffected thereby, but for the purpose of enforcing and recovering upon any claim a creditor shall have the same right of recourse against the corporation, its officers, directors and stockholders that he would have had if such certificate had not been filed.

9. [Appraisal of stock—objecting stockholders.] If the certificate

(a) alters or abolishes any preferential right of any outstanding shares having preferences, affecting the holders of such shares adversely; or

(b) creates, alters or abolishes any provision or right in respect of the redemption of any outstanding shares or of any sinking fund for the redemption or purchase of any such shares, affecting the holders of such shares adversely; or

(c) limits or denies any pre-emptive right of the holders of any outstanding shares to subscribe for shares or other securities of the corporation, or alters or abolishes any provision affecting any such right contained in the certificate of incorporation or other certificate filed pursuant to law, so as to affect adversely the pre-emptive right of such holders; or

any holder of any such shares not in favor of such action may at any time prior to the vote authorizing such action—or if notice of the meeting to vote upon such action was not mailed to stockholders entitled to receive such notice at least twenty days prior to the taking of such vote, then within twenty days after the mailing of such notice —object to such action and demand payment for his stock, and thereupon such stockholder or the corporation shall have the right, subject to the conditions and provisions of section twenty-one, to have such stock appraised and paid for as provided in said section. Such objection and demand must be in writing and filed with the corporation. If the action is effected without a meeting, the time of such stockholder to file his objection and demand shall expire on the twentieth day after the mailing to such stockholder of a notice stating the nature of such action and the date on which a certificate pursuant to section thirty-six and executed as prescribed by subdivision two of section thirty-seven was filed.

10. [Increase of aggregate par value.] No corporation, except as otherwise provided by law, shall file such a certificate increasing the aggregate par value of its issued shares having par value, unless prior thereto the directors have by resolution transferred from surplus to capital a sum at least equal to the amount of such increase.

11. [Changes not effecting issue of new class.] Any changes that may be made in the designations, preferences, privileges or voting powers of the shares of any class previously authorized having preferences, or the restrictions or qualifications thereof, by the filing of any certificate which does not eliminate such shares or change them into shares of another class, shall not for the purpose of any statute or rule of law be deemed to effect an issue of a new class of stock.

DELAWARE GENERAL CORPORATION LAW

Sec. 26. Certificate of Incorporation; How Amended; When Corporation Has Capital Stock; When Corporation Has No Capital Stock:—Any corporation of this State existing prior to the tenth day of March, 1899, whether created by Special Act, or general law, or any corporation created under the provisions of this Chapter, may, from time to time, when and as desired, amend its Certificate of Incorporation by addition to its corporate powers and purposes, or diminution thereof, or both; or by substitution of other powers and purposes, in whole or in part, for those prescribed by its Certificate of Incorporation; or by increasing or decreasing its authorized capital stock or reclassifying the same, by changing the number, par value, designations, preferences, or relative, participating, optional, or other special rights of the shares, or the qualifications, limitations or restrictions of such rights, or by changing shares with par value into shares without par value, or shares without par value into shares with par value either with or without increasing or decreasing the number of shares; or by changing its corporate title; or by making any other change or alteration in its Certificate of Incorporation that may be desired, and any or all such changes or alterations may be effected by one certificate of amendment; provided that every Certificate of Incorporation as so amended, changed or altered, shall contain only such provisions as it would be lawful and proper to insert in an original Certificate of Incorporation made at the time of making such amendment.

Whenever issued shares having par value are changed into the same or a greater or less number of shares without par value, whether of the same or of a different class or classes of stock, the aggregate amount of the capital of the corporation represented by such shares without par value shall be the same as the aggregate amount of capital represented by the shares so changed; and whenever issued shares without par value are changed into other shares without par value to a greater or less number, whether of the same or of a different class or classes, the amount of capital represented by the new shares in the aggregate shall be the same as the aggregate amount of capital represented by the shares so changed. The certificate of amendment of any Certificate of Incorporation effecting any change in the issued shares of the corporation shall set forth that the capital of the corporation will not be reduced under or by reason of said amendment.

Every such amendment shall be made and effected in manner following, to-wit:

1. If the corporation has a capital stock, its Board of Directors shall adopt a resolution setting forth the amendment proposed, declaring its advisability, and calling a meeting of the stockholders entitled to vote in respect thereof, for the consideration of such amendment. Said meeting shall be called and held upon such notice as the certificate of incorporation or by-laws of the corporation shall provide, or, in the absence of such provision, upon notice thereof to each stockholder so entitled to vote, either delivered to such stockholder or mailed to him, at his postoffice address, if known, at least ten days before the date fixed for said meeting, said notice to set forth such amendment in full or a brief summary of the changes to be effected thereby, as the directors shall deem advisable. At said meeting a vote of the stockholders so entitled to vote, by ballot, in person or by proxy, shall be taken for and against the proposed amendment, which vote shall be conducted by two Judges appointed for the purpose, either by the directors or by the said meeting. Said Judges shall decide upon the qualifications of voters, and accept their votes, and when the vote is completed, count and ascertain the number of shares voted respectively for and against the amendment, and shall declare whether the persons or bodies corporate holding the majority of the voting stock of said corporation (or of each class of stock entitled to vote thereon, when such vote is to be taken by classes) have voted for or against the proposed amendment; and shall make out a certificate accordingly, stating the number of shares of stock, issued and outstanding and entitled to vote thereon, and the number of shares voted for and the number of shares voted against the amendment respectively, and shall subscribe and deliver said certificate to the Secretary of the corporation. If it shall appear by said Certificate of the Judges that the persons or bodies corporate holding the majority of the stock of said corporation entitled to vote (or of each class of stock when such vote is to be taken by classes) have voted in favor of the amendment, a certificate setting forth the amendment and certifying that such amendment has been duly adopted in accordance with the provisions of this Section shall be made under the seal of the corporation and signed by its President or a Vice-President, and its Secretary or an Assistant Secretary and the President or such Vice-President shall acknowledge the said certificate before an officer authorized by the laws of Delaware to take acknowledgments of deeds; and the said certificate, so executed and acknowledged shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State, and a copy thereof, certified by said Secretary of State, shall be recorded in the office of the Recorder of the County in which the original Certificate of Incorporation is recorded; or if the corporation shall have been created by special public act of the Legislature, then said certificate shall be recorded in the office of the Recorder of any County where the business of the said corporation may be conducted. And upon so filing and recording the same, the Certificate of Incorporation of said corporation shall be deemed to be amended accordingly; provided, however, that if any such proposed amendment would alter or change the preferences, special rights or powers given to any one or more classes of stock, by the Certificate of Incorporation, so as to affect such class or classes of stock adversely, or would increase or decrease the amount of the authorized stock of such class or classes of stock, or would increase or decrease the par value thereof, then the holders of the stock of each class of stock so affected by the amendment shall be entitled to vote as a class upon such amendment, whether by the terms of the Certificate of Incorporation such class be entitled to vote or not; and the affirmative vote of a majority in interest of each such class of stock so affected by the amendment shall be necessary to the adoption thereof, in addition to the affirmative vote of a majority of all other stock entitled to vote thereon; and provided, further that the amount of the authorized stock of any such class or classes of stock may be increased or decreased by the affirmative vote of the holders of a majority of the stock of the corporation entitled to vote, if so provided in the original Certificate of Incorporation or in any amendment thereto which created such class or classes of stock or in any amendment thereto which was authorized by a resolution or resolutions adopted by the affirmative vote of the holders of a majority of such class or classes of stock. * * *
